

CHAPTER V

Part V: DANIEL, & TWELVE MINOR PROPHETS: HOSEA-MALACHI.

Part V: DANIEL-MALACHI: Prophetical Books: Daniel & Twelve: Minor-Smaller-Shorter Prophets.

BOOK OF DANIEL: Prophet-Ruler.

In the 3rd year of King Jehoiakim of Judah, King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon besieged it. The 'Lord' (Adonai, as a substitute for Yehowah, Jehovah, Yah) gave King Jehoiakim into his hand, with some of the vessels of 'God's' House (Beth-haElohim, House of the God); who carried them to the Land of Shinar (Babylonia: southeastern Mesopotamia between the Tigris & Euphrates Rivers (modern southern Iraq from around Baghdad to the Persian Gulf)) to his 'god's' (elohim) house: also he took the vessels into the treasure-house of his 'god' (elohim). The King told Ashpenaz the Master (Rab as in Rabbi; lord, master, great-one, chief, teacher) of his eunuchs, to select of the Israelites, of the Royal-seed & Nobles, attractive & healthy youths, intelligent, educated, experienced, & scholarly, suitable to stand in the King's Palace (his Court); to teach them the learning & language of the Chaldeans (Kassedim of Dim, as in Ur of the Chaldees of Chaldea; 'I' is variant pronunciation; historically its roots are not clear, perhaps lost after the Sumerians (southern Mesopotamia) were dominated by the Akkadians (northern Mesopotamia)). {See: Gesenius, RBDB, 1907; also 1906 abridged: "n. pr. gent, et terr. Kasdim= Chaldeans, Chaldea, (As. (mat) Kaldu, 'Kaldu'; fr. earlier (Bab.) form [Kasdu*]'—'s' before dental becoming 'I'). 1. 'Chaldeans': a. people dwelling on lower Euphrates & Tigris; in n. pr. loc. b. esp. people ruled by Nebuchadnezzar; bath-k' = [daughter of Kasedim, Chaldea] Babylon (in dirge). c. Chaldeans as learned class, skilled in interpretations Dn 2:2. 2. 'Chaldea', & Chaldea shall be despoiled." The King appointed their daily meals from the royal menu, and of his wine, for three years; that they may stand before the King. Among these captives, Jews of Judah, were Daniel, Hananiah, Mishaël, & Azariah.

(Note: "023: 3rd yr: King Jehoiakim's reign. He rebels against King of Babylon. Pharaoh Neco defeated (battle at Carchemish). King Nabopolassar dies. King Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem. 024: 4th yr: King Jehoiakim's reign. 1st yr: King Nebuchad(n,r)ezzar's reign. 1st yr: 70 Years Captivity Begins. Jeremiah's Prophecies recorded in a Book. (Jeremiah's 23rd yr of ministry) (Daniel, Hananiah, Mishaël, and Azariah (in their late teens or early twenties) & other Jews taken captive to Babylon) (Daniel @ 20) 025: 5th yr: King Jehoiakim's reign. 2nd yr: King Nebuchadnezzar's reign.) 2nd yr of the 70 Years Captivity. (King Nebuchadnezzar's Dream of Great Image of an Imperial Man; Daniel interprets the Dream of Empires or Kingdoms: Babylon, Medes-Persians, Greeks, & Romans. Daniel made Ruler of Babylon's Province.) (Ezekiel @ 20.)") The Prince of the eunuchs renamed them: Daniel was Belteshazzar; Hananiah was Shadrach; Mishaël was Meshach; & Azariah was Abed-nego. Daniel determined not to defile himself with the royal meals or wine: he requested of the Chief of the eunuchs to avoid defilement by abstinence from the royal menu. God (haElohim) favored Daniel to the Head of the eunuchs; he said to Daniel: 'I fear my Lord, the King, who appointed your meals & drinks: why should he see your faces looking worse than the youths your age? my head would be endangered with the King'. Daniel told the Steward, appointed by the Prince of the eunuchs over the 4 of them: 'please, test yur servants, 10 days; let us have vegetables or grains with water. Then compare our faces to the youths eating of the royal menu; then decide'. He listened to them, and tested them for 10 days. Afterwards their faces appeared healthier, & more wholesome, than the other youths. So the Steward substituted for them the royal meals & wine for pulse. God (haElohim) gave these 4 youths knowledge & skill in all the learning & wisdom: & Daniel had understanding in visions & dreams. At the end of King's appointed days, of 3 years, the Prince of the eunuchs led them to stand before Nebuchadnezzar. The King conversed with them; and among all the youths were none like Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, & Azariah: so they continued to stand before the King, in his Court. In all matters of wisdom & understanding that the King inquired of them, he found them 10 times better than the magicians & enchanters (scribes, diviners, astrologers, scholars, experts, sages; conjurer, necromancer) in all his realm. Daniel continued in captivity to 1st year of King Cyrus, at the 70th year of the Babylonian Captivity, and about the time of his death in his 80s.

In the 2nd year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar: Nebuchadnezzar dreamed dreams; his spirit was troubled & he was sleepless. The King commanded to call the magicians, enchanters, sorcerers, & Chaldeans, to tell him his dreams. They stood before the King: he related, I dreamed, my spirit is troubled to know the dream. The Chaldeans replied to the King in Syriac (Aramaic): 'King, live forever, tell yur servants the dream, and we'll reveal the interpretation'. The king told them 'he's forgotten it; if they cannot reveal the dream & its interpretation, they'll be cut in pieces, their houses become dunghill. If they reveal both, they'll be rewarded & honored'. They answered again as before; he replied that 'he knows that they are stalling for time, because he doesn't remember the dream. But if they cannot reveal the dream, there is only one law for them; for they prepared lying & corrupt words to tell him, till the time is changed; so he demands no more delay'. The Chaldeans answered: 'No man on earth can show the King's demand, so no king, lord, or ruler, has ever demanded such a thing from magician, enchanter, or Chaldean. The King requires a rare thing, no one can reveal it to the King, except the 'Gods' \(Elahin, Elohim\), whose dwelling is not with flesh'. He was angry & furious, he ordered to destroy all the wise men of Babylon. The decree went forth for the wise men must be slain; they searched for Daniel & his companions to be slain. Daniel wisely asked Arioch, Captain of the King's Guard, who was executing the King's order to slay the wise men of Babylon: why is the King's decree so urgent? Arioch told him. Daniel went & requested a set time to give the interpretation to the King. He returned home, and related the thing to his 3 companions; to desire mercies of the God (Ellah, Eloah, Allah) of heaven concerning this secret (mystery, problem); that they would not be slain along with rest of the wise men of Babylon. The secret was revealed to Daniel in a night vision. He blessed the God (Elah, Ellah, Allah) of Heaven: 'Blessed be the Name of God \(Elah\) for ever & ever; for wisdom & might are His. He changes the times and the seasons; He removes kings, and sets up kings; He giveth wisdom to the wise, and knowledge to them that have understanding; He reveals the deep and secret things; He knows what is in the darkness, and the light dwells with Him. I thank Thee, and praise Thee, O Thou God \(Elah\) of my fathers, Who has given me wisdom & might, and has now made known to me what we desired of Thee; for Thou has made known to us the King's matter.' Daniel went to Arioch, appointed by the King to destroy the wise men of Babylon; he told him not to destroy the wise men; to lead him to the King to reveal the interpretation. The King asked Daniel (Belteshazzar), 'Can yu tell me my dream & its interpretation'? He replied to the King, 'The King's mystery the wise men, enchanters, magicians, & soothsayers cannot reveal to the King; but their is a God \(Elah\) in heaven That reveals secrets, He has revealed to King Nebuchadnezzar what will occur in the latter days \(end times\)'.

Thy Dream, & the Visions of thy head on thy bed, are these: as for thee, King, thy thoughts on thy bed, what should be hereafter; and He That reveals secrets has made known to thee what shall be. But as for me, this secret \(mystery\) is not revealed to me for any wisdom that I have more than any living, but to the intent that the interpretation may be revealed to the King, to know the thoughts of thy heart. Thou, King, saw, a Great Image. This Image, which was mighty, and whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee; its aspect was terrible \(awesome\). As for this image, its Head was of fine Gold, its Breast & its Arms of Silver, its Belly & its Thighs of Brass, its Legs of Iron, its Feet part of Iron, & part of Clay. Thou saw till a Stone was cut out without hands, which smote the Image upon its Feet of Iron & Clay, and brake them in pieces. Then was the Iron, Clay, Brass, Silver, & gold, broken in pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors; and the wind carried them away, so that no place was found for them: and the Stone that smote the Image became a Great Mountain, and filled the whole earth. This is the Dream; and we will tell its Interpretation to the King. Thou, King, are King of Kings, to whom the God (Ellah) of heaven has given the (1st) Kingdom, power, strength, & the glory; and wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field & the birds of the heavens He has given into thy hand, and has made thee to rule over them all: thou art the Head of Gold. And after thee shall arise another (2nd Silver) Kingdom inferior to thee; and another third (3rd) Kingdom of Brass, which shall bear rule over all the earth. And the fourth (4th) Kingdom shall be strong as Iron, forasmuch as Iron breaks in pieces and subdues all things; and as Iron that crushes all these, shall it break in pieces & crush. And whereas thou saw the Feet & Toes, part of potters' Clay, & part of Iron, it shall be a divided Kingdom; but there shall be in it of the strength of the Iron, as thou saw the Iron mixed with miry Clay. And as the Toes of the Feet were part of Iron, and part of Clay, so the Kingdom shall be partly strong, & partly broken. And whereas thou saw the Iron mixed with miry Clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men; but they shall not cleave one to another, even as Iron does not mingle with Clay. And in the days of those Kings shall the God (Ellah) of heaven set up a (5th) Kingdom which shall never be destroyed, nor shall its sovereignty be left to another people; but it shall break in pieces & consume all these Kingdoms, and it shall stand forever. As thou saw a Stone was cut out of the Mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the Iron, Brass, Clay, Silver, & the Gold; the Great God (Elah Rab) has revealed to the King what shall be hereafter: the Dream is certain, & its Interpretation sure.'

King Nebuchadnezzar prostrated, worshipped (bowed, revered, honored) Daniel, and commanded to offer an oblation & sweet odors to him. The King responded to Daniel: 'Truth, your God (Elah) is the God of Gods (Elah Elahin), the Lord of Kings, & Revealer of secrets, Who enabled you to reveal this secret (mystery)'. The King made Daniel Great (Rabi, that is, Rabbi Daniel); gave him many great gifts, and made him to rule over the whole province of Babylon, and to be Chief Governor over the wise-men of Babylon. Daniel requested of the King, and he appointed Shadrach, Meshach, & Abed-nego, over the affairs of the province: Daniel stayed in the King's Gate.

King Nebuchadnezzar, made an Image (tzelem, statue, likeness, monument, pillar) of Gold, whose height was 60 cubits (90 feet, cubit @ 1 1/2', or 18"), its width 6 cubits (9'): he set it up in the Plain of Dura, (near modern Babli Al Hillah near Euphrates River southwest of Baghdad) in the province of Babylon. King Nebuchadnezzar summoned the satraps, deputies, governors, judges, treasurers, counselors, sheriffs, & all the rulers of the provinces, to the dedication of the Image he erected; they came to his dedication. The Herald proclaimed:

'It is Commanded. Peoples, Nations, & Languages: When you hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, you fall down and worship the Golden Image that King Nebuchadnezzar has stood up; and those who refuse to prostrate & worship will be immediately thrown into the fiery furnace'.

At that time, some Chaldeans brought accusation against the Jews. They presented to King Nebuchadnezzar: 'Forever live the King! The King has made a decree, that everyman to bow & worship the Golden Image on hearing the musical presentation (orchestra); and those who refuse must be thrown into the fiery furnace. Certain Jews thou has appointed over the affairs of the province of Babylon: Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego; these men, King, have disregarded thee: they serve not thy Gods (Elahin), nor worship the Golden Image which thou hast set up'. Nebuchadnezzar in rage & fury ordered to bring them to stand before him, & they came: Nebuchadnezzar asked them, 'What is your reason that ye serve not my 'God' (Elah), nor worship the Golden Image which I have set up? Be ready to fall down & worship the Image which I have made: but if ye worship not, ye shall be cast the same hour into the midst of a burning fiery furnace; and who is that 'god' (elah) that shall deliver you out of my hands? They answered: 'King Nebuchadnezzar, we have no need to answer thee in this matter. Our God (Elah) Whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace; and He will deliver us out of thy hand. But if not, be it known unto thee, King, that we will not serve thy 'gods' (elahin), nor worship the Golden Image which thou has set up'. Nebuchadnezzar, enraged, his facial expression changed against them: he ordered the furnace to be heated up 7 times hotter than usual; he commanded certain mighty men that were in his army to bind Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, to throw them into the burning fiery furnace. They were bound in their underclothing, robes, mantles, & garments, and were thrown into the midst of the burning fiery furnace. Because the King's commandment was urgent, the furnace exceeding hot, the flame of the fire scorched those men that carried them. These three men fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace. Then King Nebuchadnezzar was astonished, rose up in haste: he spake and said unto his counsellors, 'Did not we throw three men bound into the midst of the fire'? They answered the King, 'True'; he said, 'I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they are not hurt; and the aspect (form) of the 4th is like a son of the 'gods' (bar-elahin)'. Then Nebuchadnezzar came near to the mouth of the burning fiery furnace: he called, 'Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, you servants of the Most High God (Elaha Illaiah Illaah, or compare Abram's expression to Melchizedek: El Elyon), come forth, and come here'. They came forth out of the midst of the fire. And the satraps, deputies, governors, & the King's counsellors, being gathered together, saw these men, that the fire had no power upon their bodies, nor was the hair of their head singed, neither were their clothes changed, nor had the smell of fire passed on them. Nebuchadnezzar said, 'Blessed be the God (Elah) of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, Who hath sent His Angel (Messenger, Malachah), and delivered His Servants that trusted in Him, and have changed the King's word, and have yielded their bodies, that they might not serve nor worship any 'god' (elah), except their own God (Elah). Therefore I make a decree, that every people, nation, and language, which speak anything amiss against the God (Elah) of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill; because there is no other 'god' (elah) that is able to deliver after this sort'. The King promoted Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego in the province of Babylon. [The next 3 verses: 4:1-3, is in the Hebrew Text 3:31-33.]

'King Nebuchadnezzar, to all the peoples, nations, & languages, that dwell in all the earth: Peace be multiplied unto you. It seemed good to me to show the signs & wonders that the Most High God hath wrought toward me. How great are His signs! and how mighty are His wonders! His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and His dominion is from generation to generation'. 'I, Nebuchadnezzar, was at rest in my house, flourishing in my palace. I saw a dream which made me afraid; the thoughts on my bed & the visions of my head troubled me. I made a decree to bring in all the wise men of Babylon before me, to make known to me the interpretation of the dream. Then came in the magicians, the enchanters, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers; and I told the dream to them; but they did not reveal to me its interpretation. At last Daniel, Belteshazzar, according to the name of my 'god' (elah), came in before me, in whom is the 'spirit (ruach) of the holy 'gods' (elahin): and I told the dream to him: 'Belteshazzar, Master of the magicians, I know that the spirit (ruach) of the holy gods (elahin) is in thee, no secret troubles thee: tell me the visions of my dream, & its interpretation'. The Visions of my head on my bed: I saw a Tree in the midst of the earth; and its height was great. The Tree grew, & was strong, its height reached to heaven, the sight of it to the end of the earth. Its leaves were fair, its fruit much, and in it was food for all: the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the birds of the heavens dwelt in its branches, all flesh was fed from it. I saw in the Visions of my head on my bed, a Watcher & a Holy One came down from heaven. He cried aloud: 'Hew down the Tree, and cut off its branches, shake off its leaves, scatter its fruit: let the beasts get away from under it, and the fowls from its branches. Leave the stump of its roots in the earth, even with a band of iron & brass, in the tender grass of the field; let it be wet with the dew of heaven: let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth: let his heart be changed from man's, let a beast's heart be given to him; let seven (7) times pass over him. The sentence is by the decree of the Watchers, the demand by the word of the Holy Ones; to the intent the living may know the Most High rules in the Kingdom of men, and gives it to whomsoever He will, and setteth up over it the lowest of men'. This dream I, King Nebuchadnezzar, have seen; and thou, Belteshazzar, declare the interpretation, for all the wise men of my Kingdom are not able to make known to me the interpretation; but thou are able; for the spirit of the holy 'gods' (elahin) is in thee'. Then Daniel, Belteshazzar, was stricken dumb for a while, his thoughts troubled him. The King responded, 'Belteshazzar, let not the dream, or the interpretation, trouble thee'. Belteshazzar answered, 'My Lord, the dream be to them that hate thee, and its interpretation to thine adversaries: The Tree that thou saw, which grew, & was strong, whose height reached to heaven, its sight to all the earth; whose leaves were fair, its fruit much, and in it was food for all; under it the beasts of the field dwelt, on whose branches the birds of the heavens had their habitation: it is thou, King, that art grown & become strong; thy greatness is grown, it reacheth to heaven, thy dominion to the end of the earth. The King saw a Watcher and a Holy One coming down from heaven, saying, 'Hew down the Tree, destroy it; leave the stump of its roots in the earth, with a band of iron & brass, in the tender grass of the field, let it be wet with the dew of heaven: let his portion be with the beasts of the field, till 7 times pass over him'; this is the interpretation, King, it is the decree of the Most High, which is come on my Lord the King: that thou shall be driven from men, thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, thou shall eat grass as oxen, shall be wet with the dew of heaven, 7 times shall pass over thee; till thou know the Most High rules in the Kingdom of men, and gives it to whomsoever He will. They commanded to leave the stump of the roots of the Tree: thy Kingdom shall be sure to thee, after thou shall learnt that the heavens do rule. So, King, let my counsel be acceptable to thee, break off thy sins by righteousness, thine iniquities by showing mercy to the poor; if there may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity'. All this came upon King Nebuchadnezzar. At the end of twelve (12) months he was walking in the Royal Palace [Hanging Gardens] of Babylon. The King boasted, 'Is not this Great Babylon, which I have built for the Royal Dwelling-place, by the might of my power and for the glory of my majesty'? While the word was in the King's mouth, there fell a Voice from heaven: 'King Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken: The Kingdom is departed from thee: thou shall be driven from men; thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field; thou shalt be made to eat grass as oxen; 7 times shall pass over thee; until thou learn the Most High rules in the Kingdom of men, He gives it to whomsoever He will'. The same hour was the thing fulfilled on Nebuchadnezzar: he was driven from men, he did eat grass as oxen, his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hair was grown like eagles', his nails like birds'. 'At the end of the days [not years; 7 times may be days, weeks, months, seasons, years; only if we are told explicitly or implicitly can we be certain; inferences or eisegesis must be avoided] I, Nebuchadnezzar, lifted up mine eyes to heaven, mine understanding returned to me, I blessed the Most High, I praised & honored Him That liveth for ever; for His Dominion is an everlasting dominion, and His Kingdom from generation to generation; the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing; He does according to His will in the Army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou? At the same time mine understanding returned to me; the glory of my kingdom, my majesty & brightness returned to me; my counsellors & my lords sought to me; I was re-established in my Kingdom, and excellent greatness was added to me. I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise, extol, & honor the King of heaven; for all His works are truth, and His ways justice; and those that walk in pride He is able to abase'.

King Belshazzar made a great feast for 1,000 of his Lords (rabreban, rabrebon fr. rab = great ones, masters, etc.), and drank wine with them. Belshazzar, while he tasted the wine, commanded to bring the golden & silver vessels which his father Nebuchadnezzar took from the Temple at Jerusalem; that the King & his Lords, his wives & his concubines, might drink therefrom. Then they brought the golden vessels that were taken out of the Temple of God's House (Beth Elaha) which was at Jerusalem; and they all drank from them. They drank wine, praised the 'gods' (elahin) of gold, silver, brass, iron, wood, & of stone. In the same hour appeared the Fingers of a man's hand, and wrote opposite the candlestick (lampstand. menorah) on the plaster of the wall of the King's Palace: the King saw the part of the Hand that wrote. The King's countenance was changed, his thoughts disturbed him; the joints of his loins were loosed, his knees touched one another. The King shouted to bring in the enchanters, the Chaldeans, the soothsayers. The King spoke to the wise men of Babylon, 'Whoever shall read this writing, and show me its interpretation, shall be clothed with purple, and have a chain of gold about his neck, and shall be the 3rd Ruler in the Kingdom'. All the King's wise men came in, but they could not read the writing, nor reveal to the King the interpretation. King Belshazzar was greatly troubled, his facial expression changed, his lords were perplexed. The Queen by reason of the words of the King and his Lords came into the banquet house: the Queen said, 'King, live forever; let not thy thoughts trouble thee, nor let thy countenance be changed. There is a man in thy Kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy 'gods' (elahin); in the days of thy father light, understanding & wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods (elahin), were found in him; King Nebuchadnezzar thy father, the King, made him Master (Rab) of the magicians, enchanters, Chaldeans, and soothsayers; forasmuch as an excellent spirit, knowledge, understanding, interpreting of dreams, showing of dark sentences, and dissolving of doubts, were found in the same Daniel, whom the King renamed Belteshazzar. Let Daniel be called, and he will reveal the interpretation'. Daniel was brought in before the King. The King asked Daniel, 'Are thou that Daniel, who is of the children of the Captivity of Judah, whom the King, my father, brought out of Judah? I have heard of thee, that the spirit of the 'gods' (elahin) is in thee, that light, understanding, & excellent wisdom are found in thee. The wise men & enchanters have been brought in before me, to read this writing, and reveal to me its interpretation; but they could not reveal the interpretation of the thing. But I have heard of thee, that thou can give interpretations & dissolve doubts; now if thou can read the writing, and reveal to me its interpretation, thou shall be clothed with purple, with a chain of gold about thy neck, and shall be the 3rd Ruler in the Kingdom'. Daniel answered the King, 'Let thy gifts be to thyself, and give thy rewards to another; I will read the writing for the King, & reveal to him the interpretation: Thou King, the Most High God (Elaha Illaia Illaah) gave thy father Nebuchadnezzar the Kingdom, greatness, glory, & majesty: because of the greatness that He gave him, all the peoples, nations, & languages trembled and feared before him: whom he would he slew, whom he would he kept alive; whom he would he raised up, whom he would he put down. When his heart was lifted up, and his spirit was hardened so that he dealt proudly, he was deposed from his kingly Throne, and they took his glory from him: he was driven from the sons of men, his heart was made like the beasts', his dwelling was with the wild donkeys; he was fed with grass like oxen, his body was wet with the dew of heaven; till he learnt that the Most High God (Elaha Illaia Illaah) rules in the Kingdom of men, and that He sets up over it whomever He will. Thou, his son, Belshazzar, has not humbled thy heart, though thou knew all this, but hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of Heaven (Mareh-Shemaia); they have brought the vessels of His House before thee, and thou & thy lords, thy wives & thy concubines, have drunk wine from them; thou hast praised the 'gods' (elahin) of silver, gold, brass, iron, wood, stone, which see not, nor hear, nor know; the God (Elah) in Whose Hand thy breath is, and Whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified. Then was the part of the Hand sent from before him, and this writing was inscribed. This is the writing that was inscribed: MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE: God (Elaha) has numbered thy Kingdom, and brought it to an end; TEKEL: thou are weighed in the balances, and are found deficient. PERES: thy Kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes & Persians. Then commanded Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel with purple, put a chain of gold about his neck, made proclamation concerning him, that he should be the 3rd ruler in the Kingdom. In that night Belshazzar the Chaldean King was slain. [5:31 = 6:1 Heb.]

Darius the Mede took the Kingdom, being about 62 years old.

It pleased Darius to set over the Kingdom 120 Satraps, to be throughout the whole Kingdom, and over them three Presidents, of whom Daniel was one; that these Satraps might give account to them, that the King should have no damage. Daniel was distinguished above the Presidents & the Satraps because an excellent spirit was in him; and the King thought to set him over the whole realm. The Presidents & the Satraps sought to find occasion against Daniel as regarding the Kingdom; but they could find no occasion nor fault, forasmuch as he was faithful, neither was there any error or fault found in him. Then said these men, 'We shall not find any occasion against Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the Law of his God (Eloah)'. These presidents and satraps assembled together to the King, and said: King Darius, live forever. All the presidents of the Kingdom, the Deputies, Satraps, Counsellors, & Governors, have consulted together to establish a royal statute, and to make a strong interdict, that whosoever shall ask a petition of any 'god' (elah) or man for 30 days, except from thee, King, he shall be cast into the den of lions. King, establish the interdict, sign the writing, that it be not changed, according to the Law of the Medes & Persians, which alters not. King Darius signed the writing & the interdict. Daniel knew that the writing was signed, but he went into his house (now his windows were open in his chamber toward Jerusalem), he kneeled down three times a day, prayed, & gave thanks to his God (Elah), as he did before. These men assembled together, found Daniel making petition & supplication to his God (Elah). They spoke to the King concerning the King's interdict: 'Did thou not sign an interdict, that any man that shall make petition to any 'god' (elah) or man within 30 days, except to thee, O King, shall be thrown into the den of lions'? The King replied, 'It's true, according to the Law of the Medes & Persians, which alters not'. They answered the King: 'Daniel, who is of the children of the Captivity of Judah, regards thee not, King, nor the interdict that thou has signed, but makes his petition 3 times a day'. The King, hearing these words, was sore displeased, and set his heart on Daniel to deliver him; and he labored till the going down of the sun to rescue him. These men assembled together to the King, said to the King: 'Know, King, it is a Law of the Medes & Persians, that no interdict nor statute which the King establishes may be changed'. The King commanded, they arrested Daniel, pushed him into the den of lions. The King said to Daniel: Thy God (Elah) Whom thou serve continually, He will deliver thee. A stone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the den; and the King sealed it with his own signet, and with the signet of his Lords; that nothing might be changed concerning Daniel. The King went to his Palace, and passed the night fasting; neither were instruments of music brought before him: and his sleep fled from him. The King arose early in the morning, and went in haste to the den of lions. He came near to the den to Daniel, he cried with a lamentable voice; the King said to Daniel: 'Daniel, servant of the living God (Elaha), is thy God (Elaha), Whom thou serve continually, able to deliver thee from the lions'? Daniel answered the King, 'King, live forever, my God (Elah) hath sent His Angel (Messenger, Malak; Melek is King), and has shut the lions' mouths, and they have not hurt me; forasmuch as before Him innocency was found in me; and also before thee, King, have I done no hurt'. The King was exceeding glad, ordered they take Daniel up out of the den. So Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, because he had trusted in his God (Elah). The King commanded, and they brought those men that had accused Daniel, and they threw them into the den of lions, with their children & wives; the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces, before they came to the bottom of the den. King Darius wrote to all the peoples, nations, & languages, that dwell in all the earth: 'Peace be multiplied unto you. I make a decree, that in all the dominion of my Kingdom men tremble & fear before the God (Elah) of Daniel; for He is the living God (Elah), and stedfast forever, His Kingdom shall not be destroyed; His dominion shall be even unto the end; He delivers & rescues, He works signs & wonders in heaven & in earth, Who has delivered Daniel from the power of the lions'.

Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius, and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian.

In the 1st year of King Belshazzar of Babylon Daniel had a Dream & Visions of his head on his bed: then he wrote the Dream and told the sum of the matters. Daniel said: 'I saw in my Vision by night, the '4 Winds' of heaven brake forth on the 'Great Sea (Mediterranean Sea)'. '4 Great Beasts' came up from the 'Sea', diverse one from another. The '1st Beast' was like a 'Lion', with 'Eagle's Wings': I beheld till its 'Wings' were plucked, and it was lifted up from the earth, and made to stand upon '2 Feet' as a 'Man'; a 'Man's Heart' was given to it. Look, a '2nd Beast', like to a 'Bear', it was raised up on '1 Side (Foot)', '3 Ribs' were in its 'Mouth' between its 'Teeth': they said to it, 'Arise, devour much flesh'. I beheld, '3rd One', like a 'Leopard', which had on its 'Back, 4 Bird Wings'; the 'Beast' had '4 Heads'; and dominion was given to it. After this I saw in the Night-Visions, a '4th Beast', terrible & powerful, & strong exceedingly; and it had 'Great Iron Teeth'; it devoured & brake in pieces, & stamped the residue with its 'Feet': it was diverse from all the 'Beasts' that were before it; it had '10 Horns'. I considered the 'Horns', there came up among them another 'Horn', a 'Little One' (Little Horn), before which '3 of the 1st Horns' (3 Earlier Horns) were plucked up by the 'Roots': in this 'Horn' were 'Eyes' like the 'Eyes of a Man', a 'Mouth' 'speaking great things'. I beheld till 'Thrones' were placed, 'One That was Ancient of Days' did sit: His 'Raiment' was 'White' as 'Snow', the 'Hair' of His 'Head' like 'Pure Wool'; His 'Throne' was 'Fiery Flames', the its 'Wheels Burning Fire'. A 'Fiery Stream' issued & came forth from before Him: 1,000s of 1,000s ministered to Him, 10,000 times 10,000 stood before Him: the Judgment was set, and the 'Books' were opened. I beheld at that time because of the 'Voice' of the 'Great Words' which the 'Horn' spoke; I beheld even till the 'Beast' was slain, and its 'Body' destroyed, and it was given to be burned with fire. The other 'Beasts', their dominion was taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and a time [the exact time & season is not disclosed]. I saw in the Night-Visions, there came with the clouds of heaven 'One' like a 'Son of Man (Bar Enosh)', and He came even to the 'Ancient of Days', and they brought Him near before Him. There was given Him Dominion, & Glory, & a Kingdom, that all the Peoples, Nations, & Languages should serve Him: His dominion is an Everlasting Dominion, which shall not pass away, and His Kingdom that which shall not be destroyed. As for me, Daniel, my spirit was grieved in the midst of my body, and the Visions of my head troubled me. I came near to one of them that stood by, and asked him the truth concerning all this. So he told me, and made me know the interpretation of the things:'

'These '4 Great Beasts', are '4 Kings', that shall arise out of the earth. The Saints of the Most High shall receive the Kingdom, and possess the Kingdom forever, even for ever & ever'. I desired to know the truth concerning the '4th Beast', and concerning the '10 Horns' that were on its 'Head', and the 'Other One' which came up, and before him 3 fell, that 'Other Horn' that had 'Eyes', & a 'Mouth' that 'spoke great things', whose look was more stout than its fellows. I beheld, the 'Same Horn' 'made war with the Saints, & prevailed against them'; till the 'Ancient of Days' came, and Judgment was given to the Saints of the Most-High (Elyon), and the time came that the Saints possessed the Kingdom. The '10 Horns': out of this Kingdom shall '10 Kings' arise: and 'Another' shall arise after them; and he shall be diverse from the 'Former', and he shall put down '3 Kings'. 'He shall speak words against the Most-High (Elyon), and shall wear out the saints of the Most-High (Elyon); and he shall think to change the times and the law; and they shall be given into his hand until a Time & Times & Half Time' [unknown dates or time]. 'The Judgment shall be set, they shall take away his Dominion, to consume and to destroy it to the end. The Kingdom & the Dominion, and the greatness of the Kingdoms under the whole heaven, shall be given to the People of the Saints of the Most-High (Elyon): His Kingdom is an Everlasting Kingdom, and all Dominions shall serve and obey Him'.

'Here is the end of the matter. As for me, Daniel, my thoughts much troubled me, and my countenance was changed in me: but I kept the matter in my heart'.

'In the 3rd year of the reign of King Belshazzar a Vision appeared to me, Daniel, after what appeared to me formerly (i.e. in 1st yr): I saw in the Vision (I was in Shushan the Palace, in the province of Elam; I was by the River (Canal) Ulai (near Susa)): there stood near the River a 'Ram' which had '2 Horns': the '2 Horns' were High (Long, Tall, Big); but one was Higher (Longer) than the other, and the Higher came up last. I saw the 'Ram' pushing 'Westward, Northward, & Southward'; no 'Beasts' could stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his Hand (Power); but he did according to his will, and magnified himself. As I was considering, a 'He-Goat' came from the 'West' over the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground: the 'Goat' had a 'Notable (Great) Horn between his Eyes'. He came to the 'Ram' that had the '2 Horns', which I saw standing near the River, and ran to him in the fury of his power. I saw him going close to the 'Ram', and he was moved with anger against him, and struck the 'Ram', and brake his '2 Horns'; and there was no power in the 'Ram' to stand before him; but he battered him down to the ground, and trampled on him; there was none that could deliver the 'Ram' out of his hand. The 'He-Goat' magnified himself exceedingly: and when he was strong, the 'Great Horn' was broken; and in place of it there came up '4 Notable Ones' toward the '4 Winds' of heaven. 'Out of One' of them came forth a 'Little Horn', which grew exceeding great, 'toward the South, toward the East, & toward the Glorious (?)'. It grew great, even to the 'Host of Heaven'; and some of the 'Host & of the Stars' it battered down to the ground, & trampled on them. It magnified itself, even to the 'Prince of the Host'; and it took away from him the 'Continual (Offering, Sacrifice)', and the 'Place of his Sanctuary' was cast down. The 'Host' was given over together with the 'Continual (Offering, Sacrifice)' through transgression; and it cast down truth to the ground, and it continued & prospered. I heard a 'Holy One' speaking; and another 'Holy One' said to the 'One' who spake, 'How long shall be the Vision of the Continual (Offering, Sacrifice), and the transgression that makes desolate, to give both the Sanctuary & the Host to be trodden under foot?' He said unto me, 'Unto 2,300 Evenings-Mornings [that is, 'days', consisting of nights & days]; then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed'. When I, Daniel, had seen the 'Vision', I sought to understand it; there stood before me as the appearance of a 'Man'. I heard a 'Man's Voice' between the Ulai, which called out, 'Gabriel, make this man to understand the Vision'. He came near where I stood; and when he came, I was affrighted, and fell on my face: but he said unto me, 'Understand, Son of man; for the Vision belongs to the End Time'. As he was speaking with me, I fell into a deep sleep with my face toward the ground; but he touched me, and set me upright. He said, 'I will reveal & make ye know what shall be in the Latter Time (End Time) of the indignation; for it belongs to the appointed Time of the End (End Time)'. The 'Ram' which thou saw, with '2 Horns', they are the 'Kings of Media & Persia'. The rough (aggressive) 'He-Goat is the King of Greece: the Great Horn between his eyes is the 1st King'. What was broken, in its place '4 Ones' stood up, '4 Kingdoms' shall stand up out of the Nation, but not with his power. 'In the Latter Time (End Time) of their Kingdom', when the transgressors are come to the full, a 'King' of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. His power shall be mighty, but not by his own power; and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper and continue; and he shall destroy 'the Mighty Ones & the Holy People'. Through his policy he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and in security (unchallenged) shall he destroy many: he shall also stand up against the 'Prince of Princes'; but he shall be broken without hand. 'The Vision of the Evenings & Mornings which was told is true: but shut thou up the Vision; for it belongs to Many Days (End Times)'. I, Daniel, fainted, and was sick certain days; then I rose up, and did the King's business: and I wondered at the 'Vision', but none understood it'.

In 1st year of Darius (?, Cyrus) the son of Ahasuerus (?, Astyages, Artaxerxes, Xerxes 1st, the Great), of the seed of the Medes (Persian-Mede), who was made King over the realm of the Chaldeans. 'In the 1st year of his reign I, Daniel, understood by the Books (Scrolls) the number of the years whereof Jehovah's Word (Debhar-YeHoWaH) came to Jeremiah the Prophet, for the accomplishing of '70 years Desolations of Jerusalem'. I set my face to the Lord God (El-Adhon), to seek by prayer & supplications, with fasting, sackcloth, & ashes. I prayed to Jehovah my God (YeHoWaH Elohai), and made confession: 'Lord (Adhonai), the Great and Dreadful God (haEl), Who keeps covenant and lovingkindness with them that love Him and keep His commandments: we have sinned, have dealt perversely, have done wickedly, have rebelled, even turning aside from Thy precepts & from Thine ordinances; neither have we listened to Thy Servants the Prophets, that spake in Thy Name to our Kings, our princes, and our fathers, to the people of the land. Lord (Adonai), righteousness belongs to Thee, but to us confusion of face, as at this day; to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, to all Israel, that are near, & that are far off, through the countries whither Thou hast driven them, because of their trespasses against Thee. Lord (Adonai), to us confusion of face, to our Kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against Thee. To the Lord our God (Adonai Eloheanu) belong mercies and forgiveness; for we have rebelled against Him; neither have we obeyed the Voice of Jehovah our God (YeHoWaH Eloheanu), to walk in His Laws, which He set before us by His Servants the prophets. Israel have transgressed Thy Law, turning aside, that they should not obey Thy Voice: the curse has been poured out upon us, and the Oath that is written in the Law of Moses the Servant of God (haElohim); for we have sinned against Him. He confirmed His words, which He spake against us, against our judges that judged us, by bringing upon us a great evil; for under the whole heaven has not been done as has been done on Jerusalem. As it is written in the Law of Moses, all this evil is come on us: yet have we not entreated the favor of Jehovah our God (YeHoWaH Eloheanu), that we should turn from our iniquities, and have discernment in Thy truth. Jehovah (YeHoWaH) watched over the evil, and brought it on us; for Jehovah, our God (YeHoWaH) is righteous in His Works which He doeth, and we have not obeyed His Voice. Lord our God (Adonai Eloheanu), Who has led Thy people forth out of the land of Egypt with a Mighty Hand, and has gotten Thee renown, as at this day; we have sinned, we have done wickedly. Lord (Adonai), according to all Thy Righteousness, let Thine Anger & Thy Wrath, I pray Thee, be turned away from Thy City Jerusalem, Thy Holy Mountain; because for our sins, & for the iniquities of our fathers, Jerusalem & Thy People are become a reproach to all around us. Our God (Eloheanu), listen to the prayer of Thy Servant, and to his supplications, and cause Thy face to shine upon Thy Sanctuary that is desolate, for the Lord's sake. My God (Elohai), incline Thine ear, and hear; open Thine Eyes, behold our desolations, and the City which is called by Thy Name: for we do not present our supplications before Thee for our righteousness, but for Thy Great Mercies' Sake. Lord (Adonai), hear; Lord (Adonai), forgive; Lord (Adonai), listen & do; defer not, for Thine Own Sake, my God (Elohai), because Thy City and Thy People are called by Thy Name'. 'While I was speaking, praying, & confessing my sin & the sin of my people Israel, and presenting my supplication before Jehovah my God (YeHoWaH Elohai) for the Holy Mountain of my God (Elohai); yea, while I was speaking in prayer, the Man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the Vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. He instructed me, talked with me, and said, 'Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee wisdom and understanding'. At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment went forth, and I am come to tell thee; for thou art greatly beloved: consider the matter, & understand the Vision. '70 weeks are decreed on thy people and on thy Holy City, to finish transgression, to make an end of sins, to make reconciliation for iniquity, to bring in everlasting righteousness, to seal up Vision & Prophecy, & to anoint the Most Holy'. 'Know & discern, from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to rebuild Jerusalem to the Anointed One, the Prince, shall be 7 weeks, & 62 weeks: it shall be rebuilt, with street & moat (ditches), even in troublous times. After the 62 weeks shall the Anointed One be cut off, and shall have nothing: the people of the Coming Prince shall destroy the city & the Sanctuary; the end thereof shall be with a flood, to the end shall be war; desolations are determined. He shall make a firm Covenant with many for 1 week: and in the midst of the week he (He ?) shall cause the sacrifice & the oblation to cease; on the Wing of Abominations Desolating One Rides (Destroyer Comes); to the Full End (End Time), and that determined, shall be poured out upon the desolate (desolation, desolator)'.'

In the 3rd year of King Cyrus of Persia a thing was revealed to Daniel, renamed Belteshazzar; the thing was true, of a great warfare: he understood the thing, and had understanding of the Vision. 'In those days I, Daniel, was mourning 3 whole weeks. I ate no pleasant bread, neither came flesh nor wine into my mouth, neither did I anoint myself at all, till 3 whole weeks were fulfilled. On the 24th day of the first month, as I was by the side of the Great River, which is Hiddekel (Tigress, not the Euphrates), 'I saw a Man clothed in linen, Whose Loins were girded with pure gold of Uphaz: His Body also was like the Beryl, His Face as the appearance of Lightning, His Eyes as Flaming Torches, His Arms & His Feet like to Burnished Brass, the Voice of His Words like the Sound of a Multitude'. I, Daniel, alone saw the Vision; for the men that were with me saw not the Vision; but a great quaking fell upon them, and they fled to hide themselves. I was left alone, & saw this Great Vision, and there remained no strength in me; for my comeliness (splendour, vigour) was turned in me into corruption, and I retained no strength. Yet I heard the Voice of his Words; then I fell into deep-sleep (trance, dream) prostrate, with my face toward the ground. A Hand touched me, which put me on my knees & on the palms of my hands. He said to me, 'Daniel, greatly beloved man, understand the words that I speak unto thee, & stand upright; for to thee am I now sent'. When he had spoken this word unto me, I stood trembling. He said to me, 'Fear not, Daniel; for from the first day that thou did set thy heart to understand, & to humble thyself before thy God (Eloheka), thy words were heard: and I am come for thy words' sake. But the Prince of the Kingdom of Persia resisted me 21 days; but, Michael, one of the Chief Princes, came to help me: and I remained there with the Kings of Persia. 'I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days (End Times); for the vision is yet for [many] days': when he had spoken to me according to these words, I lowered my face to the ground, & was speechless. 'One in the likeness of the Sons of Men touched my lips: then I opened my mouth, & said to him that stood before me, my Lord (Adoni), by reason of the Vision my sorrows are turned on me, & I retain no strength. For how can the servant of my Lord (Adoni) talk with this my Lord (Adoni)? for as for me, there remained no strength in me, neither was there breath left in me. Then there touched me again One like the appearance of a Man, and he strengthened me. He said, greatly beloved man, fear not: peace be to thee, be strong, yea, be strong. When he spoke to me, I was strengthened, & said, Let my Lord (Adoni) speak; for thou has strengthened me. Then said he, Know thou wherefore I am come unto thee? and now will I return to fight with the Prince of Persia: when I go forth, the Prince of Greece shall come. But I will tell thee that which is inscribed in the Writing of Truth: and there is none that holds with me against these, but Michael your Prince'.

'And as for me (Gabriel), in the 1st year of Darius the Mede, I stood up to confirm and strengthen him (Michael). I will show thee the Truth: There shall stand up yet 3 Kings in Persia; the 4th shall be far richer than they all: when he is grown strong through his riches, he shall stir up all against the Realm of Greece. A Mighty King shall stand up, that shall rule with Great Dominion, and do according to his will. When he shall stand up, his Kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the 4 Winds of heaven, but not to his posterity, nor according to his Dominion wherewith he ruled; for his Kingdom shall be plucked up, even for others besides these. The King of the South (Egypt south of Judah) shall be strong, & of his Princes; he shall be strong above him, and have Dominion; his Dominion shall be a Great Dominion. At the End of Years (End Times) they shall join themselves together; and the daughter of the King of the South (Egypt) shall come to the King of the North (Syria north of Israel) to make an agreement: but she shall not retain the strength of her arm; neither shall he stand, nor his arm; but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that birthed her, and he that strengthened her in those times. But out of a Shoot from her Roots shall One stand up in his place, who shall come to the army, and shall enter into the fortress of the King of the North (Syria), & shall deal against them, & shall prevail. He shall carry captive their 'gods' (elohim), with their molten images, their goodly vessels of silver & of gold, into Egypt (the King of the South); and he shall refrain some years from the King of the North (Syria). He (the Syrian King) shall come into the Realm of the King of the South (to fight with the Egyptian King, but he shall return into his own land. His sons (of the Syrian King) shall war, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces, which shall come on, and overflow, and pass through; and they shall return and war, even to his (Egyptian) fortress. The King of the South (Egypt) shall be moved with anger, and shall come forth and fight with him (the Syrian), with the King of the North (the Syrian); and he (the Syrian) shall set forth a great multitude, and the multitude shall be given into his (the Egyptian, in defeat) hand. The multitude shall be lifted up, and his (Syrian's) heart shall be exalted; and he (Syrian) shall cast down tens (10s) of thousands (1000s) (in war), but he shall not prevail. The King of the North (the Syrian) shall return (to Syria), and shall set forth (for another battle) a multitude greater than the former; and he (the Syrian) shall engage at the End of the Times of Years (End Times), with a great army and with much substance. In Those Times (End Times) there shall many stand up against the King of the South (Egypt): also the children of the violent among thy people (militant Israelites, like the Maccabees or Hasmoneans) shall lift themselves up to establish the Vision; but they shall fall. The King of the North (the Syrian) shall come, and cast up a mound, and take a well-fortified city: and the forces of the South (Egypt) shall not stand, neither his chosen people (allies), neither shall there be any strength to stand. But he (Syrian) that cometh against him (Egyptian) shall do according to his (Syrian's) own will, and none shall stand before him (the Syrian); and he (Syrian) shall stand in the Glorious Land (Israel & Judah), and in his (Syrian's) hand shall be destruction. He (Syrian) shall set his face to come with the strength of his whole Kingdom, and with him equitable conditions; and he (Syrian) shall perform them: and he (Syrian) shall give him (the Egyptian) the daughter of women, to corrupt her; but she shall not stand, neither be for him (Syrian). After this shall he (Syrian) turn his face unto the isles (western peoples), and shall take many: but a Prince shall cause the reproach offered by him (Syrian) to cease; he (the Prince) shall cause his (Syrian) reproach to turn upon him. Then he (Syrian) shall turn his face toward the fortresses of his own land (Syria); but he shall stumble and fall, and shall not be found. Then shall stand up in his (Syrian) place one that shall cause an exactor to pass through the glory of the Kingdom; but within few days he (2nd Syrian) shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle. And in his (3rd Syrian) place shall stand up a Contemptible Person (as Antiochus Epiphanes as in 1st Maccabees), to whom they had not given the honor of the Kingdom: but he (3rd Syrian) shall come in time of security (peace), and shall obtain the Kingdom by flatteries. And the overwhelming forces shall be overwhelmed from before him (3rd Syrian), and shall be broken, yea, also the Prince of the Covenant. And after the league made with him he (3rd Syrian) shall work deceitfully; for he (3rd Syrian) shall come up, and shall become strong, with a small people. In time of security (peace) shall he come even upon the fattest places of the province; and he (3rd Syrian) shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers; he (3rd Syrian) shall scatter among them prey, and spoil, and substance: yea, he (3rd Syrian) shall devise his devices against the strongholds, even for a time. And he (Syrian, 3rd Syrian) shall stir up his power & his courage against the King of the South (Egyptian) with a great army; and the King of the South (Egypt) shall war in battle with an exceeding great and mighty army; but he (Egyptian) shall not stand; for they (his army) shall devise devices against him (Egyptian). They (his court & allies) that eat of his dainties shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow; and many shall fall down slain. As for both these Kings (Syrian & Egyptian), their hearts shall be to do mischief, and they shall speak lies at one table: but it shall not prosper; for yet the End shall be at the Time Appointed (End Times). Then shall he (Syrian) return into his land (Syria) with great substance; and his heart [shall be] against the Holy Covenant; and he shall continue (prosper), and return to his own land (Syria). At the Time Appointed (End Time) he (Syrian) shall return, and come into the south (Egypt); but it shall not be in the Latter Time (End Time) as it was in the former (earlier conflicts). For ships of Kittim (west Mediterranean Sea, Cyprus, Rome, Europe) shall come against him (Syrian); therefore he (Syrian) shall be grieved, and shall return, and have indignation against the Holy Covenant, and shall continue: he (Syrian) shall even return, and have regard to them that forsake the Holy Covenant. Forces shall stand on his (Syrian's) part, they shall profane the Sanctuary, even the Fortress, and shall take away the Continual (Offering, Sacrifice, Oblation); they (Syrian forces) shall set up the Abomination that maketh Desolate. And such as do wickedly against the Covenant shall he (Syrian) pervert by flatteries; but the people that know their God shall be strong, and continue. They (faithful Jews) that are wise among the people shall instruct many; yet they shall fall by the sword and by flame, by captivity and by spoil: days (undetermined). When they (Jews) shall fall, they shall be helped with a little help; but many shall join themselves to them (to the Jews) with flatteries. Some of them (Jews) that are wise shall fall, to refine them, and to purify, and to make them white, even to the Time of the End (End Time); because it is yet for the Time Appointed (End Time). (See 1st & 2nd Maccabees & Josephus to illustrate these things historically.) The King (Syrian) shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every 'god' (el), and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods (El Elim); and he (Syrian) shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished; for what is determined shall be done. Neither shall he regard the 'gods' (elohe) of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any 'god' (eloah); for he shall magnify himself above all. In his place shall he honor the 'god' (eloah) of fortresses; and a 'god' (eloah) whom his forefathers (fathers) knew not shall he honor with gold, silver, precious stones, & pleasant things. He shall deal with the strongest fortresses by the help of a foreign 'god' (eloah): whosoever acknowledges he (Syrian) will increase with glory; and he (Syrian) shall cause them (his allies, vassals) to rule over many, and shall divide the land for a price. And at the Time of the End (End Time) shall the King of the South (Egyptian)) contend with him (Syrian); and the King of the North (Syrian) shall come against him (Syrian) like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he (Syrian) shall enter into the countries (Canaan, Arabs, Egypt), and shall overflow and pass through. He shall enter also into the Glorious Land (Israel & Judah), and many shall be overthrown; but these shall be delivered out of his (Syrian's) hand: Edom & Moab, & the chief of the children of Ammon. He shall extend his (Syrian's) hand also upon the countries; and the land of Egypt (the South) shall not escape. But he (the Syrian) shall have power over the treasures of gold & of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt; and the Libyans & the Ethiopians (Egypt's allies) shall be at his (Syrian's) steps. But news out of the East & out of the North shall trouble him (while in his southern campaign); and he (Syrian) shall go forth (back to Syria) with great fury to destroy and utterly to sweep away many. And he (Syrian) shall plant the tents of his palace between the Sea (Great Sea, Mediterranean Sea) and the Glorious Holy Mountain (Zion, Jerusalem); yet he (Syrian) shall come to his end, and none shall help him. And at That Time shall Michael stand up, the Great Prince who standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a Time of Trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at That Time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the Book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame & everlasting contempt. And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever & ever. 'But thou, Daniel, Close the Words, & Seal the Book, even to the Time of the End (End Time): many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased'. Then I, Daniel, saw, there stood 2 others, the one on the brink of the river on this side, and the other on the brink of the river on that side. And one said to the Man Clothed in Linen, Who was above the waters of the river, 'How long shall it be to the End of these Wonders'? And I heard the Man Clothed in Linen, Who was above the waters of the river, when He held up His Right Hand & His Left hand to heaven, and swore by Him That Lives Forever that it shall be for a Time, Times, and a Half; and when they have made an end of breaking in pieces the power of the Holy People, all these things shall be finished'. And I heard, but I understood not: then said I, my Lord (Adoni), what shall be the issue of these things? And he said, 'Go thy way, Daniel; for the words are closed and sealed till the Time of the End (End Time). Many shall purify themselves, make themselves white, & be refined; but the wicked shall do wickedly; and none of the wicked shall understand; but they that are wise shall understand. And from the time that the continual (Offering, Sacrifice, Oblation) shall be taken away, and the Abomination that maketh Desolate set up, there shall be 1290 days [not 'years']. Blessed is he that waits, & comes to the 1335 days (not 'years'). But go thou thy way Till the End be; for thou shall rest, and shall stand in thy lot, at the End of the Days (End Times).''

The Four Major Prophetic Books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, & Daniel completes the Old Testament. The 12 Minor Prophets from Hosea to Malachi will foot-note these 4 Prophetic Books; each will find 3 Books of the Minor Prophets to be an Appendix to them. The 12 Minor prophets divided by the 4 Major Prophets will have each 3 Books. Isaiah: Hosea, Joel, Amos; Jeremiah: Obadiah, Jonah, Micah; Ezekiel: Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah; Daniel: Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. The 4 Major Prophets are given to us in natural chronological order; but the 12 Minor Prophets are not given in natural chronological order, but a different kind of order, that inspiration has determined in course of time to produce for us. We might place the natural order thus: Obadiah, Joel, Jonah, Hosea, Amos, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi; some not as certain as others in chronological sequence. If we pursued the historical significance of the order in relations to the 2 Kingdoms, we would discover the causes, reasons, & ways of the apostasy in both adultery & idolatry of the Northern Kingdom of Israel & Samaria; and the Southern Kingdom of Judah & Jerusalem, along with the relevant Kings to them, from Jehoram & Joram; Joash, Jehu, Jehoahaz; Jeroboam II & Amaziah; Jotham & Ahaz; Pekah, Jotham, Ahaz, & Hezekiah; Zechariah, Hoshea & Manasseh & Josiah, Jehoahaz, & Jehoiakim of the Captivity with his sons & grandsons: Jeconiah, Zedekiah, Shealtiel, etc. With special notice, valuable lessons, in the Gentile Kings that ruled Israel & Judah in the Exile: Nebuchadnezzar, Darius, & Cyrus. But we are not in pursuit of this significance, which is instructive, in itself, in many ways. We are not yet ready to study & reflect on the Minor Prophets, so further remarks is not necessary here.

In our reflection studies in the historical books of Moses & the Monarchs, the legal system of the nation of Israel, then the history of the Kingdom of Israel, we followed the Divine relationship that existed between God & His people. The Mosaic foundation of the nation's covenantal constitution, as in a marriage union, had repeatedly failed. The Divine Monarchy in which the Lord as their King as a Husband, was negated, disregarded, rejected, & betrayed. His love for Israel was such that He continuously & creatively, by words & wonders, to attract His people to their God. As God of all the earth, Lord of all mankind, King of the world & nations, His testimony to judge & save the world was contingent on how He could save & keep His chosen people. The Mosaic laws, the Levitical priestly ministry, & the Davidic monarchy & kingdom was a failure. What was left to Him was the prophetic word & the Messianic hope, according to Scriptures, of Himself doing what we could not do. The Messianic promise from Genesis 3 to the close of the Old Testament, & in the interim awaiting Messiah's appearance in the new dispensation of the New Testament & Covenant. The Spirit of Christ, Messiah, was always operative in the prophetic word, and in King David & Solomon, we have the Messianic hope visualized in a transient form. We need not rehearse the Books of the Bible already studied in the development of these matters.

It is perhaps worth repeating by recalling the progression of the Kingdom of God as seen & known on earth. Isaiah spoke to the condition of a people forsaking their God, from top to bottom; the Messianic message clear that the Lord will not fail His people if they return to Him. The reform of King Hezekiah, though little & late, was encouraging that perhaps a spiritual transformation was still possible in God's House. That proved, quickly, very disappointing in the next generation, which determined the remedy to be by chastisement in Divine judgment. In Jeremiah that prophetic word slowly revealed that destruction of the House, Temple, Palaces, were to lead to Exile & Captivity; and this despite good King Josiah's final reforms & along with Jeremiah's radical message. In Ezekiel, is seen, the judgment on the nation having begun, the prophetic word soon to cease, Levitical priesthood terminated, still the Lord could at least remind them in Captivity of their state, & His willingness to overturn their doom. The spiritual state of the nation was typified in a most grotesque manner, the symbolism turned graphic, and the spiritual picture in visions & types & parables, showed a nation as an adulterous wife, shameless & self-deluded, and so addicted to sins, vices, evils, that she paid her lovers to bring on her own destruction & death.

In the Prophet Daniel, as a Statesman & Ruler, in the Gentile power, in judgment (as his very name signifies in Hebrew: God's Judgment) in Exile & Captivity, with no way to return to the Land, the City, and the House. God must look beyond the Old Testament, must return the more universal concern of His heart towards mankind. The Gentiles, the nations which were alien to the true living God, must be reached by another & better way. This will be the last great attempt on God's part to help Israel's condition & comfort them in their punishment, leading them to repentance & blessing. The reforms after the Captivity was not a dispensational change on God's part towards Israel & the Gentiles, but a toleration till Messiah comes in the fulness of the Gentiles. With this brief introductory word to our reflections on Daniel, we will turn to the Book.

The Lord having turned away from His people, delivered them over to judgment by the hands of the Gentiles. The last King during Jeremiah's ministry could not be persuaded to yield to the Divine Word to recalling the nation to God. The Book of Jeremiah's Prophecies was near completion in the actual history. The many warnings of their punishment in all its detail were now at hand. The Monarchy, the divided monarchy, was now to pass into new dispensation of Gentile domination, and the kingdom of God suppressed & more hidden, Israel was to have a new King in Babylon of the Chaldeans in the Great King Nebuchadnezzar. The kingship in Israel will become suppressed & terminated in the Lo-Ammi experience. As of old in the beginning of the creation of their national identity, so now in the dissolution of that union in its final stage, having begun some 300 years in King Jeroboam I, and fixed 100 years later in King Jehu who destroyed the House of Ahab & Jezebel, during the prophetic ministry of Elijah & Elishah. The revivals & reformations from King Hezekiah to King Josiah not availing a true full national repentance to avert the predicted doom. So the Lord's Gentile Servant of wrath, His Rod of judgment, will close the Jewish dispensation of God's attempt to witness to the world of His Person & Nature to an apostate world by means of Israel. Though Lo-Ammi, nationally, yet He obligates Himself by His repeated oaths, to protect & preserve those Jews as individuals as a remnant, till Messiah comes in a new dispensation with a new covenant with better things than Moses or David.

We find the Jewish remnant in Daniel & his 3 companions, all young men, youths just reaching maturity, selected by the Chaldeans for the King of Babylon; to be nationalized as perfect Gentiles in Captivity & Exile. This will test the quality of the judgmental or judicial probation to see if faithfulness to God is preserved. Civilization was such that in the neo-Babylonians or Chaldeans humanity had become distinctly advanced in urban dwelling. From the days of Abraham & Hammurabi, to Moses & the Pharaohs, to David & Solomon & the Assyrian kingdoms, some 1500 years of mankind migrating from Mesopotamia Valley to the Mediterranean Sea, trading & interacting in every way. Kingdoms would rise to conquer kingdoms & peoples, and kingship or sovereignty of the Monarch increased in power & influence. The adopted titles & names to declare their status to their subjects & to the world. Divine rights were assumed as ancient hereditary grants by Divine Permission, not be challenged or rejected. In Genesis we studied all these things as they developed from a germinal seed to growth & meaning. Human aggression of one nation upon another nation also increased proportionately to man's need & desires. The Imperial Powers at play in Israel's history were Mesopotamian (Chaldean, Babylonian, Assyrian, Syrian, Aramaean, etc.), Canaan & Philistines (Israel or Hebrews & Palestine), & Egyptian; later the western lands & peoples of the Great Sea would dominate.

The Babylonian & Chaldeans were influenced by all that preceded them, and in turn molded the following generations in their own civilization distinction. Polytheism continued to spread throughout the world in all the earth. Each City had its own chosen God, Gods, Goddess & Goddesses; the Deities & Divinities becoming thousands. Moses called & used by Jehovah, the God of creation & man, & of all things known or unknown, to declare to mankind that He alone was the only, true & living God, never to be idolized into creature forms or likenesses. This absolute dogmatic doctrine would always be resisted by other nations, would be opposed, & even persecuted as a form of atheism or disrespect to other deities or idols. So here the 4 Hebrew youths were chosen among all the captives of the Royal Families, as the best of the best in body & mind. Daniel proved to be the very best with many good qualities that appealed to the Babylonian King & his Chaldean Court. Knowledge of secrets, mysteries, science, philosophy of stars & times, were to cultivated & improved by whatever other nations or peoples had also attained. The Laws of God in Moses Books would prove to be matchless when practiced by the Hebrew youths as to food & drink, But it was not in this ceremonial purity that would advance Daniel & his companions in the King's Court: " Now as for these four youths, God gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom: and Daniel had understanding in all visions and dreams." (We are informed that Daniel lived thru the entire 70 yr. Captivity, --which has great dispensational significance in God's order in the ages, and to the prophecies relating to King Cyrus.)

In the 2nd year of King Nebuchadnezzar's rule, (& we might assume towards the end of that year) that he dreamed of such that his spirit was troubled & his soul sleepless. He had forgotten the details of the dream, but its terror or impact was felt. He demanded of the various experts & scholars of the various Chaldean classes to relate his forgotten dream & give its interpretation. His demand was unreasonable, indicative of insanity already at work. But God was at work to reveal His larger purposes to come with the Gentiles. Daniel with his companions sought from the Lord the Dream & its Interpretation, believing the Scriptures that revealed of God: "He changes the times and the seasons; He removes kings, and sets up kings; He giveth wisdom to the wise, and knowledge to them that have understanding; He reveals the deep and secret things; He knows what is in the darkness, and the light dwells with Him." The Chaldean superstition of magic, enchantment, spiritism, & such like, was easily exposed by the King's demand. But the God of Heaven would answer the prayer of these Hebrew youths to the wonder of the Gentiles. Daniel tells the King : "there is a God \(Elah\) in heaven That reveals secrets, He has revealed to King Nebuchadnezzar what will occur in the latter days \(end times, future times\)."

King Nebuchadnezzar Divine Dream & Vision as revealed to Daniel was a Divine Mystery in the Great Image of a Colossal Composite Metallic Man. We must set forth in tabular form the features:

Daniel 2:31-45. King Nebuchadnezzar's Dream & Prophet Daniel's Interpretation.

I.

2:31: Great Image: Mighty, & Excellent Brightness & Stood Terrible.

2:32: Image: Head of Fine Gold. Breast & Arms of Silver. Belly & Thighs of Brass.

2:33: Legs of Iron; Feet of Iron & Clay Mixed.

2:34: Stone: Cut-Out Without Hands; Smote Image's Feet (Iron & Clay Mixed); Brake in Pieces.

2:35: Iron, Clay, Brass, Silver, & Gold: Broken in Pieces together: (Chaff of Summer Threshing-floors; & Wind Blown Away). Stone (Image Demolisher): Great Mountain (Filled Earth).

II.

2:36-38: 1st: (King Nebuchadnezzar's Dream & Prophet Daniel's Interpretation.) (King Nebuchadnezzar: King of Kings; God of Heaven gave Kingdom, Power, Strength, & Glory; Ruler Over All): Golden Head.

2:39: 2nd: Inferior (Silver) Kingdom. 3rd: Brass Kingdom of brass (Ruling Earth)

2:40-43: 4th: Strong Iron Kingdom (Iron Smashes & Subdues All; Smashing & Crushing These.)

Feet & Toes of Potters' Clay & Iron Mixed: Divided Kingdom: (Iron Strength & Iron-Miry Clay Mixed. Toes of Feet: also have iron-clay mixture. Mixed: Kingdom: Partly Strong & Partly Broken. Iron-Miry-Clay Mixed: Mingled Seed of Men: Not United: Iron & Clay Mingle Not.)

2:44-45: 5th: Days of Those Kings: God of Heaven set up Kingdom: Indestructible & Perpetual Sovereignty Over His People: Demolishing & Consuming All These Kingdoms: Eternal Standing.

2:45: Stone Cut Out of Mountain Without Hands & Braking in Pieces Iron, Brass, Clay, Silver, & Gold: God Almighty Revealed Future to King: Dream Certain & Interpretation Sure.)

The Vision-Dream is that of a universal image of the Imperial Kingdoms of western human civilization from King Nebuchadnezzar to Messiah. These 4 Imperial Gentile Kingdoms were to rule over & influence Israel till Messiah's advent. The Gentile dispensation of kingship or sovereignty over God's people would develop for some 500 years in 5 political dispensations, administration, government, empires, economy, & stewardship. The Imperial Kingdoms were to be compared to 4 Metals & one Stone Kingdom. Gold, silver, brass, & iron, which would also have iron-clay mixture. The Neo-Babylonia Chaldean Kingdom had overtaken the Assyrian Empire, which was the Kingdom Isaiah prophesied about & against in relations to nation of Israel of both divided Kingdoms; & the Gentile power that conquered, captured, & exiled or dispersed the 10 Tribes.

16 Assyrian Kings: 800s B.C. to 600s B.C.:

800s: Ashurnasirpal II. Shalmaneser. Shamshiadad V.

700s: Adadnirari III. Shalmaneser IV. Ashur-dan III. Ashurnirari V. Tiglath-pileser III. Shalmaneser V. Sargon II.

600s: Sennacherib. Esarhaddon. Ashurbanipal. Ashuretiliani. Sinshariskun. Ashur-uballit II.

Assyrian Kings in the days of Isaiah: Tiglath-pileser III. Shalmaneser V. Sargon II. Sennacherib. Esarhaddon. Assyrian Kings of Jeremiah's days: Ashurbanipal. Ashuretiliani. Sinshariskun. Ashur-uballit II.

Daniel sees only the world Empires after the Fall of Assyria, which we must learn from as to the prophetic chronology of the future times or end times. The Divine judgment on the 10 tribes of Israel is not to be confused with the dispensational punishment on Judah. The Davidic House & Kingdom was always in Judah & Jerusalem, and the divided Kingdom allowed for discipline was never intended to last beyond Rehoboam or Jeroboam I. We studied all this in Isaiah & the historical Books of the Kings. In Ezekiel we learnt the Divine judgment of both Houses were like Two Sisters married to One Man, One Husband, but equally were unfaithful & treacherous. Now in Daniel the prophetic eye sees future things, no longer occupied with the past failure of the Mosaic Covenant, which now, in Daniel's Captivity, is dissolved by Gentile power. The prophetic spirit was looking for the Life & Times of the Messiah. The Messianic Kingdom will crush & destroy the Imperial Power at work in human civilization, and mankind's subjugation to representative government of the monarchy or kingship, then constitutional government of varied sorts, will come to an end, including the ever threat of anarchy. Gold has a high value is a most precious metal, and a Kingdom represented as a Gold Kingdom is memorial. A Silver Kingdom is inferior to Gold, though also of high value. Brass, an alloy of two inferior metals, of golden reflection but not as honorable or valued as silver & gold. Iron the most common, is the strongest of the metals, reflecting silver, especially as steel, but is of no precious worth, yet more useful in war or peace. But when mixed with clay as a non-metal it becomes useless for anything. This 4th Kingdom is more curious that the former 3, taking on a unique form, and of the greatest length of duration & expansion, being the result of the inevitable end of all human progress of human government on earth. The 5th Kingdom is of Messiah, and brings God's Kingdom on earth, by demolishing all human institutions, constitutions, & unions. The fuller interpretation is to be found in later chapters of the Book of Daniel, and remainder of the Old Testament & the New Testament to this present hour.

The Babylonia Empire succeeded the Assyrian Empire; in turn the Babylon was followed by Medo-Persian; that followed by the Greek, and finally, followed by the Romans. The vision before us is not history as seen in historical details, but a prophetic picture of human development as seen from God's eyes & heart. It is not the life & times of Nebuchadnezzar, or of Darius & Cyrus, or of the Great Alexander, or the Caesars. Nor is it a prediction of Divine Acts to prewrite history, or to make history according to prophecy. It is this assumption, if not presumption, to impose on prophecy this notion of a form of prophetic predestination or predetermined destiny that has created so many weird ridiculous interpretations, and seeing in history all kinds of fulfillment of prophetic predictions. Had we paid more careful attention to our reading & study of the 3 Major Prophets, then when we came to Daniel we would not come up with such wild desperate theories. But we will see more of this in the following chapters of Daniel. The Dream & Interpretation astonished the King & Daniel & his companions were rewarded power in the Kingdom of their captivity. Before we move on to the next chapter of the King's Acts, we do well to remember the words concerning the 5th Messianic Kingdom: "And in the days of those Kings shall the God (Ellah) of heaven set up a (5th) Kingdom which shall never be destroyed, nor shall its sovereignty be left to another people; but it shall break in pieces & consume all these Kingdoms, and it shall stand forever. As thou saw a Stone was cut out of the Mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the Iron, Brass, Clay, Silver, & the Gold; the Great God (Elah Rab) has revealed to the King what shall be hereafter: the Dream is certain, & its Interpretation sure."

King Nebuchadnezzar's Image (tzelem, statue, likeness, monument, pillar) of 60 by 6 cubits (90 x 9 in feet), if made in a natural human form, say to be an image of the King himself, the ration in height to width at the shoulders is quite disproportionate. The average man at 5' 10" is less than 20" wide at the shoulders, an average of 3.5 ratio. In this argument the ratio of the Image at 3.5 x 6 cbts = 21 cbts or in feet about 32 ft (9' x 3.5 = 31.5 ft). If we insist on the King's Image in appearance then we would need some 50 to 60 feet of platform on which the Image stands (which is also attested in Warriors on a Tower Post in defense of the city or fortress). If we conceive the Image as a Pillar then the ratio is common to what archaeology have found common to the ancient world as monuments. This Golden Image of the King of Babylon as the Head of Gold is elevated to an Idol to be worshipped. This is characteristic of Monarchs who inflate their status to that of Gods & Goddesses. Their honored titles were: King of Kings, Great King, Master of the World, Lord of Kingdoms, etc. It rose to insanity by the time we reach the 32 year Alexander of Macedon the Conqueror: "Great Alexander: Basileus of Macedon, Hegemon of the Hellenic League, Shahanshah of Persia, Pharaoh of Egypt, Lord of Asia. Chosen by Ra, Beloved by Amun. Nomen: Alexandros, Alexander. Horus name: Mekemet: Protector of Egypt. Second Horus name: Brave Ruler, Attacker of Foreign Lands. Third Horus name: Ruler of Rulers of Entire Land (World). Fourth Horus name: Sturdy-Armed One. Nebty name: Great Mighty Lion, Conqueror of Mountains, Lands, & Deserts. Golden Horus: (Strong) Bull, Protector Egypt, Ruler of Sea & of what the Sun Encircles (i.e. of All Under the Sun, the World or Globe.)" This deification of the Monarch by his Icon or Image became the Idol & thus a God. This idolatry of the King of Babylon after what was revealed to him in the dream-vision revealed & interpreted by Daniel shows further deterioration into insanity, like so many great men & women; their absolute power absolutely corrupting. We saw the same development or deterioration in King Saul, Israel's 1st Monarch. This is always to God's saints a trial of fire of faith. Whether God delivers or not, as the Hebrew young men said: "We will not serve thy 'gods', nor worship the Golden Image which thou hast set up".

We are prone to be skeptics of miracles, and of the God signs & wonders. It is impossible for super-hot furnace fire to not fry the Hebrew youths, clothes & all. Nothing is impossible with God Who made all things; how He makes it that the Angel, like as the Son of the Gods (Son of God), attended to these 3 in their ordeal, is to us inscrutable & naturally incredible. But if we falsify Daniel for this miracle, and the others in the Book, we must also, piece by piece, reject the entire Old Testament, then discredit the entire New Testament. God's involvement with His chosen people was such that miracle were a necessity to preserve them throughout history. The Gentile King is forced to concede the truth & power of the true & living God.

'King Nebuchadnezzar, to all the peoples, nations, & languages, that dwell in all the earth: Peace be multiplied unto you. It seemed good to me to show the signs & wonders that the Most High God hath wrought toward me. How great are His signs! and how mighty are His wonders! His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and His dominion is from generation to generation'. This knowledge of the King of Babylon, the Gentile Monarch, did not long sustain him, and his ways continued to be both unreasonable, insane, & often wicked. He continued in idolatry. God would now show the Monarch is sovereignty over all human government & authority, of which distributes dispensationally at will. King Nebuchadnezzar was a Giant Fruit Tree that God has determined to cut down to a stump for 7 times. The Times may be days, weeks, months, seasons, or years; God knows. His pride & insanity & idolatry in the Image, in his accomplishment, & his importance all led to the Divine judgment. But the judgment was temporary, afterwards: "I, Nebuchadnezzar, lifted up mine eyes to heaven, mine understanding returned to me, I blessed the Most High, I praised & honored Him That liveth for ever; for His Dominion is an everlasting dominion, and His Kingdom from generation to generation; the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing; He does according to His will in the Army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou? At the same time mine understanding returned to me; the glory of my kingdom, my majesty & brightness returned to me; my counsellors & my lords sought to me; I was re-established in my Kingdom, and excellent greatness was added to me. I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise, extol, & honor the King of heaven; for all His works are truth, and His ways justice; and those that walk in pride He is able to abase'."

The Book moves on to the next generation, Nebuchadnezzar's son (grandson, etc.), King Belshazzar. All that God manifested in word & wonders was forgotten & discarded, even while Daniel lived. Here historians tell us some chronology of the times of Daniel. Wikipedia: (Nabopolassar, proclaimed as Babylon's King in 600s B.C., successfully drove out Assyrians from southern Mesopotamia & united & consolidated all of Babylonia under his rule by c.620 B.C.; founding Neo-Babylonian Empire. Neo-Babylonian (or Chaldean) Dynasty was Babylonia's last dynasty of native Mesopotamian monarchs & fall of their empire in 539 B.C. marked end of Babylonia as independent kingdom.) (1st. Nabopolassar 600s B.C. (Babylonian (Chaldean) rebel; successfully drove out Assyrians & re-established Babylonia as independent kingdom.) 2nd. Nebuchadnezzar II (Nabopolassar's son) 500s B.C.. 3rd. Amel-Marduk (Nebuchadnezzar's II son) 500s B.C.. 4th. Neriglissar (in-law of Amel-Marduk; usurped throne.) 500s B.C.. 5th. Labashi-Marduk (Neriglissar's son) c.556 B.C.. Nabonidus (usurped throne from Labashi-Marduk) 500s B.C..)

(c.539, Great King Cyrus of Persian Achaemenid Empire conquered Babylon, which would never again successfully regain independence. Babylonians had resented their last native king, Nabonidus, over his religious practices & some of his political choices & Cyrus could thus claim to be legitimate successor of ancient Babylonian kings & avenger of Babylon's national deity, Marduk. Early Achaemenid rulers had great respect for Babylonia, regarding region as separate entity or kingdom united with their own kingdom in something akin to personal union. Despite this, native Babylonians grew to resent their foreign rulers, as they had with Assyrians earlier, & rebelled several times. Achaemenid kings continued to use title "King of Babylon" alongside their other royal titles until reign of King Xerxes I, who dropped the title in c.481 B.C., divided previously large Babylonian satrapy & desecrated Babylon after having had to put down Babylonian revolt.)

The above history & chronology does not explain the person or reign of King Belshazzar, nor the proper relations to King Nebuchadnezzar (son or grandson, or adopted son, all these relations would be said as 'son'). The Queen Mother is not identified as King Belshazzar's mother nor King Nebuchadnezzar's wife; these are uncertain or unknown things., after he elevated by proclamation Daniel as 3rd Ruler of the Kingdom. But we see clearly the turbulent period toward the end of the Dynasty by the hands of the Persians. According to the Book of Daniel, King Belshazzar, the Chaldean, was slain the night of the interpretation of the Handwriting on the Wall. King Darius, the Mede, took the Kingdom at 62 years of age (& Daniel about 85 yrs old), which implies other co-rulers, regents, or such within his regency as he himself would properly be the Regnant, Cyrus a co-regent. Nebuchadnezzar died about 560 B.C. Belshazzar is assumed to begin his reign with his father Nabonidus about 555 B.C.. Wikipedia: Most important sources for time of Belshazzar are Nabonidus Chronicle, Cyrus Cylinder, & Verse Account of Nabonidus —which, despite its name, was commissioned by Persian conqueror Great Cyrus.

((* Belshazzar, Nabonidus' son, last king of Neo-Babylonian Empire. Nabonidus Chronicle describes him as Nebuchadnezzar's grandson, but his father was not of Royal line. He played pivotal role in the coup d'etat that overthrew King Labashi-Marduk & brought Nabonidus to power c.555 B.C.E., although unlike his co-conspirators he was not member of the old Babylonian aristocracy. Nabonidus spent the years c.555–545 B.C.E. at Oasis of Teima in northern areas of Arabian Peninsula, leaving Belshazzar to govern Babylon. During his father's prolonged absence Belshazzar ruled as regent or co-regent, but was never called King & never took part in Babylonian New Year Festival, at which King's presence was essential. His duties as Crown Prince (title that appears in documents) included overseeing temple estates and leasing out temple land, & he worked at restoring Babylonian God Marduk, demoted by Nabonidus in favor of the Moon God Sin. Nabonidus returned to Babylon c.545 B.C.E.. King's return may have been connected with increasing threat posed by Persian conqueror Cyrus the Great, who ruled a huge empire to the north and east of Babylon. Open hostilities commenced in c.540 B.C.E., 12th October "Ugbaru, governor of district of Gutium, & army of Cyrus entered Babylon without a battle" (Babylonian Chronicle) —perhaps same Gobryas, a Babylonian provincial governor who switched to Persian side, mentioned by Greek historian Xenophon. Nabonidus was captured & his life apparently spared, but Belshazzar's is unknown. Nabonidus Chronicle is ancient Babylonian text, part of larger series of Babylonian Chronicles inscribed in cuneiform script on clay tablets. It deals primarily with reign of Nabonidus, last king of Neo-Babylonian Empire, covers conquest of Babylon by Persian Great King Cyrus, ends with start of reign of Cyrus's son Cambyses, spanning a period from c.555 B.C. to some time after c.540 B.C.. It provides rare contemporary account of Cyrus's rise to power & is main source of information on this period; Amélie Kuhrt describes it as "the most reliable and sober [ancient] account of the fall of Babylon." Cyrus Cylinder or Cyrus Charter is ancient clay cylinder, now broken into several pieces, on which is written declaration in Akkadian cuneiform script in name of Persia's Achaemenid Great King Cyrus. It dates from c.6th century B.C. & was discovered in ruins of Babylon in Mesopotamia in 1879. It is currently in possession of British Museum, which sponsored expedition that discovered cylinder. It was created & used as foundation deposit following Persian conquest of Babylon c.540 B.C. when Neo-Babylonian Empire was invaded by Cyrus & incorporated into his Persian Empire. Cylinders of Nabonidus refers to cuneiform inscriptions of King Nabonidus of Babylonia. These inscriptions were made on clay cylinders. They include Nabonidus Cylinder from Sippar, & Nabonidus Cylinders from Ur, four in number. Nabonidus Cylinder from Sippar is a long text in which Nabonidus describes how he repaired three temples: Sanctuary of Moon god Sin in Harran, Sanctuary of Warrior Goddess Anunitu in Sippar, & Temple of Shamash in Sippar. Nabonidus Cylinders from Ur contain foundation text of Ziggurat called E-lugal-galga-sisa, which belonged to Temple of Sin in Ur. Nabonidus describes how he repaired structure. It is probably King's last building inscription & may be dated to c.540 B.C.. Text is interesting because it offers a full syncretism of Sin, Marduk, and Nabu. Nabonidus cylinders from Ur are also noteworthy because they mention a son named Belshazzar, who is mentioned in Book of Daniel. Cylinders state: "As for me, Nabonidus, King of Babylon, save me from sinning against your great Godhead and grant me as a present a lifelong of days, and as for Belshazzar, the eldest son -my offspring- instill reverence for your great Godhead in his heart and may he not commit any cultic mistake, may he be sated with a life of plenitude." *))

So much for the history for now. We must focus on prophecy.

But first Daniel & the Lions trial. The enmity that exists in man against his fellow goes back the Garden of Eden in the Serpent's enmity against God. The judgment & curse would be perpetual enmity between the woman's seed & the serpent's seed; it is the way of good versus evil; the way of the Devil or of God; the path of darkness against the light. God gave honor to Daniel & his companions, it was conceded by the Kings of Babylon, despite their idolatry; but evil seeks ways to persecute the godly, who they will not tolerate in the hardness of their heart & malicious hate. The rulers & governors of the realm, opposed Daniel & his status; they conceived a sure plot to ensnare Daniel, to force the King to condemn him to the Lion's Den. The Law of the God of the Jews & Daniel would prove Daniel's fate, his worship & prayers to God his crime in the Gentile Empire. The law of the Medes & Persians being unalterable was arbitrary & contrary to sanity & equity. Such are laws among man. The King bound by his own law must surrender Daniel to his enemies, even against the King's strongest desire to rescue him from the sentence of death. The hungry lions did not touch Daniel, the Angel of God protecting him. The King glad of such miracle & mercy, with retribution threw the men & their families into their snare; and the lions ate well. The King Darius wrote: "Peace be multiplied unto you. I make a decree, that in all the Dominion of my Kingdom men tremble & fear before the God (Elah) of Daniel; for He is the living God (Elah), and stedfast forever, His Kingdom shall not be destroyed; His Dominion shall be even unto the end; He delivers & rescues, He works signs & wonders in heaven & in earth, Who has delivered Daniel from the power of the lions." Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius, and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian.

The 2nd half of the Book of Daniel, chapters 7-12, is all prophetic in a special way. The historical dream-vision of the Great Gentile Image must now be expanded & enlarged. Though the Dream-Visions of Daniel came earlier in time, it is reserved till now to introduce this prophetic section. From here to the end, let him reads & hears, take heed of these things. The divine prophetic preview & revelation of Gentile imperial or global expansion as it pertains to the Jews become Daniel's focus. Daniel relates his Vision & its Interpretation:

(("I saw in my Vision by night, the '4 Winds' of heaven brake forth on the 'Great Sea (Mediterranean Sea)'. '4 Great Beasts' came up from the 'Sea', diverse one from another. The '1st Beast' was like a 'Lion', with 'Eagle's Wings': I beheld till its 'Wings' were plucked, and it was lifted up from the earth, and made to stand upon '2 Feet' as a 'Man'; a 'Man's Heart' was given to it. Look, a '2nd Beast', like to a 'Bear', it was raised up on '1 Side (Foot)', '3 Ribs' were in its 'Mouth' between its 'Teeth': they said to it, 'Arise, devour much flesh'. I beheld, '3rd One', like a 'Leopard', which had on its 'Back, 4 Bird Wings'; the 'Beast' had '4 Heads'; and Dominion was given to it. After this I saw in the Night-Visions, a '4th Beast', terrible & powerful, & strong exceedingly; and it had 'Great Iron Teeth'; it devoured & brake in pieces, & stamped the residue (people, kingdoms, etc) with its 'Feet': it was diverse from all the 'Beasts' that were before it; it had '10 Horns'. I considered the 'Horns', there came up among them another 'Horn', a 'Little One' (Little Horn), before which '3 of the 1st Horns' (3 Earlier Horns) were plucked up by the 'Roots': in this 'Horn' were 'Eyes' like the 'Eyes of a Man', a 'Mouth' speaking great things'. I beheld till 'Thrones' were placed, 'One That was Ancient of Days' did sit: His 'Raiment' was 'White' as 'Snow', the 'Hair' of His 'Head' like 'Pure Wool'; His 'Throne' was 'Fiery Flames', the its 'Wheels Burning Fire'. A 'Fiery Stream' issued & came forth from before Him: 1,000s of 1,000s ministered to Him, 10,000 times 10,000 stood before Him: the Judgment was set, and the 'Books' were opened. I beheld at that time because of the 'Voice' of the 'Great Words' which the 'Horn' spoke; I beheld even till the 'Beast' was slain, and its 'Body' destroyed, and it was given to be burned with fire. The other 'Beasts', their Dominion was taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and a time [the exact time & season is not disclosed]. I saw in the Night-Visions, there came with the clouds of heaven 'One' like a 'Son of Man (Bar Enosh)', and He came even to the 'Ancient of Days', and they brought Him near before Him. There was given Him Dominion, & Glory, & a Kingdom, that all the Peoples, Nations, & Languages should serve Him: His dominion is an Everlasting Dominion, which shall not pass away, and His Kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

As for me, Daniel, my spirit was grieved in the midst of my body, and the Visions of my head troubled me. I came near to one of them that stood by, and asked him the truth concerning all this. So he told me, and made me know the interpretation of the things:'

These '4 Great Beasts', are '4 Kings', that shall arise out of the earth. The Saints of the Most High shall receive the Kingdom, and possess the Kingdom forever, even for ever & ever'. I desired to know the truth concerning the '4th Beast', and concerning the '10 Horns' that were on its 'Head', and the 'Other One' which came up, and before him 3 fell, that 'Other Horn' that had 'Eyes', & a 'Mouth' that 'spoke great things', whose look was more stout than its fellows. I beheld, the 'Same Horn' 'made war with the Saints, & prevailed against them'; till the 'Ancient of Days' came, and Judgment was given to the Saints of the Most-High (Elyon), and the time came that the Saints possessed the Kingdom. The '10 Horns': out of this Kingdom shall '10 Kings' arise: and 'Another' shall arise after them; and he shall be diverse from the 'Former', and he shall put down '3 Kings'. 'He shall speak words against the Most-High (Elyon), and shall wear out the saints of the Most-High (Elyon); and he shall think to change the times and the law; and they shall be given into his hand until a Time & Times & Half Time' [unknown dates or time]. 'The Judgment shall be set, they shall take away his Dominion, to consume and to destroy it to the end. The Kingdom & the Dominion, and the greatness of the Kingdoms under the whole heaven, shall be given to the People of the Saints of the Most-High (Elyon): His Kingdom is an Everlasting Kingdom, and all Dominions shall serve and obey Him'.

'Here is the end of the matter. As for me, Daniel, my thoughts much troubled me, and my countenance was changed in me: but I kept the matter in my heart'."))

Our analysis of the details of this Prophetic Dream-Vision & its Interpretation is this:

There are 4 Winds, 4 Great Beasts, & the Ancient of Days. The 4 Winds as a Storm on the Great Mediterranean Sea generate 4 Great Beasts, each different or unique. The 4 Beasts were like: Eagle Winged Lion; One-Footed Bear with 3 Ribs in its Mouth's Teeth; Leopard with its Back with 4 Bird Wings, it had 4 Heads; 4th Greatest Unique Beast with Great Iron Teeth, with Feet, with 10 Horns. The 1st Lion-like Beast had its Wings plucked, made to stand upright on its 2 Feet as a Man does, it was given a Man's Heart. The 2nd Bear-like Beast raised on One Side or Leg, was commanded to devour much flesh. The 3rd Leopard-like Beast was given Dominion or Empire. The 4th most unusual Greatest Beast devoured & crushed with its Feet everything; it was not like the former 3; its 10 Horns: One Little Horn emerged to uprooted 3 of the 10 Horns, leaving 7 Horns, it being the 8th Horn, the Little Horn: with Eyes of Man & a Great Speaking Mouth. Thrones were set up, seated was the One of Ancient Days (the Eternal One: Attiq Yomin), His snow-white Clothes, pure woolen Head of Hair, on His Blazing Throne on Wheels of Flames: a fiery stream issued from His Throne, His Court was Ministers of 1,000s & His Cases 10,000s to before the Judgment of the Open Books. The Time of the great words of the voice of the Horn (the 8th Horn, the Little Horn), the Beast was slain, its Body destroyed & torched. The rest of the Beast (the 7 Horns) were deprived of Dominion but allowed to continue for a season & time of undisclosed duration.

Daniel then saw in his Night-Visions: from the Clouds of Heaven came One like the Son of Man (Bar Enosh, in contrast to Ben Adam), that is, the Messiah, came to & brought to the Ancient of Days (the Ancient One: Attiq Yomin); He was given Dominion, Glory, & Kingdom, that is, Universal Glorious Rulership & Sovereignty & Everlasting Eternal Dominion over all the Earth of Peoples, Nations, & Languages. These Visions disturbed & puzzled Daniel, so he approached one of the Heavenly Court & asked concerning the truth & meaning of these Visions. He was given this Interpretation:

"The 4 Great Beasts that emerged from the Sea are 4 Kings to arise out of the Earth. The Saints of God will receive & possess the Kingdom forever. As for them unusual 4th Beast. & the 10 Horns on its Head, & the other unique Little Horn with Eyes & boastful blasphemous Mouth: he will war against the Saints & prevail till the Ancient of Days come with judgment for God's Saints & their possession of the Kingdom to come. Furthermore: from the Kingdom of the 4th Beast, shall emerge 10 Horns as 10 Kings, then afterwards the 11th Horn will emerge, the Little Horn, & displaces 3 of the 10 Horns, himself becoming the 8th Horn. He will oppose God, the Most High, & God's Saints, wearing them out, changing times & law, & prevailing against the Saints for a Time & Times & Half Time (3 1/2 of Times) of undisclosed duration. Then the Advent, judgment & court set, the 8th Horn's dominion confiscated to consume & destroy it to the end." The Kingdom & the Dominion, and the greatness of the Kingdoms under the whole heaven, shall be given to the People of the Saints of the Most-High (Elyon): His Kingdom is an Everlasting Kingdom, and all Dominions shall serve and obey Him." This is all, very troublesome Vision.

In our Reflections what more can we say to further interpret it to satisfy Daniel's meditations. It is clear that the Gentile Image of King Nebuchadnezzar is here further developed, the Kingdom of Babylon as the a quo, the starting place of the Gentile Beast, and the ad quem destination is the Messianic Kingdom. Babylon was mankind's 1st Kingdom, even before Egypt & elsewhere, originating with mankind's primal home according to Genesis chapters 1-11. In Mesopotamia, both North & South, in the Biblical Land of Shinar, arose after the Great Flood of Noah, over several generations & centuries, among an ancient people completely lost to historians for 2,000 years: namely the Sumerians & the Akkadians. The Southern Kingdom of Shinar was eventually repelled by the Northern Kingdom. The Sumer in the South down to Ur. Akkad with up to Nineveh. In time these 2 Kingdoms developed into Chaldeans & Syrians or Aramaeans; then after hundreds (100s) of years both arose anew, the Neo-Assyrian & the Neo-Babylonian Empires, which brings us to the Book of Daniel. As in Genesis 10 in the Table of the Gentiles, the Nations descended from Noah & his sons, the a quo origin of human civilization began in the Bible with Nimrod the 1st Great Mighty Hunter before the Lord. This civilization emerged from the Noahic Covenant & Gentile Dispensation, the Covenant as to Human Government, & the Dispensation as to the Gentile Nations. So here in Daniel we have reached a dispensational change in Gentile history from very ancient human evolution to ancient civilizations as Imperial Kingdoms or Global Dominance, which in turn continues to the present modern times. Therefore from the prophetic Divine Intuition & Inclination we are allowed into the future things of Daniel's day. It is said that History begins at Sumer, so we may say Empires began at Babylon.

Some are determined to figure out the certainty of the historical application & analogy to the 4 Beasts which are the 4 Metals & Members of Nebuchadnezzar's Dream-Vision. But I refrain to go too far, and advise to spare yourself needless labor, trouble, & error. The 4 Metals of the Golden Silver Brass Metallic Iron Man Image destroyed by the Stone is not ancient history substance or details. The thousands of facts, details, & stats are never considered by prophetic inspiration here & hereafter.

Daniel takes us from King Belshazzar's 1st year to his 3rd year, which we are not able to exactly harmonize with the exact years of Daniel's Captivity & of the Years of the Chaldean Babylonian Kings after the death of King Nebuchadnezzar. From King Nebuchadnezzar accession to the Throne in Babylon to King Belshazzar's death & King Darius & King Cyrus accession to the Throne in Babylon is some 70 years, Daniel in his mid-80s. It is apparent that these Visions of Daniel of Kings Belshazzar, Darius, & Cyrus, indicates that the Book of Daniel, like so much of Scripture was penned by the help of others beside the author. Due to the length of Daniel's life, history of his times unfolded in ways that the prophetic spirit had a vessel ready to hand to communicate divine things. The reader must judge in himself the veracity of these visions, events, & records.

Daniel's Vision near the River Ulai in Elam: a Long-Horned Ram, with 2 Horns., one grew longer than the other; the Ram pushed Westward, Northward, & Southward; no Beasts could resist & oppose or escape his Hand (Power); but he did according to his will, and magnified himself. Next, a He or Male Goat (Short-Horned Billy Goat or He-Goat), with a Great Horn between his Eyes, rushing towards the Ram in fury of power. The He-Goat struck the Ram & broke the 2 Ram Horns, leaving without power to resist or oppose. The He-Goat continued to batter the Ram to the ground, & trampled him; none could rescue the Ram from the He-Goat; which magnified himself exceedingly. But when the He-Goat became strong, his Great Horn was broken; in its place emerged 4 Notable Ones (Horns) pointing towards the 4

Winds (West, North, South, & East) of heaven. Out of One of the 4 Horns, emerged a Little Horn, which became great, he was pushing Southward & Eastward & toward the Glorious-land (Land of Israel, between Egypt & Syria). He grew great, towards the Host of Heaven, & battered & trampled down some of the Hosts & Stars. He magnified himself towards the Prince of the Host, taking away (eradicate, discontinue, terminate), from the Prince the 'Continual (Offering, Sacrifice)', and the 'Place of his Sanctuary' was cast down. The 'Host' was given over together with (treated like) the 'Continual (Offering, Sacrifice)' through transgression; and it cast down truth to the ground, and it continued & prospered. I heard a 'Holy One' (Angel or Elder) speaking; and another 'Holy One' said to the 'One' who spake, 'How long shall be the Vision of the Continual (Offering, Sacrifice), and the transgression that makes desolate, to give both the Sanctuary & the Host to be trodden under foot'? He said unto me, 'Unto 2,300 Evenings-Mornings [that is, 'days', consisting of nights & days]; then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed'. When I, Daniel, had seen the 'Vision', I sought to understand it; there stood before me as the appearance of a 'Man'. I heard a 'Man's Voice' between the Ulai, which called out, 'Gabriel, make this man to understand the Vision'. He came near where I stood; and when he came, I was affrighted, and fell on my face: but he said unto me, 'Understand, Son of man (like in Ezekiel); for the Vision belongs to the End Time'. As he was speaking with me, I fell into a deep sleep with my face toward the ground; but he touched me, and set me upright. He said, 'I will reveal & make ye know what shall be in the Latter Time (End Time) of the indignation; for it belongs to the appointed Time of the End (End Time)'. The 'Ram' which thou saw, with '2 Horns', they are the 'Kings of Media & Persia'. The rough (aggressive) 'He-Goat is the King of Greece: the Great Horn between his eyes is the 1st King' (Great Alexander). What was broken, in its place '4 Ones' stood up, '4 Kingdoms' shall stand up out of the Nation (Greek Empire), but not with his power. 'In the Latter Time (End Time) of their Kingdom', when the transgressors are come to the full, a 'King' of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. His power shall be mighty, but not by his own power; and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper and continue; and he shall destroy 'the Mighty Ones & the Holy People'. Through his policy he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and in security (unchallenged) shall he destroy many: he shall also stand up against the 'Prince of Princes'; but he shall be broken without hand. 'The Vision of the Evenings & Mornings which was told is true: but shut thou up the Vision; for it belongs to Many Days (End Times)'. I, Daniel, fainted, and was sick certain days; then I rose up, and did the King's business: and I wondered at the 'Vision', but none understood it.

It is clear to us that the Medo-Persian Empire will be conquered by the Grecian Great Horn of the Greek Goat, the Great King & Conqueror Alexander. That the 4 Notables were his 4 Generals, from which out of one of them emerged the Little Horn which in many respects is seen in the Greek Seleucid North-Eastern Kingdom & Power of King Antiochus Epiphanes or rather Epimanes in his struggle against the Ptolemies of Egypt, with its famous City of Alexandria of North Egypt. The picture & type seen in him in this Vision is clearly of Antiochus as AntiChrist of the future end times, from Daniel's time forward. 'The Vision of the Evenings & Mornings which was told is true": which is the priestly ministry of the Mosaic Levitical laws of offering sacrifices twice a day every day. The 2300 days equals some unknown times: if we calculate by math, we get: (2300 Eves & Morns = 2300 Days ÷ 7 dys = 328.57 wks ÷ 4 wks = 82.14 mnths ÷ 12 mnths = 6.84 yrs ÷ 2 = 3.42 yrs or about 3 1/2 yrs.) To exhaust the Vision in King Antiochus is to discard & ignore what will continue to develop in the other chapters of Daniel, chapters 9-12. Things are to be compared & understood with the help of the Books of Maccabees & Josephus' Jewish Wars.. I repeat the warning to Bible students, readers, & scholars, it is erroneous to take these Visions & Prophecies too far in finding the fulfillments both in history & Scriptures.

We will not repeat the historical chronology problems of these Persian Kings of Babylonia of Chaldeans. Daniel's reading of the Prophet Jeremiah's Scrolls, no doubt those re-written after King Jehoiakim burnt the first edition before the Captivity some 70 years earlier when Daniel was still in Judah of the Royal families, & perhaps the Kings Court as a Royal family member. Daniel became concerned as to the end '70 years Desolations of Jerusalem'. His status as a captive of the Gentile Power, of Israel & the Jews Captivity & condition of exile & foreigners or aliens, not to forget Jerusalem, the Temple, the land, now so far away, and the Remnant so few returned to their homeland, so he came himself to prayer & supplications in his remaining years. His prayer reflects so many things related to the Jewish dispensation as it applied to their latter state, that we do well & best just let the prayer speak for itself, paying attention to its details: 'Lord (Adhonai), the Great and Dreadful God (haEl), Who keeps covenant and lovingkindness with them that love Him and keep His commandments: we have sinned, have dealt perversely, have done wickedly, have rebelled, even turning aside from Thy precepts & from Thine ordinances; neither have we listened to Thy Servants the Prophets, that spake in Thy Name to our Kings, our princes, and our fathers, to the people of the land. Lord (Adonai), righteousness belongs to Thee, but to us confusion of face, as at this day; to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, to all Israel, that are near, & that are far off, through the countries whither Thou hast driven them, because of their trespasses against Thee. Lord (Adonai), to us confusion of face, to our Kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against Thee. To the Lord our God (Adonai Elohenu) belong mercies and forgiveness; for we have rebelled against Him; neither have we obeyed the Voice of Jehovah our God (YeHoWaH Elohenu), to walk in His Laws, which He set before us by His Servants the prophets. Israel have transgressed Thy Law, turning aside, that they should not obey Thy Voice: the curse has been poured out upon us, and the Oath that is written in the Law of Moses the Servant of God (haElohim); for we have sinned against Him. He confirmed His words, which He spoke against us, against our judges that judged us, by bringing upon us a great evil; for under the whole heaven has not been done as has been done on Jerusalem. As it is written in the Law of Moses, all this evil is come on us: yet have we not entreated the favor of Jehovah our God (YeHoWaH Elohenu), that we should turn from our iniquities, and have discernment in Thy truth. Jehovah (YeHoWaH) watched over the evil, and brought it on us; for Jehovah our God (YeHoWaH) is righteous in His Works which He doeth, and we have not obeyed His Voice. Lord our God (Adonai Elohenu), Who has led Thy people forth out of the land of Egypt with a Mighty Hand, and has gotten Thee renown, as at this day; we have sinned, we have done wickedly. Lord (Adonai), according to all Thy Righteousness, let Thine Anger & Thy Wrath, I pray Thee, be turned away from Thy City Jerusalem, Thy Holy Mountain; because for our sins, & for the iniquities of our fathers, Jerusalem & Thy People are become a reproach to all around us. Our God (Elohehu), listen to the prayer of Thy Servant, and to his supplications, and cause Thy face to shine upon Thy Sanctuary that is desolate, for the Lord's sake. My God (Elohai), incline Thine ear, and hear; open Thine Eyes, behold our desolations, and the City which is called by Thy Name: for we do not present our supplications before Thee for our righteousness, but for Thy Great Mercies' Sake. Lord (Adonai), hear; Lord (Adonai), forgive; Lord (Adonai), listen & do; defer not, for Thine Own Sake, my God (Elohai), because Thy City and Thy People are called by Thy Name.'

Before we go on, we consider Daniel's confession, repentance, humility, & faith. Israel's sins in disobedience to & violation of the Covenanted Law, the refusal to turn & return at the prophetic word repeatedly given, especially in Jeremiah's times & ministry. Judah & Israel got the Divine judgment deserved for disobedience & idolatry; yet Daniel still believed in the God of mercy, forgiveness, & redemption. This said we turn to the Angel Gabriel's Divine answer to Daniel's prayer & desire. The Angelic revelation concerning the Vision is to give wisdom & understanding to consider the matter (dabar, word), & understand the Vision. Gabriel said: '70 Weeks are decreed on thy people and on thy Holy City, to finish transgression, to make an end of sins, to make reconciliation for iniquity, to bring in everlasting righteousness, to seal up Vision & Prophecy, & to anoint the Most Holy'. 'Know & discern, from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to rebuild Jerusalem to the Anointed One (Messiah), the Prince, shall be 7 weeks, & 62 weeks: it shall be rebuilt, with street & moat (ditches), even in troublous times. After the 62 weeks shall the Anointed One be cut off, and shall have nothing: the people of the Coming Prince shall destroy the city & the Sanctuary; the end thereof shall be with a flood, to the end shall be war; desolations are determined. He shall make a firm Covenant with many for 1 week: and in the midst of the week he (He ?) shall cause the sacrifice & the oblation to cease; on the Wing of Abominations Desolating One Rides (Destroyer Comes); to the Full End (End Time), and that determined, shall be poured out upon the desolate (desolation, desolator)'.

We display the prophetic chronology of the 70 Weeks thus:
Daniel 9:24-27: Seventy (70, LXX) Weeks.

I. 7 Weeks: ($7 \times 7 = 49$)

II. 62 Weeks: ($62 \times 7 = 434$)

III. 1 Week: ($7 \times 1 = 7$)

IV. 70 Weeks: ($7 \times 70 = 490$) (Mat. 18:22: "Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, Until 'seven times'; but, Until 'seventy times seven' (490).") (Decree: Jerusalem's Restoration & Rebuilding) to (Prince Messiah) (Jerusalem rebuilt: street (inside City) & moat (ditch outside around Wall))

V. 49 Years = 1 Jubilee = 50th Year. $490 \div 49 = 10$ Jubilee Weeks; 10 Jubilees (10×50) = 500 Years. Chronology: 500 Years; B.C. 460 – 490 = 30 A.D. (Alternative Dates from the Decree to Messiah changes the Actual Dates. Example: B.C. 457 – 490 = 33 A.D. Likewise Jubilee Years alters results: $460 - 500 = 40$ A.D. Or, $457 - 500 = 43$ A.D. If Exact Date of Decree is Unknown then Messiah's Exact Date is Unknown.

In the 70 Years Captivity the Dispensational Judgment on Israel & Judah in the Babylonian Captivity God satisfied His righteous judgment & retribution on His chosen people. But His larger purposes with the Nations had come to maturity in man's experience of human government from the Flood to Messiah. 500 years still must be completed to bring that Dispensation to a close. Daniel would be used to introduce the preparation of the new Dispensation of the Messiah. This is why the 70 Weeks are here revealed at the close of the 70 Years Captivity. It is a prophetic 70 Weeks of Probation or Preparation of Israel for the Messiah in the Gentile world. 490 Years, the 70 Weeks, were to pass before God's patience & probation & toleration with the Gentiles must be terminated, to introduce a new & better way to deal with humanity, which belongs to Him, & which He desired so much to save. The Prophetic Period is to consist in 3 parts: 7 Weeks; 62 Weeks; 1 Week, which will be divided into 2 halves. The period in years would be: $49 + 434 + 1$, totals 490. The problem of interpretation arises if we overlook that Gentile Dispensation is being dealt with, with God dispensationally interactive with Gentile Kings. It is not enough to liberate the Jews, help them return to Israel & Judah as a Remnant, leaving the vast majority of Jews, Israelites, & Hebrews in Diaspora, dispersed throughout the Gentiles. No longer was the Old Jerusalem of King David House & Throne & Solomon's Temple, God's earthly Home, & Kingdom; no, but a New Jerusalem of Messiah, a New Covenant & Dispensation of spiritual things as fulfillment of all things typified, foreshadowed, prophesied, promised, & purposed with God's creation. God Himself will change Times, Seasons, Calendars, Governments, etc. Of these more to follow in the last 3 chapters of the Book of Daniel, chapters 10-12.

Daniel (Belteshazzar) is given another Vision in the 3rd year of King Cyrus the Persian, a Vision of Great Warfare, which was able to understand: he was near the Great Tigris River: 'I saw a Man clothed in linen, Whose Loins were girded with pure gold of Uphaz: His Body also was like the Beryl, His Face as the Appearance of Lightning, His Eyes as Flaming Torches, His Arms & His Feet like to Burnished Brass, the Voice of His Words like the Sound of a Multitude'. This Vision of the Man exhausted Daniel, & on hearing His Voice was put in a hypnotic trance face down. A Hand (of Gabriel, but not necessarily of the Man in white linen in the Vision) touched him & told him that he was a greatly beloved man, that he must understand the Angelic words not to be alarmed, & to stand up, for he was sent to him some 3 weeks (21 days) ago, but was resisted or opposed by the Prince of the Kingdom of Persia, but Prince Michael, one of the Chief Princes, helped me, & remained in with the Kings of Persia. 'I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days (End Times); for the vision is yet for [many] days': when he had spoken these words to him, he lowered his face to the ground, & was speechless. 'One in the likeness of the Sons of Men (i.e. Angel Gabriel, not necessarily of the Man in white linen in the Vision) touched my lips: then I opened my mouth, & said to him that stood before me, my Lord (Adoni), by reason of the Vision my sorrows are turned on me, & I retain no strength. For how can the servant of my Lord (Adoni) talk with this my Lord (Adoni)? for as for me, there remained no strength in me, neither was there breath left in me. Then there touched me again One like the appearance of a Man, and he strengthened me. He said, greatly beloved man, fear not: peace be to thee, be strong, yea, be strong. When he spoke to me, I was strengthened, & said, Let my Lord (Adoni) speak; for thou has strengthened me. Then said he, Know thou wherefore I am come unto thee? and now will I return to fight with the Prince of Persia: when I go forth, the Prince of Greece shall come. But I will tell thee that which is inscribed in the Writing of Truth: and there is none that holds with me against these, but Michael your Prince (Angelic Prince of Israel & Judah)'. The Angel Gabriel tells Daniel in spirit in the Vision, that in the 1st year of King Darius the Mede, he stood to help & support him, that is, to side with the Angel Prince Michael for Israel or the Jews. "I will show thee the Truth: There shall stand up yet 3 Kings in Persia; the 4th shall be far richer than they all: when he is grown strong through his riches, he shall stir up all against the Realm of Greece. A Mighty King shall stand up, that shall rule with Great Dominion, and do according to his will. When he shall stand up, his Kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the 4 Winds of heaven, but not to his posterity, nor according to his Dominion wherewith he ruled; for his Kingdom shall be plucked up, even for others besides these. The King of the South (Egypt south of Judah) shall be strong, & of his Princes; he shall be strong above him, and have Dominion; his Dominion shall be a Great Dominion. At the End of Years (End Times) they shall join themselves together; and the daughter of the King of the South (Egypt) shall come to the King of the North (Syria north of Israel) to make an agreement: but she shall not retain the strength of her arm; neither shall he stand, nor his arm; but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that birthed her, and he that strengthened her in those times. But out of a Shoot from her Roots shall One stand up in his place, who shall come to the army, and shall enter into the fortress of the King of the North (Syria), & shall deal against them, & shall prevail. He shall carry captive their 'gods' (elohim), with their molten images, their goodly vessels of silver & of gold, into Egypt (the King of the South); and he shall refrain some years from the King of the North (Syria). He (the Syrian King) shall come into the Realm of the King of the South (to fight with the Egyptian King, but he shall return into his own land. His sons (of the Syrian King) shall war, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces, which shall come on, and overflow, and pass through; and they shall return and war, even to his (Egyptian) fortress. The King of the South (Egypt) shall be moved with anger, and shall come forth and fight with him (the Syrian), with the King of the North (the Syrian); and he (the Syrian) shall set forth a great multitude, and the multitude shall be given into his (the Egyptian, in defeat) hand. The multitude shall be lifted up, and his (Syrian's) heart shall be exalted; and he (Syrian) shall cast down tens (10s) of thousands (1000s) (in war), but he shall not prevail. The King of the North (the Syrian) shall return (to Syria), and shall set forth (for another battle) a multitude greater than the former; and he (the Syrian) shall engage at the End of the Times of Years (End Times), with a great army and with much substance. In Those Times (End Times) there shall many stand up against the King of the South (Egypt): also the children of the violent among thy people (militant Israelites, like the Maccabees or Hasmoneans) shall lift themselves up to establish the Vision; but they shall fall. The King of the North (the Syrian) shall come, and cast up a mound, and take a well-fortified city: and the forces of the South (Egypt) shall not stand, neither his chosen people

(allies), neither shall there be any strength to stand. But he (Syrian) that cometh against him (Egyptian) shall do according to his (Syrian's) own will, and none shall stand before him (the Syrian); and he (Syrian) shall stand in the Glorious Land (Israel & Judah), and in his (Syrian's) hand shall be destruction. He (Syrian) shall set his face to come with the strength of his whole Kingdom, and with him equitable conditions; and he (Syrian) shall perform them: and he (Syrian) shall give him (the Egyptian) the daughter of women, to corrupt her; but she shall not stand, neither be for him (Syrian). After this shall he (Syrian) turn his face unto the isles (western peoples), and shall take many: but a Prince shall cause the reproach offered by him (Syrian) to cease; he (the Prince) shall cause his (Syrian) reproach to turn upon him. Then he (Syrian) shall turn his face toward the fortresses of his own land (Syria); but he shall stumble and fall, and shall not be found. Then shall stand up in his (Syrian) place one that shall cause an exactor to pass through the glory of the Kingdom; but within few days he (2nd Syrian) shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle. And in his (3rd Syrian) place shall stand up a Contemptible Person (as Antiochus Epiphanes as in 1st Maccabees), to whom they had not given the honor of the Kingdom: but he (3rd Syrian) shall come in time of security (peace), and shall obtain the Kingdom by flatteries. And the overwhelming forces shall be overwhelmed from before him (3rd Syrian), and shall be broken, yea, also the Prince of the Covenant. And after the league made with him he (3rd Syrian) shall work deceitfully; for he (3rd Syrian) shall come up, and shall become strong, with a small people. In time of security (peace) shall he come even upon the fattest places of the province; and he (3rd Syrian) shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers; he (3rd Syrian) shall scatter among them prey, and spoil, and substance: yea, he (3rd Syrian) shall devise his devices against the strongholds, even for a time. And he (Syrian, 3rd Syrian) shall stir up his power & his courage against the King of the South (Egyptian) with a great army; and the King of the South (Egypt) shall war in battle with an exceeding great and mighty army; but he (Egyptian) shall not stand; for they (his army) shall devise devices against him (Egyptian). They (his court & allies) that eat of his dainties shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow; and many shall fall down slain. As for both these Kings (Syrian & Egyptian), their hearts shall be to do mischief, and they shall speak lies at one table: but it shall not prosper; for yet the End shall be at the Time Appointed (End Times). Then shall he (Syrian) return into his land (Syria) with great substance; and his heart [shall be] against the Holy Covenant; and he shall continue (prosper), and return to his own land (Syria). At the Time Appointed (End Time) he (Syrian) shall return, and come into the south (Egypt); but it shall not be in the Latter Time (End Time) as it was in the former (earlier conflicts). For ships of Kittim (west Mediterranean Sea, Cyprus, Rome, Europe) shall come against him (Syrian); therefore he (Syrian) shall be grieved, and shall return, and have indignation against the Holy Covenant, and shall continue: he (Syrian) shall even return, and have regard to them that forsake the Holy Covenant. Forces shall stand on his (Syrian's) part, they shall profane the Sanctuary, even the Fortress, and shall take away the Continual (Offering, Sacrifice, Oblation); they (Syrian forces) shall set up the Abomination that maketh Desolate. And such as do wickedly against the Covenant shall he (Syrian) pervert by flatteries; but the people that know their God shall be strong, and continue. They (faithful Jews) that are wise among the people shall instruct many; yet they shall fall by the sword and by flame, by captivity and by spoil: days (undetermined). When they (Jews) shall fall, they shall be helped with a little help; but many shall join themselves to them (to the Jews) with flatteries. Some of them (Jews) that are wise shall fall, to refine them, and to purify, and to make them white, even to the Time of the End (End Time); because it is yet for the Time Appointed (End Time). (See 1st & 2nd Maccabees & Josephus' Jewish Wars to illustrate these things historically.) The King (Syrian) shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every 'god' (el), and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods (El Elim); and he (Syrian) shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished; for what is determined shall be done. Neither shall he regard the 'gods' (elohe) of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any 'god' (eloah); for he shall magnify himself above all. In his place shall he honor the 'god' (eloah) of fortresses; and a 'god' (eloah) whom his forefathers (fathers) knew not shall he honor with gold, silver, precious stones, & pleasant things. He shall deal with the strongest fortresses by the help of a foreign 'god' (eloah): whosoever acknowledges he (Syrian) will increase with glory; and he (Syrian) shall cause them (his allies, vassals) to rule over many, and shall divide the land for a price. And at the Time of the End (End Time) shall the King of the South (Egyptian)) contend with him (Syrian); and the King of the North (Syrian) shall come against him (Syrian) like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he (Syrian) shall enter into the countries (Canaan, Arabs, Egypt), and shall overflow and pass through. He shall enter also into the Glorious Land (Israel & Judah), and many shall be overthrown; but these shall be delivered out of his (Syrian's) hand: Edom & Moab, & the chief of the children of Ammon. He shall extend his (Syrian's) hand also upon the countries; and the land of Egypt (the South) shall not escape. But he (the Syrian) shall have power over the treasures of gold & of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt; and the Libyans & the Ethiopians (Egypt's allies) shall be at his (Syrian's) steps. But news out of the East & out of the North shall trouble him (while in his southern campaign); and he (Syrian) shall go forth (back to Syria) with great fury to destroy and utterly to sweep away many. And he (Syrian) shall plant the tents of his palace between the Sea (Great Sea, Mediterranean Sea) and the Glorious Holy Mountain (Zion, Jerusalem); yet he (Syrian) shall come to his end, and none shall help him. And at That Time shall Michael stand up, the Great Prince who standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a Time of Trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at That Time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the Book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame & everlasting contempt. And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever & ever. 'But thou, Daniel, Close the Words, & Seal the Book, even to the Time of the End (End Time): many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased'. Then I, Daniel, saw, there stood 2 others, the one on the brink of the river on this side, and the other on the brink of the river on that side. And one said to the Man Clothed in Linen, Who was above the waters of the river, 'How long shall it be to the End of these Wonders'? And I heard the Man Clothed in Linen, Who was above the waters of the river, when He held up His Right Hand & His Left hand to heaven, and swore by Him That Lives Forever that it shall be for a Time, Times, and a Half; and when they have made an end of breaking in pieces the power of the Holy People, all these things shall be finished'. And I heard, but I understood not: then said I, my Lord (Adoni), what shall be the issue of these things? And he said, 'Go thy way, Daniel; for the words are closed and sealed till the Time of the End (End Time). Many shall purify themselves, make themselves white, & be refined; but the wicked shall do wickedly; and none of the wicked shall understand; but they that are wise shall understand. And from the time that the continual (Offering, Sacrifice, Oblation) shall be taken away, and the Abomination that maketh Desolate set up, there shall be 1290 days [not 'years']. Blessed is he that waits, & comes to the 1335 days (not 'years'). But go thou thy way Till the End be; for thou shall rest, and shall stand in thy lot, at the End of the Days (End Times)'."

We analyse the details of the Revelation & Vision: 1st: There shall stand up yet 3 Kings in Persia; the 4th shall be far richer than they all: when he is grown strong through his riches, he shall stir up all against the Realm of Greece. A Mighty King shall stand up, that shall rule with Great Dominion, and do according to his will. When he shall stand up, his Kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the 4 Winds of heaven, but not to his posterity, nor according to his Dominion wherewith he ruled; for his Kingdom shall be plucked up, even for others besides these. Wikipedia (unless stated otherwise all historical extracts are from this) history teaches concerning the Persian-Greco Wars: ((Greco-Persian Wars were a series of conflicts between Achaemenid Empire & Greek City-States that started in c.500 B.C. & lasted until c.450 B.C.. Collision between fractious political world of Greeks and the enormous empire of the Persians began when Cyrus the Great conquered the Greek-inhabited region of Ionia in c.550 B.C.. Struggling to control independent-minded cities of Ionia, Persians appointed tyrants to rule each of them. This would prove to be source of much trouble for Greeks & Persians alike.) (Second Persian invasion of Greece occurred during the Greco-Persian Wars, as King Xerxes I of Persia sought to conquer all of Greece. Invasion was a direct, if delayed, response to defeat of first Persian invasion of Greece at the Battle of Marathon, which ended Darius I attempts to subjugate Greece. After Darius's death, his son Xerxes spent several years planning for second invasion, mustering enormous army & navy. The Athenians & Spartans led Greek resistance. About tenth of Greek City-States joined the 'Allied' effort; most remained neutral or submitted to Xerxes.) (Wars of Alexander the Great were fought by King Alexander III of Macedon ("Great" or Mighty), first against the Achaemenid Persian Empire under Darius III, and then against local chieftains & warlords as far east as Punjab, India (in modern history). By time of his death, he had conquered most of the world known to the ancient Greeks. However, he failed to conquer South Asia. Although being successful as military commander, he failed to provide any stable alternative to Achaemenid Empire —his untimely death threw vast territories he conquered into civil war. Alexander assumed kingship of Macedonia following death of his father Philip II, who had unified most of city-states of mainland Greece under Macedonian hegemony in federation called Hellenic League. After reconfirming Macedonian rule by quashing rebellion of southern Greek city-states & staging short but bloody excursion against Macedon's northern neighbors, Alexander set out east against Achaemenid Persian Empire, under its "King of Kings" (title all Achaemenid kings went by), Darius III, which he defeated and overthrew. His conquests included Anatolia, Syria, Phoenicia, Judea, Gaza, Egypt, Mesopotamia, Persia and Bactria, and he extended the boundaries of his own empire as far as Taxila, India (now Pakistan). Alexander had already made more plans prior to his death for military & mercantile expansions into Arabian Peninsula, after which he was to turn his armies to west (Carthage, Rome, & Iberian Peninsula). However, Alexander's Diadochi (successors) quietly abandoned these grandiose plans after his death. Instead, within a few years of Alexander's death, the Diadochi (successors) began fighting with each other, dividing up the Empire between themselves, and triggering 40 years of warfare.) (Wars of Diadochi ("successors"), or Wars of Alexander's Successors, were a series of conflicts fought between Alexander the Great's generals over the rule of his vast empire after his death. They occurred between 322-281 B.C.. On June 10, c.325 B.C., Alexander the Great died, leaving behind a huge empire stretching from Greece & Macedon in Europe to Indus valley in India. His death left Macedonians in very difficult position. Ruthlessness of Philip & Alexander toward possible rivals had left Empire without clear & competent successor. Argead family was reduced to Alexander's mentally defective half-brother Arrhidaeus, his yet unborn son Alexander IV, & his reputed illegitimate son Heracles, mere child, & women of family, his mother Olympias, his sister Cleopatra, & his half-sisters Thessalonice & Cynane. Without chosen successor, there was almost immediately dispute among his Generals as to whom his successor should be. Meleager & Infantry supported candidacy of Alexander's half-brother, Arrhidaeus, while Perdiccas, leading Cavalry Commander, supported waiting until birth of Alexander's unborn child by Roxana. Compromise was arranged —Arrhidaeus (as Philip III) should become King, & should rule jointly with Roxana's child, assuming that it was boy (as it was, becoming Alexander IV). Perdiccas himself would become Regent of Empire, & Meleager his Lieutenant. Soon, however, Perdiccas had Meleager & other Infantry leaders murdered, & assumed full control.

Other cavalry generals who had supported Perdiccas were rewarded in partition of Babylon by becoming Satraps of various parts of Empire. Ptolemy received Egypt; Laomedon received Syria & Phoenicia; Philotas took Cilicia; Peithon took Media; Antigonos received Phrygia, Lycia & Pamphylia; Asander received Caria; Menander received Lydia; Lysimachus received Thrace; Leonnatus received Hellespontine Phrygia; & Neoptolemus had Armenia. Macedon & rest of Greece were to be under joint rule of Antipater, who had governed them for Alexander, & Craterus, Alexander's most-able lieutenant, while Alexander's old secretary, Eumenes of Cardia, was to receive Cappadocia & Paphlagonia. In east, Perdiccas largely left Alexander's arrangements intact –Taxiles & Porus ruled over their kingdoms in India; Alexander's father-in-law Oxyartes ruled Gandara; Sibyrtius ruled Arachosia & Gedrosia; Stasanor ruled Aria & Drangiana; Philip ruled Bactria & Sogdiana; Phrataphernes ruled Parthia and Hyrcania; Peucestas governed Persis; Tlepolemus had charge over Carmania; Atropates governed northern Media; Archon got Babylonia; and Arcesilas ruled northern Mesopotamia.

News of Alexander's death inspired revolt in Greece, known as Lamian War. Athens & other cities joined together, ultimately besieging Antipater in fortress of Lamia. Antipater was relieved by force sent by Leonnatus, who was killed in action, but the war did not come to end until Craterus's arrival with fleet to defeat Athenians at Battle of Crannon on September 5, c.320 B.C.. For time, this brought end to Greek resistance to Macedonian domination. Meanwhile, Peithon suppressed revolt of Greek settlers in eastern parts of Empire, & Perdiccas & Eumenes subdued Cappadocia. First War of Diadochi, c.320 B.C.. Second War of Diadochi, c. 320-315 B.C.. Third War of Diadochi, c.315-310 B.C.. At the end of war there were five Diadochi left: Cassander ruling Macedon & Thessaly, Lysimachus ruling Thrace, Antigonos ruling Asia Minor, Syria & Phoenicia, Seleucus ruling eastern provinces & Ptolemy ruling Egypt & Cyprus. Each of them ruled as Kings (in all but name). Babylonian War, c.310 B.C.. Fourth War of Diadochi, c.310-300 B.C.. Struggle of Lysimachus & Seleucus, c.285-280 B.C.. Gallic Invasions & Consolidation, c.280-275 B.C.. (Now, at long last, almost 50 years after Alexander's death, some sort of order was restored. Ptolemy ruled over Egypt, southern Syria (known as Coele-Syria), and various territories on the southern coast of Asia Minor. Antiochus ruled the vast Asian territories of Empire, while Macedon & Greece (with exception of Aetolian League) fell to Antigonos.)

The King of the South (Egypt south of Judah) shall be strong, & of his Princes; he shall be strong above him, and have Dominion; his Dominion shall be a Great Dominion. At the End of Years (End Times) they shall join themselves together; and the daughter of the King of the South (Egypt) shall come to the King of the North (Syria north of Israel) to make an agreement: but she shall not retain the strength of her arm; neither shall he stand, nor his arm; but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that birthed her, and he that strengthened her in those times. But out of a Shoot from her Roots shall One stand up in his place, who shall come to the army, and shall enter into the fortress of the King of the North (Syria), & shall deal against them, & shall prevail. He shall carry captive their 'gods' (elohim), with their molten images, their goodly vessels of silver & of gold, into Egypt (the King of the South); and he shall refrain some years from the King of the North (Syria). He (the Syrian King) shall come into the Realm of the King of the South (to fight with the Egyptian King, but he shall return into his own land. His sons (of the Syrian King) shall war, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces, which shall come on, and overflow, and pass through; and they shall return and war, even to his (Egyptian) fortress. The King of the South (Egypt) shall be moved with anger, and shall come forth and fight with him (the Syrian), with the King of the North (the Syrian); and he (the Syrian) shall set forth a great multitude, and the multitude shall be given into his (the Egyptian, in defeat) hand. The multitude shall be lifted up, and his (Syrian's) heart shall be exalted; and he (Syrian) shall cast down tens (10s) of thousands (1000s) (in war), but he shall not prevail. The King of the North (the Syrian) shall return (to Syria), and shall set forth (for another battle) a multitude greater than the former; and he (the Syrian) shall engage at the End of the Times of Years (End Times), with a great army and with much substance. In Those Times (End Times) there shall many stand up against the King of the South (Egypt): also the children of the violent among thy people (militant Israelites, like the Maccabees or Hasmoneans) shall lift themselves up to establish the Vision; but they shall fall. The King of the North (the Syrian) shall come, and cast up a mound, and take a well-fortified city: and the forces of the South (Egypt) shall not stand, neither his chosen people (allies), neither shall there be any strength to stand. But he (Syrian) that cometh against him (Egyptian) shall do according to his (Syrian's) own will, and none shall stand before him (the Syrian); and he (Syrian) shall stand in the Glorious Land (Israel & Judah), and in his (Syrian's) hand shall be destruction. He (Syrian) shall set his face to come with the strength of his whole Kingdom, and with him equitable conditions; and he (Syrian) shall perform them: and he (Syrian) shall give him (the Egyptian) the daughter of women, to corrupt her; but she shall not stand, neither be for him (Syrian). After this shall he (Syrian) turn his face unto the isles (western peoples), and shall take many: but a Prince shall cause the reproach offered by him (Syrian) to cease; he (the Prince) shall cause his (Syrian) reproach to turn upon him. Then he (Syrian) shall turn his face toward the fortresses of his own land (Syria); but he shall stumble and fall, and shall not be found. Then shall stand up in his (Syrian) place one that shall cause an exactor to pass through the glory of the Kingdom; but within few days he (2nd Syrian) shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle. And in his (3rd Syrian) place shall stand up a Contemptible Person (as Antiochus Epiphanes as in 1st Maccabees), to whom they had not given the honor of the Kingdom: but he (3rd Syrian) shall come in time of security (peace), and shall obtain the Kingdom by flatteries. And the overwhelming forces shall be overwhelmed from before him (3rd Syrian), and shall be broken, yea, also the Prince of the Covenant. And after the league made with him he (3rd Syrian) shall work deceitfully; for he (3rd Syrian) shall come up, and shall become strong, with a small people. In time of security (peace) shall he come even upon the fattest places of the province; and he (3rd Syrian) shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers; he (3rd Syrian) shall scatter among them prey, and spoil, and substance: yea, he (3rd Syrian) shall devise his devices against the strongholds, even for a time. And he (Syrian, 3rd Syrian) shall stir up his power & his courage against the King of the South (Egyptian) with a great army; and the King of the South (Egypt) shall war in battle with an exceeding great and mighty army; but he (Egyptian) shall not stand; for they (his army) shall devise devices against him (Egyptian). They (his court & allies) that eat of his dainties shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow; and many shall fall down slain. As for both these Kings (Syrian & Egyptian), their hearts shall be to do mischief, and they shall speak lies at one table: but it shall not prosper; for yet the End shall be at the Time Appointed (End Times). Then shall he (Syrian) return into his land (Syria) with great substance; and his heart [shall be] against the Holy Covenant; and he shall continue (prosper), and return to his own land (Syria). At the Time Appointed (End Time) he (Syrian) shall return, and come into the south (Egypt); but it shall not be in the Latter Time (End Time) as it was in the former (earlier conflicts). For ships of Kittim (west Mediterranean Sea, Cyprus, Rome, Europe) shall come against him (Syrian); therefore he (Syrian) shall be grieved, and shall return, and have indignation against the Holy Covenant, and shall continue: he (Syrian) shall even return, and have regard to them (Jews) that forsake the Holy Covenant. Forces shall stand on his (Syrian's) part, they shall profane the Sanctuary, even the Fortress, and shall take away the Continual (Offering, Sacrifice, Oblation); they (Syrian forces) shall set up the Abomination that maketh Desolate. And such as do wickedly against the Covenant shall he (Syrian) pervert by flatteries; but the people (Jews) that know their God shall be strong, and continue. They (faithful Jews) that are wise among the people shall instruct many; yet they shall fall by the sword and by flame, by captivity and by spoil: days (undetermined). When they (Jews) shall fall, they shall be helped with a little help; but many shall join themselves to them (to the Jews) with flatteries. Some of them (Jews) that are wise shall fall, to refine them, and to purify, and to make them white, even to the Time of the End (End Time); because it is yet for the Time Appointed (End Time). (See 1st & 2nd Maccabees & Josephus' Jewish Wars to illustrate these things historically.) The King (Syrian) shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every 'god' (el), and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods (El Elim); and he (Syrian) shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished; for what is determined shall be done. Neither shall he regard the 'gods' (elohe) of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any 'god' (eloah); for he shall magnify himself above all. In his place shall he honor the 'god' (eloah) of fortresses; and a 'god' (eloah) whom his forefathers (fathers) knew not shall he honor with gold, silver, precious stones, & pleasant things. He shall deal with the strongest fortresses by the help of a foreign

'god' (eloah): whosoever acknowledges, he (Syrian) will increase with glory; and he (Syrian) shall cause them (his allies, vassals) to rule over many, and shall divide the land for a price. And at the Time of the End (End Time) shall the King of the South (Egyptian)) contend with him (Syrian); and the King of the North (Syrian) shall come against him (Syrian) like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he (Syrian) shall enter into the countries (Canaan, Arabs, Egypt), and shall overflow and pass through. He shall enter also into the Glorious Land (Israel & Judah), and many shall be overthrown; but these shall be delivered out of his (Syrian's) hand: Edom & Moab, & the chief of the children of Ammon. He shall extend his (Syrian's) hand also upon the countries; and the land of Egypt (the South) shall not escape. But he (the Syrian) shall have power over the treasures of gold & of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt; and the Libyans & the Ethiopians (Egypt's allies) shall be at his (Syrian's) steps. But news out of the East & out of the North shall trouble him (while in his southern campaign); and he (Syrian) shall go forth (back to Syria) with great fury to destroy and utterly to sweep away many. And he (Syrian) shall plant the tents of his palace between the Sea (Great Sea, Mediterranean Sea) and the Glorious Holy Mountain (Zion, Jerusalem); yet he (Syrian) shall come to his end, and none shall help him.

Extracted from Wikipedia: ((Syrian Wars were a series of 6 wars between Seleucid Empire & Ptolemaic Kingdom of Egypt, successor states to Alexander the Great's Empire, during the 3rd and 2nd centuries B.C. over the region then called Coele-Syria, one of the few avenues into Egypt. These conflicts drained material & manpower of both parties & led to their eventual destruction & conquest by Rome & Parthia. They are briefly mentioned in the biblical Books of Maccabees.

In Wars of Diadochi following Alexander's death, Coele-Syria initially came under rule of Antigonos I Monophthalmus. In c.300 B.C. Ptolemy I Soter, who 4 years earlier had crowned himself King of Egypt, exploited events surrounding Battle of Ipsus to take control of region. Victors at Ipsus, however, had allocated Coele-Syria to Ptolemy's former ally Seleucus I Nicator, founder of Seleucid Empire. Seleucus, who had been aided by Ptolemy during his ascent to power, did not take any military action to reclaim region. Once both were dead, however, their successors became embroiled in war.

First Syrian War (c.275–270 B.C.)

Decade into his rule, Ptolemy II faced Antiochus I, Seleucid King who was trying to expand his empire's holdings in Syria & Anatolia. Ptolemy proved to be forceful ruler & skilled General. In addition, his recent marriage to his court-wise sister Arsinoe II of Egypt had stabilized the volatile Egyptian Court, allowing Ptolemy to successfully carry out the campaign.

First Syrian War was major victory for Ptolemies. Antiochus took Ptolemaic controlled areas in coastal Syria & southern Anatolia in his initial rush. Ptolemy reconquered these territories by c.270 B.C., extending Ptolemaic rule as far as Caria & into most of Cilicia. With Ptolemy's eye focused eastward, his half-brother Magas declared his province of Cyrenaica to be independent. It would remain independent until c.250 B.C., when it was reabsorbed into the Ptolemaic Kingdom: but not before having triggered a sequence of Ptolemaic (Egypt) & Seleucid (Syria) court intrigues, war & ultimately leading to marriage of Theos & Berenice (also called Berenice Phernophorus or Berenice Syra (died c.245 B.C.), daughter of Ptolemy II Philadelphus & Arsinoe I of Egypt. She was married to Seleucid (Syria) ruler Antiochus II Theos, supplanting his first wife, Laodice, whose children she persuaded him to bar from succession to throne in favour of her own.).

Second Syrian War (c.260-255 B.C.) See also: Battle of Cos.

Antiochus II (Syria) succeeded his father in c.260 B.C., & thus began a new war for Syria. He reached agreement with current Antigonid King in Macedon, Antigonos II Gonatas, who was also interested in pushing Ptolemy II (Egypt) out of Aegean. With Macedon's support, Antiochus II launched attack on Ptolemaic outposts in Asia.

Most of the information about Second Syrian War has been lost. It is clear that Antigonos' fleet defeated Ptolemy's at the Battle of Cos in c.260, diminishing Ptolemaic naval power. Ptolemy (Egypt) appears to have lost ground in Cilicia, Pamphylia, and Ionia, while Antiochus (Syria) regained Miletus & Ephesus. Macedon's involvement in the war ceased when Antigonus became preoccupied by rebellion of Corinth & Chalcis in c.255 B.C., possibly instigated by Ptolemy (Egypt), as well as increase in enemy activity along Macedon's northern frontier.

War was concluded around c.255 B.C. with marriage of Antiochus (Syria) to Ptolemy's (Egypt) daughter, Berenice Syra. Antiochus repudiated his previous wife, Laodice, and turned over substantial domain to her. He died in Ephesus in c.245 B.C., poisoned. Ptolemy II (Berenice's father) died in same year.

Third Syrian War (c.245-240 B.C.) See also: Battle of Andros (c.245 B.C.).

Also known as Laodicean War, Third Syrian War began with one of many succession crises that plagued Hellenistic states. Antiochus II (Syria) left two ambitious mothers, his repudiated wife Laodice & Ptolemy II's daughter Berenice Syra, in a competition to put their respective sons on throne. Laodice claimed that Antiochus had named her son heir while on his deathbed, but Berenice argued that her newly born son was legitimate heir. Berenice asked her brother Ptolemy III (Egypt), new Ptolemaic king, to come to Antioch (Syria) & help place her son on throne. When Ptolemy (Egypt) arrived, Berenice & her child had been assassinated.

Ptolemy (Egypt) declared war on Laodice's newly crowned son, Seleucus II (Syria), in c.245 B.C., & campaigned with great success (his forces possibly being commanded by Xanthippus of Sparta, aka Xanthippus of Carthage, mercenary general responsible for defeating Roman army at Tunis/Bagrades in c.255 B.C.). He won major victories over Seleucus in Syria and Anatolia, briefly occupied Antioch &, as a recent cuneiform discovery proves, even reached Babylon. These victories were marred by loss of Cyclades to Antigonus Gonatas in Battle of Andros. Seleucus (Syria) had his own difficulties. His domineering mother asked him to grant co-regency to his younger brother, Antiochus Hierax, as well as rule over Seleucid territories in Anatolia. Antiochus (Syria) promptly declared independence, undermining Seleucus' (Syria) efforts to defend against Ptolemy (Egypt). In exchange for peace in c.240 B.C., Ptolemy (Egypt) was awarded new territories on northern coast of Syria, including Seleucia Pieria, the port of Antioch. Ptolemaic (Egypt) kingdom was at height of its power.

Fourth Syrian War (c.220-215 B.C.) See also: Battle of Raphia.

Upon taking Seleucid (Syria) throne in c.225 B.C., Antiochus III the Great (241–187 BC) set himself the task of restoring the lost imperial possessions of Seleucus I Nicator, which extended from Greco-Bactrian Kingdom in the east, the Hellespont in the north, & Syria in the south. By c.220 B.C., he had re-established Seleucid control over Media & Persia, which had been in rebellion. Ambitious King turned his eyes toward Syria & Egypt.

Egypt had been significantly weakened by court intrigue & public unrest. Rule of newly inaugurated Ptolemy IV Philopator (reigned c.220-205 B.C.) began with the murder of queen-mother Berenice II. Young king quickly fell under absolute influence of imperial courtiers. His ministers used their absolute power in their own self-interest, to people's great chagrin.

Antiochus (Syria) sought to take advantage of this chaotic situation. After invasion in c.220 B.C. failed to launch, he finally began Fourth Syrian War in c.220 B.C.. He (Syria) recaptured Seleucia Pieria as well as cities in Phoenicia, amongst them Tyre. Rather than promptly invading Egypt, Antiochus waited in Phoenicia for over a year, consolidating his new territories & listening to diplomatic proposals from Ptolemaic (Egypt) kingdom.

Meanwhile, Ptolemy's minister Sosibius began recruiting and training an army. He recruited not only from local Greek population, as Hellenistic armies generally were, but also from native Egyptians, enrolling at least 30,000 natives as phalangites. This innovation paid off, but it would eventually have dire consequences for Ptolemaic stability. In the summer of c.220 B.C., Ptolemy engaged & defeated long-delayed Antiochus in Battle of Raphia, largest battle since Battle of Ipsus over 80 years earlier.

Ptolemy's (Egypt) victory preserved his control over Coele-Syria, & weak King (Egypt) declined to advance further into Antiochus' (Syria) empire, even to retake Seleucia Pieria. The Ptolemaic kingdom would continue to weaken over the following years, suffering from economic problems & rebellion. Nationalist sentiment had developed among native Egyptians who had fought at Raphia. Confident & well-trained, they broke from Ptolemy in what is known as the Egyptian Revolt, establishing their own kingdom in Upper Egypt which Ptolemies finally reconquered around c.185 B.C..

Fifth Syrian War (c.200-195 B.C.) See also: Battle of Panium.

Death of Ptolemy IV in c.205 B.C. was followed by a bloody conflict over regency as his heir, Ptolemy V, was just child. Conflict began with murder of dead king's wife & sister Arsinoë by ministers Agathocles & Sosibius. Fate of Sosibius is unclear, but Agathocles seems to have held regency for some time until he was lynched by volatile Alexandrian mob. Regency was passed from one adviser to another, & kingdom was in state of near anarchy.

Seeking to take advantage of this turmoil, Antiochus III staged a second invasion of Coele-Syria. He convinced Philip V of Macedon to join the war and conquer the Ptolemies' territories in Asia Minor - actions which led to Second Macedonian War between Macedon & Romans. Antiochus quickly swept through the region. After a brief setback at Gaza, he delivered a crushing blow to the Ptolemies at the Battle of Panium near the head of the River Jordan which earned him the important port of Sidon.

In c.200 B.C., Roman emissaries came to Philip & Antiochus demanding that they refrain from invading Egypt. Romans would suffer no disruption of import of grain from Egypt, key to supporting massive population in Italy. As neither Monarch had planned to invade Egypt itself, they willingly complied to Rome's demands. Antiochus completed subjugation of Coele-Syria in c.200 B.C. & went on to raid Ptolemy's remaining coastal strongholds in Caria & Cilicia.

Problems at home led Ptolemy (Egypt) to seek quick & disadvantageous conclusion. Nativist movement, which began before war with Egyptian Revolt & expanded with support of Egyptian priests, created turmoil & sedition throughout kingdom. Economic troubles led Ptolemaic government to increase taxation, which in turn fed nationalist fire. In order to focus on home front, Ptolemy signed a conciliatory treaty with Antiochus (Syria) in c.195 B.C., leaving Seleucid King in possession of Coele-Syria & agreeing to marry Antiochus' daughter Cleopatra I.

Sixth Syrian War (c.170 B.C.) Sidon coinage of Antiochus IV, depicting victorious galley.

Causes of this conflict are obscure. In c.170, Eulaeus & Lenaeus, two regents of young King of Egypt Ptolemy VI Philometor, declared war on the Seleucid (Syria) ruler Antiochus IV Epiphanes. In same year, Ptolemy's younger siblings Ptolemy VIII Physcon & Cleopatra II were declared co-rulers in order to bolster unity of Egypt. Military operations did not begin until c.170 B.C. when Antiochus quickly gained the upper hand, seizing the important strategic town of Pelusium. Egyptians realised their folly in starting war, Eulaeus & Lenaeus were overthrown & replaced by two new regents, Comanus & Cineas, & envoys were sent to negotiate peace treaty with Antiochus (Syria). Antiochus took Ptolemy VI (who was his nephew) under his guardianship, giving him effective control of Egypt. However, this was unacceptable to people of Alexandria who responded by proclaiming Ptolemy Physcon as sole King. Antiochus (Syria) besieged Alexandria but he was unable to cut communications to city so, at the end of c.170 B.C., he withdrew his army. In his absence, Ptolemy VI & his brother were reconciled. Antiochus, angered at his loss of control over King, invaded again. Egyptians sent to Rome asking for help & Senate dispatched Gaius Popilius Laenas to Alexandria. Meanwhile, Antiochus had seized Cyprus & Memphis & was marching on Alexandria. At Eleusis, on outskirts of capital, he met Popilius Laenas, with whom he had been friends during his stay in Rome. But instead of a friendly welcome, Popilius offered King ultimatum from Senate: he must evacuate Egypt & Cyprus immediately. Antiochus begged to have time to consider but Popilius drew circle round him in sand with his cane & told him to decide before he stepped outside it. Antiochus chose to obey Roman ultimatum. "Day of Eleusis" (Day of Roman Ultimatum at Eleusis) ended Sixth Syrian War & Antiochus' hopes of conquering Egyptian territory.))

The Syrian-Egyptian Wars were easily seen in Daniel's prophecy, and so interpreted in Books of Maccabees & Josephus's Jewish Wars. They produced Maccabees' "Hasmonean Dynasty ruling Judea & surrounding regions during classical antiquity. Between c.140 and c.115 B.C.E. dynasty ruled Judea semi-autonomously from Seleucids. From c.110 B.C.E., with Seleucid Empire disintegrating, dynasty became fully independent, expanded into neighbouring regions of Samaria, Galilee, Iturea, Perea, & Idumea, and Rulers took title "basileus" (King)." It is also evident that the prophetic history is general & indefinite as to its exact fulfillment. The North & South Powers, as Syria & Egypt has continued 2,000 years. The implication & inference of Antiochus Epiphanes typifying AntiChrist is also evident. These prophecies as prophetic historical predictions are very electrifying & certainly latent with hermeneutical curiosity & fascination, but also liable to many errors & exaggerations. We move on to conclude our reading, study, & reflections of the Prophet Daniel's Visions.

"And at That Time shall Michael stand up, the Great Prince who standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a Time of Trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at That Time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the Book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame & everlasting contempt. And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever & ever. 'But thou, Daniel, Close the Words, & Seal the Book, even to the Time of the End (End Time): many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased'." These words will take the Jews from the rise of the Maccabees to the coming of Messiah, & will continue to the 2nd Advent of Christ. The Jews will increasingly integrate & mix in the Gentile world among all the nations, first with the Greeks, but then completely with the Romans to our day. The Angelic Rulers as seen in Gabriel & Michael, the Prince of Persia & the Prince of Greece, will work for the protection & preservation of Israel or the Jews. They will continue to be tried, persecuted, & if possible, annihilated by genocide. Many will know their God, & remain faithful unto death & to the very end of the times. All will lead to the resurrection of eternal life or condemnation. Daniel is told to seal the Book of Visions & Prophecies till the future appointed time. That Time the Apostle John, in his Book of Revelation of Jesus Christ, will unseal & consummate. We do no good to Jews or Christians or other Gentiles to try to figure out too exactly

"Then I, Daniel, saw, there stood 2 others, the one on the brink of the river on this side, and the other on the brink of the river on that side. And one said to the Man Clothed in Linen, Who was above the waters of the river, 'How long shall it be to the End of these Wonders'? And I heard the Man Clothed in Linen, Who was above the waters of the river, when He held up His Right Hand & His Left hand to heaven, and swore by Him That Lives Forever that it shall be for a Time, Times, and a Half; and when they have made an end of breaking in pieces the power of the Holy People, all these things shall be finished'. And I heard, but I understood not: then said I, my Lord (Adoni), what shall be the issue of these things? And he said, 'Go thy way, Daniel; for the words are closed and sealed till the Time of the End (End Time). Many shall purify themselves, make themselves white, & be refined; but the wicked shall do wickedly; and none of the wicked shall understand; but they that are wise shall understand. And from the time that the continual (Offering, Sacrifice, Oblation) shall be taken away, and the Abomination that maketh Desolate set up, there shall be 1290 days [not 'years']. Blessed is he that waits, & comes to the 1335 days (not 'years'). But go thou thy way Till the End be for thou shall rest, and shall stand in thy lot, at the End of the Days (End Times)'".

The words above takes us through the days of Messiah in His 1st Advent and through to present Dispensation of the Spirit in the Christian Church as testimony & witness for God's Christ to Jews & Gentiles. We must now review the 500 years before Messiah, & preview the 500 years after Christ.

The Gentiles reached a certain maturity in the world in their progression & advancement in the human experience & the evolution of mankind. From a Biblical perspective man as an image appeared to reach his adulthood, the ancient ways as if a minor, must yield to maturity & creation of new world. The Gentiles were some 2,000 years in development, just reaching the end of their teen years, when the Ancient ways were still very much at work in influence & practice. The ways of their distant past had been adapted & modified by human interaction of cultures & customs, & other forces of great numbers. The inhabited world throughout the earth increased in population globally from 1,000s of people in a large city to 10,000s to 100,000s in a kingdom to millions in an Empire. In religion, philosophy, science, technology, education, transportation, communication, commerce, & exploration had brought the global or world Man to be a New Image. As we said often before, from Adam to Abraham & Hammurabi we have 2,000 years, from then till Christ & Caesar is another 2,000 years, & to the present another 2,000 years human growth in the world. The increase in population brought both good & evil with its growth, with the changes mankind had to make to survive & thrive. The doctrine & notion of the survival of the fittest by natural selections of migration, exploitation, war, subjugation, & slavery made the strongest people & power to dominate. But this supremacy of one nation over another nation, alienation of people with people, national prejudice, malice towards races, and a thousand other things we could consider, all brought the human family as Man before God, with the Nations as the representation of that Human Image.

King Nebuchadnezzar's dream-vision of the Colossal Metal Man in Imperial divisions from Babylon to Rome is what now occupies the Divine Watcher of the Nations with His Court of Angelic Princes to keep up with all human expansion & innovations. Each nation has a way on earth, the Mesopotamian way, Babylonian or Assyrian or Persian way, Egyptian way, Mediterranean way, Greek & Roman way, European way, British & German way, Spanish & French way, Italian & Russian way; or of these, the Western way versus the Eastern way, Near Eastern or Far Eastern way, Asian or African way, Chinese or Mongolian way, Japanese or Korean way, Islanders way, Mainland way, South American way, North American way, Mexican or American way, Canadian way, Latin American way, Jewish or Christian way, Buddhist or Muslim way, etc, etc. All these ways are seen in customs, habits, dress, manners, food, music, houses, labor, etc. We are not able with all our technology of the 21st century, keep up with human changes & development. So too, God not to overburden His Heart & Time deals with the Gentile Nations by Kingdoms, the Kingdoms by Kings, cities & states by majors & governors, villages by chiefs, families by fathers, etc. The leaders & rulers of every sort will before God represents the whole as the Head is to the Body. As with the Gentiles more so with the Hebrews, Israelites, & Jews. God's people have divine headship established by God in the institution & dispensation of human government. Powers & Authorities are allowed as divine institutions to govern man amongst themselves in their Kingdoms or States.

Enough is said in general government among men. Israel as Hebrews were now to be transformed from the ancient Mosaic system of Laws & Levites, to Jews of a new Judaism of the Book & Prayers. The ritual worship with all its bloody sacrifices will in time be removed & terminated. The Temple will become the Synagogue, Jerusalem to the hope of Messiah's Kingdom. In this last words of Daniel's Vision the Persian Power supported by the Angelic Prince opposed to Israel, but by the efforts of Michael & Gabriel, the Prince of Greece will prevail against Persia. After this change the details of the prophecy focus our attention to disintegration of the Great or Mighty King & Prince Alexander's Kingdom & Empire under his Diadochi, eventually the Kingdoms of 2 Generals would prevail and last to the Roman conquest. It is the King of the North & the King of the South conflict or warfare that exposes to those who understand that the spiritual warfare at work in the Gentile world that directly dominates the Jews, then later the Jews & Christians, is the true dispensational operation of human government as to God's people. For the rest we leave for the Minor Prophets & the literature & the events leading up to the New Testament. We will not encounter the universal treatment of history & government till we come to the Book of Revelation.

Chronology from Persian King Cyrus to Jewish King Messiah of 600 Years: End of 70 Years Babylonian Captivity of the Old Testament to the New Testament. (Variable 1-3 years.) (Taken from Bible, Apocrypha, Wikipedia, Encyclopedia Britannica, Encyclopedia of Ancient History, etc.) (Chronology is unfinished, will be edited over the weeks, the Timeline of the Persian Period from Great Cyrus to Great Alexander is very full.)

001: (550 B.C.) 70th yr of the 70 Years Captivity Ends. (Belshazzar killed. Darius the Median (Astyages) takes the Throne. (Astyages (Ahasuerus, Artaxerxes) marries Esther.). Cyrus, Astyages son, Decree rebuilding of Temple. Daniel's Vision of the 70 Sevens. Temple Foundation laid. Nehemiah in Jerusalem.) (Zerubbabel & Remnant Returns to Jerusalem. Feast of Tabernacles observed.) (1st yr of Persian rule: Cyrus, etc.) Fall of Babylon. [c.540 (560) = 550 B.C.] ((Cyrus the Great: King: of Anshan, Persia, Media, World, Bablon, Sumer & Akkad, Four Corners of World; Great King, Mighty King. (Sculptured Rock Relief of Cyrus the Great with Hemhem Crown Horns, etc., or Four-winged Cherub tutelary divinity, in Cyrus' residence in Pasagardae.) King of Kings (Shah) of Achaemenid Empire: Reign 559-530 B.C. Predecessor: Establishment of Empire.

Successor: Cambyses II. King of Persia: Reign 559-530 B.C. Predecessor: Cambyses I. Successor: Cambyses II. King of Media: Reign 549-530 B.C. Predecessor: Astyages

Successor: Cambyses II. King of Lydia: Reign 547-530 B.C. Predecessor: Croesus

Successor: Cambyses II. King of Babylon: Reign 539-530 B.C. Predecessor: Nabonidus

Successor: Cambyses II. Cyrus II, Great, son of Cambyses I, grandson of Cyrus I. Born c. 600 B.C., Anshan, Persis. Died December 530 B.C. (aged 70), along the Syr Darya. Burial: Pasargadae. Consort: Cassandane. Issue: Cambyses II, Bardiya, Artystone, Atossa, Roxane. House: Teispid. Father: Cambyses I. Mother: Mandane of Media.)) (c.539, Great Cyrus of Persian Achaemenid Empire conquered Babylon, which would never again successfully regain independence. Babylonians had resented their last native king, Nabonidus, over his religious practices & some of his political choices & Cyrus could thus claim to be legitimate successor of ancient Babylonian kings & avenger of Baylon's national deity, Marduk. Early Achaemenid rulers had great respect for Babylonia, regarding region as separate entity or kingdom united with their own kingdom in something akin to personal union. Despite this, native Babylonians grew to resent their foreign rulers, as they had with Assyrians earlier, & rebelled several times. Achaemenid kings continued to use title "King of Babylon" alongside their other royal titles until reign of Xerxes I, who dropped the title in c.481 B.C., divided previously large Babylonian satrapy & desecrated Babylon after having had to put down Babylonian revolt.) ((* Belshazzar, Nabonidus' son, last king of Neo-Babylonian Empire. Nabonidus Chronicle describes him as Nebuchadnezzar's grandson, but his father was not of Royal line. He played pivotal role in the coup d'etat that overthrew King Labashi-Marduk & brought Nabonidus to power c.555 B.C.E., although unlike his co-conspirators he was not member of the old Babylonian aristocracy. Nabonidus spent the years c. 555–545 B.C.E. at Oasis of Teima in northern areas of Arabian Peninsula, leaving Belshazzar to govern Babylon. During his father's prolonged absence Belshazzar ruled as regent or co-regent, but was never called King & never took part in Babylonian New Year Festival, at which King's presence was essential. His duties as Crown Prince (title that appears in documents) included overseeing temple estates and leasing out temple land, & he worked at restoring Babylonian God Marduk, demoted by Nabonidus in favor of the Moon God Sin. Nabonidus returned to Babylon c.545 B.C.E.. King's return may have been connected with increasing threat posed by Persian conqueror Cyrus the Great, who ruled a huge empire to the north and east of Babylon. Open hostilities commenced in c.540 B.C.E., 12th October "Ugbaru, governor of district of Gutium, & army of Cyrus entered Babylon without a battle" (Babylonian Chronicle) —perhaps same Gobryas, a Babylonian provincial governor who switched to Persian side, mentioned by Greek historian Xenophon. Nabonidus was captured & his life apparently spared, but Belshazzar's is unknown. Nabonidus Chronicle is ancient Babylonian text, part of larger series of Babylonian Chronicles inscribed in cuneiform script on clay tablets. It deals primarily with reign of Nabonidus, last king of Neo-Babylonian Empire, covers conquest of Babylon by Persian Great King Cyrus, ends with start of reign of Cyrus's son Cambyses, spanning a period from c.555 B.C. to some time after c.540 B.C.. It provides rare contemporary account of Cyrus's rise to power & is main source of information on this period; Amélie Kuhrt describes it as "the most reliable and sober [ancient] account of the fall of Babylon." Cyrus Cylinder or Cyrus Charter is ancient clay cylinder, now broken into several pieces, on which is written declaration in Akkadian cuneiform script in name of Persia's Achaemenid Great King Cyrus. It dates from c.6th century B.C. & was discovered in ruins of Babylon in Mesopotamia in 1879. It is currently in possession of British Museum, which sponsored expedition that discovered cylinder. It was created & used as foundation deposit following Persian conquest of Babylon c.540 B.C., when Neo-Babylonian Empire was invaded by Cyrus & incorporated into his Persian Empire. Cylinders of Nabonidus refers to cuneiform inscriptions of King Nabonidus of Babylonia. These inscriptions were made on clay cylinders. They include Nabonidus Cylinder from Sippar, & Nabonidus Cylinders from Ur, four in number. Nabonidus Cylinder from Sippar is a long text in which Nabonidus describes how he repaired three temples: Sanctuary of Moon god Sin in Harran, Sanctuary of Warrior Goddess Anunitu in Sippar, & Temple of Shamash in Sippar. Nabonidus Cylinders from Ur contain foundation text of Ziggurat called E-lugal-galga-sisa, which belonged to Temple of Sin in Ur. Nabonidus describes how he repaired structure. It is probably King's last building inscription & may be dated to ca. 540 BC. Text is interesting because it offers a full syncretism of Sin, Marduk, and Nabu. Nabonidus cylinders from Ur are also noteworthy because they mention a son named Belshazzar, who is mentioned in Book of Daniel. Cylinders state: "As for me, Nabonidus, King of Babylon, save me from sinning against your great Godhead and grant me as a present a lifelong of days, and as for Belshazzar, the eldest son -my offspring- instill reverence for your great Godhead in his heart and may he not commit any cultic mistake, may he be sated with a life of plenitude." *) 002: (1st yr of Persian rule: Cyrus, etc. Achaemenid Empire begins from 120 yrs of earlier history, from the Achaemenes, Teispids, & Achaemenid family tree: Teispes (Hystaspes), Cyrus I, Cambyses I and Cyrus II, also known as Cyrus the Great, who created the empire (the later Behistun Inscription, written by Darius the Great, claims that Teispes was the son of Achaemenes and that Darius is also descended from Teispes through a different line, but no earlier texts mention Achaemenes). In Herodotus' Histories, he writes that Cyrus the Great was the son of Cambyses I & Mandane of Media, the daughter of Astyages, the king of the Median Empire.) (Achaemenid Empire, called the First Persian Empire, was an ancient Iranian empire based in Western Asia founded by Cyrus the Great. Ranging at its greatest extent from the Balkans and Eastern Europe proper in the west to the Indus Valley in the east, it was larger than any previous empire in history, spanning 5.5 million square kilometers. Incorporating various peoples of different origins and faiths, it is notable for its successful model of a centralised, bureaucratic administration, for building infrastructure such as road systems and a postal system, the use of an official language across its territories, and the development of civil services and a large professional army. The empire's successes inspired similar systems in later empires.)

003: (1st yr of Persian rule: Cyrus, etc.) (Daniel dies @ 90.)

004: (1st yr of Persian rule: Cyrus, etc.)

005: (1st yr of Persian rule: Cyrus, etc.)

006: (1st yr of Persian rule: Cyrus, etc.) (King Cyrus dies.) (Cambyses makes Nehemiah Governor in Jerusalem.)

007: (Persian rule.)

008: (Persian rule.)

009: (Persian rule.)

010: (540 B.C.) (Persian rule.) (Darius I, Great, rules c.35 yrs., c.520-485 B.C. See 'Behistun Inscription'.)

020: (530 B.C.) (Persian rule.) ((Cambyses II: King of Kings, Great King, of Persia, Babylon, Pharaoh of Egypt, King of Countries. (Stela or Steel Stone Monument: Cambyses kneeling as Pharaoh while worshipping Apis Bull (524 B.C.). King of Kings (Shah) of Achaemenid Empire: Reign 530-July 522 B.C. Predecessor: Cyrus II, Great. Successor: Bardiya, Co-ruler with Cyrus the Great (530 BC). Pharaoh of Egypt: Reign 525-July 522 B.C. Predecessor: Psamtik III. Successor: Bardiya. (Royal Titulary: Prenomen (Praenomen): Offspring of Ra, Lord of Two Lands. Nomen: Cambyses. Horus Name: Sematawy: Uniter of Two Lands.) Died July 522 B.C., Hamag, Eber-Nari. House: Achaemenid. Father: Cyrus the Great. Mother: Cassandane. Religion: Indo-Iranian. (Achaemenid Coin minted at Sardis, possibly under Cambyses II. Depicts on face-side open mouth Lion's Head facing Horned Bull.))) ((Darius I, Great: Great King of Persia, Babylon, Countries, Pharaoh of Egypt: Reign: 29 Sept. 522 B.C.E.–Oct 486 B.C.E.. Coronation: Pasargadae. Pred. Bardiya. Suc.: Xerxes I. Pharaoh of Egypt: Reign: Sept. 522 B.C.E.–Oct. 486 B.C.E. Pred.: Bardiya. Suc.: Xerxes I. Born: 550 B.C.E.. Died: Oct. 486 B.C.E. (@ c.64). Burial: Naqsh-e Rostam. Spouse: Atossa Artystone Parmys Phratagone Phaidimea daughter of Gobryas. Issue: Artobazanes, Xerxes, Ariabignes, Arsamenes, Masistes, Achaemenes, Arsames, Gobryas, Ariomardus, Abriokomas, Hyperantes, Artazostre. Full name: Dārayavahuš. Dynasty: Achaemenid. Father: Hystaspes. Mother: Rhodogune. Religion: Indo-Iranian religion.)) (Relief of Darius I in Persepolis: King Darius seated on Throne, crowned, bearded, fully robed, in right hand holds long rod or staff or scepter, in his left hand ornate handled sword or dagger with blade between his thighs. His bare feet rests on footstool.)) (Royal titulary: Prenomen: Progeny of Ra. Nomen: Darius. Horus name: Splendid Mind; Chieftain & Lord, Beloved of Upper Egypt. Nebty name: Son of Amun. Golden Horus: ?)

030: (520 B.C.) (Persian rule.) (Bardiya: King of Kings, Great King, of Persia, Babylon, Countries, Pharaoh of Egypt: King of Kings (Shah) of Achaemenid Empire. Reign 522 B.C. Predecessor: Cambyses II. Successor: Great Darius. Pharaoh of Egypt: Reign 525–522 B.C. Pred.: Cambyses II. Suc.: Great Darius. Burial: 522 B.C. Spouse: Phaidyme. Issue: Parmys. Dynasty: Achaemenid. Father: Great Cyrus II (younger brother of Cambyses II). Mother: Cassandane. Religion: Zoroastrianism. Bardiya: Greek Smerdis.) (Portrait of Achaemenid ruler toppled by Darius (or imposter Gaumata), appearing on Behistun

Inscription: multilingual inscription & large rock relief on cliff at Mount Behistun in the Kermanshah Province of Iran, near city of Kermanshah in western Iran, established by Darius the Great. It was crucial to the decipherment of cuneiform script (inscription includes three versions of same text, written in three different cuneiform script languages: Old Persian, Elamite, and Babylonian. This Inscription is to cuneiform what the Rosetta Stone is to Egyptian hieroglyphs: the document most crucial in the decipherment of a previously lost script.) (Behistun Inscription: Punishment of captured impostors & conspirators: Gaumāta lies under boot of Darius the Great. Last captive in line, wearing a traditional Scythian hat and costume, is identified as Skunkha. His image was added after the inscription was completed, requiring some of the text to be removed.)

040: (510 B.C.) (Persian rule.)

045: (505 B.C.) (Xerxes, grandson to Cyrus I, Great, by his mother, Cyrus' daughter Atossa. (Called Ahasuerus in Book of Esther.) Xerxes ruled c.20 yrs, c.486-465 B.C.)

050: (500 B.C.) (Persian rule.)

060: (490 B.C.) (Persian rule.) (Wiki: Battle of Marathon fought in 490 B.C. 1st Persian invasion of Greece, citizens of Athens, aided by Plataea, & Persian force commanded by Darius and Artaphernes. Battle was culmination 1st attempt by Persia, under King Darius I, to subjugate Greece. Greek army decisively defeated the more numerous Persians, marking a turning point in Greco-Persian Wars.)

065: (485 B.C.) (Persian rule.) (Xerxes I: King of Kings, Great King, of Persia, Babylon, Countries, Pharaoh of Egypt: King of Achaemenid Empire: Reign: Oct. 486–Aug. 465 B.C.. (Rock relief of a Achaemenid king, most likely Xerxes, exactly like relief of Darius I, located in the National Museum of Iran.) Pred.: Great Darius. Suc. Artaxerxes I. Born: c. 518 B.C.. Died: Aug. 465 B.C. (@ c.53). Burial: Naqsh-e Rostam. Spouse: Amestris. Issue: Darius, Hystaspes, Artaxerxes I, Arsames, Amytis. Dynasty: Achaemenid. Father: Great Darius. Mother: Atossa. Religion: Indo-Iranian religion.) (Xerxes the Great, 4th King of Kings (Shah) of the Achaemenid Empire; like his father & predecessor Darius I, he ruled empire at its territorial apex. He was assassinated in 465 BC at the hands of Artabanus, commander of 'royal bodyguard' helped by eunuch, Aspamitres. Xerxes & Darius left throne vacant.) (Persian rule.) (Wiki.: Ency. Iranica: Persian defeat Battle of Marathon, Darius planned expedition against Greek-city states; he, Xerxes I, not Darius, would command imperial armies. Darius 3 yrs preparing men & ships for war; revolt broke out in Egypt; it worsened his failing health & prevented leading his army. Soon Darius died. October 486 B.C.E., Darius' body was embalmed & entombed in prepared rock-cut tomb at Naqsh-e Rostam. Inscription on his tomb: "Great King, King of Kings, King of countries containing all kinds of men, King in this great earth far & wide, son of Hystaspes, Achaemenian, Persian, son of Persian, Aryan [Iranian], having Aryan lineage." Xerxes, eldest son of Darius & Atossa, succeeded to the throne as Xerxes I; however, prior to Xerxes's accession, he contested succession with his elder half-brother Artobazanes, Darius's eldest son, born to his first wife before Darius rose to power. Xerxes' accession, empire was again ruled by member of House of Cyrus.)

070: (480 B.C.) (Persian rule.)

080: (470 B.C.) (Persian rule.)

085: (465 B.C.) (Persian rule.) (Artaxerxes, 3rd son of of Xerxes I, 6th King of Kings of Achaemenid Empire, & grandson of Darius I. reigned c.40 yrs, c.465-424 B.C.) (Relief of Artaxerxes I, holding bow, from his tomb in Naqsh-e Rostam.) (Artaxerxes I: King of Kings, Great King, of Persia, Countries, Pharaoh of Egypt: King (Shah) of Achaemenid Empire: Reign: 465–424 B.C.. Pred. Xerxes I. Suc. Xerxes II. Pharaoh of Egypt: Reign. 465–424 B.C.. Pred. Xerxes I. Suc. Xerxes II. Born: Unknown. Died: 424 B.C., Susa. Burial: Naqsh-e Rostam, Persepolis. Spouse: Queen Damaspia Alogyne of Babylon Cosmartidene of Babylon Andia of Babylon. Issue: Xerxes II, Sogdianus, Darius II, Arsites, Parysatis. House: Achaemenid. Father: Xerxes I. Mother: Amestris. Religion: Zoroastrianism. Birth Nomen: Artaxerxes.)

090: (460 B.C.) (Persian rule.)

100: (450 B.C.) (Persian rule. 1st Cent.)

105: (Persian rule. 1st Cent.) ((Artaxerxes I, (died 425 B.C., Susa, Elam [now in Iran]), Achaemenid king of Persia (reigned c.40 yrs, c.465–425 B.C.). Artaxerxes I died of natural causes in 424 B.C.E, having ensured peaceful succession by naming Xerxes II his legitimate heir. Xerxes II reigned about 1 month, however, before he was assassinated by Sogdianus. Sogdianus had support of a segment of Nobles & ruled for six months (1/2 yr) before he was assassinated by his half-brother Nothus (also given as Ochus) who took the throne name Darius II.) (Book of Ezra & Nehemiah: King Artaxerxes commissioned Ezra the Priest, with letter of decree (see Cyrus's edict), to take charge of the ecclesiastical & civil affairs of the Jewish nation. Ezra departed Babylon in the 1st month of 7th year of Artaxerxes' reign, leading company of Jews, with priests & Levites; arrived in Jerusalem on 1st day of 5th month of 7th year in Hebrew calendar. King is Artaxerxes I (465-424 B.C.E.) or Artaxerxes II (404-359 B.C.E.) Nehemiah & Ezra independent of each other. Nehemiah 12: both are leading processions on the wall as part of the wall dedication ceremony. So, they clearly were contemporaries working together in Jerusalem at time Wall & City of Jerusalem was rebuilt. Ezra appears for 1st time in Nehemiah 8, having probably been at the court for twelve years. Rebuilding of Jewish community in Jerusalem began under Cyrus the Great, who permitted Jews held captive in Babylon to Return to Jerusalem & Rebuild Solomon's Temple. Some Jews returned to Jerusalem in 538 B.C., & foundation of "Second Temple" was laid in 536 B.C., in 2nd year of Return (Ezra 3:8). After a period of strife, the temple was finally completed in 6th year of Darius, 516 BC (Ezra 6:15). Artaxerxes' 20th year: Nehemiah, King's Cup-bearer, & King's friend or favorite; Artaxerxes inquired after Nehemiah's sadness. Nehemiah related to him plight of Jewish people & City of Jerusalem was undefended. King sent Nehemiah to Jerusalem with letters of safe passage to Governors in Trans-Euphrates, and to Asaph, Keeper of Royal Forests, to make beams for Citadel by Temple & to Rebuild City Walls.) (Darius II, Nothus or Ochus, was King of Kings (Shah) of Persian Empire reigned c. 20 yrs, c.423 B.C. to 405 B.C. Artaxerxes I died in 424 B.C., was followed by his son Xerxes II. After 1 1/2 month Xerxes II was murdered by his brother Secydianus (Sogdianus). His illegitimate brother, Ochus, Satrap of Hyrcania, rebelled against Sogdianus, & after short fight killed him, & suppressed by treachery the attempt of his own brother Arsites to imitate his example. Ochus adopted the name Darius (Greek sources often call him Darius Nothos, "Bastard"). Neither the names Xerxes II nor Sogdianus occur in the dates of the numerous Babylonian tablets from Nippur; here effectively the reign of Darius II follows immediately after that of Artaxerxes I. Elephantine papyri mention Darius II as contemporary of High Priest Johanan of Ezra 10:6.)(Darius II died c.405 B.C. before final victory of Egyptian general, Amyrtaeus, over the Persians in Egypt. His successor was his eldest son Arsames (his mother Parysatis), he was crowned as Artaxerxes II in Pasargadae. Reigned c.45 years. Reign: 404 to 358 BC (46 years). His son Artaxerxes III was his successor. Coin with his portrait exists.))

110: (440 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.)

120: (430 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.)

125: (425 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.) (Xerxes II: King of Kings, Great King, of Persia, Countries, Pharaoh of Egypt: King (Shah) of Achaemenid Empire: Reign: 424 B.C. (45 days). Pred.: Artaxerxes I. Suc.: Sogdianus. Pharaoh of Egypt: Reign: 424 BC (45 days). Pred.: Artaxerxes I. Suc.: Sogdianus. Died: Persepolis, Persia. House: Achaemenid. Father: Artaxerxes I. Mother: Damaspiia. Religion: Zoroastrianism. Name: Artaxerxes.) (Darius II: King of Kings, Great King, of Persia, Countries, Pharaoh of Egypt: King (Shah) of Achaemenid Empire: Reign: 423 B.C.–404 B.C. Pred.: Sogdianus. Suc.: Artaxerxes II. Pharaoh of Egypt. Reign: 423 B.C.–404 B.C.. Pred.: Sogdianus. Suc.: Amyrtaeus. Died: 404 B.C.. Spouse: Parysatis. Issue: Artaxerxes II, Younger Cyrus, Ostanes. House: Achaemenid. Father: Artaxerxes I. Mother: Cosmartidene of Babylon. Royal titulary: Nomen: Darius. Nebty name: Meryamun Raneb Hebuserkhopesh.)

130: (420 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.)

140: (410 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.)

145: (405 B.C.) (Amyrtaeus: Amenirdisu; Amyrtaios of Sais: (Aramaic papyrus from Elephantine, dating to Regnal Year 5 of Amyrtaeus (400 BC).) Pharaoh: Reign: 5 years, 404 B.C.-Oct. 399 B.C. (28th Dynasty). Pred.: Darius II. Suc.: Nephertites I. Died: Oct. 399 B.C.. Royal titulary: Amun-Given.)

150: (400 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.) (Artaxerxes II, Arsames, died c.360 B.C. His son Artaxerxes III, was his successor.) (Ochus: dynastic name of Artaxerxes III, was King of Kings of the Achaemenid Empire from 358-338 B.C. He was the son & successor of Artaxerxes II (reigned c20 yrs, c.404-358 B.C.) & his mother was Stateira. Before ascending Throne Artaxerxes was Satrap & Commander of his father's army. Artaxerxes came to power after one of his brothers was executed, another committed suicide, the last murdered, & his father, Artaxerxes II, died. Soon after becoming King, Artaxerxes murdered all of Royal Family to secure his place as King. He started two major campaigns against Egypt: 1st campaign failed, & was followed up by rebellions throughout the western part of his Empire. In 343 B.C., Artaxerxes defeated Nectanebo II, the Pharaoh of Egypt, driving him from Egypt, stopping a revolt in Phoenicia on the way. In Artaxerxes' later years, Philip II of Macedon's power, was increasing in Greece, where he tried to convince the Greeks to revolt against the Achaemenid Empire. His activities were opposed by Artaxerxes, and with his support, the city of Perinthus resisted Macedonian siege.) (regnal name of Artaxerxes IV was twelfth Achaemenid king of Persia from 338 BC to 336 BC. He is known as Arses in Greek sources and that seems to have been his real name, but the Xanthus trilingue and potsherds from Samaria report that he took the royal name of Artaxerxes IV, following his father and grandfather.)

((Darius III (c. 380 – July 330 BC), originally named Artashata and called Codomannus by the Greeks,[1] was the last king of the Achaemenid Empire of Persia, from 336 BC to 330 BC. Artashata adopted Darius as a dynastic name. His empire was unstable, with large portions governed by jealous and unreliable satraps and inhabited by disaffected and rebellious subjects. In 334 BC, Alexander the Great began his invasion of the Persian Empire and subsequently defeated the Persians in a number of battles before looting and destroying their capital, Persepolis, by fire in 330 BC. With the Persian Empire now effectively under Alexander's control, Alexander then decided to pursue Darius. Before Alexander reached him, however, Darius was killed by his cousin Satrap Bessus. Ochus (heir) Alexander the Great (Macedonian Empire) Artaxerxes V Bessus (unofficially) (Pharaoh of Egypt Reign 336–332 BC Predecessor Artaxerxes IV Successor Alexander the Great)) (Nephertites I: Nefaarud I, Nayfaurud I.

(Sphinx of pharaoh Nephertites I in the Louvre Museum.) Pharaoh: Reign: 399–393 B.C.. (29th Dynasty). Pred. Amyrtaeus. Suc. Hakor. Children: Hakor. Died: 393 B.C.. Burial: Mendes?. Royal titulary: Prenomen: Soul of Re, Beloved of Gods. Nomen: Great Ones prosper. Horus Name: Great Mind. Golden Horus: Chosen by the Gods.)

155: (395 B.C.)

160: (390 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.) (Hakor: Achoris, Hakoris, Hagar. (Upper half of statue of Hakor. In Cairo Museum.) Pharaoh: Reign: 392 (391)–379 (378) B.C.E. (29th Dynasty). Pred.: Nephertites I (392 (391) B.C.E.); Psammuthes (390 (389) B.C.E.) Suc.: Psammuthes (391 (390) B.C.E.); Nephertites II (379 (380) B.C.E.) Children: Nephertites II. Father: Nephertites I? Royal titulary: Prenomen: Embraces maat of Ra, Chosen One of Khnum. Nomen: Hakor; Hagar, Arab / Bedouin. Horus name: Great of Intellect who loves the Two Lands. Nebty name: Brave. Golden Horus: Satisfying Gods.)

170: (380 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.) (Nephertites II: Nefaarud II. Pharaoh: Reign: Summer 380 B.C. (29th Dynasty). Pred.: Hakor. Suc.: Nectanebo I. Father: Hakor. Died: 380 B.C.. Royal titulary: ?) (Nectanebo I: (Statue of Nectanebo I with kheprish crown (kheprish was an ancient Egyptian royal headdress. It is also known as the blue crown or war crown. New Kingdom pharaohs are often depicted wearing it in battle, but it was also frequently worn in ceremonies.) Pharaoh: Reign: 379 (378)–361 (360) B.C.E..(30th Dynasty). Pred.: Nephertites II (29th Dynasty). Suc.: Teos. Royal titulary. Children: Teos, Tjahapimu. Father: Djedhor. Mother: unknown. Royal titulary. Royal titulary: Prenomen: Manifestation of Ka of Ra. Nomen: Lord's Strong One. Horus name: Strong Arm. Nebty name: Maker of Two Lands Admirable. Golden Horus: Pleases Gods.)

180: (370 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.)

190: (360 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.) (Teos: (Fragment of faience saucer (fine tin-glazed blue decorated earthenware pottery) inscribed with the name of Teos. The Petrie Museum of Egyptian Archaeology, London.) Pharaoh: Reign: 361 (360–359 (358) B.C.E..(30th Dynasty). Coregency: 3 years with Nectanebo I. Pred.: Nectanebo I. Suc.: Nectanebo II. Children: Khedebneithirbinet II (?). Father: Nectanebo I. Royal titulary: Pharaoh. Prenomen: Carrying out Justice of Ra. Nomen: Horus Says Chosen of Anhur. Horus name: Appears as Maat, Leader of Two Lands. Nebty name: ? Golden Horus: Ruling King Destroys Foreign Countries.) (Nectanebo II: (Head of Nectanebo II, handsome young man, headdress, Museum of Fine Arts of Lyon.) Pharaoh: Reign: 360–342 B.C. (Thirtieth Dynasty). Pred.: Teos. Suc.: Artaxerxes III. Father: Tjahapimu. Born: c.380 B.C..Died: c.340 ? B.C.. Royal titulary: Prenomen: Heart Pleasing Ra, Chosen of Onuris. Nomen: Strong Horus of Hebit, Beloved of Hathor. Horus name: Beloved by Two Lands. Nebty name: ? Golden Horus: Creator of Laws.) (Artaxerxes III: King of Kings, Great King, King of Persia, Pharaoh of Egypt, King of Countries Artaxerxes III tomb at Persepolis. Bust of Artaxerxes III, holding bow, located in the Allard Pierson Museum in the Netherlands. King of Kings (Shah) of the Achaemenid Empire: Reign: 358–338 B.C.. Pred: Artaxerxes II: Suc: Arses. Pharaoh of Egypt: Reign: 343–338 B.C.. Pred. Nectanebo II. Suc. Arses. Died: Aug. (Sept.) 338 B.C.. Burial: Persepolis. Issue: Arses. Parysatis II. Dynasty. Achaemenid. Father Artaxerxes II. Mother: Stateira. Religion: Zoroastrianism.)

200: (350 B.C.) (Persian rule. 2nd Cent.)

210: (340 B.C.) (Arses: Artaxerxes IV: King of Kings, Great King, King of Persia, Pharaoh of Egypt, King of Countries. (Artaxerxes IV = Arses: Probable portrait of Arses on coinage, on reverse side seated crowned bearded, holding long staff & ornate handle sword or dagger, wearing the Egyptian Pharaonic crown. King (Shah) of the Achaemenid Empire. Reign: 338–336 B.C.. Pred. Artaxerxes III. Suc. Darius III. Pharaoh of Egypt. Pred. Artaxerxes III. Suc.: Darius III. Died: 336 B.C.. Regnal name: Artaxerxes IV. Dynasty Achaemenid. Father: Artaxerxes III. Mother: Atossa. Religion: Zoroastrianism.)

215: (335 B.C.) (Darius III: King of Kings, Great King, King of Persia, Pharaoh of Egypt, King of Countries. King of Kings (Shah) of the Achaemenid Empire. Reign: 336–330 B.C.. Pred: Artaxerxes IV, Arsēs. Suc.: Ochus (heir). Alexander the Great (Macedonian (Greek) Empire). Artaxerxes V, Bessus (unofficially). Pharaoh of Egypt: Reign: 336–332 B.C.. Pred. Artaxerxes IV. Suc. Alexander the Great. Born: c.380 B.C.. Persia. Died. July 330 B.C. (aged c. 50), Bactria. Burial: Persepolis. Spouse: Stateira I. Issue: Stateira II, Ochus, Drypetis. House: Achaemenid Dynasty. Father: Arsames of Ostanēs. Mother: Sisygambis. Religion: Zoroastrianism.) (Darius III (c.380–July 330 B.C.), originally named Artashata and called Codomannus by the Greeks, was the last king of Persian Achaemenid Empire.) (Alexander the Great: Basileus of Macedon, Hegemon of the Hellenic League, Shahanshah of Persia, Pharaoh of Egypt, Lord of Asia. (Alexander Mosaic (c. 100 BC), ancient Roman floor mosaic from the House of Faun in Pompeii showing Alexander fighting king Darius III of Persia in the Battle of Issus.) King of Macedon: Reign: 336–323 B.C. Pred.: Philip II. Suc.: Alexander IV, Philip III. Hegemon of Hellenic League Strategos Autokrator of Greece: Reign: 336 B.C.. Pred.: Philip II. Pharaoh of Egypt. Reign: 332–323 B.C.. Pred.: Darius III. Successor: Alexander IV, Philip III. King of Persia: Reign: 330–323 B.C.. Pred: Darius III. Suc.: Alexander IV, Philip III. Lord of Asia: Reign: 331–323 B.C.. Pred.: New office. Suc.: Alexander IV, Philip III. Born: 20 or 21 July 356 B.C., Pella, Macedon, Ancient Greece. Died: 10 or 11 June 323 BC (aged 32), Babylon, Mesopotamia. Spouse: Roxana of Bactria, Stateira II of Persia, Parysatis II of Persia. Issue: Alexander IV, Heracles of Macedon (alleged illegitimate son). Full name: Alexander III of Macedon. Great Alexander. Dynasty: Argead. Father: Philip II of Macedon. Mother: Olympias of Epirus. Religion: Greek polytheism. Royal titulary: Prenomen: Chosen by Ra, Beloved by Amun. Nomen: Alexandros, Alexander. Horus name: Mekemet: Protector of Egypt. Second Horus name: BraveRuler, Attacker of Foreign Lands. Third Horus name: Ruler of Rulers of Entire Land (World). Fourth Horus name: Sturdy-Armed One. Nebty name: Great Mighty Lion, Conqueror of Mountains, Lands, & Deserts. Golden Horus: (Strong) Bull, Protector Egypt, Ruler of Sea & of what the Sun Encircles (i.e. of All Under the Sun, the World or Globe.)

220: (330 B.C.) (Persian rule, Ends after 220 yrs after conquest of Babylon.) (Greek Empire begins with Alexander I, Great & his 4 Generals: Ptolemaic Egypt, Seleucid Mesopotamia and Central Asia, Attalid Anatolia, and Antigoniid Macedon. Alexander IV and Philip III were murdered.) (Artabazanes of Media Atropatene (3rd century B.C.), was a Prince & King of Atropatene Kingdom. He ruled c.220 B.C. & was contemporary of Seleucid Greek King Antiochus III, Great, of Iranian lineage. Artabazanes: grandson of Persian King Darius II. Father of Artabazanes was one of the 4 sons born to Darius II with daughter of Gobryas, prior to his accession.)

230: (320 B.C.) (Greek rule. 1st Cent.)

240: (320 B.C.) (Greek rule. 1st Cent.)

250: (310 B.C.) (Greek rule. 1st Cent.)

300: (300 B.C.) (Greek rule. 1st Cent.)

310: (Greek rule. 1st Cent.)

320: (Greek rule. 1st Cent.)

330: (Greek rule. 1st Cent.)

340: (Greek rule. 1st Cent.)

350: (Greek rule. 2nd Cent.)

360: (Greek rule.)

370: (Greek rule.)

380: (Greek rule.)

390: (Greek rule.)

400: (Greek rule.)

410: (Greek rule.)

420: (Greek rule.)

430: (Greek rule.)

440: (Greek rule.)

450: (Greek rule. 3rd Cent.)

460: (Greek rule.)

470: (Greek rule.)

480: (Greek rule.)

490: (Greek rule.)

500: (Greek rule.)

510: (Greek rule.)

520: (Greek rule. 3rd Cent.)

530: (Greek rule ends. Roman rule begins with Julius Caesar & Augustus.)

540: (Roman rule. 1st Cent.)

550: (Roman rule.)

560: (Roman rule.) (B.C. dates change to A.D. dates.) (New Testament. Jesus the Christ (Messiah) is born.)

570: (Roman rule.)

580: (Roman rule.)

590: (Roman rule.) (Jesus Christ ministered & crucified, buried & resurrected.)

600: (Roman rule.)

590: (Roman rule.)

580: (Roman rule.)

570: (Roman rule.)

560: (Roman rule. 2nd Cent.)

550: (Roman rule.)

Selections Relevant to Book of Daniel: 1-25: 1. Jerome. 2. Calvin. 3. Newton. 4. Lowth. 5. Stuart. 6. Barnes. 7. Auberlen. 8. Tregelles. 9. Japheth Ben Ali. 10. Rashi. 11. Darby. 12. Montagu. 13. Miller. 14. Folsom. 15. Smith. 16. Rule. 17. Pusey. 18. Keil. 19. Zöckler. 20. Driver. 21. Wilson. 22. Seder Olam Rabba. 23. Larkin. 24. 1st Maccabees. 25. Josephus.

1. Jerome.

St. Jerome. Commentary Daniel. A.D. 408. Migne Ser Lat Ch Fath, v16. Tr. GL Archer, Jr. 1958

Early Christian History Commentary on Daniel Written in 408 By St. Jerome (A.D. 340- 420) Doctor Maximus Sacris Scripturis Explanandis.

Translated by Gleason L. Archer, Jr. "The most important single work produced by the Church Fathers on any of the prophetic writings of the Old Testament"

"And so there are many of our viewpoint who think that Domitius Nero was the Antichrist because of his outstanding savagery and depravity." -Jerome

{{ Introduction:

"The most important single work produced by the Church Fathers on any of the prophetic writings of the Old Testament, commenting upon the original Hebrew text, and showing a complete mastery of all the literature of the Church on the subjects touched upon to the time of composition, is without question St. Jerome's Commentary on the Book of Daniel. In Origen's work on Daniel (Migne Series of Latin Church Fathers, Vol. XVI, pp. 2765-2928) much of the exegesis is spoiled by the author's allegorical principles of hermeneutics, and the later commentary by Chrysostom (Vol. XVI, pp. 191-246) is more in the nature of a series of homilies than an attempt to wrestle with the problems of Daniel's prophecies. For over eleven hundred years after its publication, all who wrote on Daniel showed themselves more indebted to this work by Jerome than to any other commentary on the Old Testament Scriptures produced in the period of the Church Fathers. It is strange that though we have some sixteen thousand pages in the Ante-Nicene, Nicene, and Post-Nicene Fathers, in the three major series of translations of patristic literature issued by Scribners some years ago, the Commentary on Daniel was passed by, as it was in the earlier series of translations undertaken by leaders of the Oxford Movement in the middle of the nineteenth century. The fifth volume of the Ante-Nicene Fathers includes fragments from the commentary on Daniel by Hippolytus, written about A.D. 230 (pp. 177-199) and these fragments contain very important material, especially on the last of the seventy weeks, Antichrist, and the author's amazing identification of the toes of clay and iron of Daniel 2:43 with democracies; yet, the work is quite inferior in learning and insight to that of Jerome. (The doctoral dissertation by John P.

O'Connell, "The Eschatology of St. Jerome," Mundelein, Ill., 1948, passes over almost all of the eschatological interpretations of Jerome's commentary on Daniel.)

The translation of no volume of the first six centuries of the Christian Church, appearing for the first time in the twentieth century, has quite the significance, it seems to me, that has this translation by my colleague and friend, Dr. Gleason L. Archer, of Jerome's indispensable and ever-suggestive work on Daniel. Not even in the commentaries of Luther and Calvin on this portion of Scripture do we have anything as worthwhile as this volume of Jerome. Inasmuch as the life and work of Jerome may not be too well known to many who will be studying this volume, perhaps a brief word concerning his role in the early development of Christian thought will not be out of place. Jerome was born of Christian parents in the year A.D. 347 at Strido, near Aquileia, the capital of Venetia in central Italy. He was educated in the city of Rome, and was baptized there. Before he was twenty years of age, Jerome went to Gaul to carry on research, and returned to live in Aquileia from 370 to 373. In 374 he made an extensive trip through the Near East, including a visit to Jerusalem, and then spent five years in the desert of Chalcis, where he practiced the most intense asceticism, though, says a recent writer, "perpetually haunted by reminiscences of the world and the flesh. He took, however, his classical library with him and comforted himself with Greek and Latin; till one night he dreamed that a judge before whom he was brought punished him for being a Ciceronian and not a Christian; whereupon [in his dream apparently] he vowed to devote his intellect entirely to the Scriptures, and on waking proceeded to learn Hebrew" (Ernest Leigh-Bennett: Handbook of the Early Church Fathers, London, 1920, p. 273).

Jerome's health declined seriously, and in 379 we find him in the great Christian city of Antioch where, much against his will, he was ordained a priest by Paulinus. The following year he visited Constantinople, desiring to hear Gregory of Nazianzus. From 382 to 385 he resided in Rome, and became a close friend of Pope Damasus. Having aroused the bitter opposition of many Roman citizens because of his insistence upon ascetic practices, winning to these a number of noble Roman ladies, in 386 he left for the East and took up residence in Bethlehem, where he continued to live until his death in 420. It was here that most of his writing was done.

Jerome is famous in the history of the Christian Church for four things: He made monastic life popular in the Latin Church, though he by no means originated monasticism, of course, and he did not found an order, such as the Benedictine or Franciscan. His letters are certainly the finest gems of autobiography produced by any Christian, at least in the first millennium of the Church. It is to Jerome that we owe the great Vulgate, completed in 404, which became the standard Bible for the Western Church, and remains such. "In that work he produced what must be numbered among the supreme achievements of the Christian mind in any age" (G. Grutzmacher, art., "Jerome," ERE, Vol. VII, p. 500). "Here he created an object lesson on monasticism at the most sacred spot in the world, and he invited the world to come and learn. And the world came, for his hostelry was continually filled with travellers from the West. In consequence there now appear a reverence for the monastic life, a reverence for sacred places, and sacred things, and a habit of pilgrimages" (Leigh-Bennett, p. 279).

The following statement on the Septuagint by a recognized contemporary authority is worth quoting: "St. Jerome was more than a channel for Greek learning. As a Hebrew scholar and humanist he brought the Bible closer to the Latin-speaking world. The Old Latin was an unliterary translation from the Septuagint; the Vulgate was based on the 'Hebrew Truth' as St. Jerome lovingly calls it. The language, 'where the rustic Latin of the first Christian centuries mingles with the Hebraising Latinity of St. Jerome,' was the beginning of a new era, when eastern poetry penetrated into the speech of the western peoples." (Beryl Smalley: The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages, Oxford, 1941.).

Well deserved was Jerome's title of Doctor Maximus sacris Scripturis explanandis. Even during Jerome's lifetime, Sulpicius Severus allowed one of the disputants in his Dialogus, written about 405, to say, "I would be surprised if he (Jerome) were not already known to you through his writings, since he is read throughout the whole world." Although they differed on many matters, Augustine confessed to

Jerome, "I have not as great a knowledge of the divine Scriptures as you have, nor could I have such knowledge as I see in you." (These two quotations are from the excellent chapter, "St. Jerome as an Exegete," by Louis N. Hartmann, in A Monument to St. Jerome, edited by Francis X. Murphy, New York, 1952, p. 67.)....(Wilbur M. Smith, Fuller Theological Seminary, October, 1958.)" }}

{{ Prologue: (Jerome's Preface)

(617-618) "Porphyry wrote his twelfth book against the prophecy of Daniel, (A) denying that it was composed by the person to whom it is ascribed in its title, but rather by some individual living in Judaea at the time of the Antiochus who was surnamed Epiphanes. He furthermore alleged that "Daniel" did not foretell the future so much as he related the past, and lastly that whatever he spoke of up till the time of Antiochus contained authentic history, whereas anything he may have conjectured beyond that point was false, inasmuch as he would not have foreknown the future. Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, made a most able reply to these allegations in three volumes, that is, the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth. Appollinarius did likewise, in a single large book, namely his twenty-sixth. (B) Prior to these authors Methodius made a partial reply.

But inasmuch as it is not our purpose to make answer to the false accusations of an adversary, a task requiring lengthy discussion, but rather to treat of the actual content of the prophet's message for the benefit of us who are Christians, I wish to stress in my Preface this fact, that none of the prophets has so clearly spoken concerning Christ as has this prophet Daniel. (619-620) For not only did he assert that He would come, a prediction common to the other prophets as well, but also he set forth the very time at which He would come. Moreover he went through the various kings in order, stated the actual number of years involved, and announced beforehand the clearest signs of events to come. And because Porphyry saw that all these things had been fulfilled and could not deny that they had taken place, he overcame this evidence of historical accuracy by taking refuge in this evasion, contending that whatever is foretold concerning Antichrist at the end of the world was actually fulfilled in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, because of certain similarities to things which took place at his time. But this very attack testifies to Daniel's accuracy. For so striking was the reliability of what the prophet foretold, that he could not appear to unbelievers as a predictor of the future, but rather a narrator of things already past. And so wherever occasion arises in the course of explaining this volume, I shall attempt briefly to answer his malicious charge, and to controvert by simple explanation (p. 492) the philosophical skill, or rather the worldly malice, by which he strives to subvert the truth and by specious legerdemain to remove that which is so apparent to our eyes.

I would therefore beseech you, Pammachius, as a foremost lover of learning, and Marcella, as an outstanding exemplar of Roman virtue, men who are bound together by faith and blood, to lend aid to my efforts by your prayers, in order that our Lord and Savior might in His own cause and by His mind make answer through my mouth. For it is He who says to the prophet, "Open thy mouth and I will fill it" (Psalm 80:11). For if He admonishes us, when we have been hailed before judges and tribunals, not to ponder what answer we are to give to them (Luke 12), how much more is He able to carry on His own war against blaspheming adversaries and through His servants to vanquish them? For this reason a great number of the Psalms also contain that Hebrew expression, 'lamanasseh', rendered by the Septuagint as "To the end," but which rather is to be understood as "For victory!" For Aquila construed it as to 'nikopoio', that is, "To Him who grants the victory." Symmachus renders it as 'epinikion' which properly signifies "Triumph and the palm of victory."

But among other things we should recognize that Porphyry makes this objection to us concerning the Book of Daniel, that it is clearly a forgery not to be considered as belonging to the Hebrew Scriptures but an invention composed in Greek. This he deduces from the fact that in the story of Susanna, where Daniel is speaking to the elders, we find the expressions, "To split from the mastic tree" (apo tou skhinou skhisai) and to saw from the evergreen oak (kai apo tou prinou prisai),² (D) a wordplay appropriate to Greek rather than to Hebrew. But both Eusebius and Apollinarius have answered him after the same tenor, that the stories of Susanna and of Bel and the Dragon are not contained in the Hebrew, but rather they constitute a part of the prophecy of Habakkuk, the son of Jesus of the tribe of Levi. Just as we find in the title of that same story of Bel, according to the Septuagint, "There was a certain priest named Daniel, the son of Abda, an intimate of the King of Babylon." And yet Holy Scripture testifies that Daniel and the three Hebrew children were of the tribe (p. 493) of Judah.

For this same reason when I was translating Daniel many years ago, I noted these visions with a critical symbol, showing that they were not included in the Hebrew. And in this connection I am surprised to be told that certain fault-finders complain that I have on my own initiative truncated the book. After all, both Origen, Eusebius and Apollinarius, and other outstanding churchmen and teachers of Greece acknowledge that, as I have said, these visions are not found amongst the Hebrews, and that therefore they are not obliged to answer to Porphyry for these portions which exhibit no authority as Holy Scripture.

I also wish to emphasize to the reader the fact that it was not according to the Septuagint version but according to the version of Theodotion himself that the churches publicly read Daniel. (A) And Theodotion, at any rate, was an unbeliever subsequent to the advent of Christ, although some assert that he was an Ebionite (621-622), which is another variety of Jew. But even Origen in his Vulgate edition (of the Greek Old Testament) placed asterisks around the work of Theodotion, indicating that the material added was missing (in the Septuagint), whereas on the other hand he prefixed obeli (i.e., diacritical marks) to some of the verses, distinguishing thereby whatever was additional material (not contained in the Hebrew). And since all the churches of Christ, whether belonging to the Greek-speaking territory or the Latin, the Syrian or the Egyptian, publicly read this edition with its asterisks and obeli, let the hostile-minded not begrudge my labor, because I wanted our (Latin-speaking) people to have what the Greek-speaking peoples habitually read publicly in the regions of Aquila and Symmachus. And if the Greeks do not for all their wealth of learning despise the scholarly work of Jews, why should poverty-stricken Latins look down upon a man who is a Christian? And if my product seems unsatisfactory, at (p. 494) least my good intentions should be recognized." }}

{{ "But now it is time for us to unfold the words of the prophet himself, not following our usual custom of setting everything forth in detail with an accompanying detailed discussion (the procedure followed in our commentary on the Twelve Minor Prophets), but rather employing a certain brevity and inserting at intervals an explanation of only those things which are obscure. In this way we hope to avoid tiring the reader with an innumerable abundance of books. And yet to understand the final portions of Daniel a detailed investigation of Greek history is necessary, that is to say, such authorities as (B) Sutorius, Callinicus, Diodorus, Hieronymus, Polybius, Posidonius, Claudius, Theon, and Andronycus surnamed Alipius, historians whom Porphyry claims to have followed, Josephus also and those whom he cites, and especially our own historian, Livy, and Pompeius Trogus, and Justinus. All these men narrate the history involved in Daniel's final vision, carrying it beyond the time of Alexander to the days of Caesar Augustus in their description of the Syrian and Egyptian wars, i.e., those of Seleucus, Antiochus, and the Ptolemies. And if we are compelled from time to time to make mention of profane literature and speak of matters therein contained which we have formerly failed to mention, it is not by personal preference but by stark necessity, so to speak, in order to prove that those things which were foretold by the holy prophets many centuries before are actually contained in the written records of both the Greeks and Romans and of other peoples as well.

2:1. "In the second (2nd) year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuchadnezzar saw a dream and his spirit was terrified, and his dream fled from him." If the three (3) lads had entered before him at the end of three years, as he himself had commanded, how is it that he is now said to have seen the dream in the second (2nd) year of his reign? The Hebrews solve the difficulty in this way, that the second (2nd) year refers here to his reign over all (627) the barbarian nations, not only Judah and the Chaldeans, but also the Assyrians and Egyptians, and the Moabites and the rest of the nations which by the permission of God he had conquered. For this reason Josephus also writes in the tenth book of the Antiquities: After the second (2nd) year from the devastation of Egypt Nebuchadnezzar beheld a marvelous dream, and "his spirit was terrified and his dream fled from him.".... 2:4. "The Chaldeans replied to the king in Syriac." (A) Up to this point what we have read has been recounted in Hebrew. From this point on until the vision of the third (3rd) year of King Balthasar [Belshazzar] which Daniel saw in Susa, the account is written in Hebrew characters, to be sure, but in the Chaldee language, which he here calls Syriac.

2:31-45: Let us go through the prophetic interpretation, and as we translate Daniel's words (C), let us explain at some length the matters which he briefly states. "Now thou art the head of gold." "The head of gold," he says "is thou, O king." By this statement it is clear that the first empire, the Babylonian, is compared to the most precious metal, gold. (p32) "And after thee there shall arise another empire inferior to thee, made of silver." (The Vulgate LXX does not include "made of silver.") That is to say, the empire of the Medes and Persians, which bears a resemblance to silver, being inferior to the preceding empire, and superior to that which is to follow. "And a third empire of bronze (the Vulgate LXX has "made of copper"), which shall rule over the entire earth." This signifies the Alexandrian empire, and that of (p. 504) the Macedonians, and of Alexander's successors. Now this is properly termed brazen, for among all the metals bronze possesses an outstanding resonance and a clear ring, and the blast of a brazen trumpet is heard far and wide, (634) so that it signifies not only the fame and power of the empire but also the eloquence of the Greek language. "And there shall be a fourth empire like unto iron. Just as iron breaks to pieces and overcomes all else, so it shall break to pieces and shatter all these preceding empires . . ." Now the fourth empire, which clearly refers to the Romans, is the iron empire which breaks in pieces and overcomes all others. But its feet and toes are partly of iron and partly of earthenware, a fact most clearly demonstrated at the present time. For just as there was at the first nothing stronger or harder than the Roman realm, so also in these last days there is nothing more feeble (D), since we require the assistance of barbarian tribes both in our civil wars and against foreign nations. However, at the final period of all these empires of gold and silver and bronze and iron, a rock (namely, the Lord and Savior) was cut off without hands, that is, without copulation or human seed and by birth from a virgin's womb; and after all the empires had been crushed, He became a great mountain and filled the whole earth. This last the Jews and the impious Porphyry apply to the people of Israel, who they insist will be the strongest power at the end of the ages, and will crush all realms and will rule forever....

3:1. "Nebuchadnezzar the king made a golden statue seventy (70) [Jerome's Translation reads 'sexaginta', 60 & so does Migne's edition of Jerome's commentary, thus Archer's translation is mistaken here.] cubits in height and six cubits in breadth."... "And he set it up in the plain of Dura in the province of Babylon." Instead of "Dura" Theodotion has "Deira," and Symmachus has (D) "Durau," whereas the Septuagint renders it as the common noun 'peribolon', a word which we might render as "game-preserve" or "enclosure.".....

(3:22-4:3 has added stories of the 3 Hebrews in the Fiery Furnace on which Jerome translate & comments.) 4:6 (=8). "Then at last my associate, Daniel, (B) whose name according to the name of my 'god' is Belteshazzar, entered before my presence." With the exception of the Septuagint translators (who for some reason or other have omitted this whole passage [i.e., vv. 6-9]), the other three translators [Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion] have translated the word [i.e. 'oh'rdn, a dubious word generally rendered as "at last" by modern translations, but here probably to be construed as "another"] as "associate" (collega). Consequently by the judgment of the teachers of the Church, the Septuagint edition has been rejected in the case of this book, and it is the translation of Theodotion which is commonly read, since it agrees with the Hebrew as well as with the other translators (C). Wherefore also Origen asserts in the ninth book of the Stromata that he is discussing the text from this point on in the prophecy of Daniel, not as it appears in the Septuagint, which greatly differs from the Hebrew original, but rather as it appears in Theodotion's edition....

5:25-28. "This is the inscription which has been set up: MANE, THECEL, PHARES. And this is the interpretation of the sentence: 'MANE' means that God has numbered thy kingdom and brought it to an end. 'THECEL' means it has been weighed in the scales and has been found deficient (Vulg.: thou hast been weighed and hast been found. ..). 'PHARES' means that thy kingdom has been removed and given to the Medes and Persians." The inscription (A) of these three words on the wall simply meant: "Mane, Thecel, Phares"; the first of which sounds forth the idea of "number," and the second "a weighing out," and the third "removal." And so there was a need not only for reading the inscription but also for interpreting what had been read, in order that it might be understood what these words were announcing. That is to say, that God had numbered his kingdom and brought it to an end, and that He had seized hold upon him to weigh him in His judgment-scales, and the sword would slay him before he should meet a natural death; and that his empire would be divided among the Medes and Persians. For Cyrus, the king of the Persians, as we have already mentioned, overthrew the Chaldean Empire in alliance with Darius, his maternal uncle.....5:30-31. "On that same night Belshazzar, King of the Chaldeans, was slain, and Darius the Mede succeeded to his kingdom at the age of sixty-two." Josephus writes in his tenth book of the Jewish Antiquities that when Babylon had been laid under siege by the Medes and Persians, that is, by Darius and Cyrus, Belshazzar, King of Babylon, fell into such forgetfulness of his own situation as to put on his celebrated banquet and drink from the vessels of the Temple, and even while he was besieged he found leisure for banqueting. From this circumstance the historical account could arise, that he was captured and slaughtered on the same night, while everyone was either terrified by fear of the vision and its interpretation, or else taken up with festivity and drunken banqueting. As for the fact that while Cyrus, King of the Persians, was the victor, and Darius was only King of the Medes, it was Darius who was recorded to have succeeded to the throne of Babylon, this was an arrangement occasioned by factors of age, family relationship, and the territory ruled over. By this I mean that Darius was sixty-two years old, and that, according to what we read, the kingdom of the Medes was more sizable than that of the Persians, and being Cyrus's uncle, he naturally had a prior claim, and ought to have been accounted as successor to the rule of Babylon. Therefore also in a vision of Isaiah which was recited against Babylon, after many other matters too lengthy to mention, an account is given of these things which are to take place: "Behold I Myself will rouse up against them the Medes, a people who do not seek after silver nor desire gold, but who slay the very children with their arrows and have no compassion upon women who suckle their young" (B) (Isa. 13:7). And Jeremiah says: "Sanctify nations against her, even the kings of Media, and the governors thereof and all the magistrates thereof and all the land under the power thereof" (Jer. 51:28). Then follow the words: "The daughter of Babylon is like a threshing-floor during the time of its treading; yet a little while, and the time of its harvesting will come" (Jer. 51:33). And in testimony of the fact that Babylon was captured (657) during a banquet, Isaiah clearly exhorts her to battle when he writes: "Babylon, my beloved, has become a strange spectacle unto me [this rendering differs from the Hebrew original and the Septuagint, and seems altogether unjustified]: set thou the table and behold in the mirrors [the Hebrew says: "set the watch"] those who eat and drink; rise up, ye princes, and snatch up your shields!" (Isa. 21:4, 5).

6:1 ff. "It pleased Darius to appoint over his kingdom one hundred and twenty satraps, that they might be throughout his whole kingdom; and over them there were three princes, of which Daniel was one." Josephus, of whom we made mention above, in writing an account of this passage, put it this way: Now Darius (C), who destroyed the empire of the (p. 523) Babylonians in cooperation with his relative, Cyrus, --for they carried on the war as allies-- was sixty-two years of age at the time he captured

Babylon. He was the son of Astyages, and was known to the Greeks by another name. Moreover he took away the prophet Daniel with him and took him to Media, and made him one of the three princes who were in charge of his whole kingdom. Hence we see that when Babylon was overthrown, Darius returned to his own kingdom in Media, and brought Daniel along with him in the same honorable capacity to which he had been promoted by Belshazzar. There is no doubt but what Darius had heard of the sign and portent which had come to Belshazzar, and also of the interpretation which Daniel had set forth, and how he had foretold the rule of the Medes and the Persians. And so no one should be troubled by the fact that Daniel is said in one place to have lived in Darius's reign, and in another place in the reign of Cyrus. The Septuagint rendered Darius by the name Artaxerxes. But as for the fact that a non-chronological order is followed, so that some history is narrated in the reign of Darius before material is given for Belshazzar's reign [cf. 7:1 and 8:1, which of course follow chap. 6], whereas we are subsequently to read that he was put to death by Darius, it seems to me that the anachronism results from the fact that the author has brought all the historical portions together in immediate sequence. Therefore it is at the close of the earlier vision that he had stated: "And Darius the Mede succeeded to the realm at the age of sixty-two." And so it was under this Darius who put Belshazzar to death that the events took place of which we are about to speak. (p63)..... 6:28. "Thereafter Daniel lived on until the reign of Darius and the reign of Cyrus the Persian." And so the statement which we read above at the end of the first vision, "And Daniel lived until the first year of King Cyrus," is not to be understood as defining the span of his life. In view of the fact that we read in the last vision: "In the third year of Cyrus, King of the Persians, a word was revealed to Daniel, whose surname was Belteshazzar"; this is what is meant, that up to the first year of King Cyrus, who destroyed the empire of the Chaldeans, Daniel continued in power in Chaldea, but was afterwards transferred to Media by Darius.

7:2-3:But as for the four beasts who came up out of the sea and were differentiated from one another, we may identify them from the angel's discourse. "These four great beasts," he says, "are four kingdoms which shall rise up from the earth." And as for the four winds which strove in the great sea, they are called winds of heaven because each one of the angels does for his realm the duty entrusted to him. This too should be noted, that the fierceness and (664) cruelty of the kingdoms concerned are indicated by the term "beasts."..... 7:5.....). But as for the three rows or ranks that were in his mouth and between his teeth, one authority has interpreted this to mean that allusion was made to the fact that the Persian kingdom was divided up among three princes, just as we read in the sections dealing with Belshazzar and with Darius that there were three princes who were in charge of the one hundred and twenty satraps. But other commentators affirm that these were three kings of the Persians who were subsequent to Cyrus, and yet they fail to mention them by name (A). But we know that after Cyrus's reign of thirty years his son Cambyses ruled among the Persians, and his brothers the magi [the plural seems unwarranted, since there was but one brother involved, namely, Smerdis], and then Darius, in the second year of whose reign the rebuilding of the Temple was commenced at Jerusalem. The fifth king was Xerxes, the son of Darius; the sixth was Artabanus [actually only the assassin of Xerxes; he never became king]; the seventh, Artaxerxes who was surnamed Makrokheir, that is Longimanus ("Long-handed"); the eighth, (B) Xerxes; the ninth, Sogdianus [the reigns of the last two totaled no more than eight months]; the tenth, Darius surnamed Nothos ("Bastard"); the eleventh, the Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is, "The Rememberer"; the twelfth, the other Artaxerxes, who himself received the surname of Ochus; the thirteenth, Arses, the son of Ochus; and the fourteenth, Darius the son of Arsamus, who was conquered by Alexander, the king of the Macedonians. How then can we say that these were three kings of the Persians? Of course we could select some who were especially cruel, but we cannot ascertain them on the basis of the historical accounts. Therefore the three rows in the mouth of the Persian kingdom and between its teeth we must take to be the three kingdoms of the Babylonians, the Medes, and the Persians, all of which were reduced to a single realm. And as for the information, "And thus they spake to him: 'Devour flesh in abundance,' " this refers to the time when in the reign of the Ahasuerus whom the Septuagint calls Artaxerxes, the order was given, at the suggestion of Haman the Agagite, that all the Jews be slaughtered on a single day (Esth. 3). And very properly, instead of saying, "He was devouring them" the account specifies, "Thus they spake unto him...." This shows that the matter was only attempted, and was by no means ever carried out. ... 7:6: The third kingdom was that of the Macedonians,... There was never, after all, any victory won more quickly than Alexander's, for he traversed all the way from Illyricum and the Adriatic Sea to the Indian Ocean and the Ganges River, not merely fighting battles but winning decisive victories; and in six years he subjugated to his rule a portion of Europe and all of Asia. And by the four heads reference is made to his generals who subsequently rose up as successors to his royal power, namely Ptolemy, Seleucus, Philip [i.e., Philip Arrhidaeus, an illegitimate brother of Alexander, who was proclaimed king upon Alexander's death, but never exercised genuine power, and died after seven years], and Antigonus [the precursor of Seleucus in the rule of the Asiatic portion of Alexander's empire]. "And power was given to it" shows that the empire did not result from Alexander's bravery but from the will of God.... 7:7... The fourth empire is the Roman Empire, which now occupies the entire world,...". ..and it had ten horns." Porphyry assigned the last two beasts, that of the Macedonians and that of the Romans, to the one realm of the Macedonians and divided them up as follows. He claimed that the leopard was Alexander himself, and that the beast which was dissimilar to the others represented the four successors of Alexander, and then he enumerates ten kings up to the time of Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, and who were very cruel. And he did not assign the kings themselves to separate kingdoms, for example Macedon, Syria, Asia, or Egypt, but rather he made out the various kingdoms a single realm consisting of a series. This he did of course in order that the words which were written: "... a mouth uttering overweening boasts" [in the last part of verse 8] might be considered as spoken about Antiochus instead of about Antichrist.... Porphyry vainly surmises that the little (p. 531) horn which rose up after the ten horns is Antiochus Epiphanes, and that the three uprooted horns out of the ten are (A) Ptolemy VI (surnamed Philometer), Ptolemy VII (Euergetes), and Artaxias, King of Armenia. The first two of these kings died long before Antiochus was born. Against Artaxias, to be sure, we know that Antiochus indeed waged war, but also we know that Artaxias remained in possession of his original kingly authority. We should therefore concur with the traditional interpretation of all the commentators of the Christian Church, that at the end of the world, when the Roman Empire is to be destroyed, there shall be ten kings who will partition the Roman world amongst themselves. Then an insignificant eleventh king will arise, who will overcome three of the ten kings, that is, the king of Egypt, the king of [North] Africa, and the king of Ethiopia, as we shall show more clearly in our later discussion. Then after they have been slain, the seven other kings also will bow their necks to the victor. "And behold," he continues, "there were eyes like unto human eyes in that horn." Let us not follow the opinion of some commentators and suppose him to be either the Devil or some demon, but rather, one of the human race, in whom Satan will wholly take up his residence in bodily form. "... and a mouth uttering overweening boasts..." (cf. II Thess. 2). For this is the man of sin, the son (668) of perdition, and that too to such a degree that he dares to sit in the temple of God, making himself out to be like God.... 7:8... And the Ancient (C) of days is the One who, according to John (p. 532) sits alone upon His throne. Likewise the Son of man, who came unto the Ancient of days, is the same as He who, according to John, is called the Lion of the tribe of Judah (Rev. 5), the Root of David, and the titles of that sort.... 7:13-14...". ..And He arrived unto the Ancient of days, and they brought Him before His presence, and He gave unto Him authority and honor and royal power." All that is said here concerning His being brought before Almighty God and receiving authority and honor and royal power is to be understood in the light of the Apostle's statement: "Who, although He was in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and was found in His condition to be as a man: He humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even to the death of the cross" (Phil. 2:6-8). And if the sect of the Arians were willing to give heed to all this Scripture with a reverent mind, they would never direct against the Son of God the calumny that He is not on an equality with God. "... And He is the one whom all the peoples, tribes, and language-groups shall serve. His authority is an eternal authority which shall not be removed, and His kingdom shall be one that shall never be destroyed..." Let Porphyry answer the query of whom out of all mankind this language might apply to, or who this person might be who was so powerful as to break and smash to pieces the little horn, whom he interprets to be Antiochus? If he replies that the princes of Antiochus were defeated by Judas Maccabaeus, then he must explain how Judas could be said to come with the clouds of heaven like unto the Son of man, and to be brought unto the Ancient of days, and how it could be said that authority and royal power was bestowed upon him, and that all (671) peoples and tribes and language-groups served him, and that his power is eternal and not terminated by any conclusion (p. 534).... 7:17-18... ". . . And they shall possess the kingdom unto eternity, even forever and ever. ..." If this be taken to refer to the Maccabees, the advocate of this position should explain how the kingdom of the Maccabees is of a perpetual character. 7:25. Verse 25. "And he shall utter (variant: "he utters") speeches against the Lofty One." Or else, as Symmachus has rendered it: "He utters speeches like God," so that one who assumes the authority of God will also arrogate to himself the words of divine majesty. ". . . And he shall crush the saints of the Most High, and will suppose himself to be able to alter times and laws." The Antichrist will wage war against the saints and will overcome them; and he shall exalt himself to such a height of arrogance (A) as to attempt changing the very laws of God and the sacred rites as well. He will also lift himself up against all that is called God, subjecting all religion to his own authority. "... And they shall be delivered into his hand for a time, and times, and half a time." "Time" is equivalent to "year." The word "times," according to the idiom of the Hebrews (who also possess the dual number) represents "two years." [The Aramaic original here, according to the Massoretic vowel pointing, has the plural ending ----iyn, not the dual ending ----ayin. To be sure, the consonantal text could also be pointed as dual.] The half a year signifies "six months." During this period [3 1/2 years] the saints are to be given over to the power of the Antichrist, in order that those Jews might be condemned who did not believe the truth but supported a lie. The Savior also speaks of this period in the Gospel, saying: "Unless those days had been cut short, no flesh would be saved" (Matt. 24:22). In the final vision we shall assert the inappropriateness of this period to Antiochus. 7:26-27... This refers to Antichrist, that is, to the little horn which uttered the lofty words, for his kingdom is to be permanently destroyed... Here the reference is to Christ's empire, which is eternal. 7:28. "Thus far is the end of the word." That is, "the end of that word and discourse which the Lord revealed to me in this present vision." "... I, Daniel, was much troubled with my thoughts (B), and my countenance was altered within me; but I preserved the word in my heart." Up to this point the Book of Daniel was written in the Chaldee and Syriac language. All the rest that follows up to the very end of the volume we read in Hebrew.

8:3... He calls Darius, Cyrus's uncle, a ram. He reigned over the Medes after his father, Astyages. And the one horn which was higher than the other, and growing still larger, signified Cyrus himself, who succeeded his maternal grandfather, Astyages, and reigned over the Medes and Persians along with his uncle, Darius, whom the Greeks called Cyaxeres. 8:4. "After this I saw the ram pushing with its horns westward (D) and northward and southward...." Not that he saw the ram itself, that is, the ram of Cyrus or Darius, but rather the ram of the same kingdom as theirs, that is, the second Darius, who was the last king of the Persian power, and who was overcome by the king of the Macedonians, Alexander the son of Philip. And as to the fact that Darius was a very powerful and wealthy king, both the Greek and the Latin and the barbarian historical accounts so relate. 8:5. "And I myself understood. ..." On the basis of the previous visions which had symbolized the second kingdom by the ram and the he-goat, Daniel now also understood that he was looking at the empire of the Medes and Persians. "And behold, there was a he-goat which was coming from the West above the surface of the whole earth, and yet without touching the ground. ..." So that no one will think that I am attaching a private interpretation to this, let us simply repeat the words of Gabriel as he explained the prophet's vision. He said, "The ram whom thou sawest to possess two horns is the king of the Medes and Persians." This was, of course, Darius the son of Arsames, in whose reign the kingdom of the Medes and Persians was destroyed. "There was in addition a he-goat, who was coming from the west," and because of his extraordinary speed he appeared not to touch the ground. This was Alexander, the king of the Greeks, who after the overthrow of Thebes took up arms against the Persians. Commencing the conflict at the Granicus River, he conquered the generals of Darius and finally smashed against (674) the ram himself and broke in pieces his two horns, the Medes and the Persians. Casting him beneath his feet, he subjected both horns to his own authority. "And (he had) a large horn. ..." refers to the first king, Alexander himself. When he died in Babylon at the age of thirty-two, his four generals rose up in his place and divided his empire among themselves. For Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, seized Egypt; the Philip who was also called Aridaeus (var.: Arius), the (half-) brother of Alexander took over Macedonia; Seleucus Nicanor took over Syria, Babylonia, and all the kingdoms of the East; and Antigonus ruled over Asia Minor. "But (they shall not rise up) with his power" (chap. 8:22), since no one was able to equal the greatness of Alexander himself. "And a long time afterward" there shall arise "a king of Syria who shall be of shameless countenance and shall understand (evil) counsels," even Antiochus Epiphanes, the son of the Seleucus who was also called Philopator. 8:9. After he had been a hostage to Rome, and had without the knowledge of the Senate obtained rule by treachery, Antiochus fought with Ptolemy Philometor, that is, "against the South" and against Egypt; and then again "against the East," and against those who were fomenting revolution in Persia. At the last he fought against the Jews and captured Judea, entering into Jerusalem and setting up in the Temple of God the statue of Jupiter Olympius. "...and against the power of heaven," that is, against the children of Israel, who were protected by the assistance of angels. He pushed his arrogance to such an extreme that he subjected the majority of the saints to the worship of idols, as if he would tread the very stars beneath his feet. And thus it came to pass that he held the South and the East, that is, Egypt and Persia, under his sway.

8:11-12. And as for the statement, "And he glorified himself even against the Prince of Power," this means that he lifted himself up against God and persecuted His saints. He even took away the endelekhismos or "continual offering" which was customarily sacrificed in the morning and at even, and he prevailed to the casting down of the "place of His sanctuary." And he did not do this by his own prowess, but only "on account of the sins of the people." And thus it came to pass that truth was prostrated upon the ground, and as the worship of idols flourished, the religion of God suffered an eclipse.

8:13. "And I heard one of the saints speaking, and one saint said to another saint (I do not know which one), who was conversing with him." Instead of "another one which one I do not know" -- the rendering of Symmachus (p. 537) (A) (tini pote) which I too have followed-- Aquila and (675) Theodotion, and the Septuagint as well, have simply put the Hebrew word (p-l-m-n-y) 'phelmoni' (B) itself. Without specifying the angel's name, I should say that the author indicated some one of the angels or other in a general way.

"How long shall be the vision concerning the continual sacrifice and the sin of the desolation that is made, and the sanctuary and the strength be trodden under foot?" "One angel asks another angel for how long a period the Temple is by the judgment of God to be desolated under the rule of Antiochus, King of Syria, and how long the image of Jupiter is to stand in God's Temple (according to his additional statement: "... and the sanctuary and the strength be trodden under foot?")." 8:14. And he answered him, "Until the evening and the morning, until two thousand three hundred days (C); and then the sanctuary shall be cleansed." If we read the Books of Maccabees and the history of Josephus, we shall find it there recorded that in the one hundred and forty-third (143rd) year after the Seleucus who first reigned in Syria after the decease of Alexander, Antiochus entered Jerusalem, and after wreaking a general devastation he returned again in the third (3rd) year and set up the statue of Jupiter in the Temple. Up until the time of Judas Macca-baeus, that is, up until the one hundred and eighth year (108th), Jerusalem lay waste over a period of six (6) years, and for three (3) [of those] years the Temple lay defiled; making up a total of two thousand three hundred (2300) days plus three months. [At least that is what the text seems to say, following the present word-order. Actually the three months should be added to the six years in order to come out to a total of approximately 2300 days.] At the end of the period the Temple was purged. Some authorities read two hundred (200) instead of two thousand three hundred (2300), in order to avoid the apparent excess involved in six (6) years and three months. [Actually, however, 2200 days would come out to only six (6) years and nine days; the reasoning here seems obscure.] Most of our commentators refer this passage to the Antichrist, and hold that that which occurred under Antiochus was only by way of a type which shall be fulfilled under Antichrist. And as for the statement, "The sanctuary shall be cleansed," this refers to the time of Judas Maccabaeus, who came from the village of Modin, and who being aided by the efforts of his brothers (D) and relatives and many of the Jewish people [defeated?] [the verb is left out] the generals of Antiochus not far above Emmaus (which is now called Nicopolis). And hearing of this, Antiochus, who had risen up against the Prince of princes, that is, against the Lord of lords and King of kings, was earnestly desirous of despoiling the temple of Diana which was located in Elimaïs, in the Persian district, because it possessed valuable votive offerings. And when he there lost his army, he was destroyed without hands, that is to say, he died of grief. As for the mention of evening and morning [in that fourteenth verse], this signifies the succession of day and night..... 8:16-17....Inasmuch as Ezekiel and Daniel and Zechariah behold themselves to be often in the company of angels, they were reminded of their frailty, lest they should be lifted up in pride and imagine themselves to partake of the nature or dignity of angels. Therefore they are addressed as sons of men, in order that they might realize that they are but human beings.

9:1-2. "In the first year of the Darius who was the son of Ahasuerus of the race of the Medes and who reigned over (678) the kingdom of the Chaldeans, in the first year of his reign. ..." This is the Darius who in cooperation with Cyrus conquered the Chaldeans and Babylonians. We are not to think of that other Darius in the second year of whose reign the Temple was built (as Porphyry supposes in making out a late date for Daniel); nor are we to think of the Darius who was vanquished by Alexander, the king of the Macedonians. He therefore adds the name of his father and also refers to his victory, inasmuch as he was the first of the race of the Medes to overthrow the kingdom of the Chaldeans. He does this to avoid any mistake in the reading which might arise from the similarity of the name. (p90)

9:24-27. " 'Seventy (70) weeks are shortened upon thy people and upon thy holy city, (C) that transgression may be finished, and sin may have an end, and iniquity may be abolished, and everlasting justice may be brought to bear, and that the vision and prophecy may be fulfilled that the Holy One of the saints may be anointed. Know therefore and take note that from the going forth of the word to build up Jerusalem again, unto Christ the prince, there shall be seven weeks and sixty-two weeks, and the street shall be built again, and the walls, in distressing times. And after sixty-two weeks Christ shall be slain, and ((D) the people that shall deny Him) shall not be His. And a people, with their leader that shall come, shall destroy the city and the sanctuary. And the end thereof shall be devastation, and after the end of the war there shall be the appointed desolation. And he shall confirm the covenant with many in one week; and in the middle of the week both victim and sacrifice shall fail. And there shall be in the Temple the abomination of desolation, and the desolation shall continue even unto the consummation and the end.' " Because the prophet had said, "Thou didst lead forth Thy people, and Thy name was pronounced upon Thy city and upon Thy people," Gabriel therefore, as the mouthpiece of God, says by implication: "By no means are they God's people, but only thy people; nor is Jerusalem the holy city of God, but it is only a holy city unto thee, as thou sayest." This is similar to what we read in Exodus also, when God says to Moses, "Descend, for thy people have committed sin" (Ex. 32:7). That is to say, they are not My people, for they have forsaken Me. And so, because thou dost supplicate for Jerusalem and prayest for the people of the Jews, hearken unto that which shall befall thy people in seventy (70) weeks of years, and those things which will happen to thy city.

*I realize that this question has been argued over in various ways by men of greatest learning, and that each of them has expressed his views according to the capacity of his own genius. And so, because it is unsafe to pass judgment upon the opinions of the great teachers of the Church and to set one above another, I shall simply repeat the view of each, and leave it to the reader's judgment as to whose explanation ought to be followed. In the fifth volume of his Tempora ["Chronology"], Africanus has this to say concerning the seventy (70) weeks (682) (and I quote him verbatim): "The chapter (E) which we read in Daniel concerning the seventy (70) weeks contains many remarkable details, which require too lengthy a discussion at this point; and so we must discuss only what pertains to our present task, namely that which concerns chronology. There is no doubt but what it constitutes a prediction of Christ's advent, for He appeared to the world at the end of seventy(70) weeks. After Him the crimes were consummated and sin reached its end and iniquity was destroyed. An eternal righteousness also was proclaimed which overcame the mere righteousness of the law; and the vision and the prophecy were fulfilled, inasmuch as the Law and the Prophets endured until the time of (F) John the Baptist (Luke 16), and then the Saint of saints was anointed. And all these things were the objects of hope, prior to Christ's incarnation, rather (p. 543) than the objects of actual possession. Now the angel himself specified seventy (70) weeks of years, that is to say, four hundred and ninety (490) years from the issuing of the word that the petition be granted and that Jerusalem be rebuilt. The specified interval began in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, King of the Persians; for it was his cupbearer, Nehemiah (Neh. 1), who, as we read in the book of Ezra [the Vulgate reckons Nehemiah as II Esdras], petitioned the king and obtained his request that Jerusalem be rebuilt. And this was the word, or decree, which granted permission for the construction of the city and its encompassment with walls; for up until that time it had lain open to the incursions of the surrounding nations. But if one points to the command of King Cyrus, who granted to all who desired it permission to return to Jerusalem, the fact of the matter is that the high priest Jesus [Jeshua] and Zerubbabel, and later on the priest Ezra, together with the others who had been willing to set forth from Babylon with them, only made an abortive attempt to construct the Temple and the city with its walls, but were prevented by the surrounding nations from completing the task, on the pretext that the king had not so ordered. And thus the work remained incomplete until Nehemiah's time and the twentieth (20) year of King Artaxerxes. Hence the captivity lasted for seventy (70) years prior to the Persian rule. [This last sentence is bracketed by the editor.] At this period in the Persian Empire a hundred and fifteen (115) years had elapsed since its inception, but it was the one hundred and eighty-fifth (185th) year from the captivity of Jerusalem when Artaxerxes first gave orders for the walls of Jerusalem to be built. [Actually only 141 years, the interval between 587 B.C. and 446 B.C.] Nehemiah was in charge of this undertaking, and the street was built and the surrounding walls were erected. Now if you compute (683) seventy weeks of years from that date, you can come out to the time of Christ. But if we wish to take any other date (A) as the starting point for these weeks, then the dates will show a discrepancy and we shall encounter many difficulties. For if the seventy weeks are computed from the time of Cyrus and his decree of indulgence which effectuated the release of the Jewish captives, then we shall encounter a deficit of a hundred (100) years and more short of the stated number of seventy (70) weeks [only seventy-eight (78) years, by more recent computation, for Cyrus's decree was given in 538 B.C.]. If we reckon from the day when the angel spoke to Daniel, the deficit would be much greater [actually not more than a few months or a year]. An even greater number of years is added, if you wish to put the beginning of the weeks at the commencement of the captivity. For the kingdom of the Persians endured for two hundred and thirty (230) years until the rise of the Macedonian kingdom; then the Macedonians themselves reigned for three hundred (300) years. From that date until the sixteenth (16th) (i.e., the fifteenth (15th)) year of Tiberius Caesar, when Christ suffered death, is an interval of sixty (60) [sic!] years [reckoning from the death of Cleopatra, the last of the Macedonian Ptolemies]. All of these years added together come to the number of five hundred and ninety (590), with the result that a hundred (100) years remain to be accounted for. On the other hand, the interval from the twentieth (20th) year of Artaxerxes to the time of Christ completes the figure of seventy (70) weeks, if we reckon according to the lunar computation of the Hebrews, who did not number their months according to the movement of the sun, but rather according to the moon. For the interval from the one hundred fiftieth (150th) year of the Persian Empire, when Artaxerxes, as king thereof, attained the twentieth (20th) year of his reign (and this was the fourth (4th) year of the eighty-third (83rd) Olympiad), up until the two hundred and second (202nd) Olympiad (for it was the second (2nd) year of that Olympiad which was the fifteenth (15th) year of Tiberius Caesar) comes out to be the grand total of four hundred seventy-five (475) years. This would result in four hundred ninety (490) Hebrew years, reckoning according to the lunar months as we have suggested. For according to their (p. 544) computation, these years can be made up of months of twenty-nine (variant: twenty-eight (28)) and a half ($29 \frac{1}{2}$, $28 \frac{1}{2}$) days each. This means that the sun, during a period of four hundred ninety (490) years, completes its revolution in three hundred sixty-five (365) days and a quarter, and this amounts to twelve (12) lunar months for each individual year, with eleven and a fourth days left over to spare. Consequently the Greeks and Jews over a period of eight (8) years insert three intercalary months (embolimoí). (684) For if you will multiply eleven and a quarter ($11 \frac{1}{4}$) days by eight (8), you will come out to ninety days (90), which equal three (3) months. Now if you divide the eight-year periods into four hundred seventy-five (475) years, your quotient will be fifty-nine (59) plus three months. These fifty-nine (59) plus eight-year periods produce enough intercalary months to make up fifteen (15) years, more or less; and if you will add these fifteen (15) years to the four hundred seventy-five (475) years, you will come out to seventy weeks (70) of years, that is, a total of four hundred and ninety years (490)."

Africanus has expressed his views in these very words which we have copied out. Let us pass on to Eusebius Pamphili [the famous church historian, who assumed the cognomen Pamphili in honor of his beloved mentor, Bishop Pamphilus], who in the eighth book of his Euangelike Apodeixis [the full title was Euangelikes Apodeixeos Proparaskeue or "Preparation for the Demonstration of the Gospel"; the Latin title is Praeparatio Evangelica] ventures some such conjecture as this: "It does not seem to me that the seventy (70) weeks have been divided up without purpose, in that seven (7) is mentioned first, and then sixty-two (62), and then a last (1) week is added, which in turn is itself divided into two parts. For it is written: 'Thou shalt know and understand that from the issuing of the word (command) that the petition be granted and Jerusalem be built until Christ the Prince there shall be seven weeks and sixty-two (69) weeks.' And after the rest which he relates in the intervening section, he states at the end: 'He shall confirm a testimony (covenant) with many during one week.' It is clear that the angel did not detail these things in his reply to no purpose or apart from the inspiration of God. This observation seems to require some cautious and careful reasoning, so that the reader may pay diligent attention and inquire into the cause for this division (variant: vision). But if we must express our own opinion, in conformity with the rest of the interpretation which concerns this present context, in the angel's statement: 'From the issuing of the word that the petition be granted and that Jerusalem be built, until the time of Christ the Prince,' we are only to think of other princes who had charge of the Jewish people subsequent to this prophecy and subsequent to the return from Babylon. That is to say, we are to think of the 'arkhiereis' [high priests] and pontiffs to whom the Scripture attaches the title of christs, by reason of the fact that they have been anointed. The first of these was Jesus [Jeshua] the son of Jehozadak, the high priest, and then the rest who had that office up until the time of the advent of our Lord and Savior. And it is these who are intended by the prophet's prediction when it states: 'From the issuing of the word that the petition be granted and Jerusalem be built even unto Christ the Prince there shall be seven weeks, and sixty-two weeks.' (685) That is to say, the purpose is that seven (7) weeks be counted off, and then afterward sixty-two (62) weeks, which come to a total of four hundred and eighty-three years (483) after the time of Cyrus. And lest we appear to be putting forth a mere conjecture too rashly and without testing the truth of our statements, let us reckon up those who bore office as christs over the people from the time of Jeshua, the son of Jehozadak, until the advent of the Lord; that is to say, those who were anointed for the high priesthood. First, then, as we have already stated, subsequent to Daniel's prophecy, which occurred in the reign of Cyrus, and subsequent to the return of (p. 545) the people from Babylon, Jeshua the son of Jehozadak was the high priest, and together with Zerubbabel, son of Shealtiel, they laid the foundations of the temple. And because the undertaking was hindered by the Samaritans and the other surrounding nations, seven (7) weeks of years elapsed (that is to say, forty-nine years (49)), during which the work on the temple remained unfinished. These (7) weeks are separated by the prophecy from the remaining sixty-two (62) weeks. And lastly, the Jews also followed this view when they said to the Lord in the Gospel-narrative: 'This temple was built over a period of forty-six years, and shalt thou raise it up in three days' (John 2:20). For this was the number of years which elapsed between the first (1st) year of Cyrus, who granted to those Jews who so desired the permission to return to their fatherland, and the sixth (6th) year of King Darius, in whose reign the entire work upon the temple was finished. [Actually the two dates involved are 538 B.C. and 516 B.C., an interval of only twenty-two (22) years.] Furthermore Josephus added on three (3) more years, during which the 'periboloi' (precincts) and certain other construction left undone were brought to completion; and when these are added to the forty-six (46) years, they come out to forty-nine (49) years, or seven (7) weeks of years. And the remaining sixty-two (62) weeks are computed from the seventh (7th) year of Darius. At that time Jeshua the son of Jehozadak, and Zerubbabel (who had already reached his majority) were in charge of the people, and it was in their time that Haggai and Zechariah prophesied. After them came Ezra and Nehemiah from Babylon and constructed the walls of the city during the high priesthood of Joiakim, son of Jeshua, who had the surname of Jehozadak. After him Eliashib succeeded to the priesthood, then Joiada and Johanan after him. Following him there was Jaddua, in whose lifetime Alexander, the king of the Macedonians, founded Alexandria, (686) as (A) Josephus relates in his books of the Antiquities, and actually came to Jerusalem and offered blood-sacrifices in the Temple. Now Alexander died in the one hundred and thirteenth (113th) Olympiad, in the two hundred thirty-sixth (236th) year of the Persian Empire, which in turn had begun in the first (1st) year of the fifty-fifth (55th) Olympiad. That was the date when Cyrus, King of the Persians, conquered the Babylonians and Chaldeans. After the death of the priest Jaddua, who had been in charge of the temple in Alexander's reign, Onias received the high priesthood. It was at this period that Seleucus, after the conquest of Babylon, placed upon his own head the crown of all Syria and Asia, in the twelfth (12th) year after Alexander's death. Up to that time the years which had elapsed since the rule of Cyrus, when computed together, were two hundred and forty-eight (248). From that date the Scripture of the Maccabees computes the kingdom of the Greeks. Following Onias, the high priest Eleazar became head of the Jews. That was the period when the Seventy translators (Septuaginta interpretes) are said to have translated the Holy Scriptures into Greek at Alexandria. After him came Onias II, who was followed by Simon, who ruled over the people when Jesus the son of Sirach wrote the book which bears the Greek title of Panaretos ("A Completely Virtuous Man"), and which is by most people falsely attributed to Solomon. Another Onias followed him in the high priesthood, and that was the period when Antiochus was trying to force the Jews to sacrifice to the gods of the Gentiles. After the death of Onias, Judas Maccabaeus cleansed the Temple and smashed to bits the statues of the idols. His brother Jonathan followed him, (p. 546) and after Jonathan their brother Simon governed the people. By his death the two hundred and seventy-seventh (277th) year of the Syrian kingdom had elapsed, and the First Book of Maccabees contains a record of events up to that time. And so the total number of years from the first (1st) year of Cyrus, King of Persia, until the end of the First Book of Maccabees and the death of the high priest Simon is four hundred twenty-five (425). After him John [Hyrcanus] occupied the high priesthood for twenty-nine (29) years, and upon his death Aristobulus became head of the people for a (1) year and was the first man after the return from Babylon to associate with the dignity of high priesthood the authority of kingship. His successor was Alexander, who likewise was high priest and king, and who governed the people for twenty-seven (27) years. Up to this point, the number of years from the first (1st) year of Cyrus and the return of the captives who desired to come back to Judaea is to be computed at four hundred and eighty-three (483). This total is made up of the seven weeks (7) and the sixty-two (62) weeks, or sixty-nine (69) weeks altogether. And during this whole period high priests ruled over the Jewish people, and I now believe that they are those referred to as christ-princes. And when the last of them, Alexander, had died, the Jewish nation was rent in this direction and that into various factions, and was harrassed by internal seditions in its leaderless condition; and that too to such an extent that Alexandra, who was also called Salina, and who was the wife of the same Alexander, seized power and kept the high priesthood for her son, Hyrcanus. But she passed on the royal power to her other son, Aristobulus, and he exercised it for ten (10) years. But when the brothers fought with each other in civil war and the Jewish nation was drawn into various factions, then Gnaeus Pompey, the general of the Roman army, came upon the scene. Having captured Jerusalem, he penetrated even to the shrine in the temple which was called the Holy of holies. He sent Aristobulus back to Rome in chains, keeping him for his triumphal procession, and then he gave the high priesthood to his brother, Hyrcanus. Then for the first time the Jewish nation became tributary to the Romans. Succeeding him, Herod, the son of Antipater, received the royal authority over the Jews by senatorial decree, after Hyrcanus had been killed; and so he was the first foreigner to become governor of the Jews. Moreover when his parents had died, he handed over the high priesthood to his children, even though they were non-Jews, utterly contrary to the law of Moses. Nor did he entrust the office to them for long, (B) except upon their granting him favors and bribes, for he despised the commands of God's law."

The same Eusebius offered another explanation also, and if we wanted to translate it into Latin, we should greatly expand the size of this book. And so the sense of his interpretation is this, that the number of years from the sixth (6th) year of Darius, who reigned after Cyrus and his son, Cambyses, -- and this was the date when the work on the temple was completed-- until the time of Herod and Caesar Augustus is reckoned to be seven weeks (7) plus sixty-two (62) weeks, which make a total of four hundred eighty-three years (483). (688) That was the date when the christ, that is to say, Hyrcanus, being the last high priest of the Maccabaeen line, was murdered by Herod, and the succession of high priests came to an end, so far as the law of God was concerned. It was then also that a Roman army (p. 547) under the leadership of a Roman general devastated both the city and the sanctuary itself. Or else it was Herod himself who committed the devastation, after he had through the Romans appropriated to himself a governmental authority to which he had no right. And as for the angel's statement, "For he shall establish a compact with many for one week (variant: "a compact for many weeks"), and in the midst of the week the sacrifice and offering shall cease," it is to be understood in this way, that Christ was born while Herod was reigning in Judaea and Augustus in Rome, and He preached the Gospel for three (3) years and six (6) months, according to John the Evangelist. And he established the worship of the true God with many people, undoubtedly meaning the Apostles and believers generally. And then, after our Lord's passion, the sacrifice and offering ceased in the middle of the week. For whatever took place in the Temple after that date was not a valid sacrifice to God but a mere worship of the devil, while they all cried out together, "His blood be upon us and upon our children" (Matt. 27:25); and again, "We have no king but Caesar." Any reader who is interested may look up this passage in the Chronicle of this same Eusebius, for I translated it into Latin many years ago. But as for his statement that the number of years to be reckoned from the completion of the temple to the tenth (10th) year of the Emperor Augustus, that is, when Hyrcanus was slain and Herod obtained Judaea, amounts to a total of seven (7) plus sixty-two (62) weeks, or four hundred eighty-three (483) years, we may check it in the following fashion. The building of the temple was finished in the seventy-sixth (76th) (here and in the other place read: "sixty-seventh (67th)" --Migne) Olympiad, which was the sixth (6th) year of Darius. In the third (3rd) year of the one hundred and eighty-sixth (186th) Olympiad, that is, the tenth (10th) year of Augustus, Herod seized the rule over the Jews. This makes the interval four hundred and eighty-three (483) years, reckoning up by the individual Olympiads and computing them at four (4) years each. This same Eusebius reports another view as well, which I do not entirely reject (A), that most authorities extend the one (1) [last] week of years to the sum of seventy years (70), reckoning each year as a ten-year (10 yr) period [reading the corrupt 'upputatio' as 'supputatio']. They also claim that thirty-five (35) years intervened between the passion of the Lord and the reign of Nero, and that it was at this latter date when the weapons of Rome were first (689) lifted up against the Jews, this being the half-way (1/2) point of the week of seventy years (70). After that, indeed, from the time of Vespasian and Titus (and it was right after their accession to power that Jerusalem and the temple were burned) up to the reign of Trajan another thirty-five (35) years elapsed. And this, they assert, was the week of which the angel said to Daniel: "And he shall establish a compact with many for one week." For the Gospel was preached by the Apostles all over the world, since they survived even unto that late date. According to the tradition of the church historians, John the Evangelist lived up to the time of Trajan. Yet I am at a loss to know how we can understand the earlier seven (7) weeks and the sixty-two (62) weeks to involve seven (7) years each, and just this last one to involve ten (10) years for each unit of the seven (7), or seventy (70) years in all.

So much for Eusebius. But Hippolytus has expressed the following opinion concerning these same weeks (B): he reckons the seven (7) weeks as prior to the return of the people from Babylon, and the sixty-two (62) weeks as subsequent to their return and extending to the birth of Christ. But the dates do not (p. 548) agree at all. If indeed the duration of the Persian Empire be reckoned at two hundred and thirty (230) years, and the Macedonian Empire at three hundred (300), and the period thereafter up to the birth of the Lord be thirty (30) years, then the total from the beginning of the reign of Cyrus, King of the Persians, until the advent of the Savior will be five hundred and sixty (560) years. Moreover Hippolytus places the final (7th) week at the end of the world and divides it into the period of Elias and the period of Antichrist, so that during the [first] three and a half (3 1/2) years of the last (7th) week the knowledge of God is established. And as for the statement, "He shall establish a compact with many for a week" (Dan. 9:27), during the other three years under the Antichrist the sacrifice and offering shall cease. But when Christ shall come and shall slay the wicked one by the breath of His mouth, desolation shall hold sway till the end.

On the other hand Apollinarius of Laodicea in his investigation of the problem breaks away from the stream of the past and directs his longing desires towards the future, very unsafely venturing an opinion concerning matters so obscure. And if by any chance those of future generations should not see these predictions of his fulfilled at the time he set, then they will be forced to seek for some other solution and to convict the teacher himself of erroneous interpretation. And so, in order to avoid the appearance of slandering a man as having made a statement he never made, he makes the following assertion --and I translate him word for word: "To the period of four hundred and ninety (490) years the wicked deeds are to be confined (690) as well as all the crimes which shall ensue from those deeds. After these shall come the times of blessing, and the world is to be reconciled unto God at the advent of Christ, His Son. For from the coming forth of the Word, when Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, to the forty-ninth (49th) year, that is, the end of the seven (7) weeks, [God] waited for Israel to repent.

Thereafter, indeed, from the eighth (8th) year of Claudius Caesar [i.e., 48 A.D.] onward, the Romans took up arms against the Jews. For it was in His thirtieth (30th) year, according to the Evangelist Luke, that the Lord incarnate began His preaching of the Gospel (Luke 1 [3]) [sic!]. According to the Evangelist John (John 2 and 11), Christ completed two (2) years over a period of three (3) passovers. The years of Tiberius' reign from that point onward are to be reckoned at six (6); then there were the four (4) years of the reign of Gaius Caesar, surnamed Caligula, and eight (8) more years in the reign of Claudius. This makes a total of forty-nine (49) years, or the equivalent of seven (7) weeks of years. But when four hundred thirty-four (434) years shall have elapsed after that date, that is to say, the sixty-two (62) weeks, then [i.e. in 482 A.D.] Jerusalem and the Temple shall be rebuilt during three and a half (3 1/2) years within the final (70th) week, beginning with the advent of Elias, who according to the dictum of our Lord and Savior (Luke 1) [[sic!], that is, applying 1:17 to a future period, the 2nd Advent.] is going to come and turn back the hearts of the fathers towards their children. And then the Antichrist shall come, and according to the Apostle [reading 'apostolum' for 'apostolorum'] he is going to sit in the temple of God (II Thess. 2) and be slain by the breath of our Lord and Savior after he has waged war against the saints. And thus it shall come to pass that the middle of the (70th) week shall mark the confirmation of God's covenant with the saints, and the middle of the (70th) week in turn shall mark the issuing of the decree under the authority of Antichrist that no more sacrifices be offered. For the Antichrist shall set up the abomination of desolation, that is, an idol or statue of his own god, within the Temple. Then shall ensue the final devastation and the condemnation of the Jewish people, who after their rejection of Christ's truth shall embrace the lie of the Antichrist. Moreover this same Apollinarius asserts that he conceived this idea about the proper dating from the fact that Africanus, (p. 549) the author of the Tempora [Chronology], whose explanation I have inserted above, affirms that the final week will occur at the end of the world. Yet, says Apollinarius, it is impossible that periods so linked together be wrenched apart, but rather the time-segments must all be joined together in conformity with Daniel's prophecy.

The learned scholar Clement, presbyter of the church at Alexandria, regards the number of years as a matter of slight consequence, (691) asserting that the seventy (70) weeks of years were completed by the span of time from the reign of Cyrus, King of the Persians, to the reign of the Roman emperors, Vespasian and Titus; that is to say, the interval of four hundred and ninety years (490), with the addition in that same figure of the two thousand three hundred (2300) days of which we made earlier mention. He attempts to reckon in these seventy (70) weeks the ages of the Persians, Macedonians, and Caesars, even though according to the most careful computation, the number of years from the first year of Cyrus, King of the Persians and Medes, when Darius also bore rule, up to the reign of Vespasian and the destruction of the Temple amounts to six hundred and thirty (630).

When Origen came to deal with [reading 'praefuisset' instead of 'profuisset'] this chapter, he urged us to seek out what information we do not possess; and because he had no leeway for allegorical interpretation, in which one may argue without constraint, but rather was restricted to matters of historical fact, he made this brief observation in the tenth volume of the Stromata: "We must quite carefully ascertain the amount of time between the first (1st) year of Darius, the son of Ahasuerus, and the advent of Christ, and discover how many years were involved, and what events are said to have occurred during them. Then we must see whether we can fit these data in with the time of the Lord's coming."

We may learn what Tertullian had to say on the subject by consulting the book which he wrote against the Jews (Contra Judaeos), and his remarks may be set forth in brief: "How, then, are we to show that Christ came within the sixty-two (62) (A) weeks? This calculation begins with the first (1st) year of Darius, since that was the time when the vision itself was revealed to Daniel. For he was told: 'Understand and conclude from (B) the prophesying (692) of the command for me to give thee this reply. ...' Hence we are to commence our computation with the first (1st) year of Darius, when Daniel beheld this vision. Let us see, then, how the years are fulfilled up to the advent of Christ. Darius reigned nineteen (19) (p. 550) years; Artaxerxes forty (40) years; the Ochus who was surnamed Cyrus twenty-four years (24); (C) Argus, one (1) year. Then Darius II, who was called Melas, twenty-one (21) (D) years. Alexander the Macedonian reigned twelve (12) years. And then after Alexander (who had ruled over both the Medes and the Persians, after he had conquered them, and had established his rule in Alexandria, calling it after his own name), Soter reigned (E) there in Alexandria for thirty-five (35) years, and was succeeded by Philadelphus, who reigned for thirty-eight (38) years (F). After him Euergetes reigned for twenty-five (25) years, and then Philopator for seventeen (17) years, followed by Epiphanes for twenty-four (24) years. Furthermore the second (2nd) Euergetes ruled for twenty (20) (G) and nine (9) years, and Soter for thirty-eight (38) years. Ptolemy [sic!] for thirty-seven (37) (H) years, and Cleopatra for twenty years (25) and five (5) months (I). Furthermore Cleopatra shared the rule with Augustus for thirteen (13) years. After Cleopatra Augustus reigned forty-three (43) years more. For all of the years of the reign of Augustus were fifty-six (56) in number. And let us see (variant: we see) that in the forty-first (41st) year of the reign of Augustus, who ruled after the death of Cleopatra (J), (693) Christ was born. And this same Augustus lived on for fifteen (15) years after the time when Christ was born. And so the resultant periods of years up to the day of Christ's birth and the forty-first (41st) year of Augustus, after the death of Cleopatra [actually only twenty-nine years after Cleopatra's death --the language here is confusing], come to the total figure of four hundred and thirty-seven years and five months (437 yrs & 5 mnths). This means that sixty-two and a half (62 1/2) weeks were used up, or the equivalent of four hundred and thirty-seven years and six months (437 1/2 yrs), by the day when Christ was born. Then eternal righteousness was revealed, and the Saint of saints was anointed, namely Christ, and the vision and prophecy were sealed, and those sins were remitted which are allowed through faith in Christ's name to all who believe in Him." But what is the meaning of the statement that the "vision and prophecy are confirmed by a seal"? It means that all the prophets made proclamation concerning [Christ] Himself, saying that He was going to come and that He would have to suffer. Hence we read shortly thereafter in this Tertullian passage, "The years were fifty-six (56) in number; furthermore, Cleopatra continued to reign jointly under Augustus...." (p. 551) It was because the prophecy was fulfilled by His advent that the vision was confirmed by a seal; and it was called a prophecy because Christ Himself is the seal of all the prophets, fulfilling as He did all that the prophets had previously declared concerning Him. Of course after His advent and His passion (variant: the passion of Christ), there is no longer any vision or prophecy (variant: or prophet) which declares that Christ will come [?]. And then a little later Tertullian says, "Let us see what is the meaning of (A) the seven and a half (7 1/2) weeks, which in turn are divided up into a subsection of earlier (62) weeks; by what transaction were they fulfilled? Well, after Augustus, (B) who lived on after Christ's birth, fifteen years elapsed. He was succeeded by Tiberius Caesar, and he held sway for twenty-two (22) years, seven (7) months and twenty-eight (28) (C) days. In the fifteenth (15th) year of his reign (D) Christ suffered, being about (694) thirty-three (33) when He suffered. Then there was Gaius Caesar, also named Caligula, who reigned for three (3) years, eight (8) months and thirteen (13) days. [Note that Claudius' reign of 13 years is here omitted.] Nero reigned for nine (9) years, nine (9) months and thirteen (13) days. Galba ruled for seven (7) months and twenty-eight (28) (E) days; Otho for three (3) months and five (5) days; and Vitellius for eight (8) months and twenty-eight (29) (F) days. Vespasian vanquished the Jews in the first (1st) year of his reign, bringing the number of years to a total of fifty-two (52), plus six (6) months. For he ruled for eleven (11) years, and so by the date of his storming Jerusalem, the Jews had completed the seventy (70) weeks foretold by Daniel."

As for the view which the Hebrews hold concerning this passage, I shall set it forth summarily and within a brief compass, leaving the credibility of their assertions to those who asserted them. And so let me put it in the form of a paraphrase (paraphrastikds) in order to bring out the sense more clearly. "O Daniel, know that from this day on which I now speak to thee (and that was the first (1st) year of the Darius who slew Belshazzar and transferred the Chaldean Empire to the Medes and Persians) unto the seventieth (70th) week of years (that is, four hundred and ninety years (490)) the following events shall befall thy people in stages [literally: part by part]. First of all, God shall be appeased by thee in view of the earnest intercession thou hast just offered Him, and sin shall be canceled out and the transgression shall come to an end. For although the city at present lies deserted and the Temple lies destroyed to its very foundations [reading fundamenta for the non-existent frudamenta], so that the nation is plunged into mourning, yet within a fairly short time it shall be restored. And not only shall it come to pass within these seventy (70) weeks that the city shall be rebuilt and the Temple restored, but also the Christ, who is the eternal righteousness, shall be born. (p. 552) And so shall the vision and the prophecy be sealed, with the result that there shall be no more any prophet to be found in Israel, and the Saint of saints shall be anointed. We read concerning Him in the Psalter: 'Because God, even Thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness (695) above thy fellows' (Ps. 44:8 = 45:7). And in another passage He says of Himself: 'Be ye holy, for I also am holy' (Lev. 19:2). Know therefore that from this day on which I speak to thee and make thee the promise by the word of the Lord that the nation shall return and Jerusalem shall be restored, there shall be sixty-two (62) weeks numbered unto the time of Christ the Prince and of the perpetual desolation of the Temple; and that there shall also be seven (7) weeks in which the two events shall take place which I have already mentioned, namely that the nation shall return and the street shall be rebuilt by Nehemiah and Ezra. And so at the end of the weeks the decree of God shall be accomplished in distressing times, when the Temple shall again be destroyed, and the city taken captive. For after the sixty-two (62) weeks the Christ shall be slain, and the nation who shall reject Him shall go out of existence" --or, as the Jews themselves put it, the kingdom of Christ which they imagined they would retain (G) shall not even be. And why do I speak of the slaying of Christ, and of the nation's utter forfeiture of God's help, since the Roman people were going to demolish the city and sanctuary under Vespasian, the leader who was to come? Upon his death the seven (7) weeks or forty-nine (49) years were complete, and after the city of Aelia was established upon the ruins of Jerusalem, Aelius Hadrian vanquished (H) the revolting Jews in their conflict with the general, Timus Rufus. It was at that time that the sacrifice and offering (ceased and) will continue to cease even unto the completion of the age, and the desolation is going to endure until the very end. We are not, say the Jews, greatly impressed by the fact that the seven (7) weeks are mentioned first, and afterwards the sixty-two (62), and again a single (1) week divided into two parts. For it is simply the idiomatic usage of the Hebrew language, as well as of antique Latin, that in quoting a figure, the small number is given first and then the larger. For example, we do not, according to good usage say in our language, "Abraham lived a hundred and seventy-five years (175)"; on the contrary the Hebrews say, "Abraham lived five and seventy (75) and one hundred (100) years" (I). And so the fulfilment is not to follow the literal order of the words, but it shall be accomplished in terms of the whole sum, taken together. I am also well aware that some of the Jews assert that as for the statement about the single week, (696) "He shall establish a covenant with many (p. 553) for one week," the division is between the reigns of Vespasian and Hadrian. According to the history of Josephus, Vespasian and Titus concluded peace with the Jews for three years and six month (3 1/2 yrs). And the [other] three years and six months (3 1/2 yrs) are accounted for in Hadrian's reign, when Jerusalem was completely destroyed and the Jewish nation was massacred in large groups at a time, with the result that they were even expelled from the borders of Judaea. This is what the Hebrews have to say on the subject, paying little attention to the fact that from the first year of Darius, King of the Persians, until the final overthrow of Jerusalem, which befell them under Hadrian, the period involved is a hundred and seventy-four (174) Olympiads or six hundred ninety-six (690) years, which total up to ninety-nine (99) Hebrew weeks plus three (3) years - that being the time when Barcochebas, the leader of the Jews, was crushed and Jerusalem was demolished to the very ground.

10:1. "In the third year of Cyrus, King of the Persians, a word was revealed unto Daniel, who was surnamed Belteshazzar, and it was a true word and great strength. For there is need of understanding in a vision." And how is it that we read at the end of the first vision, "And Daniel lived until the first year of Cyrus the King"? Well then, we understand that he enjoyed his former high position among the Chaldeans and was clothed in purple and fine linen right up until the first year of King Cyrus, when Cyrus overthrew the Chaldeans, and afterwards Daniel commenced service under Darius, the son of Ahasuerus of the Median line, who reigned over the kingdom of the Chaldeans. Or else, indeed, that Darius had already died in whose first year Daniel had learned of the mystery of the seventy (70) weeks, and he is now relating that he beheld these things in the third (3rd) year of King Cyrus....

10:21. "Nevertheless I will relate to thee what has been set down in the Scripture of truth." That is, this is the order which the words follow. The fulfilment is still in doubt. For even though thou dost beseech the Lord (701) and I present thy prayers to Him, yet the prince of the Persians takes his stand on the opposite side, and is unwilling that thy people be freed from captivity. But because the prince of the Greeks has come, and in the meantime is contending against the prince of the Persians, and also because I have Michael there as my assistant, I shall, during their mutual conflict, report to thee the coming events which God has foretold to me and has bidden me relate to thee. And let no one be disturbed by the question as to why mention is made of the prince of the Greeks or Hellenes rather than of the Macedonians, for Alexander, king of the Macedonians, did not take up arms against the Persians until he had first overthrown Greece and subjected it to his power. "And no one is my helper in all these things except Michael, your prince." He implies, 'I am that angel who presents thy prayers to God, and I have no other helper in petitioning God on your behalf except the archangel Michael, to whose charge the Jewish nation has been entrusted. And meanwhile the prince of the Greeks is engaged in a common effort with me at this particular time, contending against the prince of the Persians'. We should review our ancient history and (A) consider whether by any chance that was the date of the conquest of the Persians by the Greeks. According to the Vulgate edition (of the Septuagint), this same vision is reckoned as extending to the end of the book, that is, the vision which appeared to Daniel in the third (3rd) year of Cyrus, King of the Persians. On the other hand, according to the Hebrew original, the ensuing sections are separate from this, and recorded in an inverted order. The causes for this phenomenon we have already mentioned; that is, the matters here recorded are related as having occurred in the first year of the Darius who overthrew Belshazzar, not in the third (3rd) year of Cyrus.

11:1. "And from the first year of Darius the Mede, I stood up that he might be strengthened and confirmed." Daniel implies, "From the first year of the reign of Darius, who overthrew the Chaldeans and delivered me from the hand of my enemies to the extent of his ability (for even his sealing of the pit of lions with his signet ring was for my protection, lest my adversaries should slay me), I for my part stood before God, and I besought God's mercy upon him, in view of the man's love for me, in order that either he or his kingdom might be strengthened and confirmed. And since I persevered in my prayer, I was answered by God and given to understand the following information. After all, it is a customary thing (p. 558) with the prophets to bring in new speakers abruptly and without warning. So it is in Psalm Thirty-one [i.e., Thirty-two]: for when the prophet has petitioned God and said: "Thou art my refuge from my tribulation (B) which compassed me about; O Thou, who art my rejoicing, deliver me from those who now encompass me," then God is abruptly brought in as the speaker, replying, "I will give thee understanding, and I will instruct thee in this way in which thou shalt go; I will fasten Mine eyes upon thee" (verses 7 and 8). So also here, as the prophet relates, "From the first year of Darius the Mede, I stood up and interceded that he might be strengthened and that his rule might be confirmed," God suddenly responds:

Verse 2. "And now I shall proclaim the truth to thee." And the meaning is this: "Because thou desirest to know what shall befall the kings of Persia, hearken thou to the order of events and hear the answer to thy request."

"And behold, three (3) more kings shall arise in Persia, and the fourth (4th) shall be enriched exceedingly above them all, and when he shall have grown mighty through his wealth, he shall stir up all men against the kingdom of Greece." He states that four (4) kings shall arise in Persia after Cyrus, namely Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, and the Magus named Smerdis, who married Pantaptes, the daughter of Cambyses. Then, when he was slain by seven Magi and Darius had succeeded to his throne, the same Pantaptes married Darius, and by him gave birth to Xerxes, who became a most powerful and wealthy king, and led an innumerable host against Greece and performed those deeds which are related by the Greek historians. For in the archonship of Callias he destroyed Athens by fire, and about that same time waged the war at Thermopylae and the naval battle at Salamis. It was in his time that Sophocles and Euripides became famous [hardly Euripides, whose first play was given in 455, nine years after Xerxes' death], and Themistocles fled in exile to Persia, where he died as a result of drinking the blood of a bull. And so that writer [apparently Tertullian, cf. p. 550] is in error who records as the fourth (4th) king that Darius who was defeated by Alexander, for he was not the fourth (4th) king, but the fourteenth (14th) king of the Persians after Cyrus. It was in the seventh (7th) year of his rule that Alexander defeated and slew him. Moreover it should be observed that after he has specified four (4) kings of Persia after Cyrus, the author [i.e., Daniel] omits the nine (9) (C) others and passes right on to Alexander. For the Spirit of prophecy was not concerned about preserving historical detail but in summarizing only the most important matters. (703)

11:3-4. "But there shall rise up a strong king and shall rule with great power, and he shall do whatever he pleases. And when he shall have arisen, his kingdom shall be broken." He clearly refers to Alexander the Great, king of the Macedonians, and son of Philip. For after he had overcome the Illyrians and Thracians, and had conquered Greece and destroyed Thebes, he crossed over into Asia. And when he had routed Darius's generals and taken the city of Sardis, he afterwards captured India and founded the city of Alexandria. And then, when he had attained the age of thirty-two (32) and the twelfth (12th) year of his reign, he died of poison. "And it shall be divided towards the four winds of heaven, but not unto his own posterity nor according to his power with which he had borne rule." After Alexander his kingdom was divided towards the four (p. 559) winds, namely to the east, the west, the south, and the north. In Egypt, that is in the south, Ptolemy the son of Lagos was the first to become king. In Macedonia, that is in the west, the Philip who was also called Aridaeus, a brother of Alexander, became king. The king of Syria and Babylon and the remoter regions, that is, the east, was Seleucus Nicanor. Antigonus was king of Asia Minor and Pontus and of the other provinces in that whole area, that is, in the north. So much for the various regions of the world as a whole; but from the standpoint of Judea itself, the north would be Syria and the south would be Egypt. And as for the statement, "But not unto his own posterity," the implication is that Alexander would have no children, but rather, his kingdom would be rent asunder and fall to others who were not of his family, except of course for Philip, who kept Macedonia. Nor would it be according to the power of him who had borne rule, for the kingdom became feebler by division into four (4) parts, for they constantly fought among themselves and raged with internecine fury. (p120) "For his kingdom shall be rent in pieces (variant: destroyed), and that too among strangers besides these." Besides the four kingdoms of Macedonia, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, the kingdom of the Macedonians was torn asunder among other rulers of less prominence and among petty kings. The reference here is to Perdiccas and Craterus and Lysimachus, for Cappadocia, Armenia, Bithynia, Heracleia, Bosphorus and various other provinces withdrew themselves from the Macedonian power and set up various kings for themselves.

11:5. "And the king of the South shall be strengthened." *The reference is to Ptolemy, son of Lagos, who was the first (1st) to become king in Egypt, and was a very clever, mighty and wealthy man, and possessed such power that he was able to restore Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, to his kingdom after he had been driven out, and also to seize Cyprus and Phoenicia. And after he had conquered Demetrius, the son of Antigonos, he restored to Seleucus that portion of his kingdom which Antigonos had taken away from him. He also acquired Caria and many islands, cities, and districts unnecessary to detail at this time. But no further notice is taken of the other kingdoms, Macedonia and Asia Minor, because Judaea lay in a midway position and was held now by one group of kings and now by another. And it is not the purpose of Holy Scripture to cover external history apart from the Jews, but only that which is linked up with the nation of Israel.

"And one of his princes shall prevail over him, and he shall rule with great power, for his dominion shall be great." The person mentioned is Ptolemy Philadelphus, the second king of Egypt and the son of the former Ptolemy. It was in his reign that the Seventy (Septuaginta) translators are said to have translated the Holy Scripture into Greek. He also sent many treasures to Jerusalem for the high priest Eleazar, and votive vessels for the Temple. The curator of his library was Demetrius of Phalerum, a man of reputation among the Greeks as an orator and philosopher. Philadelphus is reported [reading narratur instead of the inappropriate narrantur] to have possessed such great power as to surpass his father Ptolemy. For history relates that he possessed two hundred thousand (200,000) infantrymen, twenty thousand (20,000) cavalry, and even two thousand (2,000) chariots and four hundred (400) elephants, which he was the first to import from Ethiopia. He also had a thousand five hundred (1,500) (p. 560) war galleys of the type now known as Liburnian, and a thousand (1,000) others for the transporting of military provisions. So great was his treasure of gold and silver that he received a yearly revenue from Egypt amounting to fourteen thousand eight hundred (14,800) talents of silver, as well as grain in the amount of five or ten hundred thousand (500,000 or 1,000,000 or 1/2 million to 1 million) artabae (a measure containing three and a half (3 1/2) modii [a modius being about three and a half (3 1/2) pecks]).

11:6. "And at the end of the years they shall be leagued together (or, as Theodotion renders: And after his years they shall be united). And the daughter of the king of the South shall come to the king of the North in order to make friendship, but she shall not obtain strength of arm nor shall her seed endure. And she herself shall be handed over, as well as her young men (Vulgate: youths) who brought her and who were strengthening her in (these) times." As we have already said, it was Seleucus, surnamed Nicanor, who first ruled over Syria. The second king was Antiochus, who was called Soter. The third was Antiochus himself, (705) who was called Theos, that is the Divine. He was the one who waged numerous wars with Ptolemy Philadelphus, who was the second ruler in Egypt, and he also fought with all the Babylonians and the men of the East, and so after many years Ptolemy Philadelphus wished to have done with this vexatious struggle, and so he gave his daughter, named Berenice, in marriage to Antiochus, who had already had by a previous wife, named Laodice, two sons, namely Seleucus, surnamed Callinicus, and the other, Antiochus. And Philadelphus conducted her as far as Pelusium and bestowed countless thousands of gold and silver by way of a dowry, from which circumstance he acquired the nickname of phernophoros or Dowry-giver (dotalis). But as for Antiochus, even though he had said he would regard Berenice as his royal consort and keep Laodice in the status of a concubine, he was finally prevailed upon by his love for Laodice to restore her to the status of queen, along with her children. But she was fearful that her husband might in his fickleness restore Berenice to favor once more, and so she had him put to death by her servants with the use of poison. And she handed over Berenice and the son whom she had born by Antiochus to Icadio and Genneus, princes of Antiochus, and then set up her elder son, Seleucus Callinicus, as king in his father's place. And so this is the matter referred to in this passage, namely that after many years Ptolemy Philadelphus and Antiochus Theos would conclude a friendship, and the daughter of the king of the South, that is Ptolemy, would go to the king of the North, that is Antiochus, in order to cement friendly relations between her father and her husband. And the text says that she will not be able to gain her end, nor shall her posterity remain upon the throne of Syria, but instead both Berenice and the men who had escorted her thither shall be put to death. And also the king, Antiochus, who had strengthened her, that is, through whom she could have obtained the mastery, was killed by his wife's poison.

11:7-9. "And a plant of the bud of her roots shall arise, and he shall come with an army and shall invade the province of the king of the North. And he shall abuse them and shall prevail. And he shall also carry away captive into Egypt their gods and their sculptures and their precious vessels of gold and silver; he shall prevail against the king of the North. And the king of the South shall enter into the kingdom and shall return to his own land." After the murder of Berenice and the death of her father, Ptolemy Philadelphus, in Egypt, her brother, who was also named Ptolemy and surnamed Euergetes, succeeded to the throne as the third of his dynasty, being in fact an offshoot of the same plant and a bud of the same root as she was, inasmuch as he was her (p. 561) brother. He came up with a great army and advanced into the province (706) of the king of the North, that is Seleucus Callinicus, who together with his mother Laodice was ruling in Syria, and abused them, and not only did he seize Syria but also took Cilicia and the remoter regions beyond the Euphrates and nearly all of Asia as well. And then, when he heard that a rebellion was afoot in Egypt, he ravaged the kingdom of Seleucus and carried off as booty forty thousand (40,000) talents of silver, and also precious vessels and images of the gods to the amount of two and a half thousand (2,500). Among them were the same images which Cambyses had brought to Persia at the time when he conquered Egypt. The Egyptian people were indeed devoted to idolatry, for when he had brought back their gods to them after so many years, they called him Euergetes (Benefactor). And he himself retained possession of Syria, but he handed over Cilicia to his friend, Antiochus, that he might govern it, and the provinces beyond the Euphrates he handed over to Xanthippus, another general.

11:10. "And his sons shall be provoked, and they shall assemble a multitude of great armies, and he shall come with haste like a flood. And he shall return and be stirred up, and he shall join battle with his army." After the flight and death of Seleucus Callinicus, his two sons, the Seleucus surnamed Ceraunus and the Antiochus who was called the Great, were provoked by a hope of victory and of avenging their father, and so they assembled an army against Ptolemy Philopator and took up arms. And when the elder brother, Seleucus, was slain in Phrygia in the third year of his reign through the treachery of Nicanor and Apaturius, the army which was in Syria summoned his brother, Antiochus the Great, from Babylon to assume the throne. And so this is the reason why the present passage states that the two sons were provoked and assembled a multitude of very sizable armies. But it implies that Antiochus the Great came by himself from Babylon to Syria, which at that time was held by Ptolemy Philopator, the son of Euergetes and the fourth (4th) king to rule in Egypt. And after he had successfully fought with his generals, or rather had by the betrayal of Theodotius obtained possession of Syria (which had already been held by a succession of Egyptian kings), he became so emboldened by his contempt for Philopator's luxurious manner of life and for the magical arts which he was said to employ, that he took the initiative in attempting an invasion of Egypt itself.

11:11-12. "And the king of the South, being provoked, shall go forth and shall prepare an exceeding great multitude, and a multitude shall be given into his hand. And he shall take (707) a multitude, and his heart shall be lifted up, because (Vulgate: and) he shall cast down many thousands. But he shall not prevail." The Ptolemy surnamed Philopator, having lost Syria through the betrayal of Theodotius, gathered together a very great multitude and launched an invasion against (p. 562) Antiochus the Great, who now bears the title of king of the North, at the region where Egypt borders upon the province of Judaea. For owing to the nature of the region, this locality lies partly to the south and partly to the north. If we speak of Judaea, it lies to the north of Egypt and to the south of Syria. And so when he had joined battle near the town of Raphia at the gateway of Egypt, Antiochus lost his entire army and was almost captured as he fled through the desert. And after he had conceded the loss of Syria, the conflict was finally brought to an end upon the basis of a treaty and certain conditions of peace. And this is what the Scripture means here by the statement that Ptolemy Philopator "shall cast down many thousands" and yet shall not prevail. For he was unable to capture his adversary. The sequel now follows.

11:13-14. "And the king of the North shall return and shall prepare a much greater multitude than before, and in the end of times and years he shall come in haste with a large army and great resources. And in those times many shall rise up against the king of the South." This indicates that Antiochus the Great, who despised the worthlessness of Ptolemy Philopator (for he had fallen desperately in love with a lute-player named Agathoclea and also her brother, retaining Agathocles himself as his concubine and afterwards appointing him as general of Egypt), assembled a huge army from the upper regions of Babylon. And since Ptolemy Philopator was now dead, Antiochus broke his treaty and set his army in motion against Philopator's four-year-old son, who was called Epiphanes. For so great was the dissoluteness and arrogance of Agathoclea, that those provinces which had previously been subjected to Egypt rose up in rebellion, and even Egypt itself was troubled with seditions. Moreover Philip, King of Macedon, and Antiochus the Great made peace with each other and engaged in a common struggle (708) against Agathocles and Ptolemy Epiphanes, on the understanding that each of them should annex to his own dominion those cities of Ptolemy which lay nearest to them. And so this is what is referred to in this passage, which says that many shall rise up against the king of the South, that is, Ptolemy Epiphanes, who was then a mere child.

"Moreover the children of the transgressors of thy people shall lift themselves up, that they may fulfil the vision, and then fall to ruin (Vulgate: and they shall fall to ruin)." During the conflict between Antiochus the Great and the generals of Ptolemy, Judaea, which lay between them, was rent into contrary factions, the one group favoring Antiochus, and the other favoring Ptolemy. Finally the high priest, Onias, fled to Egypt, taking a large number of Jews along with him, and was given by Ptolemy an honorable reception. (A) He then received the region known as Heliopolis, and by a grant of the king, he erected a temple in Egypt like the temple of the Jews, and it remained standing up until the reign of Vespasian, over a period of two hundred (B) and fifty (250) years. But then the city itself (C), which was known (p. 563) as the City of Onias, was destroyed to the very ground because of the war which the Jews had subsequently waged against the Romans. There is consequently no trace of either city or temple now remaining. But as we were saying, countless multitudes of Jews fled to Egypt on the occasion of Onias's pontificate, and the land was filled with a large number from Cyrene as well. For Onias affirmed (A) that he was fulfilling the prophecy written by Isaiah: "There shall be an altar of the Lord in Egypt, and the name of the Lord shall be found in their territories" (Isa. 19:19). And so this is the matter referred to in this passage: "The sons of the transgressors of thy people," who forsook the law of the Lord and wished to offer blood-sacrifices to God in another place than what He had commanded. They would be lifted up in pride and would boast that they were fulfilling the vision, that is, the thing which the Lord had enjoined. But they shall fall to ruin, for both temple and city shall be afterwards destroyed. And while Antiochus held Judaea, a leader of the Ptolemaic party called Scopas (B) Aetholus was sent against Antiochus, and after a bold campaign he took Judaea and took the aristocrats of Ptolemy's party back to Egypt with him on his return. (709)

11:15-16. "And the king of the North shall come, and shall cast up a mound and capture the best fortified cities, and the arms of the South shall not withstand. And his chosen ones shall rise up to resist, and they shall have no strength. And he shall come upon him and do according to his own desire, and there shall be none to stand against his face. And he shall stand in the glorious land and it shall be consumed by his hand." Purposing to retake Judaea and the many cities of Syria, Antiochus joined battle with Scopas, Ptolemy's general, near the sources of the Jordan near where the city now called Paneas was founded, and he put him to flight and besieged him in Sidon together with ten thousand of his soldiers. In order to free him, Ptolemy dispatched the famous generals, Eropus, Menocles and Damoxenus (Vulgate: Damoxeus). Yet he was unable to lift the siege, and finally Scopas, overcome by famine, had to surrender and was sent away with his associates, despoiled of all he had. And as for the statement, "He shall cast up a mound," this indicates that Antiochus is going to besiege the garrison of Scopas in the citadel of Jerusalem for a long time, while the Jews add their exertions as well. And he is going to capture other cities which had formerly been held by the Ptolemaic faction in Syria, Cilicia and Lycia (variant: Lydia). For at that time Aphrodisias, Soloe, Zephrion, Mallos, Anemurium (variant: Anemurum), Selenus, Coracesium, Coricus, Andriace, Lymira, Patara (variant: Patra), Xanthus, and finally Ephesus were all captured. These things are related by both Greek and Roman historians. And as for the statement, "And he shall stand in the glorious land, and it shall be consumed (or, finished) by his hand," the term "glorious land," or, as the Septuagint interprets it, "the land of desire" (that is, in which God takes pleasure) signifies Judaea, and particularly Jerusalem, to which Antiochus pursued those men of Scopas's party who had been honorably (C) received there. Instead of the phrase, "glorious land," as (p. 564) Aquila rendered it, Theodotion simply puts the Hebrew word itself, (D) Sabin; instead of that Symmachus translated it "land of bravery."

11:17-19. "And he shall set his face to come and possess all his kingdom, and he shall make upright conditions with him. And he shall give him the daughter of women, that she may overthrow him" (Vulgate: it). That is to say, the intention is to overthrow him, that is, Ptolemy, or else to overthrow it, that is, his kingdom. Antiochus not only wished to take possession of Syria, Cilicia, and (710) Lycia, and the other provinces which had belonged to Ptolemy's party, but also to extend his empire to Egypt. He therefore used the good offices of Eucles of Rhodes to betroth his daughter, Cleopatra, to young Ptolemy in the seventh year of his reign; and in his thirteenth year she was given to him in marriage, professedly endowed with all of Coele-syria and Judaea as her marriage-portion. By pleonasm she is called a daughter of women, just as the poet says: . . . Thus she spake with her mouth. . . . And with these ears did I drink in her voice. [The second line is quoted from Vergil's Aeneid, iv, 359; the first line I have not been able to locate; neither seems to be particularly appropriate to the context.] "And she shall not stand, neither shall she be for him. And he shall turn his face to the islands and shall capture many; and she shall cause the prince of her reproach to cease, and his reproach shall be turned upon him. And he shall turn his face to the empire of his own land; and he shall stumble and fall, and shall not be found." For he was unable to take possession of Egypt, because Ptolemy Epiphanes and his generals detected the strategem and followed a cautious policy. And besides, Cleopatra inclined more to her husband's side than to her father's. And so he turned his attention to Asia Minor, and by carrying on naval warfare against a large number of islands, he seized Rhodes, Samos, Colophon (variant: Colophonias and Bocla), Phoea and many other islands. But he was opposed by Lucius Scipio Nasica and also his brother, Publius Scipio Africanus, who had vanquished Hannibal. For since the consul Nasica, the brother of Africanus, was of a somewhat sluggish disposition, the Roman senate was unwilling to entrust to him a war against so mighty a king as Antiochus. Africanus therefore offered to assume the post of deputy on a voluntary basis, in order to obviate any damage that his brother might cause. Consequently Antiochus was vanquished and commanded to confine his rule to the other side of the Taurus range. And so he took refuge in Apamia and Susa and advanced to the easternmost cities of his realm [reading regni for regi]. And during a war against the Elymaeans he was destroyed together with his entire army. And so this is what the Scripture refers to in this passage, when it states that he would capture many islands, and yet because of the Roman conqueror he would lose the kingdom of Asia; and that the disgrace he had inflicted would come back upon his own head; and that in the end he would flee from Asia Minor and return to the empire of his own land, and would then stumble and fall, so that his place would not be found.

Verse 20. "And there shall stand up in his place one most vile and unworthy of kingly honor, and in a few days he shall be destroyed, not in rage nor in a battle." The reference is to the Seleucus surnamed Philopator, (711) the son of Antiochus the Great, who during his reign performed no deeds worthy of Syria or of his father, but (p. 565) perished ingloriously without fighting a single battle. Porphyry, however, claims that it was not this Seleucus who is referred to, but rather Ptolemy Epiphanes, who contrived a plot against Seleucus and prepared an army to fight against him, with the result that Seleucus was poisoned by his own generals. They did this because when someone asked Seleucus where he was going to get the financial resources for the great enterprises he was planning, he answered that his financial resources consisted in his friends. When this remark was publicly noised abroad, the generals became apprehensive that he would deprive them of their property and for that reason did him to death by nefarious means. Yet how could Ptolemy be said to rise up in the place of Antiochus the Great, since he did nothing of the sort? This is especially improbable since the Septuagint translated: "And there shall stand up a plant from his root," that is, "of his issue and seed," who should deal a severe blow to the prestige of the empire; "and within a few days he shall be destroyed without wrath or battle." The Hebrews claim that it is Trypho who was intended by the man who was most vile and unworthy of kingly honor, for as the boy-king's guardian he seized the throne for himself.

11:24. "And there shall stand up in his place one despised, and the kingly honor shall not be given him; and he shall come privately and shall obtain the kingdom by fraud. And the arms of the fighter shall be overcome before his face and shall be broken, and the prince of the covenant as well. And after friendly advances he shall deal deceitfully with him, and shall go up and shall overcome with a small people. And he shall enter into rich and prosperous cities, and shall do things which his fathers never did, nor his fathers' fathers. He shall scatter their spoil and their booty and their wealth, and shall undertake plots against the best fortified cities, and shall continue thus for a time." Up to this point the historical order has been followed, and there has been no point of controversy between Porphyry and those of our side (variant: and us). But the rest of the text from here on to the end of the book he interprets as applying to the person of the Antiochus who was surnamed Epiphanes, the brother of Seleucus and the son of Antiochus the Great. He reigned in Syria for eleven years after Seleucus, and he seized Judaea, and it is under his reign that the persecution of God's Law is related, and also the wars of the Maccabees. But those of our persuasion believe all these things are spoken prophetically of the Antichrist who is to arise in the end time. But this factor appears to them as a difficulty for our view, namely the question as to why the prophetic discourse should abruptly cease mention of these great kings and shift from Seleucus to the end of the world. The answer is that in the earlier historical account where mention was made of the Persian kings, only four kings of Persia were presented, following after Cyrus, and (712) many who came in between were simply skipped over, so as to come quickly to Alexander, king of the Macedonians. We hold that it is the practice of Scripture not to relate all details completely, but only to set forth what seems of major importance. Those of our school insist also that since many of the details which we are subsequently to read and explain are appropriate to the person of Antiochus, he is to be regarded as a type of the Antichrist, and those things which happened to him in a preliminary way are to be completely fulfilled in the case of the Antichrist. We hold that it is the habit of Holy Scripture to set forth by means of types the reality of things to come, in conformity with what is said of our Lord and Savior in the Seventy-first (71st) [i.e. Seventy-second (72nd)] Psalm, a psalm which is noted at the beginning as being Solomon's, and yet not all the statements which are made concerning can be applied to Solomon. For certainly he neither endured "together with the sun and before the moon from generation to generation," nor did he hold sway from sea (p. 566) to sea, or from the River unto the ends of the earth; neither did all the nations serve him, nor did his name endure before the sun; neither were all the tribes of earth blessed in him, nor did all races magnify him. But in a partial way these things were set forth in advance, by shadows as it were, and by a mere symbol of the reality, in the person of Solomon, in order that they might be more perfectly fulfilled in our Lord and Savior. And so, just as the Savior had Solomon and the other saints as types of His advent, so also we should believe that the Antichrist very properly had as a type of himself the utterly wicked king, Antiochus, who persecuted the saints and defiled the Temple. Let us therefore follow along with the explanation point by point, and let us briefly observe in the case of each item what it signifies to those of the other school of thought and what it signifies to those of our school, in accordance with each of the two explanations. Our opponents say that the one who was to "stand up in the place of" Seleucus was his brother, Antiochus Epiphanes. The party in Syria who favored Ptolemy would not at first grant him the kingly honor, but he later secured the rule of Syria by a pretense of clemency. And as Ptolemy fought and laid everything waste, his arms were overcome and broken before the face of Antiochus. Now the word arms implies the idea of strength, and therefore also the host of any army is known as a hand [i.e. manus, "hand," may also signify a "band of armed men"]. And not only does the text say that he conquered Ptolemy by fraud, but also the prince of the covenant he overcame by treachery, that is, Judas Maccabaeus. Or else this is what is referred to, that after he had secured peace with Ptolemy and he had become the prince of the covenant, he afterwards devised a plot against him. Now the Ptolemy meant here was not Epiphanes, who was the fifth Ptolemy to reign in Egypt, but Ptolemy (713) Philometor, the son of Antiochus' sister, Cleopatra; and so Antiochus was his maternal uncle. And when after Cleopatra's death Egypt was ruled by Eulaius, the eunuch who was Philometor's tutor, and by Leneus, and they were attempting to regain Syria, which Antiochus had fraudulently seized, warfare broke out between the boy Ptolemy and his uncle. And when they joined battle between Pelusium and Mt. Casius, Ptolemy's generals were defeated. But then Antiochus showed leniency towards the boy, and making a pretense of friendship, he went up to Memphis and there received the crown after the Egyptian manner. Declaring that he was looking out for the lad's interests, he subjected all Egypt to himself with only a small force of men, and he entered into rich and prosperous cities. And so he did things which his father had never done, nor his fathers' fathers. For none of the kings of Syria had ever laid Egypt waste after this fashion and scattered all their wealth. Moreover he was so shrewd that he even overcame by his deceit the well-laid plans of those who were the boy-king's generals. This is the line of interpretation which Porphyry followed, pursuing the lead of (A) Sutorius with much redundancy, discoursing of matters which we have summarized within a brief compass. But the scholars of our viewpoint have made a better and correcter interpretation, stating that the deeds are to be performed by the Antichrist at the end of the world. It is he who is destined to arise from a small nation, that is from the Jewish people, and shall be so lowly and despised that kingly honor will not be granted him. But by means of intrigue and deception he shall secure the government and by him shall the arms of the fighting nation of Rome be overcome and broken. He is to effect this result by pretending to (p. 567) be the prince of the covenant, that is, of the Law and Testament of God. And he shall enter into the richest of cities and shall do what his fathers never did, nor his fathers' fathers. For none of the Jews except the Antichrist has ever ruled over the whole world. And he shall form a design against the firmest resolves of the saints and shall do everything [he wishes] for a time, for as long as God's will shall have permitted him to do these things.

11:25-26. "And his strength and his heart shall be stirred up against the king of the South with a great army. And the king of the South shall be aroused to war with many and very strong auxiliary forces; and they shall not stand, for they shall form designs against him. And they that eat bread with him shall destroy him, and his army shall be crushed, (714) and many shall fall down slain." Porphyry interprets this as applying to Antiochus, who set forth with a great army on a campaign against his sister's son. But the king of the South, that is the generals of Ptolemy, were also roused to war with many and very powerful auxiliary forces, but they could not stand against the fraudulent schemes of Antiochus. For he pretended to be at peace with his sister's son and ate bread with him, and afterwards he took possession of Egypt. But those of our view with greater plausibility interpret all this as applying to the Antichrist, for he is to be born of the Jewish people and come from Babylon, and is first of all going to vanquish the king of Egypt, who is one of the three horns of which we have already spoken earlier.

Verses 27-30. "And the heart of the two kings shall be to do evil, and they speak falsehood at one table, and they shall not prosper, because as yet the end is unto another time. And he shall return into his land with much riches." There is no doubt but what Antiochus did conclude a peace with Ptolemy and ate at the same table with him and devised plots against him, and yet without attaining any success thereby, since he did not obtain his kingdom but was driven out by Ptolemy's soldiers. But it cannot be proved from this set of facts that the statement of this Scripture was ever fulfilled by past history, namely that there were two kings whose hearts were deceitful and who inflicted evil upon each other. Actually, Ptolemy was a mere child of tender years and was taken in by Antiochus' fraud; how then could he have plotted evil against him? And so our party insist that all these things (A) refer to the Antichrist and to the king of Egypt whom he has for the first time overcome. (p133)

"And his heart shall be against the holy covenant, and he shall succeed and return into his own land. At the time appointed he shall return and shall come to the South; but the latter time shall not be like the former. And the galleys shall come upon him, and the Romans, and he shall be dealt a heavy blow." Or, as another has rendered it, "... and they shall threaten him with attack." Both the Greek and the Roman historians relate that after Antiochus had (p. 568) been expelled from Egypt and had gone back once more, he came to Judaea, that is, against the holy covenant, and that he despoiled the Temple and removed a huge amount of gold; and then, having stationed a garrison in the citadel, he returned to his own land. And then two years later he gathered an army against (715) Ptolemy and came to the South. And while he was besieging his two nephews, the brothers of Ptolemy and sons of Cleopatra, at Alexandria, some Roman envoys arrived on the scene, one of whom was Marcus (B) Popilius Laenas. And when he had found Antiochus standing on the shore and had conveyed the senatorial decree to him by which he was ordered to withdraw from those who were friends of the Roman people and to content himself with his own domain, then Antiochus delayed his reply in order to consult with his friends. But Laenas is said to have made a circle in the sand with the staff which he held in his hand, and to have drawn it around the king, saying, "The senate and people of Rome give order for you to make answer in this very spot as to what your decision is." At these words Antiochus was greatly alarmed and said, "If this is the good pleasure of the senate and people of Rome, then I must withdraw." And so he immediately set his army in motion. But he is said to have been dealt a heavy blow, not that he was killed but that he lost all of his proud prestige. As for the Antichrist, there is no question but what he is going to fight against the holy covenant, and that when he first makes war against the king of Egypt, he shall straightway be frightened off by the assistance (C) of the Romans. But these events were typically prefigured under Antiochus Epiphanes, so that this abominable king who persecuted God's people foreshadows the Antichrist, who is to persecute the people of Christ. And so there are many (D) of our viewpoint who think that Domitius Nero [actually Domitius was the name of Nero's father, Ahenobarbus] was the Antichrist because of his outstanding savagery and depravity.

"And he shall return and shall be angry at the covenant of the sanctuary, and he shall succeed; and he shall return and take thought concerning (Vulgate: against) those who have abandoned the covenant of the sanctuary." We read of these matters at greater length in the exploits of the Maccabees (I Macc. 1), where we learn that after the Romans expelled him from Egypt, he came in anger against the covenant of the sanctuary and was welcomed by those who had forsaken the law of God and taken part in the religious rites of the Gentiles. But this is to be more amply fulfilled under the Antichrist, for he shall become angered at the covenant of God and devise plans against those whom he wishes to forsake the law of God. And so Aquila has rendered in a more significant way: (716) "And he shall devise plans to have the compact of the sanctuary abandoned."

11:31. "And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall defile (Vulgate: that (?) they may defile) the sanctuary of strength, and they shall take away the continual sacrifice, and shall place there the abomination unto desolation." Instead of "arms," (E) another writer has rendered it as "seed," so as to imply (p. 569) descendants and progeny. But those of the other viewpoint claim that the persons mentioned are those who were sent by Antiochus two years after he had plundered the Temple in order to exact tribute from the Jews, and also to eliminate the worship of God, setting up an image of Jupiter Olympius in the Temple at Jerusalem, and also statues of Antiochus himself. These are described as the abomination of desolation, having been set up when the burnt offering and continual sacrifice were taken away. But we on our side contend that all these things took place in a preliminary way as a mere type of the Antichrist, who is destined to seat himself in the Temple of God, and make himself out to be as God. The Jews, however, would have us understand these things as referring, not to Antiochus Epiphanes or the Antichrist, but to the Romans, of whom it was earlier stated, "And war galleys shall come," whether Italian or Roman, "and he shall be humbled." Considerably later, says the text, a king, Vespasian, shall emerge from the Romans themselves, who had come to Ptolemy's assistance and threatened Antiochus. It is his arms or descendants who would rise up, namely his son Titus, who with his army would defile the sanctuary and remove the continual sacrifice and devote the temple to permanent desolation. By the terms 'siim' (Siyyim) and 'chethim' (Kittiyim), which we have rendered as "galleys" and "Romans," the Jews would have us understand "Italians" and "Romans."

11:32. "And ungodly men shall deceitfully dissemble against the covenant. But the people who know their God shall prevail and succeed." And in Maccabees we read that there were some who, to be sure, pretended that they were custodians of God's law, and later they came to terms with the Gentiles; yet the others adhered to their religion. But in my opinion this will take place in the time of the Antichrist, when the love of many shall wax cold. It is concerning these people that our Lord says in the Gospel, "Dost thou think that the Son of man, when He comes, will find faith upon the earth?" (Luke 18:8).

11:33. "And they that are learned among the people shall teach many and (717) they shall fall by the sword and by fire and by captivity and by spoil for many days." The books of Maccabees relate the great sufferings the Jews endured at the hands of Antiochus and they stand as a testimony of their triumph; for they endured fire and sword, slavery and rapine, and even the ultimate penalty of death itself for the sake of guarding the law of God. But let no one doubt that these things are going to happen under the Antichrist, when many shall resist his authority and flee away in various directions. The Jews, of course, interpret these things as taking place at the destruction of the Temple, which took place under Vespasian and Titus, and they claim that there were very many of their nation who knew their Lord and were slain for keeping His law.

11:34-35. "And when they shall have fallen, they shall be relieved with a small help; and many shall be joined to them deceitfully. And some of the learned shall fall, that they may be refined as by fire and that they may be chosen and made white even to the time before appointed, because there shall yet be another time." Porphyry thinks that the "little help" was Mattathias of the village of (variant: mountain of) Modin, for he rebelled against the generals of Antiochus and attempted to preserve the worship of the true God (I Macc. 2). He says he is called a little help because Mattathias was (p. 570) slain in battle; and later on his son Judas, who was called Maccabaeus, also fell in the struggle; and the rest of his brothers were likewise taken in by the deceit of their adversaries. Consult the books of Maccabees for the details. And all these events took place, he asserts, for the purpose of testing and choosing out the saints, that they might be made white until the time before appointed, inasmuch as victory was deferred until another time. Our writers, however, would have it understood that the small help shall arise under the reign of the Antichrist, for the saints shall gather together to resist him, and afterwards a great number of the learned shall fall. And this shall take place in order that they may be refined as by fire in the furnace, and that they may be made white and may be chosen out, until the time before determined arrives --for the true victory shall be won at the coming of Christ. Some of the Jews understand these things as applying to the princes Severus and Antoninus, who esteemed the Jews very highly. But others understand the Emperor Julian as the one referred to; for after they had been oppressed by Gaius Caesar and had steadfastly endured such suffering in the afflictions of their captivity, Julian rose up as one who pretended love for the Jews, promising that he would even offer sacrifice in their temple. They were to enjoy a little help from him, and a great number of the Gentiles (718) were to join themselves to their party, although falsely and insincerely. For it would only be for the sake of their own idolatrous religion that they would pretend friendship to the Jews. And they would do this in order that those who were approved might be made manifest. For the time of their true salvation and help will be the coming of the Christ; for the Jews mistakenly imagine (A) that he (i.e., their Messiah) is yet to come, for they are going to receive the Antichrist (when he comes) (I Cor. 11).

Verse 36. "And the king shall do according to his will, and he shall be lifted up and shall magnify himself against every god; and he shall speak arrogant words against the God of gods, and shall manage successfully until the wrath be accomplished (Vulgate: indignation); for the determination is made." Or else, as another has translated it: "for in him shall be the consummation." The Jews believe that this passage has reference to the Antichrist, alleging that after the small help of Julian a king is going to rise up who shall do according to his own will and shall lift himself up against all that is called god, and shall speak (B) arrogant words against the God of gods. He shall act in such a way as to sit in the Temple of God and shall make himself out to be God, and his will shall be prospered until the wrath of God is fulfilled, for in him the consummation will take place. We too understand this to refer to the Antichrist. But Porphyry and the others who follow his lead suppose the reference to be to Antiochus Epiphanes, pointing out that he did raise himself up against the worship of God, and pushed his arrogance so far as to command his own statue to be set up in the Temple in Jerusalem. And as for the subsequent statement, "And he shall manage successfully until the wrath be accomplished, for the consummation shall be in him," they understand it to mean that his power will endure until such time as God becomes angry at him and orders him to be killed. For indeed Polybius and Diodorus, who composed the histories of the (C) Bibliothecae (Libraries), relate that Antiochus not only took measures against the God of Judaea, but also was impelled by an all-consuming avarice to attempt the plunder of the temple of (D) Diana in Elymais, because it was so wealthy. But he was so beset by the temple guard (p. 571) and the neighboring populace, and also by certain fearful apparitions, that he became demented and finally died of illness. And the historians record that this befell him because he had attempted to plunder the temple of Diana. But we for our part maintain that even though this thing befell him, it did so because he had perpetrated great cruelty upon the saints of God and had defiled His Temple. For we ought not to suppose that it was because of something he (719) only attempted to do but from which he then desisted by an act of repentance, but rather because of something he actually did he was punished.

Verses 37-39. "And he shall make no account of the god of his fathers, and he shall be engrossed in lust for women; nor shall he have regard for any of the gods, for he shall rise up against everything. But he shall worship the god Maozim in his place, and a god which his fathers knew not shall he worship with gold and silver and precious stones and things of great price. And he shall take measures to fortify Maozim, together with a strange god whom (A) he has acknowledged. And he shall increase glory and shall grant them power over many and shall divide the land as a free gift." Instead of our rendering, the Septuagint translates: "...and he will not be subject to the lusts of women." And again, instead of "the god Maozim (m'dym) [the Massoretic text has md'uzziym]," as the Hebrew has it, Aquila renders, "the God of mighty powers (fortitudinum)," whereas the Septuagint says,

"the most mighty God." But because there is an ambiguity of position in the Hebrew original of the phrase we rendered by, "And he shall be engrossed in lust for women," Aquila renders it simply word for word (in Greek): "And he shall have no understanding with regard to the god of his fathers, and (B) in regard to the desire of women and in regard to every god he shall have no understanding"; that is (in Latin): "And concerning the god of his fathers he shall not understand, and concerning the lust for women, and concerning every god he shall not understand." There are two interpretations current concerning these words, that he cherished lust for women, and that he cherished no lust for them. If we read it one way and understand it as an 'apo koinou' [the use of a common word in two different clauses]: "And he shall have no knowledge concerning a lust for women," then it is more easily applied to the Antichrist; i.e., that he will assume a pretense of chastity in order to deceive many. But if we read it in this fashion: "And occupied with lust for women," understanding, "...he shall be," then it is more appropriate to the character of Antiochus. For he is said to have been an egregious voluptuary, and to have become such a disgrace to the dignity of kingship through his lewdness and seductions, that he publicly had intercourse with actresses and harlots, and satisfied his sexual passions in the presence of the people. As for the god Maozim, Porphyry has offered an absurd explanation, asserting that Antiochus's generals set up a statue of Jupiter in the village of Modin, from which came Mattathias and his sons; moreover they compelled the Jews to offer blood-sacrifices to it, that is, to the god of Modin. The next statement, ". . .and he shall worship a god whom his fathers did not know" is more appropriate to the Antichrist than to Antiochus. For we read that Antiochus held to the religion of the (720) idols of Greece and compelled the Jews and Samaritans to worship his own gods. Likewise in regard to the statement, "...and he shall take measures to fortify Maozim, together with a strange god whom he has acknowledged; and he shall increase glory and grant them power over many, and shall divide the land as a free gift," Theodotion has interpreted (p. 572) as follows: "And he shall conduct these affairs so as to fortify garrisons with a strange god, and with them he shall manifest and increase glory; and he shall cause them to bear rule over many and divide up the land as a free gift." Symmachus rendered it "refuges" instead of "garrisons." Porphyry explained this as meaning that the man is going to fortify the citadel in Jerusalem and will station garrisons in the rest of the cities, and will instruct the Jews to worship a strange god, which doubtless means Jupiter. And displaying the idol to them, he will persuade them that they should worship it. Then he will bestow upon the deluded both honor and very great glory, and he shall deal with the rest who have borne rule in Judaea, and apportion estates unto them in return for their falsehood, and shall distribute gifts. The Antichrist likewise is going to make lavish bestowal of many rewards upon those whom he has deceived, and will divide up the land to his soldiery. And those whom he will not be able to subject to himself by fear he will subject through their cupidity.

11:40,-41. "And at the predetermined time the king of the South shall war against him, and the king of the North shall come against him like a tempest with chariots, with horsemen and with a great navy; and he shall invade lands and destroy them and pass through. And he shall enter into the glorious land, and many shall fall." Theodotion rendered: ". . .and many shall be enfeebled." And according to Aquila, the many that fell are to be understood as cities or districts or provinces. This too is referred by Porphyry to Antiochus, on the ground that in the eleventh year of his reign he warred for a second time against his nephew, Ptolemy Philometor. For when the latter heard that Antiochus had come, he gathered many thousands of soldiery. But Antiochus invaded many lands like a mighty tempest, with his chariots and horsemen and large navy, and laid everything waste as he passed through. And he came to the glorious land, that is, Judaea, which Symmachus rendered as "land of strength." In place of this Theodotion used the Hebrew word itself, Sabai (variants: Sabam and Saba) (sby). And Antiochus used the ruins of the wall of the city to fortify the citadel, (721) and thus he continued on his way to Egypt. But those of our viewpoint refer these details also to the Antichrist, asserting that he shall first fight against the king of the South, or Egypt, and shall afterwards conquer

Libya and Ethiopia, for these constitute the three broken horns about which we read previously. And then he shall come to the land of Israel, and many cities or provinces shall be given into his hands. "And only these cities shall be saved from his hands: Edom, Moab, and the principality of the children of Ammon." They say that in his haste to fight Ptolemy, the king of the South, Antiochus left untouched the Idumaeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, who dwelt to the side of Judaea, lest he should make Ptolemy the stronger by engaging in some other campaign. The Antichrist also is going to leave Idumaea, Moab, and the children of Ammon (i.e., Arabia) untouched, for the saints are to flee thither to the deserts.

11:42-43. "And he shall lay his hand upon the lands, and the land of Egypt shall not escape; and he shall have power over the treasures of gold and of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt. And likewise he shall pass through [reading transibit for transivit] (p. 573) the Libyans (Vulgate: Libya and Ethiopia) and the Ethiopians." We read that Antiochus partially accomplished this. But as for the added detail, "He shall pass through the Libyans and Ethiopians," our school insists that this is more appropriate to the Antichrist. For Antiochus never held Libya, which most writers understand to be North Africa, nor Ethiopia; unless, of course, his capture of Egypt involved the harassment of those provinces of Egypt which lay in the same general region as Ethiopia, and which lay as distant neighbors to it, on the other side of the deserts. Hence there is no assertion of his conquering them, but only the statement that he passed through the Libyans and the Ethiopians.

11:44-45. "And tidings from the East and from the North shall trouble him. And he shall come thither with a great host to destroy and slay very many. And he shall pitch his tent in Apedno between (A) the two seas, upon the famous and holy mountain; and he shall come even unto its summit, and none shall help him." *Even for this passage Porphyry has some nebulous application to Antiochus, asserting that in his conflict with the Egyptians, Libyans, and Ethiopians, passing through them he was to hear of wars which had been stirred up against him in the North and the East. Thence he was to turn back and overcome the resistance of the Aradians [Aradus was an island off the coast of Phoenicia], and lay waste the entire province along the coastline of Phoenicia. (722) And then he was to proceed without delay against Artaxias, the king of Armenia, who was moving down from the regions of the East, and having slain a large number of his troops, he would pitch his tent in the place called Apedno which is located between the two broadest rivers, the Tigris and the Euphrates. But it is impossible to state upon what famous and holy mountain he took his seat, after he had proceeded to that point. After all, it cannot be shown that he took up his seat between two seas, and it would be foolish to interpret the two seas as being the two rivers of Mesopotamia. But Porphyry gets around this famous mountain by following the rendering of Theodotion, who said: ". . . upon the sacred Mount Saba between the two seas." And even though he supposes that Saba was the name of a mountain in Armenia or Mesopotamia, he cannot explain why it was holy. [The Massoretic text has the common noun, sebiy, which means "beauty" or "honor," and gives no room for any proper noun, Saba.] To be sure, if we assume the right of making things up, we can add the detail which Porphyry fails to mention, that the mountain, forsooth, was called holy, because it was consecrated to idols in conformity with the superstition of the Armenians. The account then says: "And he shall come even unto the summit of that same mountain," --supposedly in the province of Elam, which is the easternmost Persian area. And there when he purposed to plunder the temple of Diana, which contained countless sums of money, he was routed by the barbarians, for they honored that shrine with a remarkable veneration. And Antiochus, being overcome with grief, died in Tabes, a town in Persia. By use of a most artificial line of argument Porphyry has concocted these details as an affront to us; but even though he were able to prove that these statements applied to Antiochus instead of the Antichrist, what does that matter [reading quid instead of the inappropriate qui] to us? For do we not on the basis of all the passages of Scripture prove the coming of Christ and the falsehood of the Antichrist? For assume that these things did refer to Antiochus, what injury does that inflict upon our* religious faith? Is it not true that in the earlier vision also, (p. 574) which contained a prophecy fulfilled in Antiochus, there is some reference to the Antichrist? And so let Porphyry banish his doubts and stick to manifest facts. Let him explain the meaning of that rock which was hewn from the mountain without hands, and which grew to be a great mountain and filled the earth, and which smashed to pieces the fourfold image. And let him say who that Son of man is who is going to come with clouds and stand before the Ancient of Days and have bestowed upon him a kingdom which shall never come to an end, and who is going to be served by all [reading omnes for omnem] nations, tribes, and language-groups. (723) Porphyry ignores these things which are so very clear and maintains that the prophecy refers to the Jews, although we are well aware that they are to this very day in a state of bondage. And he claims that the person who composed the book under the name of Daniel made it all up in order to revive the hopes of his countrymen. Not that he was able to foreknow all of future history, but rather he records events that had already taken place. Thus Porphyry confines himself to false claims in regard to the final vision, substituting rivers for the sea, and positing a famous and holy mountain, Apedno (B) even though he is unable to furnish any historical source in which he has read about it. Those of our party, on the other hand, explain the final chapter of this vision as relating to the Antichrist, and stating that during his war against the Egyptians, Libyans, and Ethiopians, in which he shall smash three of the ten horns, he is going to hear that war has been stirred up against him in the regions of the North and East. Then he shall come with a great host to crush and slay many people, and shall pitch his tent in Apedno near Nicopolis, which was formerly called Emmaus, at the beginning of the mountainous region in the province of Judaea. Finally he shall make his way thence to go up to the Mount of Olives and ascend to the area of Jerusalem; and this is what the Scripture means here: "And when he has pitched his tent...." at the foothills of the mountainous province between two seas. These are, of course, that which is now called the Dead Sea on the east, and the Great Sea on the shore of which lie Caesarea, Joppa, Ashkelon, and (C) Gazae. Then he shall come up to the summit thereof, that is of the mountainous province, or the apex of the Mount of Olives, which of course is called famous because our Lord and Savior ascended from it to the Father. And no one shall be able to assist the Antichrist as the Lord vents his fury upon him. Our school of thought insists that Antichrist is going to perish in that spot from which the Lord ascended to heaven. 'Apedno' is a compound word, which upon analysis yields the meaning of "his throne" (the Greek thronou autou), or (in Latin) "thy throne" [or, if tui is a misprint for sui, his throne]. And the meaning is that he shall pitch his tent (D) and his throne between the seas upon the famous, holy mountain. Symmachus translated this passage (724) as follows (in Greek): "And he shall stretch out the tents of his stable between the seas in the holy mountain of power, and he shall come even unto its height"; which means in Latin: "And he shall stretch forth the pavilions of his cavalry between the seas, upon the holy mountain of power, and shall come even unto the apex of the mountain." Theodotion (p. 575) renders it: "And he shall pitch his tent in (A) Aphedanum between the seas in the holy Mount Saba, and he shall come to the region thereof." Aquila says: "And he shall set up the tent of his headquarters in (Greek) Aphadanon between the seas, in the glorious, holy mountain, and he shall come even unto its border." Only the Septuagint frees itself from the problem about the name by translating: "And he shall establish his tent there between the seas and the holy mountain of desire and he shall come to the hour of his final end." Adhering to this rendering, Apollinarius omits all mention of the name Apedno. I have gone into this matter at some length not only for the purpose of exposing Porphyry's misrepresentation (for either he was ignorant of all these matters or else he pretended not to know them) but also to show the difficulty in Holy Scripture. And yet men who altogether lack experience lay special claim to understanding it apart from the grace of God and the scholarship of preceding generations. Now it should be observed that Hebrew has no letter P, but uses instead the letter phe, which has the force of the Greek phi. [An interesting observation, but rather puzzling. Ordinarily the Hebrew pe is spirantized only after a vowel sound, and is hard the rest of the time. It is hard and doubled in this particular word, 'appadnow, according to the Massoretic pointing.] It is simply that in this particular place the Hebrews write the letter (B) phe, yet it is to be pronounced as p. But that the Antichrist is going to come to the summit of the holy, famous mountain and perish there is a fact upon which Isaiah expatiates more fully, saying: "The Lord shall in the holy mountain cast down the face of the ruler of the darkness which is over all races, and him who rules over all peoples, and the (C) anointing which is applied against (variant: with which he was anointed against) all the nations." [This rather incoherent quotation varies very considerably from Jerome's own rendering of Isaiah 25:7 in the Vulgate, and also from the Septuagint rendering. The editors were apparently so dubious about it that they failed to give the citation at all.]

12:1-3. "But at that time shall Michael rise up, the great prince, who stands for the children of thy people, and a time shall come such as never occurred from the time that nations began to exist even unto that time. And at that time shall thy people be saved, even everyone who shall be found written in the book. And many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some unto life everlasting, and others unto reproach, that they may behold it always. But those who are instructed shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that instruct many as to righteousness, as the stars for all eternity." Up until this point Porphyry somehow managed to maintain his position and impose upon the credulity of the naive [reading imperitis for imperitus] among our adherents as well as the poorly educated among his own. But what can he say of this chapter, in which is described the resurrection of the dead, with one group being revived for eternal life and the other group for eternal disgrace? He cannot even specify who the people were under Antiochus who shone like the brightness of the firmament, and those others who shone like the stars for all eternity. But what will pigheadedness not resort to? Like some bruised serpent, he lifts up his head as he is about to die, and pours forth his venom upon those who are themselves at the point of death. This too, he declares, was written with reference to Antiochus, for after he had invaded Persia, he left his army with Lysias, who was in charge of Antioch and Phoenicia, for the purpose of warring against the Jews and destroying their city of Jerusalem. All these details are related by Josephus, the author of the history of the Hebrews. Porphyry contends that the tribulation was such as had never previously occurred, and that a time came along such as had never been from the time that races began to exist even unto that time. But when victory was bestowed upon them, and the generals of Antiochus had been slain, and Antiochus himself had died in Persia, the people of Israel experienced salvation, (p. 576) even all who had been written down in the book of God, that is, those who defended the law with great bravery. Contrasted with them were those who proved to be transgressors of the Law and sided with the party of Antiochus. Then it was, he asserts, that these guardians of the Law, who had been, as it were, slumbering in the dust of the earth and were cumbered with a load of afflictions, and even hidden away, as it were, in the tombs of wretchedness, rose up once more from the dust of the earth to a victory un hoped for, and lifted up their heads, rising up to everlasting life, even as the transgressors rose up to everlasting disgrace. But those masters and teachers who possessed a knowledge of the Law shall shine like the heaven, and those who have exhorted the more backward peoples to observe the rites of God shall blaze forth after the fashion of the stars for all eternity. He also adduces the historical account concerning the Maccabees, in which it is said that many Jews under the leadership of Mattathias and Judas Maccabaeus fled to the desert and hid in caves and holes in the rocks, and came forth again after the victory (I Macc. 2.) These things, then, were foretold in metaphorical language (726) as if it concerned a resurrection of the dead. But the more reasonable understanding of the matter is that in the time of the Antichrist there shall occur a tribulation such as there has never been since nations began to exist. For assume that Lysias won the victory instead of being defeated, and that he completely crushed the Jews instead of their conquering; certainly such tribulation would not have been comparable to that of the time when Jerusalem was captured by the Babylonians, the Temple was destroyed, and all the people were led off into captivity. And so after the Antichrist is crushed and destroyed by the breath of the Savior's mouth, the people written in God's book shall be saved; and in accordance with the merits of each, some shall rise up unto eternal life and others unto eternal shame. But the teachers shall resemble the very heavens, and those who have instructed others shall be compared to the brightness of the stars. For it is not enough to know wisdom unless one also instructs others; and the tongue of instruction which remains silent and edifies no one else can receive no reward for labor accomplished. This passage is expressed by Theodotion and the Vulgate edition [of the Septuagint] in the following fashion: "And those who understand shall shine forth like the radiance of the firmament, and many of the righteous like the stars forever and ever." Many people often ask whether a learned saint and an ordinary saint shall both enjoy the same reward and one and the same dwelling-place in heaven. Well then, the statement is made here, according to Theodotion's rendering, that the learned will resemble the very heavens, whereas the righteous who are without learning are only compared to the brightness of the stars. And so the difference between learned godliness and mere godly rusticity shall be the difference between heaven and the stars.

12:4. "But Thou, O Daniel, shut up the words and seal the book, even to the time appointed. Many shall pass over, and knowledge shall be manifold." He who had revealed manifold truth to Daniel now signifies that the things he has said are matters of secrecy, and he orders him to roll up the scroll containing his words and set a seal upon the book, with the result that many shall read it and inquire (p. 577) as to its fulfilment in history, differing in their opinions because of its great obscurity. And as for the statement, "Many shall pass over" or "go through," this indicates that it will be read by many people. For it is a familiar expression to say: "I have gone through a book," or, "I have passed through an historical account." Indeed this is the idea which Isaiah also expressed in regard to the obscurity of his own book: "And the sayings of that book shall be like the words of a book that is sealed. And if they shall give it to an illiterate man, saying, 'Read it,' he will reply, (727) 'I do not know how to read.' But if they give it to a man who does know how to read and say, 'Read the book,' he will reply, 'I cannot read it, because it is sealed up'" (Isa. 39:11). Also in the Revelation of John, there is a book seen which is sealed with seven seals inside and outside. And when no one proves able to break its seals, John says, "I wept sore; and a voice came to me, saying, 'Weep not: behold the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, has prevailed to open the book and break its seals'" (Rev. 5:4). But that book can be opened by one who has learned the mysteries of Scripture and understands its hidden truths, and its words which seem dark because of the greatness of the secrets they contain. He it is who can interpret the parables and transmute the letter which killeth into the spirit which quickeneth.

12:5-6. "And I Daniel looked, and behold as it were two other persons were standing, one on this side upon the river-bank, and the other upon that side, on the other bank of the river. And I said to the man that was clothed in linen, that stood upon the waters of the river, 'How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?'" Daniel saw two angels standing on either side upon the bank of the river of Babylon. Although it is mentioned here without specifying its name, I suppose that in line with the preceding vision it would be the Tigris River, which is called Eddecel (H-d-q-l) in Hebrew. Yet Daniel does not address his question to those who were standing upon either bank, but rather to the one whom he had seen at the beginning, who was clothed in vesture of linen or byssus, which is called baddim (b-d-y-m) in Hebrew. And this same angel was standing upon the waters of the river of Babylon, treading upon them with his feet. From this fact we understand that the former pair of angels whom he saw standing upon the bank and did not question or deem worthy of interrogation were the angels of the Greeks and Persians. But this first angel was the gracious one who had presented Daniel's prayers before God during the twenty-one days while the angel of the Persians was opposing him. And Daniel was asking him (variant: asks him) about these wonders spoken of in the present vision, as to the time when they should be accomplished. Porphyry, of course, assigns this time to the period of Antiochus, after his usual fashion, whereas we assign it to the time of Antichrist.

12:7. "And I heard the man that was clothed in linen, that stood upon the waters of the river: when he had lifted up his right hand and his left hand to heaven and had sworn by Him that liveth (728) forever, that it should be unto a time and times and half a time." Porphyry interprets a time and times and half a time to mean three and a half (3 1/2) years; and we for our part do not deny that this accords with the idiom of Sacred Scripture. For we read in an earlier section (p. 578) that seven (7) times passed over Nebuchadnezzar, that is, the seven (7) years of his existence as a wild beast. The expression was also used in the vision of the four (4) beasts, the lion, the bear, the leopard, and the (p149) other beast whose name was not specified but which represented the kingdom of the Romans. Right afterwards the statement is made concerning the Antichrist that (A) he will humble kings and utter speeches against the Exalted One and will crush the saints of the Most High; moreover he will imagine that he can alter times and laws. And the saints shall be turned over to his power unto a time and times and half a time. And the court will sit for judgment, in order that power may be removed and utterly broken and vanish away until the very end. And clearly the reference is to the coming of Christ and the saints when it is said: "But kingdom and power and the greatness of the kingdom which lies beneath the whole heaven shall be bestowed upon the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom; and all the kings shall serve and obey Him." If therefore the earlier references which were plainly written concerning the Antichrist are assigned by Porphyry to Antiochus and to the three and a half (3 1/2) years during which he asserts the Temple was deserted (cf. Verse 1, above), then he is under obligation to prove that the next statement, "His kingdom is eternal, and all kings shall serve and obey him," likewise pertains to Antiochus, or else (as he himself conjectures) to the people of the Jews. But it is perfectly apparent that such an argument will never stand. We read in the books of Maccabees --and Josephus also concurs in the same opinion (Book 11, chap. 10)-- that the Temple in Jerusalem lay defiled for three (3) years, and under Antiochus Epiphanes an idol of Jupiter stood within it (B); that is to say, from Chislew, the ninth (9th) month, of the one hundred forty-fifth (145th) year of the Macedonian rule until the ninth (9th) month of the one hundred forty-eighth (148th) year, which amounts to three (3) years. But under the Antichrist it is not stated that the desolation and overthrow of the holy Temple shall endure for three (3) years, but for three years and a half (3 1/2), that is, one thousand two hundred and ninety (1,290) days. "And when the scattering of the band (729) of the holy people shall be accomplished, all these things shall be fulfilled." When it is stated that the people of God shall have been scattered --either under the persecution of Antiochus, as Porphyry claims, or of Antichrist, which we deem to be closer to fact-- at that time shall all these things be fulfilled.

12:8-10. "And I heard, and understood not. And I said, 'O my lord, what shall happen after these things?' And he said, 'Go, Daniel, for the words are shut up and sealed until the time (C) of the end. Many shall be chosen and made white and shall be tried as fire; and the wicked shall deal wickedly. And none of the wicked shall understand, but the learned shall understand.'" The prophet wished to comprehend what he had seen, or rather, what he had heard, and he desired to understand the reality of the things to come. For he had heard of the various wars of kings, and of battles between them, and a detailed narrative of events; but he had not heard the names of the individual persons involved. And if the prophet himself heard and did not understand, what will be the case with those men who presumptuously expound a book which has been sealed, and that too unto the time of the end, a book which is (p. 579) shrouded with many obscurities? But he comments that when the end comes, the ungodly will lack comprehension, whereas those who are learned in the teaching of God will be able to understand. "For wisdom will not enter the perverted soul, nor can it impart itself to a body which is subject to sins." [The editors do not cite the source of this quotation [which is Wisdom of Solomon 1:4].]

12:11. "And from the time that the continual sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination unto desolation shall be set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days." Porphyry asserts that these one thousand two hundred and ninety (1290) days were fulfilled in the desolation of the Temple in the time of Antiochus, and yet both Josephus and the Book of Maccabees, as we have said before, record that it lasted for only three (3) years. From this circumstance it is apparent that the three and a half (3 1/2) years are spoken of in connection with the time of the Antichrist, for he is going to persecute the saints for three and a half (3 1/2) years, or one thousand two hundred and ninety (1290) days, and then he shall meet his fall on the famous, holy mountain. And so from the time of the removal of the 'endelekhismos', which we have translated as "continual sacrifice," i.e., the time when the Antichrist shall obtain possession of the world (variant: the city) and forbid the worship (A) of God, unto the day of his death the three and a half (3 1/2) years, or one thousand two hundred and ninety days (1290), shall be fulfilled. (730).

12:12. "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh unto a thousand three hundred and thirty-five days." He means that he is blessed who waits for forty-five (45) days beyond the predetermined number, for it is within that period that our Lord and Savior is to come in His glory. But the reason for the forty-five (45) days of inaction after the slaying of the Antichrist is a matter which rests in the knowledge of God; unless, of course, we say that the rule of the saints is delayed in order that their patience may be tested. Porphyry explains this passage in the following way, that the forty-five (45) days beyond the one thousand two hundred and ninety (1290) signify the interval of victory over the generals of Antiochus, or the period when Judas Maccabaeus fought with bravery and cleansed the Temple and broke the idol to pieces, offering blood-sacrifices in the Temple of God. He might have been correct in this statement if the Book of Maccabees had recorded that the Temple was polluted over a period of three and a half (3 1/2) years instead of just three (3) years (1st Mac. 4).

12:13. "But thou, (B) Daniel, go thy way until the time appointed, and take thy rest (Vulgate: thou shalt rest) and thou shalt stand in thy lot unto the end of the days." Instead of this Theodotion translated it: "But go thy way and take thy rest, and thou shalt rise up again in thy turn at the end of the days." From this remark it is demonstrated that the whole context of the prophecy has to do with the resurrection of all the dead, (p. 580) at the time when the prophet also is to rise. And it is vain for Porphyry to claim that all these things which were spoken concerning the Antichrist under the type of Antiochus actually refer to Antiochus alone. As we have already mentioned, these false claims have been answered at greater length by Eusebius of Caesarea, Apollinarius of Laodicea, and partially also by that very able writer, the martyr Methodius; and anyone who knows of these things can look them up in their writings. (C) Thus far we have been reading Daniel in the Hebrew edition; but the remaining matter to the end of the book has been translated from Theodotion's edition.

Chapters 13-14: 13:1-2. "Now there was a man that dwelt in Babylon whose name was Joakim; and he took a wife whose name was Susanna, the daughter of Helcias, a very beautiful woman and one who feared the Lord" (Vulgate: God). Having expounded to the best of my ability the contents of the book of Daniel according to the Hebrew, I shall briefly set forth the comments of Origen concerning the stories of Susanna and of Bel contained (731) in the Tenth Book of his Stromata. These remarks are from him (D) and one may observe them in the appropriate sections (i.e., of Origen's work)..... 13:54 ff. "'Tell me under which tree thou sawest them conversing with each other.' And he answered, 'Under the mastic tree.' And Daniel said to him, 'Well hast thou lied against thine own head; for behold, the angel of God, having received His sentence from Him, shall cleave thee in twain.' And a little while later the other elder said, 'Under the holm tree.' And Daniel said to him, 'Well hast thou lied against thine own head; but the angel of the Lord waiteth with a sword to sever thee in twain.'" Since the Hebrews reject the story of Susanna, asserting that it is not contained in the Book of Daniel, we ought to investigate carefully the names of the trees, the 'skhinos' and the 'prinos', which the Latins interpret as "holm-oak" and "mastic-tree," and see whether they exist among the Hebrews and what their derivation is --for example, as "cleavage" [Latin (scissio) is derived from "mastic" [Greek skhinos], and "cutting" or "sawing" [Latin sectio, serratio] is derived from "holm tree" [Greek prinos, which resembles the Greek word for "to saw": prio] in the language of the Greeks. But if no such derivation can be found, then we too are of necessity forced to agree with the verdict of those who claim that this chapter [Greek pericope] was originally composed in Greek, because it contains Greek etymology not found in Hebrew. [That is, because Daniel twice makes a sinister wordplay based upon the Greek names of these two trees, and a similar pun could not be made out from the Hebrew names, if any, of these trees, the story itself could never have been composed in Hebrew.] But if anyone can show (A) that the derivation of the ideas of cleaving and severing from the names of the two trees in question is valid in Hebrew, then we may accept this scripture also as canonical. (p156) 14:... This objection is easily solved by asserting that this particular story is not contained in the Hebrew of the Book of Daniel. If, however, anyone should be able to prove that it belongs (B) in the canon, then we should be obliged to seek out some answer to this objection."

[Jerome's additional Notes & all of Migne's Notes are omitted in these selections.] }}

2. Calvin.

ComBkProphtDaniel.v1-2.JCalvin.TrOrLatFr.etc.TMyersEdin.CTS.1652.1853,as Commentaries on the Book the Prophet Daniel. Volume 1 & 2. by John (Jean) Calvin. Now 1st Translated from the Original Latin & Collated with French Version, & Dissertations, New Translation of the Text, & Copious Indices, by Thomas Myers, M.A., Vicar of Sheriff-Hutton, Yorkshire. Edinburgh: Printed for the Calvin Translation Society. 1652.1853.

Translator's Preface (T.M.):

Arrangement of the Present Work: The Contents of these Volumes are as follow: The First Volume contains a translation of Calvin's elaborate Address to All the Faithful in France; and also of his Preface to his Lectures. Their translation is continued to the end of the Sixth Chapter, which closes the Historical portion of the Book. Dissertations explanatory of the subject-matter of the Commentary close the Volume, containing various historical, critical, and exegetical remarks, illustrating the Sacred Text as expounded by our Reformer. The chief of them are as follow, viz.: Chapters 1-6; 7-12.

1st Volume: [Historical]:

Chapter I:

Date of JEHOIAKIM'S Reign. NEBUCHADNEZZAR: one King or two? His Ancestors & Successors. CHALDEANS. Three Children [Daniel's Companions.]. CORESH —was he Cyrus the Great?

Chapter II:

Dream. Image. Stone out without hands.

Chapter III:

Statue at DURA. Magistrates. Musical Instruments. SON or Goo.

Chapter IV:

Watcher. Madness. Edict of Praise.

Chapter V:

BELSHAZZAR and the Feast. Queen. Handwriting. MEDES AND PERSIANS.

Darius the Mede. Capture of BABYLON.

Chapter VI:

Three Presidents. King's Decease. Prolongation of DANIEL's Life.

2nd Volume: proceeds with the Translation of the remaining Chapters (7-12), which are the peculiarly 'Prophetic' portion of the Book; and the interest which every sound Exposition of these Prophecies has always excited throughout the Theological world, will render the following Addenda acceptable to the reader.

I. Dissertations Explanatory of Last Six Chapters of Daniel, fully elucidating all important questions.

II. CONNECTED Translation of Calvin's version, illustrated by the peculiar words & phrases of his Commentary.

III. Summary of Historical & Prophetical Portions of the Book, according to Calvin's view of their contents.

IV. Notice of some Ancient Codices & Versions.

V. List of Most Valuable Ancient & Modern British & Foreign Expositions of Daniel, with concise Epitomes of the contents of the most important.

VI. Index of Scriptural Passages Quoted in Lectures.

VII. Copious Index of Chief Words & Subjects treated in these Volumes.

Analysis of the Contents of the Book of Daniel. There are Two Main Divisions, —I. 'Historical Portion'. —II. 'Prophetical Portion'. Each Occupies Six Chapters.

I. 'Historical Portion'. Chap. 1-6. Sect.:

1. Captivity of King Jehoiakim about B.C. 607 —treatment of Daniel & his three companions —their superiority as they stood before the king. (Chap. 1)

2. King Nebuchadnezzar's dream —forgotten —submitted to the magicians —their failure & destruction —Daniel's proposal & success —secret revealed to him & communicated to the king —image described and explained —four kingdoms —elevation of Daniel & his companions to high honour, about B.C. 603. (Chap. 2)

3. Golden image on the Plains of Dura —the accusation against Daniel's three companions —their reply to the king —their condemnation to the burning fiery furnace —their preservation —king's astonishment —his proclamation & promotion of the three confessors over the province of Babylon, about B.C. 580. (Chap. 3)

4. Nebuchadnezzar's confession of the power of the Most High —his dream respecting the Tree, the Watcher, & the Holy One —Daniel's interpretation —its accomplishment —king driven from among men —his madness, & his restoration to reason & re-establishment in his kingdom, about B.C. 570-563. (Chap. 4)

5. Impious feast of Belshazzar —handwriting —magicians' ignorance —Daniel's interpretation —its fulfilment —Belshazzar slain —Darius the conqueror, about B.C. 538. (Chap. 5)

6. One hundred and twenty (120) princes set over the kingdom —three (3) presidents —unalterable decree —Daniel's habit of prayer continued —his accusation and condemnation to the lions' den —his miraculous deliverance —king's rejoicing and decree —Prophet's prosperity till the reign of Cyrus, about B.C. 537. (Chap. 6)

II. 'Prophetical Portion'. Chap. 7-12. Sect.:

1. Daniel's own dream —four (4) beasts —Ancient of Days & Son of Man —explanation of this dream —fourth (4th) beast being the Roman Empire, & ten horns Roman Senate —kingdom given to the Son of Man —fulfilled, according to 'Calvin', at first advent of Christ & early propagation of Gospel, —about B.C. 555. (Chap. 8)
2. Daniel's vision at Shushan —ram & the he-goat —little horn —cleansing of sanctuary —appearance of Gabriel —explanation of the vision —king of fierce countenance said to be the power of heathen Rome —Prince of princes —truth of vision of evening & morning —Daniel's fainting and astonishment, —about B.C. 553. (Chap. 8)
3. Prophet, after studying writings of Jeremiah, anticipates close of captivity —he prays & confesses his sins at full length in first year of Darius son of Ahasuerus —while he is praying angel Gabriel is sent to instruct him —he is informed of the celebrated period of seventy weeks —of coming of Messiah Prince of the overspreading of desolations, which events are historically explained in the course of these Lectures,—about B.C. 538. (Chap. 9)
4. Vision by river Hiddekel in third (3rd) year of King Cyrus —during the Prophet's terror an angel addresses him, touches him, & inspires him with confidence, & then returns to contend with the prince of Persia, together with another angel called Michael your prince. This vision being introductory to the following prophecy “noted in Scripture of truth,” —about B.C. 534. (Chap. 10)
5. Prophecy of Scriptures of truth detailed at full length by angel —three (3) kings of Persia—fourth (4th) Xerxes —mighty king Alexander & division of his empire into four (4) parts —two (2) monarchies specially dwelt upon —kings of the north being the Seleucidae, & those of south the Ptolemidae or Lagidae —their various wars, intermarriages, treaties, & successes —fully elucidated by historical testimony throughout these Lectures —wilful king (ver. 16) interpreted of Antiochus the Great—vile person (ver. 21) being Antiochus Epiphanes —wilful king (ver. 36) being heathen Roman Empire —remainder of prophecy being ingeniously accommodated to well-known character of Roman conquests in East, about B.C. 534. (Chap. 11)
6. Michael the Prince stands up for the people —certainty of a future resurrection proclaimed —two (2) angels appear on banks of river —Prophet inquires concerning the timing of these events —time, times, and a half —closing & sealing of the words till the time of end —abomination of desolation set up —1290 days —1335 days —angel's command to stand in thy lot at the end of days —these periods said to be completed at first (1st) advent of Christ & early history of Gospel dispensation, including destruction of Jerusalem & persecutions of Church under heathen Emperors of Rome, about B.C. 534. (Chap. 12)

'Emst. Wilh. Hengstenberg'. Die Authentie des Daniel und die integritat des Sachariah. Berlin, A.D. 1831. This work is now accessible to the English reader through the translation of the Rev. B. P. Pratten. Edinburgh, Clark, A.D., 1848.

Its contents are as follow: —Genuineness of Daniel. Chap. I.—History of attacks on the Book of Daniel. Chap. II.—Reply to objections. Sect. i. Alleged Greek Words —ii. Impure Hebrew —iii. Silence of Jesus Sirach —iv. Position in the Canon —v. Depreciatory statements of the Jews—vi. The O. T. referred to as a complete Whole —vii. Aimless profusion of miracles —viii. Historical errors —ix. Irreconcilable contradictions—x. Improbable and suspicious accounts —xi. Later ideas & usages —xii. Unusual indefiniteness of the prophecies —xiii. This definiteness ceases with Antiochus Epiphanes —xiv. Other objections —1. Passage, chap. 12; 2. Correspondence in ideas & expressions with much later Books; 3. Marks of Jewish national pride; 4. Absence of all higher moral tendency; 5. Passages which speak in praise of Daniel. Chap. iii. —Arguments for the Genuineness. Sect. i. Testimony of the author himself —ii. Reception into the Canon, and general acknowledgment of Canonicity —iii. Testimony of Christ and the Apostles —iv. Traces of the Book in pre-Maccabean times —1. The passage of Josephus, Antiq. xi. 8 ; 2. 1st Macc. 2:59,60; 3. The LXX. of Deut. 32:8, & Isaiah 30:4; Badness of the Alex. version of Daniel, which was nearly contemporary with the alleged original composition —v. Character of the language; 1. Use of Hebrew and Aramaean; 2. Correspondence of its Aramaean, with that of Ezra, and deviation from that of the Targums —vi. Exact knowledge of history—vii. Familiar acquaintance with the institutions, manners, and customs of the times of Daniel—viii. Other arguments; 1. The entire peculiarity of prophetic style, and the mode of representation adopted in the Book; 2. Several things at variance with the spirit of the Maccabean times; 3. Exact agreement of the historical part and the prophecies; 4. Immediate conjunction of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes and the Messianic times.

As the Professor refers to many Neologian works for the purpose of refuting their wild extravagancies, the titles of the four following ones are given in full. See their characters delineated in our Preface.

Daniel aus dem Hebraisch-Aramaischen neu iberetzt und erklärt, mit einer vollständigen Einleitung, und einigen historischen und exegetischen Excursen. Von LEONHARD BERTHOLDT, erste und zweyte Hälfte. Erlangen, 1806, 1808, in octon.

G. F. GRIESINGER's Neue Ansicht der Aufsätze im Buche Daniel. Stuttg. u. Tübing., 1815, in octon. Ueber Verfasser und Zweck des Buchs Daniel. Revision der in neuerer Zeit darüber geführten Untersuchungen. Von FRIEDR. BLEEK. In der Theologischen Zeitschrift herausgeg. von Schleiermacher, de Wette, u. Lücke, p. 3. Berlin, 1822, in octon. HER. GOD. KIRMss Commentatio historico-critica, exhibens descriptionem et censuram recentium de Danielis libro opinionum. Jenae, 1828, in quat.

John Calvin's Preface to his Lectures on Daniel: Lecture 1st:

{{ The Book of the Prophet Daniel follows those Remarks, and its utility will be better understood as we proceed ; since it cannot be conveniently explained all at once. I will, however, just present the Reader with a foretaste to prepare his mind, and render him attentive. But before I do so, I must make a brief Summary of the Book. We may divide the Book into two (2) parts, and this partition will materially help us. For 'Daniel' relates how he acquired influence over the unbelieviug. It was necessary for him to be elevated to the prophetic ofiice in some singular and unusual manner. The condition of the Jews, as is well known, was so confused, that it was difficult for any one to determine whether any Prophet existed. At first Jeremiah' was alive, and after him 'Ezekiel'. After their return, the Jews had their own Prophets: but Jeremiah and Ezekiel had almost fulfilled their office, when 'Daniel' succeeded them. Others too, as we have already seen, as 'Haggai', 'Malachi', and 'Zechariah', were created Prophets for the purpose of exhorting the people, and hence their duties were partially restricted. But 'Daniel' would scarcely have been considered a Prophet, had not God, as we have said, appointed him in a remarkable way. We shall perceive at the close of the sixth (6th) chapter, that he was divinely endued with remarkable signs, so that the Jews might surely ascertain that he had the gift of prophecy, unless they were basely ungrateful to God. His name was known and respected by the inhabitants of Babylon. If the Jews had despised what even the profane Gentiles admired, was not this purposely to suffocate and trample on the grace of God? 'Daniel' , then, had sure and striking marks by which he could be recognised as God's Prophet, and his calling be rendered unquestionable.

A Second (2nd) Part (ch. 7-12) is afterwards added, in which God predicts by his agency the events which were to occur to his elect people. The Visions, then, from the seventh (7th) chapter to the end (12th) of the Book, relate peculiarly to the Church of God. There God predicts what should happen hereafter. And that admonition is the more necessary, since the trial was severe, when the Jews had to bear an exile of seventy (70) years; but after their return to their country, instead of seventy (70) years, God protracted their full deliverance till seventy (70) weeks of years. So the delay was increased sevenfold. Their spirits might be broken a thousand (1000) times, or even utterly fail; for the Prophets speak so magnificently about their redemption, that the Jews expected their state to be especially happy and prosperous, as soon as they were snatched from the Babylonish Captivity. But since they were oppressed with so many afflictions, and that, too, not for a short period, but for more than four hundred (400) years, their redemption might seem illusory since they were but seventy (70) years in exile. There is no doubt, then, that Satan seduced the minds of many to revolt, as if God were mocking them by bringing them out of Chaldea back again to their own country. For these reasons God shews his servant in a Vision what numerous and severe afflictions awaited his elect people. Besides, "Daniel so prophesies that he describes almost historically events previously hidden". And this was necessary, since in such turbulent convulsions the people would never have tasted that these had been divinely revealed to 'Daniel', unless the heavenly testimony had been proved by the event. 'This holy man ought so to speak and to prophesy concerning futurity, as if he were relating what had already happened'. But we shall see all these things in their own order.

I return, then, to what I commenced with, that we may see in few words how useful this Book is to the Church of Christ. First of all, the matter itself shews how 'Daniel' did not speak from his own discretion, but whatever he uttered was dictated by the Holy Spirit: for whence could he conceive the things which we shall afterwards behold, if he were only endued with human prudence? for instance, that other Monarchies should arise to blot out that Babylonian Empire which then had the greatest authority in all the world? Then, again, how could he divine concerning Alexander the Great and his Successors? for long before Alexander was born, 'Daniel' predicted what he should accomplish. Then he shews that his kingdom should not last, since it is directly divided into four horns. Other events also clearly demonstrate that he spoke by the dictation of the Holy Spirit. But our confidence in this is strengthened by other narratives, where he represents the various miseries to which the Church should be subject between two most cruel enemies, the kings of Syria and Egypt. He first recites their treaties, and then their hostile incursions on both sides, and afterwards so many changes, as if he pointed at the things themselves with his finger; and he so follows through their whole progress, that God appears to speak by his mouth. This, then, is a great step, and we shall not repent of taking it, when we acknowledge 'Daniel' to have been only the organ of the Holy Spirit, and never to have brought anything forward by his own private inclination. The authority, too, which he obtained, and which inspired the Jews with perfect confidence in his teaching, extends to us also. Shameful, indeed, and base would be our ingratitude, if we did not embrace him as God's Prophet, whom the Chaldeans were compelled to honour — a people whom we know to have been superstitious and full of pride. These two nations, the Egyptians and Chaldeans, placed themselves before all others; for the Chaldeans thought wisdom's only dwelling-place was with themselves: hence they would never have been inclined to receive DANIEL, unless the reality had compelled them, and the confession of his being a true prophet of God had been extorted from them.

Since 'Daniel's' authority is thus established, we must now say a few words about the subjects which he treats. Respecting the 'Interpretation of his Dreams', the first of those of Nebuchadnezzar embraces a matter of great importance, as we shall see, namely, how all the splendour and power of the world vanish away, Christ's kingdom alone remaining stable, and that nothing else is self-enduring.

In the Second (2nd) Dream of Nebuchadnezzar, 'Daniel's' admirable constancy is displayed. Very invidious, indeed, was the office of throwing down the mightiest Monarch of the whole world as he did: "Thou exceptest thyself from the number of men, and art worshipped like a god; thou shalt hereafter become a beast!" No man of these days would dare thus to address Monarchs; nay, who dares to admonish them even mildly, if they have sinned at all? When, therefore, 'Daniel' intrepidly predicted to King Nebuchadnezzar the disgrace which awaited him, he thus gave a rare and memorable proof of his constancy. And in this way, again, his calling was sealed, since this fortitude sprang from God's Spirit.

But the Second (2nd) Part is peculiarly worthy of notice, since we there perceive how God cares for his Church. God's providence is, indeed, extended to the whole world. For if a sparrow does not fall to the ground without his permission, he, doubtless, is mindful of the human race! (Matt. 10, & Luke 12) Nothing, therefore, happens to us by chance, but God in this Book affords us light, while we know his Church to be so governed by him, as to be the object of his peculiar care. If matters ever were so disturbed in the world, that one could suppose God to be asleep in heaven, and to be forgetful of the human race, surely such were the changes of those times, nay, so multiform, so extensive, and so various were they, that even the most daring must be confounded, since there was no end to the wars. Egypt prevailed at one time, while at another there were commotions in Syria. Seeing, then, all things turned up-side down, what judgment could be passed, except that God neglected the world, and the Jews were miserably deceived in their hope? They thought that as God had been their deliverer, so would he have been the perpetual guardian of their safety. Although all nations were then subject in common to various slaughters, yet if the Syrians were victorious over the Egyptians, they abused their power against the Jews, and Jerusalem lay exposed as their prey, and the reward of their victory: if, again, the opposite side were the conquerors, they revenged the injury, or sought compensation against the Jews. Thus on every side those miserable people were freed, and their condition was much worse after their return to their country, than if they had always been exiles or strangers in other regions. When, therefore, they were admonished concerning the future, this was the best prop on which they could repose. But the use of the same doctrine is at this day applicable to us. We perceive, as in a glass or picture, how God was anxious about his Church, even when he seemed to cast away all regard for it: hence when the Jews were exposed to the injuries of their enemies, it was but the accomplishment of his designs.

From the Second (2nd) Part we recognise their wonderful preservation, and that too, by a greater and more surprising exercise of God's power, than if they had lived in peace, and no one had molested them. We learn this from the seventh (7th) to the ninth (9th) chapters. Now, when 'Daniel' numbers the years till 'The Advent of Christ', how clear and distinct is the testimony which we may oppose against Satan, and all the taunts of the impious! and how certain it is that the Book of 'Daniel' was familiarly used by men before this event. But when he enumerates 'The Seventy Weeks', and says, that Christ should then come, all profane men may come, and boast, and swell with increased swaggering, yet they shall fall down convicted, since Christ is that true Redeemer whom God had promised from the beginning of the world. For He was unwilling to make him known without the most certain demonstration, such as all the mathematicians can never equal. First of all, it is worthy of observation, that 'Daniel' afterwards discoursed on the various calamities of the Church, and prophesied the time at which God pleased to shew his only-begotten Son to the world. His dissertation on the office of Christ is one of the principal supports of our faith. For he not only describes his Advent, but announces the abolition of the shadows of the Law, since the Messiah would bring with him its complete fulfilment. And when he predicts the Death of Christ, he shews for what purpose he should undergo death, namely, to abolish Sin by his sacrifice, and to bring in Eternal Righteousness. Lastly, this also must be noticed, —as he had instructed the people to bear their cross, so also he warns them that the Church's state would not be tranquil even when the Messiah came. The sons of God should be militant until the end, and not hope for any fruit of their victory until the dead should rise again, and Christ himself should collect us into his own Celestial Kingdom.

Now, we comprehend in few words, or rather only taste how useful and fruitful this Book is to us. I now come to the words themselves: I wished, as I said, just to catch a foretaste of a few things, and the reading of the Book will shew us better what advantage we may derive from each of its chapters.

Chap.1:1-2: "Here Daniel marks the time in which he was led into captivity together with his companions, namely, in the third (3rd) year of Jehoiakim. A difficult question arises here, since Nebuchadnezzar began to reign in the fourth (4th) year of Jehoiakim. How then could he have besieged Jerusalem in the third (3rd) year, and then led away the people captives according to his pleasure? Some interpreters solve this difficulty by what appears to me a frivolous conjecture, that the four (4) years ought to refer to the beginning of his reign, and so the time may be brought within the third (3rd) year. But in the second (2nd) chapter we shall see Daniel brought before the king in the second (2nd) year of his reign. They explain this difficulty also by another solution. They say —the years are not reckoned from the beginning of the reign, and,— this was the second (2nd) year from the Conquest of the Jews and the taking of Jerusalem; but this is too harsh and forced. The most probable conjecture seems to me, that the Prophet is speaking of the first (1st) King Nebuchadnezzar, or at least uses the reign of the second (2nd), while his father was yet alive. We know there were two (2) kings of the same name, father and son; and as the son did many noble and illustrious actions, he acquired the surname of Great. Whatever, therefore, we shall afterwards meet with concerning Nebuchadnezzar, cannot be understood except of the second (2nd), who is the son. But Josephus says the son was sent by his father against the Egyptians and the Jews: and this was the cause of the war, since the Egyptians often urged the Jews to a change of affairs, and enticed them to throw off the yoke. Nebuchadnezzar the younger was carrying on the war in Egypt at the death of his father, and speedily returned home, lest any one should supersede him. When, however, he found all things as he wished, Josephus thinks he put off that expedition, and went to Jerusalem. There is nothing strange, nay, it is very customary to call him King who shares the command with his father. Thus, therefore, I interpret it: In the third (3rd) year of the reign of Jehoiakim, Nebuchadnezzar came, under the command and direction of his father, or if any one prefers it, the father himself came. For there is nothing out of place, whether we refer it to the father or to the son. Nebuchadnezzar, then, king of Babylon, came to Jerusalem, that is, by the hand of his son besieged Jerusalem. But if a different explanation is preferred, since he was there himself and carried on the war in person, that view may be taken: still, the events happened in the third (3rd) year of Jehoiakim's reign. Interpreters make many mistakes in this matter. Josephus, indeed, says this was done in the eighth (8th) year, but he had never read the Book of Daniel. (*Calvin's expression is 'tam brutus homo' in Latin, and 'si stupide et brutal' in French; [that stupid man'] but he is evidently too severe on so valuable an annalist, who, in so many passages, confirms and elucidates the scriptural narrative. Besides, Calvin seems to have overlooked the passage in his Antiq., lib. xi. cap. 8, § 5, where this Book is mentioned, and its contents alluded to at length.) He was an unlearned man, and by no means familiar with the Scriptures; nay, I think he had never read three (3) verses of Daniel. It was a dreadful judgment of God for a priest to be so ignorant a man as Josephus. But in another passage on which I have commented, he seems to have followed Metasthenes and others whom he cites, when speaking of the destruction of that monarchy. And this seems to suit well enough, since in the third (3rd) year of the reign of Jehoiakim the city was once taken, and some of the nobles of the royal race were led away in triumph, among whom were Daniel and his companions. When Jehoiakim afterwards rebelled, his treatment was far more severe, as Jeremiah had predicted. But while Jehoiakim possessed the kingdom by permission of King Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel was already a captive, so that Jeremiah's prediction was fulfilled —the condition of the figs prematurely ripe was improved; for those who were led into exile last thought themselves better off than the rest. But the Prophet deprives them of their vain boast, and shews the former captives to have been better treated than the remnant of the people who as yet remained safe at home. (Jer. 24: 2, 8.) I assume, then, that Daniel was among the first fruits of the captivity; and this is an instance of God's judgments being so incomprehensible by us. For had there been any integrity in the whole people, surely Daniel was a remarkable example of it: for 'Ezekiel' includes him among the three (3) just men by whom most probably God would be appeased. (Chap. 14:14) Such, then, was the excellence of Daniel's virtues, that he was like a celestial angel among mortals; and yet he was led into exile, and lived as the slave of the king of Babylon. Others, again, who had provoked God's wrath in so many ways, remained quiet in their nests: the Lord did not deprive them of their country and of that inheritance which was a sign and pledge of their adoption. (*Much light has been thrown upon the chronology of these times since the age of Calvin: later Commentators have dated from the third (3rd) year of Jehoiakim's restoration to his kingdom after his rebellion. See 2nd Kings 24:2,3. The subject is discussed with clearness by 'Bleek' in his Theolog. Zeitschrift. Pt. iii. p. 280, &c.; and 'R. Sal. Jarchi [Rashi]' on this passage may be consulted, p. 735, edit. Gothaë, 17-13. See Dissertation at the end of this Volume.)"

Chap.5:31: "Daniel adds, the kingdom was transferred to the king of the Medes, whom he calls Darius, but Xenophon terms him Cyaxares. It is clear enough that Babylon was taken by the skill and under the auspices of Cyrus; since he was a persevering warrior possessed of great authority, though he is not mentioned here. But since Xenophon relates that Cyaxares, here called Darius, was Cyrus's father-in-law, and thus held in the highest honour and estimation, it is not surprising to find Daniel bringing that king before us. Cyrus was content with his own power and with the praise and fame of his victory, and readily conceded this title to his father-in-law, whom he perceived to be now growing aged and infirm. It is uncertain whether he was the son of Astyages, and thus the uncle of Cyrus. Many historians concur in stating that Astyages was the grandfather of Cyrus who married his daughter to Cambyses; because the astrologers had informed him how an offspring should be born of her who should possess the sovereignty over all Asia! Many add the story of his ordering the infant Cyrus to be slain, but since these matters are uncertain, I leave them undecided. I rather think Darius was the uncle of Cyrus, and also his father-in-law; though, if we believe Xenophon, he was unmarried at the capture of Babylon; for his uncle, and perhaps his father-in-law, had sent him to bring supplies when he was inferior in numbers to the Babylonians and Assyrians. However this may be, the Prophet's narrative suits the circumstances well enough, for Darius, as king of the Medes, obtained the royal authority. Cyrus was, indeed, higher than he in both rank and majesty, but he granted him the title of King of Babylon, and under this name he reigned over the Chaldeans."

Chap. 6:28: "The word (tzlch), 'tzelech', properly signifies to "pass over," and the signification is here metaphorical, in the sense of being prosperous. There is no doubt, however, of there being a silent contrast between the kingdom of the Persians and the Chaldean monarchy, that is, to speak more concisely and clearly, between the twofold condition of Daniel. For, as we have said, he was for some time in obscurity under Nebuchadnezzar; when this monarchy was about to perish he became conspicuous; and throughout the whole period of the reign of the Chaldeans he was obscure and contemptible. All indeed had heard of him as a remarkable and illustrious Prophet, but he was rejected from the palace. At one time he was seated at the king's gate, in great honour and respect, and then again he was cast out. During the continuance of the Chaldee monarchy, Daniel was not held in any esteem, but under that of the Medes and Persians he prospered, and was uniformly treated with marked respect, for Cyrus and Darius were not so negligent as instantly to forget the wonderful works of God performed by his hand. Hence the word "passing through," pleases me, since, as I have said, it is a mark of the continual possession of honour; for not only King Darius, but also Cyrus exalted him and raised him into the number of his nobles, when he heard of his favour. It is clear that he left Babylon and went elsewhere. Very probably he was not long among the Medes, for Darius or Cyaxares died without any heirs, and then his whole power passed to Cyrus alone, who was his nephew, through his sister, and his son-in-law being his daughter's husband. No doubt Daniel here commends God's favour and kindness towards himself, because this was not the usual solace of exile, to obtain the highest favour among foreign and barbarous nations, or attain the largest share of their honour and reverence. God, therefore, alleviated his sorrow by this consolation in his exile. Hence Daniel here not only regards himself in his private capacity, but also the object of his dignity. For God wished his name to be spread abroad and celebrated over all those regions through which Daniel was known, since no one could behold without remembering the power and glory of Israel's God. Daniel, therefore, wished to mark this. On the other hand also, no doubt, it is not like the rest of mankind, but because the land of Canaan was the peculiar inheritance of God's people. When Daniel was snatched away and led off to a distance, as far as Media and Persia, without the slightest hope of return, there is no doubt that he suffered continual distress. Nor was the splendour of his station among the profane of such importance as to induce him to prefer it to that pledge of God's favour and paternal adoption in the land of Canaan. He had doubtless inscribed on his heart that passage of David's, "I had rather be in the court of the Lord, than in the midst of the greatest riches of the ungodly: then, I had rather be a despised one in the house of God, than to dwell in the tents of the unrighteous." (Ps. 84:10.) Thus Daniel had been taught. Ezekiel, too, properly includes him among the three (3) most holy men who have lived since the beginning of the world. (14:14)¹ This was of the greatest moment; for when he was a youth, or at least but middle aged, he was joined with Job and Noah, and was the third (3rd) in rare and almost incredible sanctity! Since this was his character, he was no doubt affected with the greatest sorrow when he perceived himself subject to perpetual exile, without the slightest hope of return, and of being able to worship God in his temple and to offer sacrifice with the rest. But lest he should be ungrateful to God, he desires to express his sense of the uncommon benevolence with which, though an exile and a stranger, and subject to reproach among other captives, he was treated and even honoured among the Medes and Persians. This, therefore, is the simple meaning of the passage. It is quite clear, as I have lately said, that Cyrus, after the death of Darius, succeeded to the whole monarchy; and we shall afterwards see in its proper place how Daniel dwelt with Cyrus, who reigned almost thirty (30) years longer. Thus, a long time intervened between his death and that of Darius. This, therefore, did not occur without the remarkable counsel of God, since the change in the kingdom did not influence the position of Daniel, as it usually does. For new empires we know to be like turning the world upside down. But Daniel always retained his rank, and thus God's goodness was displayed in him, and wherever he went he carried with him this testimony of God's favour. I shall not proceed further, as we shall discuss a new prophecy to-morrow." }}

Dissertation 1st. Third (3rd) Year of King Jehoiakim Chap. 1:1.

{{ "A 'correct' idea of the scope and interpretation of these prophecies cannot be obtained without a due attention to the chronology of the events recorded. Hence, throughout these Dissertations it will be necessary to discuss some apparently unimportant points, and to combat some seemingly harmless opinions. We are thus compelled to enter into details which some may pronounce devoid of interest, but which will prove worth the labour bestowed upon them.

The necessity for comment on this first verse arises from 'the difficulty of reconciling its statement with the twenty fifth (25th) chapter of Jeremiah. The relation of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar must be harmonized with those of the three (3) last kings of Judah, to enable us to reconcile Daniel and Jeremiah. We must first ascertain the historical events which concern Jehoiakim, and fix their dates by comparing the Books of Kings and Chronicles, and the various allusions to him in Ezekiel and other prophets. Next, we must accurately define the events of Nebuchadnezzar's reign; and afterwards so compare them as to draw a correct inference from the whole, notwithstanding much apparent discrepancy. This has been done by some commentators, the results of whose labours will here be placed before the reader. 'Willet's remark on Calvin is worthy of notice: "Calvin thinketh to dissolve this knot by the distinction of Nebuchadnezzar the father, and Nebuchadnezzar the son; that in one place the one is spoken of, and the other in the other, but the question is not concerning the year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, but the year of Jehoiakim's reign wherein Jerusalem should be besieged; so that the doubt remaineth still." (*'Willet's "Hexapla in Dan'." Edit. 1610, p. 13.) He also answers Calvin's solution, by referring Nebuchadnezzar's second (2nd) year not to the period of his reign, but "rather to the time of Daniel's ministry and employment with the king, that in the second (2nd) year of his service he expounded the king's dream." Many learned Jews are of opinion that the last year of Jehoiakim's reign is intended, meaning the last of his independent sovereignty, since they treat him in former years as simply a tributary king to either the Egyptians or Babylonians. Josephus in his Antiq., (Book x. 6,) is supposed to favour this theory; for he places Nebuchadnezzar's attack in the eighth year of Jehoiakim's reign, and does not allude to any previous one. 'Wintle', however, does not consider that the words of Josephus justify this inference, (*See his "Daniel." Edit. Tegg, 1836, p. 2.) and suggests that the difference in the methods used by the Jews and Babylonians in computing their years, may tend to obviate the inconsistency. 'Wintle' suggests some reasons for dating the commencement of the seventy (70) years' captivity from the completion of the siege in the fourth (4th) year of Jehoiakim, when Daniel and his associates were among the first (1st) captives. Prideaux supposes this event to have occurred six hundred and six (606) years B.C., or the one hundred and forty second (142nd) year of Nabonassar's era; Vignoles and Blair fix the year following (143rd). Wintle agrees with the latter date, supposing the captivity not to continue during seventy (70) solar years, and fixing their termination about 536 B.C.

Another commentator, who has paid great attention to chronology, deserves special notice, since he advocates a new theory respecting Cyrus and Nebuchadnezzar, which is worthy of remark, though it has been severely criticised. The Duke of Manchester has an elaborate chapter on this date, from which we shall extract the conclusions at which he has arrived. He understands "Daniel to speak of Jehoiakim's independent reign, reckoning from the time that he rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar." (*"The Times of Daniel," p. 29, chap. iii., where other dates of interest are clearly exhibited.) Jehoiakim was taken captive in the seventh (7th) of Nebuchadnezzar.

The oldest expositors felt the difficulty of the passage. Rabbi Solomon Jarchi [Rashi] asks, "How can this be said?" and then replies as follows : —This was the eighth (8th) year of Nebuchadnezzar and the third (3rd) of Jehoiakim's rebellion against him.

'Hengstenberg' has not been forgetful to defend our Prophet from the charge 'of historical inaccuracy, to which this verse has given rise. He treats the assumption, that Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem before his accession to the throne, as inadmissible. "The assertion of his being associated by his father in the co-regency at that time is not adequately sustained." (*Dissertations on the Genuineness of Daniel. Edinburgh, 1848, p. 43.) Cu. B. 'Michaelis' and 'Berthodt' have made various attempts to reconcile the discrepancy. "The assumption," says Hengstenberg, "that Nebuchadnezzar undertook his first (1st) expedition in the eighth (8th) year of Jehoiakim, is an hypothesis grounded merely on one (1) passage." Still, this passage, far from containing an error, affords a striking proof of the writer's historical knowledge. Berosus, as quoted by Josephus, (Arch. [Antiq.] x. 11, 1 [1-7, deals with Nebuchadnezzar & his son & Daniel.]) narrates the victory of Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish, which occurred about the close of Jehoiakim's third (3rd) year. Carchemish was a city on the banks of the Euphrates, taken by Pharaoh-Necho about three (3) years previously. Immediately after this victory, the conqueror marched against Jerusalem and took it. The process by which Hengstenberg arrives at this result, the various authors whom he quotes, and the complete refutation which he supplies of all the conjectures of his Neologian opponents, will be found amply detailed in the valuable work already quoted. Rosenmueller also discusses the point, but leans too much to those writers whom Hengstenberg refutes. }}

Dissertation 2nd: Nebuchadnezzar —one (1) King or two (2)? Chap. 1:1.

{{ The difficulty of reconciling the various statements of Scripture with themselves and with profane history, has raised the question whether there were two (2) Nebuchadnezzars or only (1) one. The Duke of Manchester is a strenuous advocate for the former hypothesis, and his view of the case is worthy of perusal. The first (1st) king he supposes to have overthrown Necho's army in the fourth (4th) year of Jehoiakim, as we have already stated. He came from the north into Judea, and took the people captive after the overthrow of Assyria. His eleventh (11th) year corresponds with the fourth (4th) of Zedekiah, while he reigned on the whole about twenty-nine (29) years. He is to be identified with Cyrus (1st), the father of Cambyses, well known in Persian history, so that the second (2nd) Nebuchadnezzar was Cambyses himself. Although the astronomical Canon of Ptolemy is a formidable adversary, this writer shews much ingenuity in bending it to his purpose. The first (1st) king of this name began his reign B.C. 511, while Paulus Orosius determines the taking of Babylon "by Cyrus" about the time of the expulsion of the kings from Rome (B.C. 510.) Thus sixty-nine (69) years elapsed between the overthrow of Necho and the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar the second (2nd); and in the eighteenth (18th) year of the reign of this latter king the golden image was set up.

Having identified the second (2nd) king with Cambyses, this writer brings forward many testimonies in favour of his being a Persian, and shews that the Chaldeans were not Babylonians but Persians. He treats him as identical with the Persian Jemsheed, the contemporary of Pythagoras and Thales, and the founder of Pasargadae and Persepolis, and justifies his positions by the authorities of Diocles, Hecataeus, Cedrenus, the Maccabees, Abydenus, and Alexander Polyhistor. "The evidence is deduced from direct testimony, from geographical position, from similarity in language and religion, in manners and customs, in personal character and alliances; from Babylonian bricks and cylinders; as also from historical synchronisms and identity of actions." (*Times of Daniel, p. 141.) The statements of Herodotus are fully discussed and compared with the Egyptian sculptures, with the view of shewing that the second (2nd) Nebuchadnezzar was the Cambyses of Herodotus, the son-in-law of Astyages and the conqueror of Egypt. The story of his madness, after profaning the temple of Apis, is said to apply accurately to this second monarch.

It could not be expected that a theory of this kind could be introduced into the world without severe and searching examination. Accordingly, BIRKS, in his preface to "The two later Visions of Daniel," writes as follows: "I have examined closely the two difficulties which alone give a seeming strength to his Grace's theory, —the succession of names in the Persian history, and the two (2) covenants under Zerubbabel and Nehemiah, —and feel confident I can meet them both with a full and complete answer. It seems to me surprising that a paradox of two (2) Scripture Nebuchadnezzars, and a (1) Scripture Cyrus, totally unknown to profane history, in the reign of Longimanus, contemporary with Cimon and Pericles, can ever be received by any mind accustomed to pay the least regard to the laws of evidence. Every fresh inquiry has only increased my confidence in the usual chronology derived from the Canon of Ptolemy, and its truth, I believe, may be almost entirely established even by Scripture evidence alone." 'Vaux', the learned author of "Nineveh and Persepolis," furnishes a clear sketch of Nebuchadnezzar's career, by combining the accounts of Herodotus and the Scriptures. In the thirty-first (31st) year of Josiah's reign, Necho fought the battle of Megiddo, in which Josiah was mortally wounded. He then took Cadytis, "the holy city" of the Jews, and at length returned to Egypt with abundance of spoil. After a lapse of three (3) years he invaded the territory of the king of Babylon. The reigning monarch —Nabopolassar— was aged and infirm; he gave the command of his army to his son Nebuchadnezzar, who defeated the Egyptians at Carcesium or Carchemish, and drove them out of Asia. He marched to Jerusalem, and reinstated Jehoiakim as its king, in subjection to himself; he spoiled the temple of the chief ornaments and vessels of value, and among the prisoners transmitted to Babylon were Daniel and his three (3) friends. He next carried on war against the Egyptians, till the news of his father's death caused his return. The revolt of Jehoiakim caused a second (2nd) attack upon the city, and the carrying off of many prisoners, among whom was Ezekiel, to the banks of the distant Chebar. Zedekiah, the brother of Jehoiakim, having been placed on the throne, and having made an alliance with Pharaoh Hophra, the Apries of Herodotus, he is deposed by the King of Babylon, and carried captive in blindness and chains. Thus for the third (3rd) and last time this conqueror invaded Judea and profaned the temple. After a lapse of four (4) years he besieged Tyre; for thirteen (13) years it resisted his arms, but was at length razed to the ground. He next succeeded in an expedition against Egypt, dethroned Apries, and leaving Amasis as his viceroy, returned to his imperial city. In the language of Jeremiah, "he arrayed himself with the land of Egypt, as a shepherd putteth on his garment.” He next occupies himself in beautifying the city, and erecting a palace of extraordinary magnificence, and in constructing those hanging gardens mentioned by Diodoras, Megasthenes, and Arrian. The remainder of his history is easily gathered from the Prophet’s narrative. “A careful consideration of the authorities seems to shew that ‘Clinton’ is right in his supposition that the reign of this prince was about forty four (44) years in duration, and that he was succeeded after a short interval by Belshazzar.” (*Nineveh and Persep., p. 71, second edition.) ‘Willet’ arrives at the same conclusion as to the length of his reign by a different process of reasoning. The following dates are extracted from Prideaux, whose caution and accuracy are most commendable:

B.C.

586. Tyre besieged.

570. Death of Apries, coincident with the dream of the tree, (chap. 4,) after his last return from Egypt.

569. Chap. 4:30. Driven out into the fields.

563. Restored after seven (7) years.

562. Death, after about forty-four (44) years’ reign.

Another series of dates has been displayed by the author of “The Times of Daniel,” founded on a different chronological basis; we can only extract a few of them from pp. 282, et seq.:

B.C.

510. Babylon taken by Cyrus, & kings expelled from Rome.

507. Commencement of Jehoiakim’s independent reign. Dan. 1:1.

500. Nebuchadnezzar II, appointed; his dream, Dan. 2.

494. Golden Image set up. Dan. 3.

483. Nebuchadnezzar I, died.

481. Nebuchadnezzar II, died.

Dr. Wells has the following chronological arrangement of the chief events of Nebuchadnezzar’s reign:

B.C.

607. He is this year taken by his father “as partner” in the kingdom, falling in with the latter part of the third (3rd) year of Jehoiakim, (Chap. 1:1)

606. Jehoiakim carried to Babylon with Daniel and others. First (1st) of the seventy (70) years’ captivity.

605. His father died. Nabopolassar in Ptolemy’s Canon, the son’s name being Naboeolassar. Canon allows him forty-three (43) years from this period.

603. Daniel interprets his dream. Chap. 2.

588. He re-takes Jerusalem and Zedekiah.

569. Returned to Babylon, is afflicted with insanity. Ch. 4.

562. He dies “a few days” after being restored to reason. }}

Dissertation 6th. Coresh —was he Cyrus the Great? Chap. 1:21.

{{ The last verse of this chapter is connected with an interesting inquiry, viz., Was the ‘Coresh’ here mentioned ‘Cyrus the Great’, or any other Cyrus? The noble author of “The Times of Daniel” has thrown much “life” into the subject by his elaborate defence of a theory which we now proceed to state and discuss. Cyrus the Great he thinks identical with Nebuchadnezzar (1st) the First, and Cambyses with his son Nebuchadnezzar (2nd) the Second; the exploits of the hero of Herodotus and Xenophon are attributed to the former, while Coresh becomes but a minor character, contemporary with Darius the Mede, after whom he is said to reign, and before Darius the son of Ahasuerus. This view also brings the story of Esther within the period of the captivity of Babylon. It has always been a subject of great difficulty with commentators on Daniel, to reconcile the scriptural narrative with those of both

Herodotus and Xenophon. The majority finding this impossible, have decided in favour of one or the other of these historians; and the best modern writers usually prefer Herodotus. 'Lowth', in his Notes on 'Isaiah', says, "the Cyrus of Herodotus was a very different character from that of the Cyrus of the Scriptures and Xenophon;" and 'Archbishop Secker' has taken great pains to compare all the profane historians with Scripture, and shews that the weight of the argument lies against the truth of the Cyropaedia. Whether Cyrus was the grandson of Astyages or not, many believe with Ctesias that he overcame him in battle, and founded the Persian empire upon the ruins of the Median dynasty. It is scarcely possible that it should be left for this nineteenth (19th) century to discover the identity between a first (1st) Nebuchadnezzar and this conqueror of the East; and while the clearing up of every historical discrepancy is impossible, yet it is desirable to reconcile the occurrences which are related by both Herodotus and Xenophon. The son of Cambyses the Persian, and of Mandane the daughter of Astyages king of the Medes, is said to have conquered Craesus king of Lydia, enlarged the Persian empire, subdued Babylon and the remnant of the Assyrian power, and placed his uncle Cyaxares over the united territories of Media and Babylon. After the death of this relative, he reigned over Asia, from India to Ethiopia, a territory consisting of 127 provinces. The manner of his death is uncertain, all the historians differ in their accounts, but the place of his burial is allowed to be Pasargadae, as Pliny has recorded in his Natural History. This tomb was visited by Alexander the Great, and has lately been noticed and described by European travellers. The plains of Murghab are watered by a river which bears the name of Kur, and is thought to be identical with the Greek Cyrus. A structure in a ruinous state has been found there, apparently of the same date as the remains at Persepolis, bearing cuneiform inscriptions which are now legible. The legend upon one of the pilasters has been interpreted, "I am Cyrus the Achaemenian;" and no doubt is entertained by the learned that this monument once contained the remains of the founder of the Persian monarchy. A single block of marble was discovered by Sir R. K. Porter, on which he discovered a beautiful sculpture in bas-relief, consisting of the figure of a man, from whose shoulders issue four large wings, rising above the head and extending to the feet. (*An engraving of this statue is given in 'Vauz's Nineveh and Persepolis', p. 322.) The whole value of such an inscription to the reader of Daniel is the legend above the figure, in the arrow-headed character, determining the spot as the tomb of Cyrus the Great. It shews, at the least, that he cannot be identified with Nebuchadnezzar.

The manner in which the author of "The Times of Daniel" has commented on the prophecies relating to the overthrow of Babylon, is worthy of notice here. Isaiah 44:14, is referred by 'Dr. Keith' to Cyrus, and objection is made to the supposed fulfilment in the person of Cyrus, (p. 293.) 'Keith' is said to apply to Cyrus the primary historical fulfilment of all the prophecies relating to the overthrow of Babylon, and the justness of this inference is doubted. Isaiah 13-14:27, is one of the passages where the asserted allusion to Cyrus is questioned, since it relates to a period in which the power of Assyria was in existence. The Assyrian is supposed to be Sennacherib, to whose predecessor both Babylon and Media were subject. "The Chaldeans, mentioned in Isaiah 13:19, I have already explained to have been a colony of astronomers, planted in Babylon by the Assyrian kings to carry on their astronomical observations, in which science they excelled." (P. 299, note.) Again, Isaiah 21:2, "Go up, O Elam; besiege, O Media," is applied by 'Dr. Keith' to Cyrus, to which the noble author objects, as well as to the supposition "that the overthrow of Belshazzar during his drunken revelry was predicted in Scripture, and that the minute fulfilment by Cyrus is recorded by Xenophon." "The feast of Belshazzar," it is added, "does not appear to correspond with the festival described by Xenophon, which was apparently periodical, and which, not a portion of the nobles, but all the Babylonians, observed by drunkenness and 'revelry during the whole night.'" "It also agrees with the mode in which Zopyrus got possession of Babylon." 'Calvin' seems to give it this turn, "A treacherous one shall find treachery," &c. (P. 301.) Further comments are then made upon Isaiah 44. & 45, and on Jeremiah 50 & 51, evading the force of their application to Cyrus, and combating with some degree of success the assertions of 'Keith'; for the noble author, who is earnest in pulling down, is ingenious in building up. "From this short examination, it appears that the prophecy of Jeremiah (50 & 51) corresponds with the capture of Babylon by Darius the Mede of Scripture, and by Darius Hystaspes, according to Herodotus." (P. 306.) Some writers have supposed Cyrus to be identical with this Darius the Mede; and 'Archbishop Secker' acknowledges some ground for such a conjecture. "The first (1st) year of Darius the Mede is by the LXX translated the first (1st) year of Cyrus," (*'Wintle's Transl., prelim. Diss', p. xxviii.) and the Canon of Ptolemy favours the identity. "Now all agree, as far as I have seen," says 'Wintle', "that the year of the expiration of the captivity, or the year that Cyrus issued his decree in favour of the Jews, was the year 212 of the era of Nabonassar, or 536 B.C.; and there is no doubt but Darius the Mede, whoever he was, reigned, according to Daniel, from the capture of Babylon, till this same first (1st) year of Cyrus, or till the commencement of the reign allotted by Scripture to Cyrus the Persian." "The Canon certainly allots nine years' reign to Cyrus over Babylon, of which space the two (2) former years are usually allowed to coincide with the reign of Cyaxares or Darius the Mede, by the advocates of Xenophon." (Prelim. Diss., p. xxvii.) Herodotus, Xenophon, and Ctesias all agree in the original superiority of the Medes, till the victories of Cyrus turned the scale, and gave rise to the Persian dynasty. At the fall of Babylon, and during the life of Darius, the Medes are mentioned by Daniel as superior, but at the accession of Cyrus this order is reversed, and Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, all assign the foremost place to the Persians.

The life of Daniel, 'Rosenmuller' reminds us, was prolonged beyond the first (1st) year of king (krwsh) 'Coresh', for the tenth (10th) chapter informs us of his vision in the third (3rd) year of that monarch's reign. He explains the apparent contradiction, by saying that it was enough for Daniel to live, or to the liberation of the Jews in the first (1st) year of the reign of Coresh; that was the crowning event of his prolonged existence. The conjectures of 'Bertholdt' and 'Aben-Ezra' are mentioned, only to be disposed of by a few words of censure. An ingenious conjecture of a French critic is found in the 'Encycl. Theol.', Liv. xxvii. The objection of Bleek, Ewald, Winer, and De Wette, are ably treated at length by 'Hengstenberg', and really meet with more serious attention than they deserve. It is a useless waste of precious time to enter minutely into every "phantasy" of the restless neology of Germany, while the chronology of Daniel's life will form the subject of a subsequent Dissertation. As some Neologians dwell much on the historian 'Ctesias', and lest the unlearned reader should be misled by their confident assertions, we may here state that we have only an epitome of his work preserved by the patriarch Photius. 'Bahr' states that he lived about 400 B.C., in the reign of Darius Nothus, being a Greek physician who remained seventeen (17) years at the Persian court. Diodorus informs us that he obtained his information from the royal archives, but there are so many anachronisms and errors of various kinds, that his statements cannot be safely followed as if historically correct. Ctesias, for instance, denies all relationship between Cyrus and Astyages. According to him, he defeated Astyages, invested his daughter Amytis with the honours of a queen, and afterwards married her. F.W. NEWMAN, indeed, prefers this narrative to that of both Herodotus and Xenophon, and thereby renders their testimony to the scriptural record uncertain and valueless. He also treats "the few facts" in regard to the Persian wars, "which the epitomator has extracted as differing from Herodotus," as carrying with them "high probability." The closing scene of his career, as depicted in the narrative of Ctesias, is pronounced "beyond comparison more credible" than that of Herodotus. This great conqueror died the third (3rd) day after his wound in a battle with "the Derbices," and was buried in that monument at Pasargadae, which the Macedonians broke open two centuries afterwards, ('Strabo', lib. xv. § 3; 'Arrian', lib. vi. § 29,) and which has lately been explored and described by Morier and Sir R. K. Porter. (*See 'Kitto's Bibl. Cyc., art Cyr., and Vaux's Nineveh', p. 316.)

Notwithstanding the hypothesis which has lately found favour with the modern writers whose works we have quoted, we feel that the views of the older critics are preferable; and, on the whole, 'Calvin's' exposition can only be improved upon in minor details. The authorities enumerated by 'Archbishop Secker', as given by 'Wintle' in his preface, p. xviii. and following, are worthy of attentive perusal; and we must refer again to 'Hengstenberg's' able replies to a variety of objections which we are unable to notice. See chap. vi. p. 102 and following, 'Edit. Ed'.

Dissertation 21st. Darius the Mede. Chap. 5:31.

The received views respecting this celebrated monarch have lately been impugned by the noble author of "The Times of Daniel." He gives five reasons for believing him to be Darius Hystaspes instead of the Cyaxares of Xenophon, the uncle and father-in-law of Cyrus. This assertion will therefore require some notice in detail, and compel us to repeat some statements with which the student of ancient history is familiar.

The views of the author already alluded to are thus expressed, — "Three kings," it is said, "of the name of Darius occur in Scripture; must we not presume that the first (1st) Darius there corresponds with Darius (1st) the first in profane history? that the second (2nd) in each equally agree; and that the third (3rd) Darius, with whom the list terminates in Scripture, is the third (3rd) Darius with whom the line of Persian kings closes?" There are strong marks in corroboration of the Median of this verse being Hystaspes; some of these are as follows: — First, each is said to have taken Babylon. Both levied taxes, so that the second verse of chap. 6 is said to be parallel to Herodotus, Book iii., and Strabo, (*§ 89. 'Jahn' points out what he considers a mistake of 'Strabo's, Arch. Bib'. chap. ii. § 233.) Book xv. This levying taxes leads to a similar assertion respecting Ahasuerus in Esther, chap. 10:1, who reigned "from India even to Ethiopia." (Esther 1:1) "Now, Ahashverosh, (meaning Ahasuerus,) who succeeded Darius the Median, reigned over India," and, according to Herodotus, Darius Hystaspes conquered India; hence this Mede was Darius Hystaspes. Pliny's testimony is brought forward to shew that Susa was built by this Darius; (*Lib. vi. ch. xxvii.) Ahasuerus resided at Shushan, which is identical with Susa, hence the conclusion is the same. Other reasons are given, and other collateral assertions made. Authorities are quoted by which it is laid down that Ahasuerus was Xerxes, the history of Esther occurred during the captivity, the son of Ahasuerus was Darius Nothus, the third (3rd) Darius was Codomanus. "To complete the evidence, I will contrast the identification which I propose with that which is now most generally approved of." (* P. 90.)

CANON OF PTOLEMY: 1. Darius the First. 2. Xerxes. 3. Artaxerxes 1st. 4. Darius 2nd. 5. Artaxerxes 2nd. 6. Ochus. 7. Arostes. 8. Darius 3rd.

SCRIPTURE AS I PROPOSE: 1. Darius the Median. 2. Ahashverosh. 3. Artaxerxes 1st, (Coresch.) 4. Darius 2nd. 5. Son of Ahashverosh. 6. Artaxerxes 2nd. [7. . . .] [8. . . .] 9. Darius 3rd, (4th from Coresch, Dan. 11)

It is also suggested that chaps. 50 & 51 of Jeremiah apply to this Darius and not to Cyrus, as Dr. Keith asserts. Chap. 51 verses 11 & 28, are said to apply to Zopyrus, and the language of the chapter is on the whole more suitable to the capture of Babylon by this Darius, according to Herodotus, Book iii., than to that by Cyrus.

The commonly received view is stated shortly by 'Rosenmüller', —that this Mede was the Cyaxares II of Xenophon, (*Cyrop., lib. i. chaps. 4, 5, and lib. iii. chap. 3, § 20.) the son of Astyages, the uncle and father-in-law of Cyrus. AEschylus, in his tragedy of the 'Persae', (*Line 762.) introduces Darius the son of Hystaspes, recounting his origin from Darius the Mede. 'Josephus', in the tenth (10th) Book of his Antiquities, says he was the son of Astyages; and; 'Theodoret', in his Commentary, identifies him with Cyaxares. 'Jerome' states that, in conjunction with his uncle Cyrus, he subverted the Chaldean empire.

"If Xenophon's account of Cyrus be in general admitted," ('Preliminary Dissertation', p. xxvi.) says 'Wintle', "we cannot be at a loss to determine who was Darius the Mede; and if even the defeat of Astyages be received according to Herodotus, and it be placed in the tenth (10th) year of Cyrus's reign over Persia Proper, yet there seems no necessity to conclude but that the kingdom of Media might still, with the consent of Cyrus, be continued to Cyaxares, his mother's brother, who might retain it till his death, after the conquest of Babylon, which Herodotus attributes to Cyrus, after he had reduced the neighbouring powers." He next proceeds to obviate one (1) or two (2) chronological difficulties often considered as weighty objections to Xenophon's account. "The name of Darius is omitted in the Canon, although he is allowed to have reigned more than one (1) year, if he reigned at all. How shall we then reconcile his history with the Canon? and where or in what part must this reign be placed? The same answer will serve for both inquiries. The Canon certainly allots nine years to Cyrus over Babylon, of which space the two former years are usually allowed to coincide with the reign of Cyaxares or Darius the Mede by the advocates of Xenophon." A MS. of 'Archbishop Secker' is then quoted, in which he gives reasons why Berosus might have overlooked this reign as short-lived and nominal. 'Prideaux' and 'Usher', and the 'Ancient Universal History', are referred to for additional information. ('Con'., part i. Books ii., iii.; 'Annals', pp. 80, 81; 'History of the Medes and Persians', vol. v.) With reference to the period before us, it is concluded, from the close of this chap. v., "that Darius the Mede did not begin his reign till after the capture of Babylon; and this event I am inclined to place in the next year after the 17th of Nabonadius, in the 210th year of the Chaldean era, or 538 years before Christ, which was the first of Cyrus's nine years. Whether the defeat of Nabonadius and the taking of the city happened near the same time, I need not determine; but it seems clear from Daniel, (chap. 5:31,) as well as from Xenophon, that the king was slain on the same night that the city was taken; and this, I apprehend, must have happened about the real year of the captivity 67, supposing the fourth (4th) of Jehoiakim to agree with the year 605 before Christ, according to Blair."

Here again the researches of Hengstenberg afford us valuable aid in discussing and reconciling the various statements of historians. The silence of Herodotus and Ctesias concerning a Median king of Babylon is noticed, and even concealment on the part of the Persians is shewn to be highly probable.

Prolongation of Daniel's Life. Chap. 6:28.

The prolongation of our Prophet's life till the era specified in this verse, is worthy of our notice, that we may, if possible, accurately ascertain his age at leading periods of his history. We cannot ascertain precisely the year of his entrance into public life. He was born shortly before King Josiah's death, probably about 620 B.C.; and thus he had many opportunities of cultivating that early piety for which he was conspicuous. He was about fourteen (14) years old when taken captive to Babylon. Three (3) years afterwards, the king of Israel threw off the Babylonian yoke, and thus he and his companions became hostages and forerunners of the capture of the whole nation. From 'Jahn's Biblical Antiquities', we learn how skilled he was in various sciences after three (3) years' training, (pp. 99, 100;) and the high opinion which was entertained of his integrity, wisdom, and piety, is confirmed, by the remarkable honour paid to him by the Prophet Ezekiel. He is connected, 'while alive', with Noah and Job. (See Ezek. 14:14.; and Calvin's comment on the passage in our Edition, vol. ii. p. 68.)

The dream and its interpretation in chap. 2 occurred during Daniel's youth, and resulted in his promotion with his three (3) friends to the highest offices of the kingdom. We now lose sight of him for thirty (30) years, and it is impossible to determine whether he sat at the king's gate during the whole of this period. The erection of the image on the plains of Dura, and the subsequent punishment of his three (3) companions, seem inconsistent with his residence at that time at Babylon as an adviser of his sovereign. The three (3) “children,” as they are termed in chap. 1:17, were now about fifty (50) years of age; and it has become necessary to remark this, because some have spoken of them as still children when thus miraculously delivered from destruction. We too often take for granted impressions of this kind, which we have imperceptibly imbibed in our earliest days; and besides this, the works of the great masters in painting have fostered the error. These splendid productions of European art are often glaringly untrue, yet while based upon fabulous anachronisms, they too often adhere to the imagination, and influence our thoughts in days of more mature advancement. At the period of the dream in chap. 4 Daniel was about fifty (50) years of age; and thus we have another gap of about fifteen (15) years. Belshazzar had now ascended his grandfather’s throne. The mystic characters on the wall soon reveal a fearful reality. Darius the Mede still esteems the upright counsellor, and he had become a venerable “ancient of days” before he is thrust into the lion’s den. During the first year of King Darius, he learned, from the Book of Jeremiah, the approaching period of Judah’s deliverance. During the third year of Cyrus, he is favoured with a vision on the banks of the Tigris. (Chap. 10:1-4) We cannot ascertain how long he lived after this period, but he was at least eighty (80) years of age when he died. Various assertions and traditions exist among the Jews respecting both the time and place of his decease, and these have passed current, through the unsuspecting simplicity of some of our older expounders, who record as certain the hazardous statements of the authorities on which they rely. 'Dr. Wells', after comparing various dates, concludes, “that Daniel was about eighty-nine (89) or ninety (90) years old in the third (3rd) year of Cyrus;” he pays no regard to the conjectures of some, who make him to have lived one hundred and thirty eight (138), or one hundred and fifty (150) years, and adds the possibility of his reaching one hundred (100) years.

Our object in view in impressing this chronology is to disabuse the public mind of the Romish ideas connected with what they term, “The song of the three children.” Their usual method of treating these three (3) martyrs for truth and holiness is utterly erroneous, and like every other error of theirs, injurious and pernicious in proportion as it deviates from the 'Written & Infallible Word of the Living God'.

Contents of Volume II:

- I. Continuation of the Translated Lectures, Chapter 7-12.
- II. Dissertations Explanatory of Remarkable Phrases & Events: Times — Wonderful Numberer — Little Horn — Seventy (70) Weeks — Wilful King — Protracted Wars of Kings of North & South — Abomination of Desolation — Mahuzzim — Michael the Prince — 1335 Days.
- III. Connected Translation of Calvin's Version of Hebrew & Chaldee Text.
- IV. Summary of Historical & Prophetical Portions of Whole Book according to Calvin's View of its Contents.
- V. Notice of Ancient Codexes & Versions.
- VI. List of Most Valuable Ancient & Modern Expositions of this Prophet, & Concise Epitomes of Most Important.
- VII. Index of Scriptural Passages Quoted throughout.
- VIII. Index of Hebrew Words Illustrated.
- IX. Copious Index of Chief Words & Subjects Treated of in these Volumes.

Lecture 32nd.

{{ 7:4. "It is clear that the four (4) monarchies are here depicted. But it is not agreed upon among all writers which monarchy the last (4th), and which the third (3rd). With regard to the first (1st), all agree in understanding the vision of the Chaldean Empire, which was joined with the Assyrian, as we saw before. For Nineveh was absorbed by the Chaldeans and Babylonians; but the Prophet discourses at length of the Assyrian and Chaldean Empire, which was then flourishing. No one, however, would have thought it so near its end; and on the very night on which Belshazzar was slain, we saw how securely and proudly he was immersed in his pleasures, and what great and listless security existed throughout the city. This monarchy then ought to be set before us in the first (1st) place. As in the second (2nd) chapter that empire was called the golden head of the statue, so also it is now called a lion; that is, it is compared to a generous animal. It is comprehended under the image of a beast, and its fierceness and atrocity, as I have said, is hereby denoted; but with respect to the other kingdom, some superiority is granted to it, since the world is always growing worse and worse. And although Cyrus was a very prudent prince, yet he did not reach the temperance of former ages; for his ambition, avarice, and cruelty were insatiable. For Isaiah also, when he speaks of the Persians, says: 'They desire neither silver nor gold, but thirst after human blood'. (Chap. 13:17)

We perceive then the reason why the Prophet says. 'The first (1st) beast offered to me was like a lion', because greater integrity flourished under the Chaldeans than when all the empires were mixed together, and the Persians subdued both the Chaldeans and the Medes. For it is evident from all histories that they were a barbarous and fierce nation. They were indeed showy in their praise of virtue, since they spent their lives in austerity, and despised all luxuries, and were exceedingly temperate in their living; but their ferocity and brutal cruelty rendered them detestable. 'The first beast' then 'was like a lion', says he, 'and had eagle's wings'; that is, although it was a lion, yet it had wings. This refers to its swiftness, since we know in how short a time the Assyrians increased their monarchy, for they had previously subdued the Chaldeans, just like a lion for swiftness. For a lion has force, spirit, and cruelty for committing injuries. Besides, the Prophet saw a winged lion, since they not only increased their empire by their own strength, but suddenly extended their wings in every direction. We see, then, how strength and power are denoted on the one hand, and the greatest speed on the other. He afterwards adds, Their wings were dragged or torn off. For when the Chaldeans desired to stretch beyond their bounds, the Lord restrained them within due limits, and checked their continual victories. Their wings were then torn off, when God restrained them by the check of a bridle, lest they should wander as freely as they had formerly done.

The Prophet then adds, 'This beast was raised from the earth', implying the cessation of the empire. For neither the Chaldeans nor the Assyrians were entirely destroyed; but their glory was completely taken away. The face of the beast no longer appeared, when God transferred that monarchy to the Medes and Persians. Hence the Prophet adds, 'It stood upon its feet, and the heart of a man was given to it'. By this form of expression, he means to imply the reduction of the Assyrians and Chaldeans to their ordinary condition, and that they were no longer like a lion, but like private men deprived of their power and strength. Hence the expression, 'a man's heart was given to them', is not intended by way of praise, but by "a man" he intends any private person; as if he had said, the aspect of the Chaldeans and Assyrians was no longer terrible, since, while their sway prevailed, all men dreaded their power. Hence God removed from the world the face of that beast, and substituted that of a man, and made them 'stand upon their feet'. Formerly they flew about in the air, and despised the earth as far beneath their feet, but God makes them stand upon their feet; that is, not conduct themselves after their customary and former manner, but simply on the common level, after God had deprived them of their empire. This, in my judgment, is the simple meaning of the Prophet. Should there be any necessity, we shall afterwards confirm the remarks which we now run through but cursorily. It follows:"

7:5. "Here the Prophet proclaims how he was instructed by a dream concerning the second beast. If we will only judge by the event, this beast doubtless represented the kingdom of the Medes and Persians, although the Prophet specifies the Persians, as the Medes had long ago submitted to their yoke. 'Behold', says he, 'another beast like a bear'. We know a bear to be a mean and foul animal, slothful and inert, as well as cruel. In comparing the bear with the lion, its appearance is foul and displeasing, while the lion is remarkable for beauty, although it is formidable. He compares the Persians to a bear, on account of their barbarity, since we have already pronounced that nation fierce and savage. Then, again, the Persians were not civilized like the Assyrians and Chaldeans, who dwelt in the most beautiful region in the whole world, and in a most lovely country like a most noble theatre; but the Persians lay hid like wild beasts in their caves. They dwelt among their mountains, and lived like the brutes. Hence the Prophet compares them very appositely to a bear; nay, God shewed this form to his Prophet. He afterwards adds, 'It stood on one side'. Some think this to have been added to express the more contracted dominion of the Medes and Persians, but this opinion is unsuitable. We know how extensive was the sway of the Medes before they came under the power of Cyrus and the Persians. By themselves the Medes were most powerful; then the Persians were added, and afterwards Cyrus seized upon the possessions of the Chaldean monarchy. He possessed even the keys of Egypt, reigned in Syria, held Judea, and extended beyond the sea, till at length he was conquered by the Scythians. When, therefore, it is said, 'he stood on one side', the obscure origin of his kingdom is intended, for the fame of the Persians was included within their mountains until Cyrus acquired for them a name by his exploits. For he was a brave warrior, and deservedly eclipsed the glory of all others. Hence, at first this beast stood on one side; that is, the Persians were without fame or reputation; they had no wealth, and never emerged from their lurking places. We see how this particular is restricted to their origin in consequence of its obscurity.

The Prophet then adds: 'Three ribs were in the beast's mouth between its teeth ; and it was thus proclaimed, Arise, eat much flesh'! Those who understand three (3) definite kingdoms by the three (3) ribs, seem to refine far too minutely. I think the number indefinite, because this beast had bitten by its mouth not one rib but more; because the Persians, as we have said, drew to themselves the power of the Medes, and afterwards subdued the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and Cyrus also subdued many nations, until all Asia Minor acknowledged his authority. When, therefore, the Prophet speaks of three (3) ribs, it implies the insatiable nature of this beast, since it was not content with a single body, but devoured many men together. For, by "many ribs," he means much prey. This is the whole sense. I do not hesitate to explain the following words, 'it was said to the beast', of angels, or of God Himself. Some prefer to understand this of the stimulus by which Cyrus was instigated to cruelty. But since God exhibits to His Prophet the image of His Providence, what I have lately suggested becomes very probable, namely, 'it was said to the beast, Arise, eat much flesh'; not because God was the author of cruelty, but since He governs by His secret counsel the events which men carry on without method, His authority is here deservedly placed before our eyes; for Cyrus would not have penetrated so swiftly into different regions, and have drawn to himself so many empires, and subjugated so many powerful nations, had not God wished to punish the world, and had made Cyrus the instrument of slaughter. As therefore Cyrus executed God's vengeance by shedding so much human blood, the Prophet declares it to have been said to him. 'Arise, and eat flesh'. In one respect God was not pleased by the slaughter of so many nations by Cyrus, and by the increase of one man's power and tyranny through so much human bloodshed; but in another respect God is said to have commanded the conduct of Cyrus, since he wished to punish the world for its ingratitude, to which the most desperate obstinacy and rebellion were added. There was no remedy for these vices; hence God entrusted Cyrus with the duty of executing His judgment. I am compelled to stop here." }}

Lecture 33rd.

{{ 7:6. "Daniel has already spoken of two (2) empires, namely, the Chaldean and Persian. Interpreters agree in the necessity for referring this vision to the Macedonian Empire. He compares this kingdom to a leopard, or, as some translate, a panther, since Alexander obtained his great power through swiftness alone; and although it is not by any means a striking animal, yet it managed by its remarkable speed to subdue the whole East. Others bring forward many points of likeness, in which the Grecian character is in accordance with the nature of the leopard. But I fear these minutiae have but little weight: it is sufficient for me that the Spirit treats here of the third (3rd) empire. It was not of any importance at first (1st), and could neither terrify distant regions, nor acquire subjects by its own worthiness. It then became like some swift animal, if I may say so, since the swiftness of Alexander is notorious; but he did not excel in either prudence, or gravity, or judgment, or in any other virtues. Mere rashness seized upon him; and even if he had never tasted wine, his ambition would have intoxicated him. Hence Alexander's whole life was drunken; there was neither moderation nor composure in him. We see, then, how suitably this answers to the character of Alexander, although this is also extended to his successors, all of whom partook largely of the nature of their prince. Daniel says, therefore, 'A beast appeared to him like a leopard'.

He also says, 'It had four (4) wings on its back, and four heads'. Some persons, as I think perversely, distinguish between the wings and the heads. They suppose the kingdom to be depicted as winged because Alexander seized upon many kingdoms in a short period; but the more simple sense is, this beast had four (4) wings and four (4) heads, because Alexander had scarcely completed his victories when he died, contrary to all expectation; and after his death, every one seized a portion of the prey for himself. This, however, is certain: after the chief generals of his army had contended for many years, all histories agree in stating that the supreme power centred in four (4). For Seleucus obtained Asia Major, and Antigonus Asia Minor, Cassander was king of Macedon, and was succeeded by Antipater, while Ptolemy the son of Lagus became the ruler of Egypt. They had agreed indeed otherwise among themselves; for Alexander had a son by Roxana, the daughter of Darius; he had a brother, Aridseus, who grew up to manhood, but was epileptic and of weak intellect. Then, since the generals of Alexander were cunning, they acted on this pretext, that all should swear allegiance to their young ward, and then to Aridseus, in case their ward should die before he was of age. Then Lysimachus was set over the treasury, and another commanded the forces, and others obtained various provinces. Fifteen (15) or twenty (20) leaders divided among themselves both offices and power, while no one dared to assume the name of king. For Alexander's son was the lawful king, and his successor was that Aridseus of whom I have spoken. But they soon afterwards united; and that was an admirable specimen of God's Providence, which alone is sufficient to prove that passage of Scripture: 'He who sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed'. (Gen. 9:6.) For none of Alexander's generals escaped in safety except those four (4) whom we have mentioned. His mother, at the age of eighty (80), suffered a violent death; his wife, Roxana, was strangled; his son perished miserably; Aridseus, his brother, a man of no intellect, and almost on a level with the brutes, was slain with the rest—in truth, the whole family of Alexander suffered violent deaths. With respect to the generals, they perished in battles, some of them being betrayed by their soldiers, and others the victims of their own negligence; and yet, although they expected a sanguinary end, they did not escape it. But four (4) only survived, and so the whole empire of Alexander was divided into four (4) parts. For Seleucus, whose successor was Antiochus, obtained Upper Asia, that is, the eastern empire; Antigonus, Asia Minor, with a part of Cilicia, and Phrygia, and other neighbouring regions; Ptolemy seized upon Egypt and a part of Africa; Cassander and then Antipater were kings of Macedon. By 'four (4) wings' and 'four (4) heads', Daniel means that partition which was made immediately after the death of Alexander. Now, therefore, we understand what God shewed to his Prophet under this vision, when he set before him the image of a leopard with four (4) wings and heads.

He says, 'Power was given to the beast', because the success of Alexander the Great was incredible. For who would have thought, when he was crossing the sea, that he would have conquered all Asia and the East? He led with him 30,000 men, and did not undertake the war on his own responsibility alone, but by various arts, he procured the nomination to the leadership of Greece from the Free States. Alexander was, therefore, a kind of mercenary of the Greeks, and was unable to lead with him more than 30,000 men, as we have said. He engaged in battle with 150,000, then with 400,000, and then with almost a myriad (million, 1,000,000). For Darius in his last battle had collected above 800,000 men besides camp-followers, so that there were almost a million (1,000,000) with him. Alexander had already drawn to himself some auxiliaries from the foreign nations whom he had conquered; but he could not trust them: hence his whole strength lay in these 30,000, and on the day on which he conquered Darius, he was so overcome by sleep that he could scarcely be aroused. The historians who extol his prudence, excuse this by recording his sleeplessness during the preceding night; besides, all agree in stating him to have been apparently dead, and when all his generals approached they could scarcely wake him up, and then they purposely raised a shout around his tent, though no one dared to enter. Alexander had scarcely wiped his eyes, when Darius fled; hence the Prophet's statement is true — "a beast's power was given to him", since this happened beyond every natural expectation and every human opinion, as by his aspect alone he could frighten all Greece, and lay prostrate so large an army. He states this of the Third (3rd) Empire. I will not repeat here all that can be said and can be gathered from history; for 'many things must be put off till the eleventh (11) chapter'. I will therefore briefly compress whatever points seem necessary for the interpretation of the passage. It now follows:"

7:7. "There is greater difficulty in this Fourth (4th) Monarchy. Those who are endued with moderate judgment, confess this vision to be fulfilled in the Roman Empire; but they afterwards disagree, since what is here said of the fourth (4th) beast many transfer to the Pope, when it is added a Little Horn sprang up; but others think the Turkish kingdom is comprehended under the Roman. The Jews for the most part incline this way, and they are necessarily compelled to do so, since Daniel will afterwards add — 'I saw the throne of the Son of Man'; since it is clear, from this prediction, that Christ's kingdom was erected by the overthrow of the Roman dominion, the Jews turn round, and, as I have said, join the Turkish monarchy with the Roman, since they do not find their Christ (Messiah) according to their imagination. And there are some of our writers who think this image ought not to be restricted to the Roman Empire, but ought to include the Turkish. In my view, there is nothing probable in that opinion; I have no doubt that in this vision the Prophet was shewn the figure of the Roman Empire, and this will be more apparent as we go on.

He says 'a fourth (4th) beast appeared'. He gives it no fixed name, because nothing ever existed like it in the world. The Prophet, by adding no similitude, signifies how horrible the monster was, for he formerly compared the Chaldean Empire to a lion, the Persian to a bear, and the Macedonian to a leopard. In these comparisons there was something natural; but when he descends to the fourth (4th) beast, he says, it was 'formidable in its aspect, and terrible, and very brave' or strong, and without any addition calls it "a beast." We see then his wish to express something prodigious by this fourth (4th) beast, as there is no animal so fierce or cruel in the world which can in any way represent with sufficient strength the nature of this beast. 'Behold', therefore, 'the fourth (4th) beast which was formidable, and fearful, and very strong'. We know of no such Monarchy before this. Although Alexander subdued the whole of the East, his victory, we are sure, was not stable. He was content with fame alone; he granted liberty to all people; and as long as they flattered him, he sought nothing else. But we know the Romans to have been masters even as far as Babylon; we know the following countries to have been subdued by them: Asia Minor, Syria, Cilicia, Greece, and Macedon, both the Spains, Gaul, Illyricum, and part of Germany. At length Britain was subjugated by Julius Caesar. No wonder this beast is called formidable and very strong! For before Julius Caesar became master of the Empire, the whole Mediterranean Sea was in all its parts under subjection to the Roman Empire. Its amazing extent is well known. Egypt had indeed its own kings, but they were tributary; whatever edicts the Romans decreed, they were executed immediately in Egypt. Minor sovereigns existed in Asia Minor as a kind of spies, but this state of things we shall treat presently. It is also well known that they possessed supreme power throughout the Mediterranean Sea, and that by the conquest of Mithridates. Pompey reduced Pontus under his dominion. In the East affairs were all at peace. The Medes and Persians gave them some trouble, but they never moved unless they were provoked. The Spains (Spaniards) were not yet accustomed to the yoke, but we know that there were always two praetors there. Julius Caesar was the first who entered Britain after subduing Gaul. Hence we see how far and wide the Romans extended their power, and with what immense cruelty. Hence Daniel calls this beast 'formidable and very strong'.

He afterwards adds, 'It had large iron teeth'. This ought to be referred to its audacity and insatiable greediness. We see how completely free their nation was from the fear of death, for they were so hardened that if any one deserted his rank for the sake of avoiding danger, he was afterwards branded with such marks of infamy, that he was compelled either to strangle himself or to incur a voluntary death! There was, then, a certain brutal cruelty in that nation, and we also know how insatiable they were. For this reason Daniel says 'they had large iron teeth'. He adds, 'it consumed and broke to pieces, and trod the remnant under foot'. These things are spoken allegorically, not only because this vision was offered to the holy Prophet, but also because God wished to paint a kind of living image, in which he might shew the peculiar characters of each government. For we know how many lands the Romans had consumed, and how they transferred to themselves the luxuries of the whole world, and whatever was valuable and precious in Asia Minor, and Greece, and Macedonia, as well as in all islands and in Asia Major—all was swept away—and even this was insufficient to satisfy them! This, then, is the ravenousness of which the Prophet now speaks, 'since they consumed', says he, 'and rubbed to pieces with their teeth'. He adds, 'they trod the remnant under their feet'—a metaphor worthy of notice, as we know they were accustomed to distribute the prey which they could not carry with them. They devoured and tore with their teeth the treasures and costly furniture and everything else; for their supplies were provided by tributes which produced large sums of money. If there was any portion of the Mediterranean which they could not defend without keeping a permanent garrison there, we know how they engaged the services of tributary kings. Thus the kingdom of Eumenes increased to a great extent till the time of his grandson Attains, but they bestowed it partly on the Rhodians, and partly on the Cyprians and others. They never remunerated those allies who almost exhausted their own possessions in aiding them, out of their own resources, but enriched them with the spoils of others; and they not only seized upon the property of one city and bestowed it on another, but they set up their lands for sale. Thus, the liberty of the Lacedaemonians was betrayed to the tyrant Nabis. They also enriched Masinissa with so much wealth, that they acquired Africa for themselves by his means. In fine, they so sported with kingdoms in seizing and giving them away, that they rendered provinces tranquil by the wealth and at the expense of others. This was remarkably conspicuous in the case of Judea, where they created out of nothing Ethnarchs and Tetrarchs and kings, who were nothing but their satellites—and that too but for a moment. For as soon as any change occurred, they retracted what they had given as easily as they bestowed it. Hence, this their cunning liberality is called treading under foot; for that remnant which they could not devour and consume with their teeth 'they trod under foot', as they kept all those whom they had either enriched or increased subject to themselves. Thus we see with what servility they were flattered by those who had obtained anything through their generosity. And how degrading was the slavery of Greece from the time the Romans entered the country! for as each state acquired any new territory, it erected a temple to the Romans. They also sent their ambassadors there to act as spies, who, under the pretence of punishing the neighbouring people for plotting against them, enriched themselves by plunder. Thus the Romans held under their feet whatever they had given to others. We see then how suitably and properly the Prophet speaks, when he says, the Romans trod down the remnant; for whatever they could not consume, and what their voraciousness could not devour, 'they trod under their feet'.

He adds afterwards, 'And this beast differed from all the former ones, and had ten (10) horns'. When he says, 'this beast was different from the rest', he confirms what we formerly said, namely, this was a horrible prodigy, and nothing could be compared to it in the nature of things. And surely if any one attentively and prudently considers the origin of the Romans, he would be astonished at their remarkable progress to such great power; for it was an unusual monster, and nothing like it had ever appeared. Interpreters treat in various ways what the Prophet subjoins respecting 'the ten horns'. I follow a simple and genuine opinion, namely, the Prophet means this Empire to belong to more persons than one. For the angel will afterwards assert the ten (10) horns to be kings; not that so many kings ruled at Rome, according to the foolish dream of the Jews, who are ignorant of all things; but the Prophet here distinguishes the Fourth (4th) Monarchy from the rest, as if he had said it should be a popular government, not presided over by one king, but divided into many heads. For they even divided provinces among themselves, and made treaties with each other, so that one was governor of Macedonia, another of Cilicia, and another of Syria. Thus we see how numerous the kingdoms were. And with regard to the number ten (10), we know this to be a frequent and usual form of speech in Scripture, where ten (10) signifies many. When plurality is denoted, the number ten (10) is used. Thus when the Prophet states the fourth (4th) beast to have ten (10) horns, he means, there were many provinces so divided, that each ruler, whether proconsul or praetor, was like a king. For the supreme power was given to them, while the city and Italy were given up to the consuls. The consul could indeed write to the provinces and command whatever he pleased; then he could elevate to honour whom he pleased for the sake of favour and friendship; but each of the praetors and proconsuls when he obtained a province, became a kind of king, since he exercised the supreme power of life and death over all his subjects. We need not be too anxious about the number, as we have already explained it. Those who reckon the Roman provinces make great mistakes; they omit the principal one; they make only one (1) of Spain, and yet we know there were two (2). They do not divide Gaul, yet there were always two (2) proconsuls there, except under Julius Caesar, who obtained the command of both Gauls. So also they speak of Greece, and yet neither a proconsul nor a praetor was ever sent into Greece. Finally, the Prophet simply means that the Roman Empire was complex, being divided into many provinces, and these provinces were governed by leaders of great weight at Rome, whose authority and rank were superior to others. Proconsuls and praetors obtained the provinces by lot, but favour frequently prevailed, as the histories of those times sufficiently assure us. Let us proceed:"

7:8. "Daniel proceeds with his description of the fourth (4th) beast. First, he says, 'he was attentive', with the intention of rousing us to serious meditation. For what is said of the fourth (4th) beast, was remarkably memorable and worthy of notice. This, then, is the reason why God struck the heart of His servant with wonder. For the Prophet would not have given his attention to the consideration of the fourth (4th) beast, unless he had been impelled to it by the secret instinct of God. The Prophet's attention, then, sprang from a heavenly impulse. Wherefore it is our duty not to read carelessly what is here written, but to weigh seriously and with the greatest diligence what the Spirit intends by this vision. 'I was attentive', therefore, says he, 'to the horns, and behold one small one arose among them'. Here interpreters begin to vary; some twist this to mean the Pope, and others the Turk; but neither opinion seems to me probable; they are both wrong, since they think the whole course of Christ's kingdom is here described, while God wished only to declare to his Prophet what should happen up to the first (1st) advent of Christ. This, then, is the error of all those who wish to embrace under this vision the perpetual state of the Church up to the end of the world. But the Holy Spirit's intention was completely different. We explained at the beginning why this vision appeared to the Prophet —because the minds of the pious would constantly fail them in the dreadful convulsions which were at hand, when they saw the supreme dominion pass over to the Persians. And then the Macedonians broke in upon them, and acquired authority throughout the whole of the East, and afterwards those robbers who made war under Alexander suddenly became kings, partly by cruelty and partly by fraud and perfidy, which created more strife than outward hostility. And when the faithful saw all those monarchies perish, and the Roman Empire spring up like a new prodigy, they would lose their courage in such confused and turbulent changes. Thus this vision was presented to the Prophet, that all the children of God might understand what severe trials awaited them before the advent of Christ.

Daniel, then, does not proceed beyond the promised redemption, and does not embrace, as I have said, the whole kingdom of Christ, but is content to bring the faithful to that exhibition of grace which they hoped and longed for.

It is sufficiently clear, therefore, that this exhibition ought to be referred to the first (1st) advent of Christ. I have no doubt that 'the little horn' relates to Julius Caesar and the other Caesars who succeeded him, namely, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, and others. Although, as we said before, the counsel of the Holy Spirit must be attended to, which leads the faithful forwards to the beginning of the reign of Christ, that is, to the preaching of the Gospel, which was commenced under Claudius, Nero, and their successors. He calls it 'a little horn', because Caesar did not assume the name of king; but when Pompey and the greater part of the senate were conquered, he could not enjoy his victory without assuming to himself supreme power. Hence he made himself tribune of the people and their dictator. Meanwhile, there were always Consuls; there was always some shadow of a Republic, while he daily consulted the senate and sat in his seat while the consuls were at the tribunals. Octavius followed the same practice, and afterwards Tiberius also. For none of the Caesars, unless he was consul, dared to ascend the tribunal; each had his own seat, although from that place he commanded all others. It is not surprising, then, if Daniel calls the monarchy of Julius and the other Caesars 'a little horn', its splendour and dignity were not great enough to eclipse the majesty of the senate; for while the senate retained the name and form of honour, it is sufficiently known that one man alone possessed the supreme power. He says, therefore, 'this little horn was raised among the ten others'. I must defer the explanation of what follows, viz., 'three of these ten were taken away.'" }}

Lecture 34th.

{{ 7:8 continued. "Three things remain to be explained by us in expounding the Fourth (4th) Beast. First of all, 'Three (3) horns were taken away from its face'; Secondly (2nd), 'The little horn', which rose among the ten (10), appeared with human eyes; Thirdly (3rd), 'It spoke magnificently', or uttered swelling words. With regard to the three (3) horns, it is sufficiently evident from the testimony of the angel that they were three (3) kings; not because this ought to be referred to persons, as I yesterday disproved, but because the Romans were accustomed to send to each province, rulers like kings who there exercised the supreme authority. Those who extend this prophecy to the end of Christ's kingdom, think that a dispersion which happened about three (300) or five (500) hundred years after the death of Christ is intended; but they are greatly mistaken. Clearly enough the whole strength of the Roman Empire was exhausted and the provinces gradually cut off, till it became a kind of mutilated body; but we yesterday shewed the incorrectness of any explanation of this oracle, except concerning the state of the Church at the first (1st) Advent of Christ and the preaching of the Gospel. At that time, it is well known, nothing had been subtracted from the boundaries of the Empire. For Julius Caesar was formidable not only to the Gauls, but also to the Germans; and besides this, the affairs of the East were at peace. After his death, although Octavius or Augustus had suffered two very destructive slaughters, especially under Quintilius Varus, who had been sent into Germany with a powerful army, yet he also extended the boundaries of the Empire, especially in the East. He also subdued the whole of Spain, where no commotions afterwards took place. As, therefore, at that period no province had been cut off from the Roman Empire, what is the meaning of the expression, 'Three (3) horns were cut off and removed from the face of the beast'? The solution is not difficult. Only let us observe how the little horn is compared with the first (1st) stature of the beast. It first appeared with ten (10) horns; when the little horn arose its figure was changed. The Prophet then says —a part of the horns was cut off, as the senate then ceased to create proconsuls. For we know how Augustus assumed to himself certain provinces, and he did this for the purpose of creating presidents at his own will, and of constituting a strong force, ever at hand, should any one rebel against him. For he did not care so much about provinces as about an army, should any tumult arise. He was desirous, therefore, of throwing a bridle over them all, lest any one should dare to attempt a revolution. Whatever was thus added to the little horn was taken from the ten (10) horns, that is, from the whole body, as the state of the monarchy was entirely changed. There is nothing forced in this exposition. We must also contend for a definite or fixed number being put for an uncertain one (1) ; as if the Prophet had said —a part of the power of the beast was abstracted after the rising of the little horn. Thus much for the first (1st) clause.

He now adds, 'The eyes in this small horn were like those of men'; and then, 'it spoke mighty things'. With respect to the eyes, this expression implies —the form of a human body was exhibited, because the Caesars did not abolish the senate nor change at once the whole form of the government; but, as we yesterday said, they were content with power; and as to splendour, titles, and pomp, they readily left these to the consuls and the senate. If any one considers the manner in which those Caesars, who are doubtless intended 'by the little horn', conducted themselves, their conduct will appear like a human figure. For Julius Caesar pretended, although he was dictator, to obey the senate's authority, and the consuls asked the opinion of the senators, after the ancient manner. He sat in the midst, and permitted many things to be decreed without interposing his will. Augustus also abused the shadow of the tribunitial power only for the purpose of ruling the Empire. Thus he submitted to the consuls; and when he wished to be elected to that office, he became a candidate with the other competitors, and put on the white robe like a private citizen. Tiberius also was a great pretender, and while plotting schemes of tyranny, was neither open nor ingenuous in his plans. So also 'the eyes of a man appeared in the little horn', that is, after this change took place and the senate and people were deprived of their liberty. He who held the government of the republic was not formidable, as an entire beast, but was like a private man as to outward form.

The Prophet adds, 'The small horn had a loud sounding mouth'. For although, with the view of conciliating favour, the Caesars conducted themselves like men, we know how atrociously they threatened their enemies, and how imperiously they either hindered or committed whatever they lusted, as it seemed good to them. There was, then, a great difference between their mouth and their eyes. For, as we already said, the splendour and dignity of the empire was in the power of the consuls and senate at the beginning. Meanwhile, by insidious arts, the Caesars drew towards themselves the whole power, till no one dared to do anything, except at their bidding. Many interpreters explain this as blasphemy against God, and impiety; and the angel will touch upon this point at the close of the chapter. But if we weigh the whole expression judiciously, what I say will appear correct, and the loud speaking here mentioned by the Prophet will signify, that pride with which the Caesars were puffed up, imposing silence on all men and allowing no one to open their mouths contrary to their will. The Prophet's words are very well explained by this fact; for 'the three (3) horns being removed from the ten (10)', means some part of the empire was separated from the main body; then, the small horn being endued with human eyes, implies a kind of modesty, as the Caesars acted like private persons, and left outward shew with the senate and people; and thirdly, when the mouth of the little horn spoke swellingly, trepidation seized upon all the Romans, and especially whoever enjoyed any reputation, hung upon the nod of the Caesars, who imposed the vilest slavery, and received the foulest and most shameful flattery from the whole senate. It now follows:"

7:11. "Since the presumptuous speaking of the little horn terrified the Prophet, he now says he was 'attentive in considering this portion'. He next says, 'The beast was slain, and his body was consumed by the burning of fire'. This ought clearly to be referred to the end of the Roman empire. For, from the time when foreigners obtained the mastery, the fourth (4th) beast ceased to flourish. The name was always retained, yet with great mockery of that ancient monarchy. I now omit all mention of Caligula, Nero, Domitian, and similar monsters. But when Spaniards and Africans acquired the absolute sway, can we call Rome any longer the mistress of the world! Surely this would be foolish indeed! To this very day the Germans also say they possess the Roman empire; but while the title of empire has passed to the Germans, clearly enough Rome is at this very day in slavery. For as to the Pope having erected his own throne there, this empire is unworthy of the name of monarchy; but what ever be our view of this point, for about 1500 years the Romans have been in bondage as slaves to foreign princes. For, after the death of Nero, Trajan was his successor, and from that time scarcely a single Roman obtained the empire; and God branded it with the most disgraceful marks of ignominy, when a swine-herd was created emperor, and that too by the lust of the soldiery! The senate retained its name till then; but if it pleased the soldiers to create any one a Caesar, the senate was immediately compelled to submit to their dictation. Thus, the Prophet with great propriety says, 'The beast was slain' shortly after the promulgation of the gospel. Then the presumptuous speaking of 'the little horn' was at an end, and 'the fourth (4th) beast' was extinct about the same time. For then no Roman became an Emperor who claimed for himself any share of power; but Rome itself fell into disgraceful slavery, and not only foreigners reigned there most shamefully, but even barbarians, swine-herds, and cow-herds! All this occurred in fulfilment of what God had shewn to his Prophet, namely, after the coming of Christ and the opening of the books, that is —after the knowledge which shone upon the world through the preaching of the gospel— the destruction of that fourth (4th) beast and of the Roman empire was close at hand."

}}

Lecture 36th.

{{ 7:17-18. "Here the angel answers Daniel concerning the four (4) beasts which had been shewn him in the vision. He says, therefore, 'Four (4) kingdoms arose', and by the name kingdom he means monarchy; for we know that the Persians had many kings until Alexander transferred to himself the empire of the East. Although Cyrus had seven (7) or eight (8) successors, yet the Persian empire continued through them all. And as we saw before, although whatever Alexander had acquired by his arms was divided among his four (4) successors, yet it still remained the Macedonian kingdom. The same thing must be said concerning the fourth (4th) kingdom. Although we know consuls to have been created yearly at Rome, yet that government lasted till Julius Caesar destroyed it, and consumed the strength of the empire, so as to surpass by his power the splendid altitude which had been long and widely conspicuous in the world. Hence the angel replied, 'By the four (4) beasts four (4) kingdoms' are denoted: he says, 'shall arise'; and yet the Chaldean had long ago arisen, and was now verging under Belshazzar to its fall. But it was proposed by the angel to teach the Prophet and all the people that there was no reason why revolutions should disturb them too much. The Israelites then saw themselves lying as if dead, yea, actually buried and concealed under the earth. For exile was to them equivalent to the tomb. For this reason, then, the angel announces 'the springing up of four (4) kingdom', while the first (1st) was then flourishing; but, as I have already said, this suits very well with the scope and object of the prophecy. He had formerly said 'from the sea', but the word "sea" is used metaphorically, since the condition of the earth was turbulent through many ages. As, therefore, nothing was stable, God appropriately set forth the whole world under the figure of the sea. He afterwards adds, 'They will obtain the kingdom of the holy lofty ones'. Here interpreters vary considerably, because, as I have before explained it, some take this prophecy to relate to the kingdom of Turkey, others to the tyranny of the Pope of Rome, and extend what the Prophet here says to the final judgment. There is nothing surprising, then, in this diversity of opinion shewing itself more fully in the various details. By 'sacred holy ones' some understand angels; but there is still much controversy about the words, for the noun 'of saints' is "in regimen," as if the Prophet had said saints of lofty ones, properly speaking. Similar passages justify those who take it "in the absolute state." But if we follow the grammatical construction, we cannot explain it other wise; but the former noun may be put in a state of regimen, as we have said. And I embrace this opinion. Some refer it to the one God, but I think this a profane way of expression. I have no doubt about the Prophet meaning sons of God by 'sacred lofty ones', because, though they are pilgrims in the world, yet they raise their minds upwards, and know themselves to be, citizens of the heavenly kingdom. Hence by the word ('lywnyn) 'gnelionin', "lofty ones," I have no doubt the Prophet means heavenly powers; that is, whatever we can conceive of divinity, and whatever is exalted above the world. I will now give my reasons shortly why I like this sense the best.

If we call 'the holy lofty ones' God Himself, what sense can we elicit from the passage? Did the Chaldeans and the rest of the monarchies usurp and transfer to themselves the power of God? There is some truth in this, because all who domineer without submitting to the one God despoil Him of His peculiar honour, and are rather robbers than kings. But the Prophet, in my opinion, understood something else from the angel, namely, that the Church should lose all form and dignity in the world during the flourishing of these four (4) monarchies. We know the sons of God to be heirs of the world; and Paul, when speaking of the promise given to Abraham, says, he was chosen by God as heir of the world. (Rom. 4:13; Heb. 1:2) And this doctrine is sufficiently known —the world was created for the sake of the human race. When Adam fell from his lawful rights, all his posterity became aliens; God deprived them of the inheritance which he had designed for them. Now, therefore, our inheritance must be restored through Christ, for which reason He is called the only heir of the world. Thus it is not surprising if the angel says that tyrants, when they exercise supreme dominion, assume and arrogate to themselves the peculiar property of the sacred lofty ones, meaning the people of God. And this suits very well with the assertions of the present passage concerning the Church being deprived of its dignity, eminence, and visibility in the world. For then God's people were like a putrid carcase, the limbs of which were separated and dispersed on all sides, without any hope of restoration. Lastly, although by the permission of Darius, and the edict and liberality of Cyrus, some portion of them returned to their country, yet what was that nominal return? They had but a precarious dwelling in the inheritance divinely promised them; they were pressed on all sides by their enemies, and were subject to the lust and injustice of them all. For the Church had no empire under the Persians. After the third (3rd) change we know how miserably they were afflicted, especially under Antiochus. That nation was always opposed to them, but then they were almost reduced to extremities, when Antiochus endeavoured furiously to abolish the whole law and worship of God. Under the Macedonian kingdom the Jews were in constant slavery; but when the Roman army penetrated those regions, they felt the horrible tyranny of the fourth (4th) beast, as we have already seen. Lastly, it is sufficiently evident from the continual history of those times, that the sons of God were always under the yoke, and were not only cruelly but ignominiously treated.

Thus this prophecy was fulfilled, namely, 'The four (4) beasts took upon themselves the empire which properly belonged to the sacred lofty ones'; that is, to God's elect sons, who, though dwellers on earth, are dependent on heaven. In this interpretation I see nothing forced, and whoever prudently weighs the matter will, as I hope, recognise what I have said as the meaning of the Prophet. The latter clause now follows: 'They shall obtain the kingdom', says he, 'for ever, and even forever and ever'. A difficult question arises here, because by these words Daniel, or the angel addressing him, seems to express a perpetual condition under these four (4) monarchies. Belshazzar was the last king of the Babylonian dynasty, and at the period of this vision the overthrow of that monarchy was at hand. With regard to the Persian kings, there were only eight (8) of them besides Cyrus. And concerning Alexander we know a sudden change happened; the terror of him spread abroad like a storm, but it vanished away after it had affected all the people of the East. The Macedonian kingdom also suffered a concussion, when those leaders began to disagree among themselves who had obtained from Alexander authority and rank; and at length the kingdom became fourfold (40), as we have already stated, and shall mention again. Now if we count the years, the length of those monarchies was not so great as to justify the epithet "perpetual." I reply, this must be referred to the sensations of the pious, to whom that delay seemed specially tedious, so that they would have pined away in their miseries, had not this prophecy in some way relieved them. We see at the present moment how great is the fervour of desire when reference is made to the help of God; and when our minds have been heated with desire, they immediately decline to impatience. It thus happens that the promises of God do not suffice to sustain us, because nothing is more difficult than to bear long delay. For if the Church in our time had been oppressed for a hundred (100) years, what constancy would have been discerned in us? If a whirlwind arises, we are astonished, and cry out, "What next? what next?" Three (3) or four (4) months will not have elapsed before all men enter upon a strife with God and expostulate with Him, because He does not hasten at once to bring assistance to His Church. We are not surprised, then, at the angel here assigning one (1) age, or even an "age of ages," to tyrants under whom the Church should be oppressed. Although I do not doubt the reference to the fulness of times, as we know Christ to have been the end of the Law, and as His advent drew nearer, so God admonished the faithful to carry forward their own expectations to the advent of their Redeemer. When, therefore, the angel uses the phrase 'one (1) age and an age of ages', I have no doubt that he defined the time for the elect, to strengthen them in patiently bearing trouble of all kinds, as this had been divinely decreed; for the four (4) beasts were to reign not only for a few years, but for continual ages; that is, until the time of renovation had arrived for the world, when God completely restored His Church. Let us proceed:"

7:19-20. "...He says, therefore, 'He also inquired about the ten (10) horns which were on the head of the beast, and of the other horn which had arisen', meaning the small one (1), 'and concerning the three (3) horns falling from the face of the beast'. We have shewn how provinces were denoted by the ten (10) horns, and how the difference between the Roman Empire and other monarchies was pointed out, because there never was one (1) supreme ruler at Rome, except when Sylla and Marius exercised their usurped authority—but each for only a short time. Here then the continual state of the Roman Empire is under review, for it was not simply a single (1) animal, as it had ten (10) horns. A finite number is put for an indefinite one. With regard to the little horn, I said it referred to the Caesars, who attracted the whole government of the state to themselves, after depriving the people of their liberty and the senate of their power, while even under their sway some dignity was continued to the senate and some majesty retained by the people. We have explained also how the three (3) horns were broken; that is, how craftily the Caesars infringed upon and diminished the strength of both people and senate. Lastly, we have accounted for this little horn being displayed with human eyes, since the Caesars exercised their dominion with cunning, when they pretended to be only tribunes of the people, and allowed the ensigns of empire to remain in the hands of the consuls; for when they came into the senate, they sat in a lowly situation in curule seats prepared for the tribunes. As, therefore, they tyrannized with such cleverness and cunning, instead of by open violence, they are said to be endowed with the eyes of a man. Then as to the tongue, the sense is the same; for although they always professed the consular power to be supreme in the state, yet they could not restrain themselves, but vomited forth many reproachful speeches. On the one side, we see them remarkable for eyes, and on the other, for the tongue. 'And its aspect was terrible beyond its companions'. This seems not to belong peculiarly to the little horn which had arisen among the ten (10), but rather to the fourth (4th) beast. But if any one wishes to understand it of the little horn, I will not contest the point, as it will thus make tolerable sense. But I rather embrace my former opinion, for it is not surprising to find the Prophet after his discourse on the little horn, returning to the beast himself."

7:21-22. "The Prophet now adds what he had omitted. The angel does not yet answer him, but as he had not sufficiently expressed how the little horn waged war with the sons of God, he now supplies the omission. He says, therefore, he saw—this ought to be received by way of correction; I saw, says he, meaning it was shewn me in a vision, how the little horn 'made war with the saints so as to prevail against them'. Clearly enough other tyrants assailed the elect people of God with far greater injury. Hence many refer this to Antiochus Epiphanes, who was hostile to the Jews beyond all others, and was utterly determined to blot out the name of the God of Israel. And we know how often he raised powerful armaments to extinguish both the people and the worship of God. As, therefore, the cruelty of Antiochus was so severe against the Israelites, many think his image to have been exhibited to the Prophet as the little horn, and what we shall afterwards see about “the time,” and “times,” and “half-a-time,” they explain of the three years and a half (3 1/2 yrs) during which the Temple was in ruins, and the people thereby prevented from offering sacrifices. As, therefore, their religion was then interrupted, they think that tyranny was denoted, by which the people were prohibited from testifying their piety. But although this opinion is plausible, and at first sight bears upon the face of it the appearance of truth, yet if we weigh all things in order, we may easily judge how unsuitable it is to Antiochus. Why, therefore, does the Prophet say — ‘the little horn waged war with the saints’? Antiochus certainly made war against the Church, and so did many others; the Egyptians, we know, often broke in and spoiled the Temple and the Romans too, before the monarchy of the Caesars. I reply, this is spoken comparatively, because no war was ever carried on so continuously and professedly against the Church, as those which occurred after the Caesars arose, and after Christ was made manifest to the world; for the devil was then more enraged, and God also relaxed the reins to prove the patience of his people. Lastly, it was natural for the bitterest conflicts to occur when the redemption of the world was carried out; and the event clearly shewed this. We know first of all, by horrid examples, how Judea was laid waste, for never was such cruelty practised against any other people. Nor was the calamity of short duration; we are well acquainted with their extreme obstinacy, which compelled their enemies to forget clemency altogether. For the Romans desired to spare them as far as possible, but so great was their obstinacy and the madness of their rage, that they provoked their enemies as if devoting themselves to destruction, until that dreadful slaughter happened, of which history has sufficiently informed us. When Titus, under the auspices of his father Vespasian, took and destroyed the city, the Jews were stabbed and slaughtered like cattle throughout the whole extent of Asia. Thus far, then, it concerns the Jews.

When God had inserted the body of the Gentiles into His Church, the cruelty of the Caesars embraced all Christians; thus the little horn waged war with the saints in a manner different from that of the former beasts, because the occasion was different, and the wrath of Satan was excited against all God's children on account of the manifestation of Christ. This, then, is the best explanation of ‘the little horn waging war against the saints’. Thus he says, ‘It must prevail’. For the Caesars and all who governed the provinces of the empire raged with such extreme violence against the Church, that it almost disappeared from the face of the earth. And thus it happened, that the little horn prevailed in appearance and in general opinion, as, for a short time, the safety of the Church was almost despaired of.

It now follows, ‘Until the Ancient of days came, judgment was given to the saints of the lofty ones’. No doubt the Prophet says God came in the same sense as before; namely, when He erected His tribunal and openly appeared as the judge of the world in the person of Christ. He does not here set before us the Son of man, as He did before, but yet a fuller explanation of this passage is to be sought in the former one. ‘God’ then is said ‘to have come’, when He put forth His power in supplying the needs of the Church, as by a common figure He is said to be at a distance from us, and to sleep or to be reposing, when He does not shew Himself openly as our deliverer. So, on the other hand, He is said to come to us, when He openly proves His constant care of us. Under this figure Daniel now says he beheld the appearance of God Himself. ‘The Ancient of days’ then ‘came’. If we ask when, we have the reply at hand; it was immediately after the promulgation of the gospel. Then God stretched forth His hand for His Church, and lifted it out of the abyss. For since the Jewish name had been for a long time hated, and all people desired to exterminate the Jews from the world, Christ's advent increased this hatred and cruelty; and the license to injure them was added, as they thought Christ's disciples were plotting a change of government, and wished to overthrow the existing state of things; as in these days all the pious suffer grievously under this false imputation. God, therefore, is said to have come, when the doctrine of the gospel was more and more promulgated, and some rest granted to the Church. Thus, by this repose, ‘the saints received the kingdom’ which had been taken from them; that is, the kingdom of God and of the saints obtained some fame and celebrity in the world, through the general diffusion of the doctrine of piety, in every direction. Now, therefore, we understand what Daniel wished to convey by the phrase, 'The Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the lofty ones'. The remainder tomorrow." }}

Lecture 37th.

{{ 7:23-24. "...This reply of the angel is subject to the same obscurity as the vision itself, but it ought to be sufficient to calm the minds of the faithful to know that various changes should arise and shake the whole earth; for as many troubles were prepared for the saints, so also they were braced up to fortitude and endurance. For God was not willing fully to explain what He had shewn to His Prophet; He only wished to set before him this conclusion —a kingdom shall arise completely different from all others. Thus the angel says, The Fourth (4th) Beast signifies 'a fourth (4th) kingdom, which shall differ from all the kingdoms'. Previously to that period, no state was so extensive in its sway. For although the Spartans and Athenians performed illustrious and memorable exploits, yet we know them to have been included within narrow boundaries; and the ambition and wordy vanity of the Greeks caused them to celebrate those wars which were scarcely of any consequence, as we learn even from their own histories. Whichever way we take this, Sparta obtained with difficulty the second (2nd) rank in Greece, as Athens did the first (1st). As far as concerns the Roman Empire, we know it to have been more extensive and powerful than the other monarchies. When all Italy came under their sway, this was sufficient for any noble monarchy; but Spain, Sicily, part of Greece, and Illyricum were added, and afterwards all Greece and Macedon, Asia Minor, Africa, and all the islands; for by one word they expelled the king of Cyprus, and sold his goods by public auction. When the dregs of the people were collected, Claudius made a law for the banishment of the king of Cyprus, and this he accomplished by his single voice, without the use of force at all. No wonder then that God foretold 'how different this kingdom should be from all the others'; it had no single head; the senate had the chief authority, though all power was centred in the people. There was therefore a kind of mingled confusion, since the government of Rome was never settled. And if we weigh all things prudently, it was neither a republic nor a kingdom, but a confused compound, in which the people exercised great power in a tumultuous way, and the senate oppressed the people as much as it could. There were three (3) ranks —the senatorian, the equestrian, and the plebeian, and that mixture made the kingdom like a monster. The angel, therefore, announces 'the fourth (4th) kingdom as different from the others'.

He afterwards confirms what we said before; 'it will fall', says he, 'and break to pieces, and tread down the whole earth'. This was fulfilled after Gaul and Britain were subdued, Germany partially subjugated, and Illyricum, Greece, and Macedon, reduced to submission. At length they penetrated to Asia, and Antiochus was banished beyond the Taurus; his kingdom afterwards became their prey, then they obtained possession of Syria. The kings of Egypt were their allies, and yet became dependent upon their nod; the sovereign dared not appoint an heir, without consulting their pleasure. As, therefore, they ruled supremely so long and so widely, they fulfilled this prophecy 'by devouring the whole earth'. For such lust for dominion never existed before; wars were heaped upon wars, they were alike greedy of the blood of others, and by no means sparing of their own. The whirlpool was insatiable, while it absorbed the whole world, and their pride crushed it and trampled it under foot. Cruelty was added to pride, for all looked up to the Romans, and conciliated the favour of Rome by flattery, for the purpose of raging savagely against their own people. By these arts almost the whole of Greece perished. For they knew how many innocent persons everywhere perished in every city, a kind of diversion which delighted them; they were fully aware how easy it was to attract all the power of the whole world to themselves, when it was able to put forth neither strength, nor skill, nor power against them. For their nobles were constantly at variance; sometimes one faction and sometimes another was supreme, and thus the splendour of every city easily and gradually diminished. Thus all Greece was spoiled, and the Romans exercised their dominion there without difficulty, as over brute beasts. We may say the same of Asia also. We are not surprised then at the angel saying, 'the earth would be trodden down and trampled on by this fourth (4th) beast'.

He afterwards adds, 'The ten (10) horns are the ten (10) kings which should arise'. These Ten (10) Kings are clearly comprehended under one (1) empire, and there is no question here of separate persons. In the Persian kingdom, we observed many kings, and yet the image of the second (2nd) beast was single (1), while it embraced all those kings until the change occurred. So also now, when treating of the Romans, the Prophet does not assert that ten (10) kings should succeed each other in regular order, but rather the multiform nature of the kingdom, under more heads than one (1). For the royal office belonged to the senators or leading citizens, whose authority prevailed very extensively both with the senate and the people. And with reference to the number, we said the plural number only was denoted, without any limitation to the number ten (10). The conclusion is as follows, this kingdom should be like a single (1) terrible animal bearing many horns, since no single (1) king held the chief sway there, as was customary by common usage in other lands, but there should be a mixture, like many kings in place of one holding the pre-eminence. The fulfilment of this is sufficiently known from the history of Rome; as if it had been said, there should not be any single (1) king at Rome, as of Persia and other nations, but many kings at the same time, alluding to the mixture and confusion in which the supreme authority was involved.

The Little Horn follows: 'A king shall arise', says he, 'different from those former ones, and shall afflict three (3) kings'. We shewed how unintelligible this becomes, unless we refer it to the Caesars to whom the monarchy passed; for after long and continued and intestine strife, the whole power passed over to the Triumvirate. A conspiracy was entered into by Lepidus, Mark Antony, and Octavius. Octavius was then all but a boy, having scarcely arrived at manhood, but all the veteran soldiers were in his favour, in consequence of the name of Julius Caesar and his adoption by him. Hence he was received by the other two into that alliance, of which Lepidus was the first (1st), and Antony the second (2nd). At length discords arose among them, and Lepidus was deprived of his place in the triumvirate, and lived, as if half-dead, while his life was only spared to him because he was raised to the office of chief priest.

Reverence for the priesthood restrained Antony from putting him to death, as long as he was content to live in privacy and retirement. Octavius at length became supreme, but by what artifice? We said Julius Caesar took no more upon himself than the office of dictator, while consuls were annually elected as usual. He did not strain the power of the dictatorship beyond moderation, but he so restrained himself, that some popular rights might seem still to flourish. Octavius also followed the cunning of his uncle and adopted father. The same conduct will be found in the other Caesars, though there were many differences between them. As the shadow of a republic yet remained, while the senate was held in some degree of reverence, it is not surprising, if the angel predicts that the beast should survive, 'when another small horn should arise different from the others'.

He adds, 'And shall afflict the three (3) kings'. I have explained this point by the slight change which the Caesars effected in the provinces, for if any of the provinces were warlike, strong armies and veteran soldiers were usually sent there. The Caesars took these to themselves, while some executive management was left to the senate with regard to the other provinces. Lastly, by this form of speech, the angel portrays the coming dominion of the little horn, and its diminishing the strength of the former ones: and yet the beast should remain apparently entire; thus, the effigy of the republic was preserved, as the people were always designated —in the forum, by the high-sounding name, Romans, and in battle, as fellow-soldiers. Meanwhile, although the name of the Roman empire was so celebrated, and its majesty was in every one's mouth, the supreme authority was in the possession of one (1) little horn which lay concealed, and dared not openly raise its head. This, then, is the pith of the interpretation of what the angel here sets before us. It follows:" }}

Lecture 39th.

{{ 8:2-3. "... He next adds, 'The vision was shewn to me, Daniel, and I happened', says he, 'when I saw it, to be in Shushan'. Some think Daniel to be then dwelling in Persia, but this view is by no means probable; for who could persuade the holy Prophet of God, who had been led captive with the rest and was attached to the king of Babylon, to depart as if he had been entirely his own master, and to go into Persia when the Persians were then open enemies? This is not at all likely; and I wonder what can induce men to adopt this comment, so contrary to all reason. For we need not dispute about a matter by no means obscure if we weigh the Prophet's words, as he removes all doubt by saying 'he was in Shushan when he saw', that is, when he was caught up by the prophetic spirit beyond himself and above the world. The Prophet does not say he dwelt in Shushan, or in the neighbourhood, but he was there in the vision only. The next verse, too, sufficiently shews him to have then been in Chaldea —'in the third (3rd) year', he says, 'of the reign of King Belshazzar'. By naming the king, he clearly expresses that he then dwelt under his power and dominion. It is clearly to be gathered from these words, without the slightest doubt, that the Prophet then dwelt in Chaldea. And perhaps Babylon had been already besieged, as we saw before. He says 'he was in the palace at Shushan'. I know not how I ought to translate this word (hbyrh), 'hebireh', as I see no reason for preferring the meaning "palace" to that of "citadel." We are sure of the nobility and celebrity of the citadel which was afterwards the head of the East, for all nations and tribes received from thence their laws, rights, and judgments. At the same time, I think this citadel was not then built, for its empire over the Persian territory was not firmly established till the successors of Cyrus. We may perhaps distinguish Shushan from Persia at large, yet as it is usually treated as a part of that kingdom, I will not urge the distinction. The country is, however, far milder and more fertile than Persia, as it receives its name from being flowery and abounding in roses. Thus the Prophet says 'he was there in a vision'.

He afterwards repeats this: 'I saw in a vision, and behold I was near the river Ulai'. The Latin writers mention a river Eulaeus, and as there is a great similitude between the words, I have no hesitation in understanding Daniel's language of the Eulaeus. The repetition is not superfluous. It adds certainty to the prophecy, because Daniel affirms it not to have been any vanishing spectre, as a vision might be suspected to be, but clearly and certainly a divine revelation, as he will afterwards relate. He says, too, 'he raised his eyes upwards'. This attentive attitude has the same meaning, as experience informs us how often men are deceived by wandering in erroneous imaginations. But Daniel here bears witness to his raising his eyes upwards, because he knew himself to be divinely called upon to discern future events.

He next subjoins, 'And behold a ram stood at the bank of the river, and it had horns'. He now compares the empire of Persia and Media to a ram. It ought not to seem absurd that God proposed to his servant various similitudes, because his duty was to teach a rude people in various ways; and we know this vision to have been presented before the Prophet, not for his private instruction only, but for the common advantage of the whole people. I do not think we need scrupulously inquire why the Persian kings are called rams. I know of no valid reason, unless perhaps to institute a comparison between them and Alexander of Macedon and his successors. If so, when God, under the image of a ram, exhibits to His Prophet the Persian empire, He does not illustrate its nature absolutely, but only by comparison with that of Alexander. We are well aware of the opposition between these two (2) empires. The Persian monarchy is called "a ram," with reference to the Macedonian, which, as we shall afterwards see, bears the name of "he-goat" with respect to its antagonist. And we may gather the best reason for this comparison in the humble origin of the kings of Persia. With great propriety, then, Cyrus, the first (1st) ruler of this empire, is here depicted for us under the form or image of a ram. His "horn" produced a concussion through the whole earth, when no one expected anything to spring from a region by no means abounding in anything noble. And as to Alexander, he is called a "he-goat," with respect to the “ram,” as being far more nimble, and yet more obscure in his origin. For what was Macedon but a mere corner of Greece? But I do not propose to run the parallel between these points; it is sufficient that God wishes to shew to His Prophet and to the whole Church, how among the Persians, unknown as they were, and despised by their neighbours, a king should arise to consume the Median power, as we shall soon see, and also to overthrow the Babylonian monarchy. 'Behold', therefore, says he, 'a ram stood before the river', or at the bank of the river, since Cyrus subdued both the Medes and his grandfather, as historians inform us. Cyrus then rushed forth from his own mountains and stood at the bank of the river. He also says, He had two (2) horns. Here the Prophet puts two (2) horns for two (2) empires, and not by any means for two (2) persons. For although Cyrus married the daughter of Cyaxares his uncle, yet we know the Persian empire to have lasted a long time, and to have supplied historians with a long catalogue of kings. As Cyrus had so many successors, by the two (2) horns God doubtless shewed his Prophet those two (2) empires of the Medes and Persians united under one (1) sovereignty. Therefore, when the ram appeared to the Prophet, it represented both kingdoms under one (1) emblem.

The context confirms this by saying, 'The two horns were lofty, one higher than the other, and this was raised backwards'. The two horns were lofty; for, though the Persian territory was not rich, and the people rustic and living in woods, spending an austere life and despising all luxuries, yet the nation was always warlike. Wherefore the Prophet says this horn 'was higher than the other', meaning, than the empire of the Medes. Now Cyrus surpassed his father-in law Darius in fame, authority, and rank, and still he always permitted Darius to enjoy the royal majesty to the end of his life. As he was an old man, Cyrus might easily concede to him the highest office without any loss to himself. With respect then to the following period, Cyrus was clearly preeminent, as he was certainly superior to Darius, whom Xenophon calls Cyaxares. For this reason, then, 'this horn was higher'. But meanwhile the Prophet shews how gradually Cyrus was raised on high. The horn rose 'backwards'; that is, “afterwards” — meaning, although the horn of the Median kingdom was more illustrious and conspicuous, yet 'the horn which rose afterwards' obscured the brightness and glory of the former one. This agrees with the narratives of profane history: for every reader of those narratives will find nothing recorded by Daniel which was not fulfilled by the event. Let us go on:"

8:4. "The Prophet now shortly sketches the great success which should attend this double kingdom. He says, 'The ram struck all the nations towards the west, and north, and south'. The Persian and Median territory lay to the east of Babylon and Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, and Greece. This, without doubt, is extended to all the successors of Cyrus, who are recorded as having convulsed the whole world. Cyrus him self was shortly afterwards cruelly and basely slain, according to many historians, although Xenophon affirms that he died in his bed. But I have before warned you not to put your trust in that writer, although most excellent, since, under the image of that king, he wished to set before us an example of perfect manliness; and hence he brings him forward as discoursing on his deathbed, and exhorting his sons to kingly virtues. Whichever is the true account, Cyrus was clearly overtaken in the midst of his career. In this way God wished to chastise his insatiable cupidity, a vice in which he resembled Alexander. As to his successors, they excited such commotions in the whole world as to stir up heaven and earth. Xerxes alone said he could bind the sea with fetters! and we know the greatness of the army which he commanded; and this passage treats not only of one (1) king, but of all those of Persia. As they obtained a dominion so far and wide, their ambition and pride always inflamed them, and there was no end to their warfare till they had subdued the distant boundaries of the world. We are acquainted too with their numerous attempts to destroy the liberty of Greece. All this the Prophet embraces in but few words. God also wished to give his Prophet a short glance into futurity, as far as such knowledge could be useful. 'I saw', then, says he, 'a ram', namely, a beast which possessed a double horn, representing the Medes and Persians united in the same sovereignty.

'He struck the west, and the north, and the south, so that no beasts could stand before him'.

As the Persian kingdom is here depicted under the image of a ram, all kings and people are called "beasts." Thus, 'no beasts stood before him, and no one could deliver out of his hand'. It is well known, indeed, how Xerxes and others failed in their attacks, and how many wars the Monarchs of Persia attempted in which they were conquered by the Greeks; but still their conquerors were in no better condition, as they were compelled to seek peace like suppliants. So great became the power of the Persians, that they inspired all nations with fear. For this reason the Prophet says, 'he did according to his pleasure', not implying the complete success of these Monarchs according to their utmost wishes, for their desires were often frustrated, as we have already narrated on the testimony of historical evidence. Still they were always formidable, not only to their neighbours who submitted to their yoke, but to the most distant nations, as they crossed the sea and descended from Asia upon Greece. In the last word, he expresses this fact, 'the ram became mighty'. For the Persian king became the greatest of all Monarchs in the world, and it is sufficiently notorious that no one could add to his dignity and strength. It follows:"

8:5-6. "Here another change is shewn to the Prophet, namely, Alexander's coming to the east and acquiring for himself the mighty sway of the Persians, as afterwards happened. With the view, then, of procuring confidence for his prediction, he says, 'he was attentive'. He doubtless dwells upon the reverence with which he received the vision to exhort us to the pursuit of piety, and also to modesty and attention. The Prophet, therefore, was not carried away in imagination by a dream which could be called in question; he knew this vision to have been set before him by God, and acknowledged his duty to receive it with modesty and humility. Wherefore, 'I was attentive, and behold a he-goat came forth from the west', says he. The situation of Macedon with respect to Persia must be noticed. As the Greeks were situated to the west of Persia, the Prophet says, 'the he-goat came from the west, and went over the surface of the whole earth'. These words signify the very extensive dominion of Alexander, and the terror of surrounding nations. His arrival in Asia with a very insignificant army is well known. He thought 30,000 men sufficient, after he had been created their general by the States of Greece. Hence, the passage is to be understood not of numbers, but of the terror inspired on all sides; for, although he advanced with but a moderate force, yet he terrified the whole earth.

'But he did not touch the ground', says he. This refers to his swiftness, for he rather flew than travelled either on foot or by sea, so incredible was his speed in this expedition. For if any one had galloped through regions completely at peace, he could not have passed through Asia more speedily. Hence a he-goat was shewn to the Prophet who did not touch the ground, that is, who was borne along with a rapid impulse, like that of lightning itself. 'And the goat had a horn', says he, 'between its eyes' — a remarkable horn. We know how much glory Alexander acquired for himself in a short time, and yet he did not undertake the war in his own name, or on his own responsibility, but he used every artifice to obtain from the Grecian States the office of general-in-chief against the Persians, as perpetual enemies. We are well acquainted with the hostility of the Persians to the Greeks, who, though often compelled to retreat with great disgrace, and infamy, and loss of troops, still kept renewing the war, as they had abundance of men and of pecuniary resources. When Alexander was created general of the whole of Greece, he had a remarkable horn between his eyes; that is, he took care to have his title of general made known to increase his personal authority. Besides, it was sufficiently prominent to constitute him alone general of the whole army, while all things were carried on according to his will, as he had undertaken the war. This, then, is the reason why the Prophet says, the horn was visible between the eyes of the goat. It follows, 'It came to the ram, which had two (2) horns'; that is, it came against the king of the Medes and Persians. Cyrus also had seized on Babylon, and had subdued many kings, but two (2) horns are assigned to the ram, since the Persian kings had united the Medes in alliance to themselves. Hence one (1) he-goat with his horn came against the ram which had two (2) horns, and ran against it in the ardour of its bravery. Thus the perseverance of Alexander is denoted, as he hastened so as to surpass all expectation by the speed of his arrival. For Darius continued in security, although he had collected a large army, but Alexander rushed forwards in the boldness of his strength, and surrounded the enemy by his celerity. It follows:"

8:7. "Here God shews to His Prophet the victory of Alexander, by which he subdued almost the whole east. Although he encountered many nations in battle, and especially the Indians, yet the name of the Persian empire was so celebrated in the world, that the dignity of others never approached it. Alexander, therefore, by conquering Darius, acquired nearly the whole east. God shewed his Prophet the easiness of his victory under this figure. 'I looked', says he, 'when he approached the ram'. Darius was fortified by both the distance of his stations and the strength of his fortifications; for many of his cities were impregnable, according to the common opinion of mankind. It was incredible, then, that the he-goat should approach the ram, surrounded as he was on all sides by such strong and such powerful garrisons. But the Prophet says 'he approached the ram, and then, he exasperated himself against him'. This applies to Alexander's furious assaults. We are well acquainted with the keenness of his talents and the superiority of his valour; yet, such was his unbridled audacity, that his promptness approached rather to rashness than to regal bravery. For he often threw himself with a blind impulse against his foes, and it was not his fault if the Macedonian name was not destroyed ten (10) times over. As, then, he rushed on with such violent fury, we are not surprised when the Prophet says 'he was exasperated of his own accord. And he struck the ram', says he. He conquered Darius in two (2) battles, when the power of the Persian sway throughout Asia Minor was completely ruined. We are all familiar with the results of these hazardous battles, shewing the whole stress of the war to have rested on that engagement in which Darius was first conquered; for when he had collected fresh forces, and engaged a second (2nd) time, he despaired of his kingdom, was betrayed by his followers, and cruelly slain. Thus 'the he-goat struck the ram, and broke his two (2) horns'; for Alexander acquired the Median as well as the Persian empire.

He says, 'The ram had no strength to stand'; and although he had collected an immense multitude, yet that preparation was available for nothing but empty pomp. For Darius was resplendent with gold, and silver, and gems, and he rather made a shew of these luxuries in warfare, than displayed manly and vigorous strength. 'The ram', then, 'had no power to stand before the he-goat'. Hence, 'he threw him prostrate on the earth, and trod him down; and no one was able to deliver out of his hand'. Darius, indeed, was slain by his attendants, but Alexander trod down all his glory, and the dignity of the Persian empire, under which all the people of the east trembled. We are aware also of the pride with which he abused his victory, until under the influence of harlots and debauchees, as some report, he tumultuously set fire to that most celebrated citadel of Susae in a drunken fit. As he so indignantly trampled under foot the glory of the Persian monarchy, we see how aptly the events fulfilled the prophecy, in the manner recorded by all profane historians." }}

Lecture 40th.

{{ 8:8. "This prophecy relates to the death of Alexander. We have explained how, under the image of a he-goat, the Macedonian empire is set before us, having its beginning in the person of Alexander, but by no means ending there, as the monarchy was divided into four (4) parts. The angel said, or at least Daniel records his words, —'that he-goat increased to an immense magnitude', because he wandered as it were in sport through almost the whole east, and at the same time subdued it; 'but when it was in its strength', says he, 'its great horn was broken'. By the great horn, he means the monarchy, which was solely in Alexander's power during his life, as he was the first and last monarch of his race. And in consequence of his generals, who had obtained dominion in the four (4) quarters of the world, becoming kings, as we shall soon see, the word "he-goat" is not restricted to his person, but is extended to his successors. He himself is called "the great horn." Hence, 'when the he-goat was in his strength', the great horn was broken. For Alexander had arrived at the height of prosperity when he died. Whether he perished by disease or by poison is unknown, since historians report a great suspicion of foul-play. The angel does not notice his age, which was thirty-three (33) years at his death, while he seemed to have been born for subduing the whole world, although he was so suddenly snatched away. But the angel regards those continued successes, since Alexander almost by a look subdued the whole east, as we have stated before, and hurried on rashly from place to place. Hence he perpetually gained fresh victories, though at the constant hazard of his life, as he had far more audacity than skill. 'When he was in his strength', says he; meaning, after having subjugated the whole east. He had returned from India, and had determined to re-cross the sea, and to reduce Greece under his power; for the States had rebelled against him, and the Athenians had already collected a great army; but all the eastern States of Asia had been rendered subservient to Alexander when he died. The angel refers to this by 'the breaking of the great horn'.

He afterwards adds, 'In his place four (4) conspicuous horns sprang up'. For he uses the noun (chzwth), 'chezeveth', "notable," as in yesterday's Lecture. There were, therefore, four (4) kingdoms which excelled, and each of them was celebrated and placed aloft. Nor is this superfluous, since we know how many became kings, who had enlisted in the service of Alexander with reputation and dignity. Perdiccas was the first (1st), and all thought him to have been favoured with special honour by Alexander. When asked whom he wished for a successor, he replied, according to the greatness or pride of his spirit, "The person whom he considered most worthy of empire." He had a son by Roxana the daughter of Darius, as well as another son; then Aridaeus his brother approached; yet he deemed no one worthy of the honour of being his successor, as if the world contained no equal to himself. His answer, then, was a proof of his pride. But when he was unable to speak, he took a ring from his hand and gave it to Perdiccas. Hence all conjectured that he had the preference in Alexander's judgment, and he obtained the supreme authority. After this, Eumenes was slain, who had served under him. Although he was an ally, he was judged as an enemy, and betrayed by his men; Lysimachus being slain on the other side. Fifteen (15) generals were put to death. And as so many succeeded to the place of Alexander and exercised the royal authority, the angel correctly expresses how 'four (4) conspicuous horns sprang up in the place of one 91) great one'. For after various conflicts and many fluctuations for fifteen (15) years or thereabouts, Alexander's monarchy was at length divided into four (4) parts. Cassander, the son of Antipater, obtained the kingdom of Macedon, after slaying Olympias, the mother of Alexander, his sister, his sons, and his wife Roxana. This was a horrible slaughter, and if ever God offered a visible spectacle to the world, whereby he openly denounced the shedding of human blood, surely a memorable proof of this existed in the whole of Alexander's race! Not a single one survived for twenty (20) years after his death. Though his mother had grown old, she was not permitted to descend naturally to the grave, but was murdered. His wife, and son, and brother, and all his relations, shared her fate. And that slaughter was even yet more cruel, as no single (1) leader spared the life of his companions, but each either openly attacked or craftily assailed his friend and confederate! But omitting details, four (4) kingdoms were at last left after such remarkable devastations. For Cassander, the son of Antipater, obtained Macedon and some part of Thrace, together with the cities of Greece. Seleucus became master in Syria; Antigonus in Asia Minor, joining Phrygia, Paphlagonia, and all other Asiatic regions, after five or six generals were slain. Ptolemy became prefect of Egypt. This makes four (4) horns, which the angel calls "conspicuous," for on the testimony of history, all the other principalities vanished away. Alexander's generals had divided among themselves many large and fertile provinces, but at length they were summed up in these four (4) heads. He says, by the four (4) winds of heaven, that is, of the atmosphere. Now the kingdom of Macedon was very far distant from Syria; Asia was in the midst, and Egypt lay to the south. Thus, the he-goat, as we saw before, reigned throughout the four (4) quarters of the globe; since Egypt, as we have said, was situated towards the south; but the kingdom of Persia, which was possessed by Seleucus, was towards the east and united with Syria; the kingdom of Asia was to the north, and that of Macedon to the west, as we formerly saw the he-goat setting out from the west. It now follows:"

8:9. "... When the Prophet says, 'Out of one of those four (4) horns a little horn arose', Antiochus Epiphanes is most distinctly pointed out. The title Epiphanes means "illustrious," as, after the capture of his father, he was detained as a hostage at Rome, and then escaped from custody. Historians inform us of his possessing a servile disposition, and being much addicted to gross flattery. As he had nothing royal or heroic in his feelings, but was simply remarkable for cunning, the Prophet is justified in calling him 'the little horn'. He was far more powerful than his neighbours; but 'the horn' is called 'little', not in comparison with the kingdoms of either Egypt, or Asia, or Macedon, but because no one supposed he would ever be king and succeed his father. He was the eldest of many brothers, and singularly servile and cunning, without a single trait worthy of future royalty. Thus he was 'the little horn' who escaped secretly and fraudulently from custody, as we have already mentioned, and returned to his native country, which he afterwards governed.

He now adds, 'This horn was very mighty towards the south and the east, and "the desire":' for unless he had been checked by the Romans, he would have obtained possession of Egypt. There is a remarkable and celebrated story of Pompilius, who was sent to him to command him to abstain from Egypt at the bidding of the senate. After he had delivered his message, Antiochus demanded time for deliberation, but Pompilius drew a circle with the staff which he held in his hand, and forbade him to move his foot until he gave him an answer. Though he claimed Egypt as his own by right of conquest, yet he dared not openly to deny the Romans their request; at first he pretended to be merely the guardian of his nephew, but he certainly seized upon the kingdom in his own name. However, he dared not oppose the Romans, but by changing his ground wished to dismiss Pompilius. They had been mutual acquaintances, and a great familiarity had arisen between them while he was a hostage at Rome; hence he offered to salute Pompilius at the interview, but he rejected him disdainfully, and, as I have said, drew a line around him, saying, "Before you go out of this circle answer me; do not delude me by asking time to consult with your councillors; answer at once, otherwise I know how to treat thee." He was compelled to relinquish Egypt, although he had formerly refused to do so. The language of the Prophet, then, was not in vain, 'The small horn became mighty towards the south', that is, towards Egypt, 'and the east'; for he extended his kingdom as far as Ptolemais. In the third (3rd) place, he uses the word glory; that is, Judea, the sanctuary of God, which he had chosen as his dwelling, and desired his name to be invoked. Thus this small horn 'extended itself to the glory', or the land of glory or desire. There is nothing doubtful in the sense, though the interpretation scarcely agrees with the words. It afterwards follows:" }}

Lecture 41st.

{{ 8:13-14. "... Meanwhile, we must notice, how Christ is the chief of angels and also their instructor, because He is the eternal Wisdom of God. Angels, therefore, must draw all the light of their intelligence from that single (1) fountain. Thus angels draw us to Christ by their example, and induce us to devote ourselves to Him through the persuasion that this is the supreme and only wisdom. If we are His disciples, being obedient, humble, and teachable, we shall desire to know only what He will make manifest to us. But the angel asks, 'What is the meaning of the vision of the perpetual sacrifice, "and of the sin"' that is, what is the object of the vision concerning the abrogation of the perpetual sacrifice, and concerning the sin which lays waste? As to the second point, we explained yesterday the various opinions of interpreters, some twisting it to Antiochus, who impiously dared to violate God's temple, and others to the priests. But we said the people were intended, lest many, as they are accustomed, should blame the Almighty for so heavily afflicting the Church. But God wished to bear witness to the origin of this devastation from the sins of the people. It is just as if the angel had said, How long will the sacrifices cease? How long will this vengeance, by which God will chastise the wickedness of His people, endure? For the sin is called devastating, through being the cause of that calamity. It is afterwards added, 'how long will the sanctuary and the army be trodden down'? that is, how long will the worship of God, and true piety, and the people itself, be trodden down under this cruel tyranny of Antiochus? But this question has far more efficacy, than if the Prophet had said, as we saw yesterday, that the punishment should be uniform and temporal. It was now necessary to explain what had already been stated more clearly. Thus this question was interposed with the view of rendering Daniel more attentive, and of stirring up the people by this narrative to the pursuit of learning. For it is no common event when angels approach Christ for our sakes, and inquire into the events which concern the state and safety of the Church. As, therefore, angels discharge this duty, we must be worse than stony, if we are not urged to eagerness and carefulness in the pursuit of divine knowledge. We see, then, why this passage concerning the angel is interposed.

The phrase, 'And he said to me', now follows. This ought to be referred not to the angel inquiring, but to the Wonderful One. Whence we rather gather the great anxiety of the angel concerning the interpretation of the prophecy, not for his own sake, but for the common benefit of the pious. Respecting this Wonderful One, though I am persuaded He was the Son of God, yet whoever he was, he certainly does not reject the angel's request. Why then does he address Daniel rather than the angel? Because the angel was not seeking his own benefit, but took up the cause of the whole Church, as we have shewn how angels are occupied in our salvation. Thus also we see how the angel notices the Prophet's astonishment, when he was almost dead, and had not thought of inquiring for himself, or at least did not dare to break forth at once; for he afterwards recovered himself, and was raised up by the angel's hand, as we shall soon perceive. 'The Wonderful One said to me' —that is, the incomprehensible or the mysterious one said to me —'for two thousand three hundred (2,300) evenings and mornings, then the sanctuary shall be justified'. Here the Hebrews are mutually at variance whether they ought to understand the number of years or of months; but it is surprising to perceive how grossly they are deluded in so plain a matter. The expression, to evening and morning, is not doubtful, since Christ clearly means two thousand three hundred (2,300) days; for what else can the phrase, morning and evening, signify. It cannot be used of either years or months. Evidently we ought to understand natural days here, consisting of twenty-four (24) hours each. Those who receive it of years and months are wretchedly mistaken, and even ridiculous in their calculations. For some begin to calculate the time from Samuel, they next descend to the reign of Saul, and next to that of David; and thus they foolishly trifle, through not understanding the intention of Christ, who wished His Church to be forewarned of the coming empires and slaughters, with the view of rendering the faithful invincible, however sorely they may be oppressed on all sides. Christ therefore wished to hold up a light to direct all the elect through the approaching darkness under the tyranny of Antiochus, and to assure them that in the very depths of it they would not be deserted by the favour of God. Hope would thus elevate their minds and all their senses unto the promised termination. To what purpose, then, do those interpreters speak of the reigns of Saul and David. We see this to be altogether foreign and adverse to the mind of Christ, and to the use of this prophecy. No less absurd is the guess of those who prate about months. Their refutation would occupy three (3) or four (4) hours, and would be a waste of time, utterly profitless. It is sufficient to gather this simple meaning from the words —Christ does not speak here of years or months, but of days. We must now seek the true interpretation of the passage from the whole context. We have shewn how impossible it is to explain this prophecy otherwise than by Antiochus: the event itself proves this to be its meaning. Blind indeed must be those who do not hold this principle —the small horn sprang from one (1) of those remarkable and illustrious persons who came forth in place of one (1) very large horn. Boys even know this by reading the accredited history of those times. As Christ here alluded to the tyranny of Antiochus, we must observe how His words accord with the facts. Christ numbers 2300 days for the pollution of the sanctuary, and this period comprehends six (6) years and about four (4) months. We know the Jews to have used lunar years as well as months. They afterwards used intercalary periods, since twelve (12) lunar months did not correspond with the sun's course. The same custom prevailed among both Greeks and Romans. Julius Caesar first arranged for us the solar year, and supplied the defect by intercalary days, so that the months might accord with the sun's course. But however that was, these days, as I have said, fill up six (6) years and three (3 1/2) months and a half. Now, if we compare the testimony of history, and especially of the book of Maccabees, with this prophecy, we shall find that miserable race oppressed for six (6) years under the tyranny of Antiochus. The idol of Olympian Jove did not remain in the temple for six (6) continuous years, but the commencement of the pollution occurred at the first attack, as if he would insult the very face of God. No wonder then if Daniel understood this vision of six (6) years and about a third (1/3), because Antiochus then insulted the worship of God and the Law; and when he poured forth innocent blood promiscuously, no one dared openly to resist him. As, therefore, religion was then laid prostrate on the ground, until the cleansing of the temple, we see how very clearly the prophecy and the history agree, as far as this narrative is concerned. Again, it is clear the purifying of the temple could not have been at the end of the sixth (6) current year, but in the month (kslw), 'keslu', answering to October or November, as learned men prudently decide, it was profaned. For this month among the Jews begins sometimes in the middle of October, and sometimes at the end, according to the course of the moon; for we said the months and years were lunar. In the month Keslu the temple was polluted; in the month ('dr, 'Ader', about three (3) months afterwards, near its close, the Maccabees purged it. (1st Macc. 4:36.) Thus the history confirms in every way what Daniel had predicted many ages previously —nay, nearly three hundred (300) years before it came to pass. For this occurred a hundred and fifty (150) years after the death of Alexander. Some time also had already elapsed, as there were eight (8) or ten (10) kings of Persia between the deaths of Cyrus and Darius. I do not remember any but the chief events just now, and it ought to be sufficient for us to perceive how Daniel's predictions were fulfilled in their own season, as historians clearly narrate. Without the slightest doubt, Christ predicted the profanation of the temple, and this would depress the spirits of the pious as if God had betrayed them, had abandoned all care of His temple, and had given up His election and His covenant entirely. Christ therefore wished to support the spirit of the faithful by this prediction, thereby informing them how fully they deserved these future evils, in consequence of their provoking God's wrath; and yet their punishment should be temporary, because the very God who announced its approach promised at the same time a prosperous issue.

Respecting the phrase, 'the sanctuary shall be justified', some translate it —“Then the sanctuary shall be expiated;” but I prefer retaining the proper sense of the word. We know how usually the Hebrews use the word “justify” when they speak of rights. When their own rights are restored to those who have been deprived of the —when a slave has been blessed with his liberty— when he who has been unjustly oppressed obtains his cause, the Hebrews use this word “justified.” As God's sanctuary was subject to infamy by the image of Olympian Jove being exhibited there, all respect for it had passed away; for we know how the glory of the temple sprang from the worship of God. As the temple had been defiled by so great a disgrace, it was then “justified,” when God established His own sacrifices again, and restored His pure worship as prescribed by the Law. 'The sanctuary', therefore, 'shall be justified'; that is, vindicated from that disgrace to which for a time it had been subject. It follows:—” }}

Lecture 42nd.

{{ 8:24-25. "We have previously given a brief explanation of all these subjects. But here the angel removes all doubt, lest we should still anxiously inquire the meaning of the ram which Daniel saw, and of the he-goat which followed and prostrated the ram. The angel, therefore, here pronounces the ram to represent two (2) kingdoms, which coalesced in one (1). Cyrus, as we have said, granted it for a time to his father-in-law Cyaxares, but yet drew the whole power to himself, and the Persians began to extend their sway over all the realms of the East. But God in this vision had respect to the beginning of that monarchy. When, however, the Persians and Medes were united, then the ram bore two (2) horns;

then the he-goat succeeded, and he threw down the ram, as we have already seen. In that he-goat there was first one (1) great horn and then four (4) small ones. The angel then answers concerning the he-goat representing the kingdom of the Greeks. There is not the slightest doubt here, since Alexander seized upon the whole East, and thus the Persian monarchy was utterly destroyed. In the he-goat, therefore, the kingdom of Greece or Macedon was displayed, but the horns will mark something special.

That great horn, says Daniel, 'was the first (1st) king', namely, Alexander; afterwards four (4) smaller horns arose in his place. We have already explained these. For when much blood had been shed, and the greater part of the leaders had been slain, and after the followers of Alexander had mutually attacked and destroyed each other, those who remained divided his dominions among themselves. Cassander the son of Antipater obtained Macedon; Seleucus, Syria; Ptolemy, Egypt; and Antigonos his own fourth (4th) share. In this way the smaller horns succeeded Alexander, according to the clear testimony of profane history. From the frequency with which God sets this prophecy before us, we gather His intention of giving us a conspicuous sign of His majesty. For how could Daniel conjecture future events for so long a period before they happened? He does not pronounce mere enigmas, but narrates things exactly as if they were already fulfilled. At the present time Epicureans despise the Scriptures and laugh at our simplicity, as if we were too credulous. But they rather display their own prodigious madness and blindness, by not acknowledging the prediction of Daniel to be divine. Nay, from this prophecy alone we may prove with certainty the unity of God. If any one was inclined to deny that first (1st) principle, and utterly reject the doctrine of His divinity, he might be convinced by this single prophecy. Not only is this subject treated here, but Daniel points with his finger to the God of Israel as the only One in whose hand and will are all things, and from whom nothing either escapes or is concealed. From this prophecy alone the authority of Scripture is established by proofs perfectly sure and undoubted, as the Prophet treats with perfect clearness events at the time unknown, and which no mortal could ever have divined.

First of all he says, 'The ram which thou sawest, having two (2) horns, means the kings of the Medes and Persians'. This had not then occurred, for that ram had not yet risen and seized upon Babylon, as we have stated already. Thus Daniel was raised up as it were to heaven, and observed from that watch-tower things hidden from the minds of men. He afterwards adds, 'The he-goat is the king of Greece'. Philip, the father of Alexander, although a strenuous and a most skilful warrior, who surpassed all the kings of Macedon for cleverness, yet, superior as he was, never dared to cross over the sea. It was sufficient for him if he could strengthen his power in Greece, and render himself formidable against his neighbours in Asia Minor. But he never dared to attack the power of Persia, or even to harass them, and much less to overcome the whole East. Alexander, inflamed rather by rashness and pride than by good judgment, thought nothing would prove difficult to him. But when Daniel saw this vision, who ever would have thought of any king of Greece invading that most powerful monarchy, and not only seizing upon the whole of Asia, but obtaining sway in Egypt, Syria, and other regions! Although Asia Minor was an extensive region, and well known to be divided into many rich and fertile provinces, yet it was but a small addition to his immense empire. Nay, when Nineveh was conquered by Babylon, and the Chaldeans became masters of Assyria, this also was an addition to the Persian monarchy. We are familiar with the amazing riches of the Medes, and yet they were entirely absorbed. Darius drew with him 800,000 men, and quite buried the earth under his army. Alexander met him at the head of 30,000. What comparison was there between them. When Xerxes came to Greece, he brought with him 800,000 men, and threatened to put fetters upon the sea; yet Daniel speaks of this incredible event just as if it had already taken place, and were matter of history. These points must be diligently noticed that the Scriptures may inspire us with the confidence which they deserve.

'The great horn', says he, 'which was between his eyes was the first (1st) king, and when it was broken, four (4) others sprang up'. Alexander, as we have mentioned, perished in the flower of his age, and was scarcely thirty (30) years old when he died, through the influence of either poison or disease.

Which of the two (2) is uncertain, although great suspicion of fraud attaches to the manner of his death; and whichever way it happened, that horn was broken. In his place there arose four (4) horns, 'which sprang up', says he, from that nation. Here we must notice this, since I very much wonder what has come into some persons' minds, to cause them to translate it "from the nations," and yet these are persons skilled in the Hebrew language. First, they shew great ignorance by changing the number, and next, they do not comprehend the intention of the angel. For he confirms what he formerly said concerning the unity of the kingdom and its division into four (4) parts, and he assigns the reason here. They shall spring, says he, from a nation, meaning the Greeks, and all from a single origin. For by what right did Ptolemy obtain the empire? solely by being one of Alexander's generals. At the beginning, he dared not use the royal name, nor wear the diadem, but only after a lapse of time. The same is true of Seleucus, and Antigonus, and Cassander. We see, then, how correctly the kingdom of the Greeks is represented to us under the figure of a single (1) beast, although it was immediately dispersed and torn into four (4) parts. The kingdoms, then, which sprang from 'the nation', meaning Greece, 'shall stand, but not in full strength'. The copula is here taken in the sense of "but ;" 'the four (4) kingdoms' shall stand, 'but not by his strength', for Alexander had touched upon the Indian sea, and enjoyed the tranquil possession of his empire throughout the whole east, having filled all men with the fear of his industry, valour, and speed. Hence, the angel states the four (4) horns to be so small, that not one of them should be equal to the first (1st) king.

'And at the end of their reign, when the wicked shall be at their height, one (1) king shall stand'. By saying at the end of their kingdom, he does not mean to imply the destruction of the four (4) kingdoms had ceased. The successors of Antiochus were not directly cast down from their sway, and Syria was not reduced into a province till about eighty (80) or a hundred (100) years after Antiochus the Great had been completely conquered. He again left heirs, who, without doubt, succeeded to the throne, as we shall see more clearly in the eleventh (11th) chapter. But this point is certain —Perseus was the last king of Macedon, and the Ptolemies continued to the times of Julius Caesar and Augustus, and we are well aware how completely Cleopatra was conquered and ruined by Antony. As women succeeded to the throne, we could not place the destruction of the Macedonian empire under Antiochus Epiphanes. But the angel means, 'at the end of their kingdom', when they had really come to the close of their reigns, and their final ruin was at hand. For when Antiochus Epiphanes returned to his country, he seemed to have re-established his power, though it very soon afterwards began to die away. Similar circumstances also happened to Egypt and to Macedon, for the reign of all their kings was precarious, and although not directly overthrown, yet they depended on the Romans, and thus their royal majesty was but fleeting. 'At the end', therefore, 'of their kingdom', that is, when they arrived at the height, and their fall led them on to ruin, then, says he, 'when the wicked were consummated' or 'perfected'. Some apply this to the professed and outward enemies of the Church, but I rather approve of another opinion, which supposes the angel to be speaking of the impious, who provoked God's wrath, till it became necessary for grievous and severe penalties to be inflicted on the people, to whom God had so magnificently promised a happy and a tranquil state. This, however, was no common temptation, after the prophets had treated so fully of the happy and prosperous state of the people after their return from captivity, to be hold the horrible dispersion, and to witness these tyrants making their assault not only upon men, but upon the temple of God itself. Wherefore the angel, as before, fortifies the Prophet and all the rest of the pious against this kind of trial, and shews how God had not changed His counsels in afflicting His Church, to which He had promised tranquillity, but had been grievously provoked by the sins of the people. He then shews the urgent necessity which had compelled God to exercise this severity. When, therefore, 'the impious had come to their height', that is, when they had arrived at the highest pitch, and their intolerable obstinacy had become desperate. We perceive how the angel here meets the trial, and instructs the pious beforehand, unfolding to them the inviolability of God's word, while the people's impiety compelled Him to treat them severely, although He had determined to display liberality in every way. 'Then', he says, 'a king shall stand with a fierce countenance'. But the rest tomorrow." }}

Lecture 52nd.

{{ 9:27. "In the last Lecture we explained how 'Christ confirmed the covenant with many during the last week'; for he gathered together the sons of God from their state of dispersion when the devastation of the Church was so horrible and wretched. Although the Gospel was not instantly promulgated among foreign nations, yet Christ is correctly said 'to have confirmed the covenant with many', as the nations were directly called to the hope of salvation. (Matt. 10:5.) Although He forbade the disciples to preach the Gospel then to either the Gentiles or Samaritans, yet He taught them that many sheep were dispersed abroad, and that the time at which God would make one (1) sheep-fold was at hand. (John 10:16.) This was fulfilled after His resurrection. During His lifetime He began to anticipate slightly the calling of the Gentiles, and thus I interpret these words of the Prophet, 'he will confirm the covenant with many'. For I take the word "many" here, (rbym), 'rebim', comparatively, for the faithful Gentiles united with the Jews. It is very well known that God's covenant was deposited by a kind of hereditary right with the Israelites until the same favour was extended to the Gentiles also. Therefore Christ is said not only to have renewed God's covenant with a single (1) nation, but generally with the world at large. I confess, indeed, the use of the word many for all, as in the fifth (5th) chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, and in other places, (ver. 19,) but there seems to be a contrast between the ancient Church, included within very narrow boundaries, and the new Church, which is extended over the whole world. We know how many, formerly strangers, have been called from the distant regions of the earth by the gospel, and so joined in alliance to the Jews as to be all in the same communion and all reckoned equally sons of God.

The Prophet now subjoins, 'He will make to cease the sacrifice and offering for half (1/2) a week'. We ought to refer this to the time of the resurrection. For while Christ passed through the period of his life on earth, he did not put an end to the sacrifices; but after he had offered himself up as a victim, then all the rites of the law came to a close. By the words "sacrifice and offering" the Prophet implies all ceremonies, a part being put for the whole; as if he had said, after Christ had offered up one eternal sacrifice, all the customary ceremonies of the Law were abolished; for otherwise Christ's death would have been superfluous, had he not put an end to all the old shadows of the Law. Although the sacrifices were continued for many years after Christ's death, yet we can no longer call them "legitimate," for no reason can be offered why the sacrifices of the Law should be pleasing to God, except their reference to that heavenly pattern which Moses saw on the mount. (Exod. 25:40.) Hence, after Christ had appeared and expiated all the sins of the world, it became necessary for all sacrifices to cease. (Heb. 8:5.) This is the Prophet's intention when he says, 'Christ should cause the sacrifices to cease for half (1/2) a week'. He embraces two points at the same time; first, Christ really and effectually put an end to the sacrifices of the Law; and secondly, he proved it to the world in the preaching of the Gospel by his Apostles. We observe, then, the sense in which God testified by his Prophet 'the cessation of sacrifices after Christ's resurrection'. The veil of the temple was then rent in twain; true liberty was proclaimed; the faithful might then feel themselves to be full grown men, and no longer subject to that government of childhood to which they had submitted under the Law.

The second (2nd) clause of the verse now follows: we have read it before, but we now repeat it to refresh the memory. 'And over the extension', or expansion, 'of abominations he shall cause astonishment', or stupefaction; 'and even to consumption and determination he shall pour himself upon the desolator'. Some translate, It shall be poured or shall distil: we shall treat the words afterwards. The passage is obscure, and may be rendered in a variety of ways, and consequently interpreters differ much from each other. Some take (knph), 'knaph', "a wing," for a "cherub;" then they change the numbers from singular (1) to plural, and think the Prophet alludes to winged cherubim. This gives those who adopt this rendering a two-fold (2-fold) method of explaining it. Some say the abomination shall be 'above the wings', that is, the ark of the covenant, because the temple was profaned, and the abomination was so ruinous that it destroyed even the very cherubim. Others take it causally —the abominations shall be for the sake of the cherubim. But I leave these subtleties, as they do not seem to me to have any solidity. Others, again, follow the Greek version, as quoted by Christ in the 24th chapter of Matthew and elsewhere, although Christ seems rather to refer to the 12th chapter of our Prophet. But as these two (2) passages refer to the same abomination, I will not insist on this point; I will only remark upon the translation of one (1) word. Those who translate "the abominations of desolation" treat the words of Daniel too carelessly, for there is no grammatical dependence of one (1) word on the other, or, technically speaking, no 'state of regimen'. The preferable opinion is that which considers the word "wing" to mean extremity or extension. Others, again, treat "extremity" as if it meant a state of despair; as if the angel had said, on account of the extremity of the abominations, as evils should accumulate upon evils without end till matters came to the last pitch of despair. Others, again, explain "the wing of abominations" more simply for the expansion itself, as if the angel had stated, the temple shall be openly profaned, and the pollution shall be apparent far and wide.

Interpreters differ again about the words (msmm), 'mesmem', and (smm), 'sem-em', usually translated "make desolate," and "desolation." Some take the former transitively, and others as neuter; the latter signifies to destroy and lay waste, and also to wonder and be astonished. I think these two words ought to be used in the same sense; as if the Prophet had said, all shall be astonished at the extent of the abominations; when they shall perceive the temple worship swept away as by a deluge, then they shall be mightily astonished. He afterwards adds the calamity which commenced when God shewed the pollution of the temple 'shall distil' or pour itself 'upon him who is astonished'. We will treat the occurrence itself to enable us to understand the sense of the words better. I have no hesitation in stating God's wish to cut off all hope of restoration from the Jews, whom we know to have been blinded by a foolish confidence, and to have supposed God's presence confined to a visible temple. As they were thus firmly persuaded of the impossibility of God's ever departing from them, they ought to be deprived of their false confidence, and no longer deceive themselves by such flattering hopes. Thus the temporary pollution of the temple was shewn by Ezekiel (Chap. 10:18.) For when the prophets constantly proclaimed the approach of their enemies to destroy both the city and temple, the greater part of the people derided them. In their opinion this would overthrow all their confidence in God, as if He had been false to His word, in promising them perpetual rest on Mount Zion. (Ps. 132:14.) Here Ezekiel relates his vision of God sitting in the temple —He then vanished, and the temple was deprived of all its glory. This was but temporary.

But we are now treating of a profanation of the temple, which should prove, if I may use the phrase, eternal and irreparable. Without the slightest doubt, this prophecy was fulfilled when the city was captured and overthrown, and the temple utterly destroyed by Titus the son of Vespasian. This satisfactorily explains the events here predicted. Some consider the word "abominations" to be used metaphorically, and to signify the overthrow of the city; but this seems to me forced. Others explain it of the statue of Caligula erected in the temple; and others again, of the standard of Tiberius, who ordered the eagles to be placed on the pinnacle of the temple. But I interpret it simply of that profanation which occurred after the gospel began to be promulgated, and of the punishment inflicted upon the Jews when they perceived their temple subject to the grossest forms of desecration, because they were unwilling to admit the only-begotten Son of God as its true glory. Others, again, understand the impious doctrines and superstitions, as well as the perverse errors with which the priests were imbued. But I think the passage marks generally the change which took place directly after Christ's resurrection, when the obstinate impiety of the people was fully detected. They were then summoned to repentance; although they had endeavoured to extinguish all hope of salvation through Christ, yet God stretched forth His hand to them, and tried whether their wickedness was curable or not. After the grace of Christ had been obstinately rejected, then the 'extension of abominations' followed; that is, God overwhelmed the temple in desecration, and caused its sanctity and glory to pass utterly away. Although this vengeance did not take place immediately after the close of the last week, yet God sufficiently avenged their impious contempt of His gospel, and besides this, He shews how He had no longer need of any visible temple, as He had now dedicated the whole world to Himself from east to west.

I now return again to the explanation of the words separately. The angel says, 'Upon the extension of abominations, astonishment', or astonishing; for some think it an adjective, and others a substantive; but the meaning is, 'all should be stupified', or astonished. I do not altogether object to the meaning already referred to —namely, rendering the word “wing” as “extremity;” for the sense will then be —when the abominations come to their height or extremity; and the sense is the same, if we use the word “expansion.” God intends to shew us the extensive range of the pollutions, —upwards, downwards, and all around, they should obscure and bury the temple's glory. Hence 'on account of the extremity or expansion of abominations there shall be astonishment', for all shall be amazed. The angel seems to oppose this stupor to pride; for the Jews were thoroughly persuaded of God's being strictly bound to themselves, and of the impossibility of His being torn away from His own temple where He had fixed His eternal dwelling-place. He predicts the approach of this amazement instead of their supine security.

He adds next, 'And unto consumption'. (klh), 'keleh', signifies “end” and “perfection,” as well as “destruction.” I take it here for consumption or destruction. 'It shall flow even unto astonishment'. I have already remarked upon the words implying this astonishment; slaughter, or something like it, ought to be understood before the verb. There is no doubt at all about the Prophet's meaning. He says this slaughter should be like a continual shower, consuming the whole people. He speaks of the people as astonished by their calamities, and deprived of all hope of escape from them; for the slaughter shall flow forth upon the astonished people. Meanwhile he shews how foolishly the Jews indulged in pride, and how fallaciously they flattered themselves in supposing the Almighty permanently attached and bound to themselves and their visible temple. The slaughter shall flow forth even to consumption, meaning, until the whole people should perish. He adds also another noun, 'even to a determined end'. We have already unfolded the meaning of this noun. Here the Prophet explains the cause of that eternal distinction which the Almighty had determined and decreed to be irrevocable." }}

Lecture 56th.

{{ 11:2. "We must now understand God's intention in thus informing his servant Daniel of future events. He was clearly unwilling to gratify a vain curiosity, and he enlarged upon events necessary to be known, thus enabling the Prophet not only privately to rely on God's grace, through this manifestation of his care for his Church, but also to exhort others to persevere in the faith. This chapter seems like a historical narrative under the form of an enigmatic description of events then future. The angel relates and places before his eyes occurrences yet to come to pass. We gather from this very clearly how God spoke through his prophets; and thus Daniel, in his prophetic character alone, is a clear proof to us of God's peculiar favour towards the Israelites. Here the angel discusses, not the general state of the world, but first the Persian kingdom, then the monarchy of Alexander, and afterwards the two (2) kingdoms of Syria and Egypt. From this we clearly perceive how the whole discourse was directed to the faithful. God did not regard the welfare of other nations, but wished to benefit his Church, and principally to sustain the faithful under their approaching troubles. It was to assure them of God's never becoming forgetful of His covenant, and of His so moderating the convulsions then taking place throughout the world, as to be ever protecting His people by His assistance. But we shall have to repeat this again, and even more than once, as we proceed.

First of all, the angel states, 'Three (3) kings shall yet stand up in Persia'. With respect to the clause, 'Behold! I announce to you the truth', I explained in yesterday's Lecture how frequently he confirmed his prophecy whenever he treated events of the greatest importance, which seemed almost incredible. 'I shall tell you the real truth; three (3) kings shall stand up'. The Jews are not only very ignorant of every thing, but very stupid also: then they have no sense of shame, and are endued with a perverse audacity; for they think there were only three (3) kings of Persia, and they neglect all history, and mingle and confound things perfectly clear and completely distinct. There were eight (8) kings of Persia of whom no mention is made here. Why, then, does the angel say, 'three (3) kings should stand up'? This was the first (1st) year of Darius, as we saw before. Hence, in their number of kings, Cyrus, the first (1st) monarch, is included, together with his son Cambyses. When these two (2) kings have been decided on, a new question will arise again; for some add Smerdis to Cambyses, though he was only an impostor; for the Magi falsely thrust him in as the son of Darius, for the purpose of acquiring the sovereignty to themselves. Thus he was acknowledged as king for seven (7) months; but when the cheat was discovered he was slain by seven (7) of the nobles, among whom was Darius the son of Hystaspes, and he, according to the common narrative, was created king by the consent of the others on the neighing of his horse. The variations of interpreters might hinder us from reading them, and so we must gather the truth from the event. For Smerdis, as I have stated, cannot be reckoned among the kings of Persia, as he was but an impostor. I therefore exclude him, following the prudence of others who have considered the point with attention.

We must now observe why Daniel mentions four (4) kings, 'the fourth (4th) of whom', he states, 'should be very rich'. Cambyses succeeded Cyrus, who was reigning when the prophecy was uttered. He was always moving about to distant places; he scarcely allowed himself rest for a single (1) year; he was exceedingly desirous of glory, insatiable in his ambition, and ever stirring up new wars. Cambyses, his son, who had slain his brother, died in Egypt, and yet added this country to the Persian empire. Darius, the son of Hystaspes, succeeded, and Xerxes followed him. They are deceived who think Darius, the son of Hystaspes, is the fourth (4th) king; without doubt the Prophet meant Xerxes, who crossed the sea with a mighty army. He led with him 900,000 men; and, however incredible this may appear, all historians constantly affirm it. He was so puffed up with pride that he said he came to put fetters upon the Hellespont, while his army covered all the neighbouring country. This is one (1) point; the four (4) kings were Cyrus, Cambyses, Darius the son of Hystaspes, and Xerxes, omitting Smerdis. We may now inquire why the angel limits the number to four (4), as the successor of Xerxes was Artaxerxes, or Darius Longimanus, the long-handed, and some others after him. This difficulty is solved by the following probable method, Xerxes destroyed the power of the Persian empire by his rashness; he escaped with the greatest disgrace, and was scarcely saved by the baseness of his flight. He brought away but few companions with him hastily in a small boat, and could not obtain a single transport, although the Hellespont had been previously covered with his ships. His whole army was almost cut to pieces, first (1st) at Thermopylae, then at Leuctra, and afterwards at other places. From that period the Persian empire declined, for when its warlike glory was annihilated, the people gave themselves up to sloth and idleness, according to the testimony of Xenophon. Some interpreters expound the phrase, 'three (3) kings stood up', of the flourishing period of the Persian monarchy: they take the words "stood up" emphatically, since from that period the nation's power began to wane. For Xerxes on his return was hated by the whole people, first for his folly, then for his putting his brother to death, for his disgraceful conduct towards his sister, and for his other crimes; and as he was so loaded with infamy before his own people, he was slain by Artabanus, who reigned seven (7) months. As the power of Persia was then almost entirely destroyed, or at least was beginning to decline, some interpreters state these three (3) kings to stand up, and then add Xerxes as the fourth (4th) and the most opulent. But suppose we take the word "stood up" relatively, with respect to the Church? For the angel states that the Persian prince, Cambyses, stood before him, in an attitude of hostility and conflict. The angel seems rather to hint 'at the standing up of four (4) kings of Persia', for the purpose of reminding the Jews of the serious evils and the grievous troubles which they must suffer under their sway. In this sense I interpret the verb "to stand," referring it to the contests by which God harassed the Church until the death of Xerxes. For at that period, when the power of the Persians declined, a longer period of rest and relaxation was afforded to the people of God. This is the reason why the angel omits and passes over in silence all the kings from Artabanus to Darius the son of Arsaces; for Arsaces was the last king but one (1), and although Ochus reigned before him, we know from profane historians how his posterity were reduced to the lowest rank under the last Darius, whom Alexander conquered, as we shall see by and by. For this reason I think this to be the genuine sense of the passage, from Cyrus to Xerxes kings of Persia should stand up against the Israelites, and during the whole of that period the contests should be renewed, and the Jews would almost perish through despair under that continued series of evils. Some say, four (4) kings should stand forth until all the Jews were led out; and we know this never to have been completed, for a small portion only returned. As to my own opinion, I am unwilling to contend with others, yet I hesitate not to enforce the angel's wish to exhort all the pious to endurance, for he announced 'the standing up of these four (4) kings', who should bring upon them various tribulations. As to the fourth (4th) king, the statement of this passage suits Xerxes exactly. 'The fourth' (4th), he says, 'shall be enriched with wealth'; for the noun is of similar meaning with the verb, as they both spring from the same root. Truly enough Darius the son of Hystaspes determined to carry on war with Greece; he made the attempt but with out success, especially at the battle of Marathon. He was cut off by sudden death when his treasures were prepared and many forces were collected. He thus left the material of war for his son. Xerxes, in the flower of his age, saw every preparation for war made ready to his hands; he eagerly embraced the occasion, and gave no heed to sound advice. For, as we have already stated, he destroyed himself and the whole monarchy, not by a single (1) slaughter only, but by four (4). And this power of raising an army of 900,000 men was no ordinary occurrence. If he had only carried with him across the sea 100,000 men, this would have been a large force. But his power of feeding such large forces while he passed through so many provinces, and then of passing them across the sea, exceeds the ordinary bounds of our belief. We are not surprised, then, at the angel's predicting the extreme wealth of this king.

He adds, 'In his fortitude and in his riches he shall stir them all up against the realm of the Greeks'. This was not accomplished by Darius the son of Hystaspes. According to my former statement, he attacked certain Grecian cities, but without producing confusion throughout the whole East, as Xerxes his successor did. As to the phrase, the kingdom of Javan, I willingly subscribe to their opinion who think the word equivalent to the Greek word Ionia. For Javan went forth in that direction, and dwelt there with his posterity in the Grecian territory, whence almost the whole of Greece obtained its present name. The whole Grecian nation is often called "Chittim," and some see good reason for their being termed "Machetae," from Chittim the son of Javan, and thus by the addition of a letter we arrive at the Macedonians. For the conjecture is probable that this people were first called Maketae, and afterwards Macedonians. Without doubt, in this passage and in many others, Javan is put for the whole of Greece, since Ionia was the portion of the country most celebrated in Judea and throughout the East generally. Xerxes then stirred up against the realm of Javan —meaning Greece— all the people of the East; for it is very well known how his empire spread far and wide in every direction. It follows:"

11:3. "This refers to Alexander of Macedon. I have already shortly stated the reason why the angel passed over all the Persian kings from Artabanus to the last Darius, they did not engage in any contests with the Jews up to Xerxes. But when Alexander invaded Asia, he struck the Jews with terror, as well as all other nations. He came like lightning, and it is by no means surprising that the Jews should be frightened at his arrival, because, as we formerly expressed it, he flew with amazing swiftness.

Alexander then rose up, not only by the riches and might of his warlike preparations, but he necessarily inspired the Jews with trepidation when they perceived their inability to resist him, and thus he was deservedly hostile to them, because, from the very beginning, they had despised his empire. Josephus also informs us how he was moved at the sight of the high priest, and how he determined to mitigate his rage against the Jews. For when he was at home, before passing over into Asia, the vision of the high priest was offered to him, for God had sent His angel under that disguise." Alexander supposed it to be some deity; but when the high priest met him in procession, the vision returned to his recollection, and he was struck as if he had seen God appearing to him from heaven. Whatever was the object of this occurrence, Alexander clearly came into Judea with the intention of utterly destroying the whole nation. This is the reason why the angel carefully predicts this change. 'A brave king, therefore, shall stand up, and rule with extensive dominion, and do according to his pleasure'; that is, he shall succeed as if he had all the events of the war under his own hand and according to his own pleasure, as the event itself most fully proved. It follows:"

11:4. "This language is concise, but there is no ambiguity in the sense. First of all the angel says, After that brave king had stood up, his empire should be broken in pieces: for when Alexander had arrived at his height, he suddenly fell sick, and shortly afterwards died at Babylon. Ambassadors had assembled round him from every quarter. He was quite intoxicated by prosperity, and very probably poisoned himself. Historians, however, have viewed him as a remarkable example of singular valour, and so they have pretended and have related, because at least they thought so, that he was deceitfully poisoned by Cassander. But we all know how in temperately and immoderately he indulged in drinking; he almost buried himself in wine, and was seized with disease amidst his cups, and sank under it, because no remedy was found for him. This, then, was Alexander's poison. Whichever way we understand it, he fell suddenly, almost as soon as he began to stand. After conquering nearly the whole East, he came to Babylon, and was uncertain in his plans as to the employment of his forces, after he had procured peace for the whole East. He was then anxious to transfer his armies to either Europe or Africa. The angel says, 'After he had stood up', meaning, after he had acquired the monarchy of the whole East, 'his kingdom should be broken up'. He uses this simile, because the whole power of Alexander was not so much extinguished as broken into separate parts. We know how the twelve (12) chiefs who were his generals drew the spoils to themselves; everyone took a portion of his kingdom, and divided it among themselves, as we have previously stated, just as if it were torn from their master's body. All consented in raising his brother Aridaeus to the dignity of king, and they called him Philip, that, while his sons were young, the memory of his father might commend them to the world. But four (4) kingdoms at length issued from Alexander's monarchy. It is unnecessary here to refer to what we may read at our leisure in the writings of historians.

The Prophet only touches shortly on those points which relate to the instruction of the Church; he does not relate in order or in detail the events narrated in history; he only says, 'His empire shall be broken, and shall be divided, says he, towards the four (4) winds of heaven'. The angel omits that partition which assigned the treasure to one (1), and gave the office of counsellor to Philip: Perdiccas was the guardian of his son, and he with others obtained a portion of his dominions. Seleucus obtained Syria, to whom his son Antiochus succeeded; Antigonus became prefect of Asia Minor; Cassander, the father of Antipater, seized the kingdom of Macedon for himself; Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, who had been a common soldier, possessed Egypt. These are the four (4) kingdoms of which the angel now treats. For Egypt was situated to the south of Judea, and Syria to the north, as we shall afterwards have occasion to observe. Macedonia came afterwards, and then Asia Minor, both east and west. But the angel does not enter into any complicated details, but shortly enumerates whatever was necessary for the common instruction of the elect people. The common consent of all writers has handed down these facts, four (4) kingdoms were constituted at length out of many portions, after the chiefs had been so mutually slain by one another that four (4) only survived, namely, Ptolemy, Seleucus, Antigonus, and Cassander. Afterwards the kingdom of Antiochus was extended when Antigonus was conquered; for Antiochus added Asia Minor to the kingdom of Syria. But Antiochus stood only for a time, and hence the angel truly and properly states this empire to have been divided into four (4) parts.

He next adds, 'And not to his posterity'. No one could have guessed what the angel predicted so many years before Alexander's birth; for he was not born till a hundred (100) years after this period. Those who know the boldness of his warlike schemes, the rapidity of his movements, and the success of his measures, would never be persuaded of this result, the complete destruction of all his posterity, and the utter extinction of his race.

Had Alexander lived quietly at home, he might have married, and have become the father of children who would have been his undisputed successors. He died young, soon after reaching the age of thirty (30); still he might have married, and have had heirs to his throne. He had a brother, Aridaeus, and other relations, among whom was his uncle Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, and a royal offspring might thus have been preserved, and a successor prepared for him. After he had subdued both upper and lower Asia, he became master of Syria, Egypt, and Judea, and extended his power to the Persian sea, while his fame extended over Africa and Europe. Since no one dared to raise a finger against him, as he possessed a most magnificent army, and all his generals were bound to him by most important benefits, and so many of his prefects were enriched by his extreme liberality, who would have thought that all his posterity and relations would be thus blotted out! He left two (2) sons, but they were slain as well as his brother Aridaeus, while his wives and his mother, aged eighty (80) years, shared the same fate. Nor did Cassander spare her, for she intrigued against him. At length, as if God would punish so many slaughters committed by Alexander, He wished his whole posterity to be extinguished. And yet, as I have stated, no foreign enemy was the agent in inflicting such heavy punishments. He had subjugated the whole East, and his bearing was such, as if the whole monarchy of that portion of the world had descended to him from his ancestors by hereditary right. As the world contained no enemy for him, his foes sprang from his own home; they slew his mother, his wives, his children, and all his relatives, and utterly rooted out all his race. We observe, then, with what clearness and certainty the angel predicts events entirely concealed from that age, and for a hundred (100) years afterwards, and such as would never be credited by mankind. There seems a great contrast in the language; 'his kingdom shall be broken, it shall be divided towards the four (4) winds of heaven, and not to his posterity'; that is, although the four (4) kingdoms should spring up in the four (4) quarters of the world, yet none of Alexander's posterity should remain in a single place, or obtain even the least portion of his dominions. This was a remarkable proof of God's wrath against the cruelty of Alexander; not that he was savage by nature, but ambition seized upon him, and made him bloodthirsty, and indisposed him to desire any end to his warfare. God, therefore, avenged that grasping disposition of Alexander's, by allowing the whole of his race thus to perish with disgrace and horrible cruelty. On this account that pride of his which wished to be thought a son of Jupiter, and which condemned to death all his friends and followers who would not prostrate themselves before him as a god; —that pride, I say, never could secure a single (1) descendant to reign in his place, or even to hold a single (1) satrapy. 'Not to his posterity', says the angel, 'and not according to his dominion'.

He passes to the four (4) kings of which he had spoken: It shall not break forth, he says, namely, from the four (4) kings. He had already stated their foreign extraction, not in any way derived from the family of that king; for none of the four (4) should equal his power, because his kingdom should be extirpated. Here the angel seems to omit intervening events, and speaks of an ultimate destruction. We know how the last king Perseus was conquered by the Romans, and how the kingdom of Antiochus was partly destroyed by war, and partly oppressed by fraud. And the angel seems to mark this. We may interpret it more to the point, by considering the cessation of Alexander's empire, with reference to his own race, as if the angel had stated that none of his successors should acquire equal power with himself. And why so? Not one of them could accomplish it. Alexander acquired so mighty a name that all people willingly submitted to his sway, and no single (1) successor could sustain the burden of the whole. Hence his kingdom, as far as it related to himself and his posterity, was divided, and no one succeeded to his power and his opulence. 'And it shall be given to others'. The angel here explains his meaning. The destruction of the kingdom ought not to be explained particularly of single parts, for each seized his own portion for himself, and his successors were all strangers. And 'to others besides those'; meaning, his kingdom shall be seized upon by others who are not of his posterity; that is, strangers shall rush into Alexander's place, and no successor shall arise from his own kindred. It afterwards follows," 11:5. "Here the angel begins to treat of the kings of Egypt and of Syria. He does not mention the king of Syria yet, but will do so in the next verse; but he begins with the king of Egypt, the neighbouring monarchy to that of Israel. He says, the king of the south, meaning, the king of Egypt, would be brave. He next adds, 'and one (1) of his princes'. Many take this in one (1) context; but I think the angel transfers his discourse to Antiochus the son of Seleucus. 'And one (1) of his princes', he says, meaning, one (1) of Alexander's princes, shall strengthen himself against him. For the letter (w), 'vau', is taken in the sense of opposing, and implies an opposition between Ptolemy the son of Lagus, and Antiochus king of Syria. Hence 'the king of the south shall grow strong' —another of Alexander's chiefs shall grow strong against him, and shall have dominion. We know how much larger and more wealthy the kingdom of Syria was than that of Egypt, especially when Asia Minor was added to it. Without doubt, the angel was acquainted with the future superiority of Antiochus to Ptolemy, when these two (2) kings are mutually compared. But the rest to-morrow." }}

Lecture 57th.

{{ 11:6. "As to the explanation of the words, the king of the south, we have stated to be the king of Egypt, and that of the north, of Syria. To do right things, means to make mutual peace; he shall not retain the strength of his arm, is, his arm shall not retain its strength; he shall not stand refers to his father Ptolemy, or Antiochus Theos, as we shall afterwards see. And then we must take the (w), 'vau', negatively, and read, nor his seed, which some translate his arm. She shall be delivered up, implies being given up to death, while some understand her parent, to be her mother or her nurse. Here, then, the angel prophesies the state of the kingdoms of Egypt and Syria; and still he has respect to the Church of God, as we stated yesterday, which was placed in the midst of these two nations. We must always strive to ascertain the intention of the Holy Spirit. He wished to support the pious under those convulsions by which they would be agitated and afflicted. Their confidence might have been utterly subverted unless they had been persuaded that nothing happens at random, since all these events were proclaimed beforehand. Again, God had sent His angel to Daniel, which proved both His power and His determination to defend His Church, and He would accomplish this, because He wished the faithful admonished beforehand neither rashly nor yet without profit. But we must first relate the history —the angel says, 'At the end of the times two (2) kings should enter into covenant and friendship'. He had announced the superiority of the king of Syria; for when Antigonus was conquered, and his son was dead, Seleucus the first king of Syria far surpassed Ptolemy in his power and the magnitude of his dominion. But a mutual rivalry arose between them, and there were some slight skirmishes on both sides, till the condition of Ptolemy became weakened, and then Seleucus rushed tumultuously, with the ferocity of a robber rather than the magnanimity of a king. After they had continued the contest for some time, Berenice the daughter of the second Ptolemy, named Philadelphus, was given in marriage to Antiochus Theos. She is also called Ber nice and Bernice. He was so blinded with pride, as to take the name of Theos, which means God; he was the third (3rd) of that name, the former king being called Soter, meaning preserver. For, as Seleucus had acquired so many and such mighty possessions, his sons did not consider their authority fully established, and so they assumed these magnificent titles for the sake of inspiring all nations with the terror of their name. Hence the first (1st) Antiochus was called Soter, and the second (2nd) Theos. Now the second (2nd) Ptolemy, named Philadelphus, gave his daughter in marriage to Antiochus Theos. By this bond peace and friendship were established between them, just as at Rome, Pompey married Julia the daughter of Caesar. And we daily observe similar occurrences, for when one (1) king has in his power a daughter, or niece, or other relatives, another king finds himself possessed of male and female relations, by whose intermarriage they confirm a treaty of peace. It was so in this case, although historians attribute some degree of craft to Philadelphus in bestowing his daughter on Antiochus Theos. He supposed this to be a means by which he might ultimately acquire the dominion over all Syria, and over the other provinces under the sway of Antiochus. Whether this really was so or not, profane historians prove the fulfilment of the angel's prediction. Without the slightest doubt, God, in His wonderful counsels, dictated to these historians what we read at the present time, and made them witnesses of His own truth. This thought, indeed, never entered their minds, but when God governs the minds and tongues of men, He wishes to establish clear and convincing testimony to this prophecy, for the purpose of shewing the real prediction of every occurrence. 'At the end of the years', says he, 'they shall become united'.

He next states, 'And the daughter of the king of the south', meaning Berenice, whom we have mentioned, 'shall come to the king of the north', meaning the king of Syria, Antiochus Theos. This alliance was contracted in defiance of justice. For Antiochus repudiated his wife Laodice, who was the mother of two (2) sons whom she had born to Antiochus; namely, Seleucus Callinicus, and Antiochus the younger, named Hierax, a hawk, on account of his rapacity. We perceive, then, how he contracted a second (2nd) marriage, after an unjust and illegal divorce of his first (1st) wife. Hence it is not surprising if this alliance was cursed by the Almighty. It turned out unhappily for both (2) the kings of Egypt and Syria. Ptolemy ought not to have thrust his daughter upon Antiochus, who was already married, nor yet to have allowed her to become a second (2nd) wife, while the king's real (1st) wife was divorced. We perceive, then, how God became the avenger of these crimes, while the plans of Antiochus and Philadelphus turned out ill. Some think that Antiochus was fraudulently poisoned by his first (1st) wife, but as the point is doubtful, I pronounce no opinion. Whether it was so or not, Antiochus had a son by Berenice, and died immediately after being reconciled to his former (1st) wife. Some historians state, that after she had recovered her dignity and rank as queen, having once (1st) experienced her husband's fickleness and perfidy, she took sure means of preventing another repudiation. When Antiochus was dead, this woman was enflamed with vengeance, and in the perverseness of her disposition, she impelled her son to murder her rival, especially stimulating Seleucus Callinicus who succeeded to his father's throne. Hierax was then prefect of Asia Minor; hence she stimulated her son with fury to murder her rival. For, although Antiochus Theos had been reconciled to her, yet some degree of rank and honour still attached to Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy. And her son perpetrated this murder with the greatest willingness, and with the basest cruelty and perfidy; for he persuaded her to entrust herself to his care, and then he murdered both her and her son.

The angel now says, 'When the daughter of the king of the south shall come to the king of the north, his arm shall not retain his strength'. The language is metaphorical, as that marriage was like a common arm to both (2) sides; for the king of Egypt stretched forth his hand to the king of Syria for mutual protection. 'That arm', then, 'did not retain its strength'; for Berenice was most wickedly slain by her stepson, Seleucus Callinicus, as we have stated. He says, also, 'she should come to make alliances'. Here, by way of concession, the angel calls that conjugal bond (myshrym), 'misrim', "rectitudines," "conditions of agreement," because at first all parties thought it would tend to that result. But Antiochus had already violated his marriage vow, and departed from his lawful alliance. Nothing, therefore, was right on his side. Without the slightest doubt he derived some advantage from the plan, as kings are always in the habit of doing. And with respect to Ptolemy, many historians, as we have already mentioned, suppose him to have longed for the kingdom of Syria. Whether or not this was so, their mutual transactions were not sincere, and so the word signifying "rectitude" is used, as we have said, only by concession. The angel does not speak in their praise, or excuse the perfidy of either, but he rather enlarges upon their crime, and from this we gather how they abused the sanctity both of marriage and of treaties, which God wished to be held sacred by all mankind. Hence, though the word is honourable in itself, yet it is used in a disgraceful sense, to shew us how the angel condemned King Ptolemy for this base prostitution of his daughter, and Antiochus for rejecting his wife, and marrying another who was not a real wife, but only a concubine. And, perhaps, God wished to use the lips of His angel to point out the tendency of all royal treaties. They always have the most specious appearances — national, quiet public peace, and similar objects which can be dexterously made prominent. For kings always court favour and praise for themselves from the foolish vulgar, whenever they make treaties of peace. Thus all these alliances have no other tendency than to produce social deception, and at length they degenerate into mutual perfidy, when one (1) party plots insidiously and wickedly against another (1).

The angel adds next, 'He shall not stand'; using the masculine gender, and most probably referring to Antiochus, as well as to Ptolemy his father-in-law. 'Neither he nor his seed shall stand', meaning his son by Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy. I dare not translate it "arm," because in my opinion the letter (w), 'vau', is needed in the word for "arm;" so I take it to denote "seed." He afterwards adds, 'And she shall be delivered up' —thus returning to Berenice— either by treachery or to death; 'and those who led her forth' —meaning her companions. Whenever any incestuous marriage is contracted, some persons of disgraceful character are sure to be concerned in bringing his new wife to the king. And very probably there were factions in the palace of Antiochus; one (1) party being more attached to Seleucus and his brother, and his mother Laodice; while others desired a change of government, according to the usual state of affairs. The advisers of the marriage between Antiochus and Berenice were sent as a guard of honour to attend them to Syria, and the angel states all these to have been delivered up together with the queen. He afterwards adds, 'And those who were her parents'. From the absence of a grammatical point under the letter (h), 'he', many think the noun to be of the feminine gender. And as it may mean mother, they treat it as if her nurse was intended, but I leave the question in doubt. He now adds, 'and those who strengthened her at those times'. He, doubtless, intends to designate all those who wished to curry favour with the king, and thus took part in this marriage between him and the daughter of the king of Egypt. The whole of that faction perished, when Berenice was slain by Seleucus Callinicus. If, then, he did not spare his step mother, much less would he spare the faction by which he was deprived of his hope of the kingdom, and through whom his mother Laodice had suffered the disgrace of a divorce. It now follows:"

11:7. "The angel treats here of Ptolemy Euergetes, the third (3rd) king of Egypt, who succeeded his father Philadelphus. He collected large forces to revenge the insult offered to his sister, and thus carried on the war with Seleucus Callinicus, who had become king after his father's death. The angel, therefore, now touches shortly on this war, by saying, 'There shall stand up a shoot from the root of that queen'. Very possibly he was younger than his sister Berenice. He says, 'He shall stand in his own degree', meaning, in the royal rank. The interpretation of those who translate, He shall stand in his father's rank, is forced. What is it then 'He shall stand in his own rank'; that is, he shall arrive at his own rank by hereditary right. Although, therefore, at first (1st) all thought the death of Berenice would be unrevenged through her father being dead, here the angel announces that her brother should be like a branch, and become the avenger of this great wickedness. 'He shall stand', then, 'in his rank', meaning, he shall arrive at the royal throne, 'from' the 'branch' or germ 'of her root', namely, Berenice. 'He shall come with an army against Callinicus'. Profane writers bear witness to this. 'And he shall come even to the fortification of the king of the north'. He entered Syria, and caused so great a terror that many fortified cities surrendered themselves to him. During this war he drew to himself many cities which seemed impregnable; whence it is not surprising to find the angel stating his arrival at the fortifications. Some translate it "dwelling-place," but without reason, and thus injure the Prophet's meaning. 'He shall come unto the very fortification', meaning, he shall arrive in Syria, and shall possess many fortified cities.

He next adds, 'And he shall work on them', meaning, he shall prosper; for this word when used without any addition, implies in Hebrew performing great exploits. 'He shall proceed' and acquire power over the greater part of Syria, 'and shall prevail'. By this last word he explains how superior he should be to Callinicus. For this king sent for his younger brother whose fidelity he suspected, and thought it the safest course to treat with his enemy. But young Hierax, the hawk, determined to use that expedition to his own advantage. He was not content with his own province of Asia Minor, but he anticipated being his father's sole heir, especially as he had hired some troops from Gaul, who had invaded Asia Minor, Bithynia, and other provinces. He was greatly puffed up, and betrayed his own covetousness. Seleucus Callinicus preferred making peace with his enemy to fostering his brother's resources. At length Hierax more and more developed the perversity of his mind. For he openly declared war against his brother, to whose assistance he pretended to have come, after having been sent for according to agreement. His brother Seleucus had promised him a portion of Asia as far as Mount Taurus; and when he saw himself the victim of his impious and disgraceful snares, he openly waged war with his brother. But he was conquered at length, and thus received the reward of his impiety. Thus Ptolemy Euergetes prevailed, while he departed from Syria after spoiling his enemy, according to what follows:"

11:8. "The angel explains more fully what he had already stated briefly, namely, Ptolemy should be the conqueror, and spoil the whole of Syria almost according to his pleasure. Profane writers also shew us the great number of images which were taken away, and how Egypt recovered its gods of silver and gold which it had lost a long time ago. Thus the event proved the truth of the angel's prophecy. The particle (gm), 'gem', is interposed for the sake of amplifying the subject, to inform us of the unequal condition of the peace, and how Ptolemy exercised the rights of a conqueror in spoiling the whole of Syria according to his lust. It is added, 'He shall stand for more years than the king of the north'. Some restrict this to the duration of the life of each king, and others extend it farther. Probably the angel speaks of Ptolemy Euergetes, who reigned forty-six (46) years. As God extended his life so long, we are not surprised at the angel's saying it should last longer than the king of Syria's. This explanation is applicable to the present case, for if he had died before, Callinicus might have recovered the effects of the war; but as Ptolemy survived, he dared not attempt any thing, being assured of the utter fruitlessness of any effort against the king who had vanquished him. It follows:—"

11:9. "This clause belongs to the former verse; as if he had said, Ptolemy shall return by a peaceful march after this hostile invasion of Syria. For he might have some fears lest his enemy should not be completely prostrated. But as he departed as conqueror, the angel announces his safe arrival in his own land. The words "come" and "return" are used emphatically, implying the absence of all harass, fear, and danger.' He returned to his kingdom and his own land, since he could not trust to the quietness of the enemies whom he had laid prostrate. It follows:—"

11:10-11. "Here the angel passes to the third (3rd) war, namely, that which the son of Callinicus stirred up against Ptolemy Philopator. After the death of Euergetes, the two (2) sons of Callinicus united their forces, and endeavoured to recover Syria, and especially that part of it of which they had been deprived. When they were already on their expedition, and their forces were on their march, the elder Seleucus died, and his surviving brother was Antiochus, called the Great. Ptolemy, called Philopator, which means a lover of his father, was then alive. He was so called in consequence of the parricide of which he was guilty, having put to death both parents, together with his brother. The word is used by way of ridicule, and a sense the opposite to that expressed is implied by this epithet, which is honourable in itself, and expresses the virtue of filial piety. But he slew his father, mother, and brother, and on account of all these impious murders, the name of Philopator was applied to him as a mark of disgrace. As, therefore, he was so thoroughly hated by his own people, the sons of Callinicus, namely,

Seleucus Ceraunus the elder, and Antiochus the Great, thought the time had arrived for the recovery of the lost cities of Syria. For he was detested and despised in consequence of his numerous crimes. They therefore anticipated little trouble in recovering their possessions, when their enemy was thus branded with infamy, and had many domestic foes. This is the reason why the angel says of the sons of Callinicus, 'They shall be provoked, and shall lead a multitude of great armies'; it may mean "great forces," as some historians relate the collection of two very strong armies. Unless I am mistaken, Antiochus the Great had 70,000 foot and 5,000 horse. Ptolemy excelled in cavalry, as he had 6,000 horse but only 62,000 foot, as Polybius informs us in his fifth (5th) book. (*Calvin quoting from memory has not stated the numbers accurately. See Polyb., lib. v. p. 421, edit. Casaubon. Paris; also the Dissertations at the end of this volume.—Ed.) They were nearly equal in forces, but the confidence of the two (2) sons of Callinicus, of whom alone the angel now speaks, was increased when they beheld their wicked enemy so greatly detested in consequence of his parricide. He afterwards says, He shall come. He changes the number, since the elder (1st) brother, being the eldest (1st) son of Callinicus, namely, Seleucus Ceraunus, died while they were preparing for the war, and they say he was slain by his attendants in passing through Asia Minor. Whether this was so or not, all historians unite in stating that Antiochus the Great alone carried on the war with Philopator. He shall come so as 'to overflow and pass through'. He recovered that part of Syria which he had lost, and when he approached Egypt, then Philopator met him. Profane historians state him to have been a coward, and never to have obtained power by open bravery, but by fraud alone. He was too late in preparing his forces for resisting his enemy.

This is the reason why the angel says, 'The king of Syria', or of the north, 'should come, even to the citadels', or fortifications; for at length Philopator roused himself from slumber, for he never put on his arms to repel an enemy except when compelled by the direst necessity. Hence he adds, 'The king of the south shall be irritated', or exasperated. He uses the word "exasperated," because, as I have just said, he would never have opposed himself to his enemy Antiochus except he had perceived his own kingdom placed in great jeopardy. He might have taken patiently the loss of Syria, so long as Egypt had been safe; but when his life and all his possessions were in danger, he became sufficiently exasperated to attack his foe; and yet he prevailed, as we shall afterwards see. I cannot complete this subject to-day, and so I shall draw to a close. Philopator became victorious, and yet he was so sluggish that he distrusted his friends and foes alike, and was forced by this very fear to make peace with his enemy, although he was really the conqueror. Not only could he have driven back his enemy whom he had vanquished, but he might have taken possession of his territories; but he did not dare to do this: he was conscious of being a parricide, and knew to his cost how hateful his name was among all men. Hence, although superior in strength, and actually the conqueror of his enemy in battle, he dared not proceed further. But we will explain the remainder another time." }}

Lecture 58th.

{{ 11:11. "In our last Lecture we explained why the angel mentions the exasperation of King Ptolemy. Unless he had been dragged into the war, his disposition was so sluggish that he would have suffered many cities to be wrested from him, and he would never have been moved by either the disgrace or the loss. But at length he took up arms, on seeing with what a stern and bold enemy he had to deal. He afterwards adds, 'He shall go out to battle against the king of the North', meaning Antiochus king of Syria. 'And he shall set din array a large multitude'. This may be referred to either of them, for Antiochus then brought into the field a large army; he had 5,000 horse and 70,000 foot. Ptolemy was superior in his cavalry, which amounted to 6,000 men. This clause will suit the case of Antiochus. 'He shall bring into the field a great multitude, and the multitude shall be given into his hand', meaning Ptolemy's. The context seems thus to flow on more easily: yet if anyone (1) prefers considering it as applicable to Ptolemy himself, I will not contend the point. It is not of much consequence, because the angel simply pronounces the superiority of Ptolemy in this battle, in which he conquered Antiochus the Great. Besides, we must notice, that he was not the conqueror by his own industry, or valour, or counsel, or military skill; but because the Lord, who regulates the events of battles, wished at that time to subdue the pride of Antiochus the Great. It now follows,"

11:12. "The angel here marks the close of the war. Had Ptolemy's valour seconded (2nd) his good fortune, he might easily have seized upon the whole kingdom of Syria, as profane historians report. But he was so given up to his own lusts, that he willingly entered into treaty with his enemy. On his return to his kingdom he slew his wife Eurydice, and was guilty of other enormities; he suffered a wicked woman, the sister of Agathocles, a victim of his passions, to rule over his kingdom, and lastly, he became a very foul example of a very cruel and degraded man. Therefore, the angel says at the beginning, 'his army should raise him aloft; his heart should be elevated', in consequence of his prosperity. He not only caused terror to Antiochus, but through all the neighbouring regions. Where he might have drawn to himself the whole power of the East, he then declined in his course. He subdued, indeed, a hostile army, and in this exploit he was in no slight degree assisted by his sister Arsinoe, as historians relate, but yet after great slaughters he did not retain his position. And what was the obstacle: His idleness and drunkenness, and his caring for nothing but banquets and debaucheries, and the most obscene pleasures. This caused his fall, after he had been raised even to the clouds by his victories. It afterwards follows:"

11:13-14. "Here the angel prophesies of other wars. For he first describes the war which was carried on by Antiochus against the Egyptians, after the death of Philopater, who left as his heir, a little son named Ptolemy Epiphanes. When, therefore, he perceived the land deprived of its king, he drew up an army and invaded Egypt. As the Egyptians had no strength to resist him, an embassy was sent to Rome; and we know how eager the Romans were to become involved in all the business of the world. With the view of extending their empire still further and wider, they sent immediately to Antiochus the Great, and commanded him to desist from the war; but after many trials he failed of success, until he engaged in a very desperate battle with Scopas, and at length obtained a victory. In the meantime, the Egyptians were far from idle: although they hoped to be able to subdue the empire of Antiochus by the assistance of the Senate, yet they carefully fitted out an armament of their own under their General Scopas, who was successful in many of his plans, but was finally defeated in the borders of Judea. The angel now describes this war. 'The king of Syria shall return', he says; meaning, after the death of Ptolemy Philopator, he rested for a while, because he had been unsuccessful with his forces, and they were so entirely disorganized that he had no confidence in the success of any expedition. But he thought Egypt would give him no trouble, as it had lost its head and was like a lifeless corpse. Then he was elevated with fresh confidence, and returned to Egypt. 'And he shall arrange a greater multitude than at the first'. He had a large and powerful army, as we have said, and a noble armament of cavalry: he had 70,000 foot, and was still collecting greater forces. The angel signifies the future arrival of the king of Syria, after the interval of a certain time. 'At the end of the times of the years he shall surely come', that is, he shall break forth. The angel seems to use this expression for the sake of increasing its certainty; for he at first (1st) despised the Romans in consequence of their great distance from him, and he had no fear of what afterwards occurred. He never supposed they had such boldness in them as to cross the sea against him.

He afterwards adds, 'And in those times many shall stand against the king of the South', or Egypt. The angel hints, that Antiochus the Great would not be his only enemy; and historians inform us of his treaty and alliance with Philip king of Macedon, for carrying on this war. Without doubt, the two (2) kings stirred up the whole of Asia Minor, and they were so unitedly powerful, that many were excited to take part with them. It seemed to be all over with the kingdom of Egypt, and thus the angel says, 'many should stand up against the king of the South'. He adds, and his sons dissipating. The Hebrews call "robbers" (phrytzym), 'pheritzim'. The root of this word is (phrtz), 'pheretz', which signifies to break or dissipate, and sometimes to destroy. Without doubt, the angel here uses the word to imply factionous men, for the people had no other chance of standing, except by remaining quiet and united. The word then applies to those who violated that unity; for when any one attached himself to foreign monarchs, Judea became exposed as a prey to either the Syrians or Egyptians. Some interpreters apply this passage to the younger Onias, who seized on Heliopolis, and drew some exiles with him, and there built a temple, as we learn from Josephus and the Book of Maccabees. For he pretended to have the prophecy in Isaiah, chap. 19, on his side, where it is said, "And there shall be an altar to God in the midst of Egypt", (v. 19.) Without doubt, the Prophet here predicts the enlargement of God's kingdom through the propagation of his religion throughout the whole world. As Egypt was to the last degree devoted to idolatry, Isaiah here shews how the pure and perfect worship of God should prevail in Egypt. As if he had said, Even the Egyptians who have hitherto endeavoured to abolish true and sincere piety, shall be added to God's people, and shall worship him acceptably. We know the Prophet to be here treating figuratively of the spiritual reign of Christ, and to be always bringing forward the shadows of his own time. By the word "altar" he simply means the worship of God. That impostor, Onias, when he erected his profane temple and polluted the sacred altar, boasted in his fulfilment of this prophecy of Isaiah.

This then is the meaning of the passage: 'The sons —dissipators of thy people— shall exalt themselves to establish the vision'; that is, under a fallacious pretext of fulfilling Isaiah's prediction, 'and yet they shall fall'. It may also have an indefinite meaning, as if the angel declared that these multitudes should not come forth unless by God's secret counsel. We know how much this thought tends to lighten the sorrow of the pious, and how much consolation it brings, when we recognise all the tumults of the world as springing from the fixed counsel of God. Nothing then appears to happen at random, but mortals are agitated because God desires to inflict His punishments upon them, and the Church is often shaken because God wishes to prove and examine the patience of His people. We may, therefore, take this prophecy absolutely; as if the angel had said: These apostates and dissipators never proposed to fulfil this prophecy of Isaiah's, and yet there was nothing confused, or out of order in all these events, as God was fulfilling what He had testified by His own Prophets. Wherefore we may receive this prediction simply, just as we do other similar ones scattered throughout the prophets. We have already heard how the Prophet was forewarned of the many distresses of the Church, on purpose to lead the faithful to acquiesce in the providence of God, when they saw things so disturbed throughout the world. It afterwards follows:"

11:15. "The angel follows up the same sentiment. He says, When Antiochus the Great shall burst forth, there shall be no valour in the Egyptians to resist him, for he shall take a fortified city. There is a change of number here, for he means fortified cities. For he should recover the cities which he had formerly lost, and should arrive at the city Raphia in Egypt. The explanation follows, 'The arms of Egypt shall not stand, nor the people of its levies'. This relates to Scopas, who was sent forth with large forces: at first he prospered, but he was afterwards vanquished in the conflict, and had no courage to persevere in resistance. It afterwards follows."

11:16. "The angel proceeds with the same discourse. He says, Antiochus the Great should accomplish his wishes, and should spread the terror of his arms in every direction, and thus no one would dare to oppose him. 'He shall do' therefore 'according to his will', he says, 'and none shall stand before his face; and he shall stand in the desirable land'; meaning, he shall bring his victorious army into Judea, 'and there shall be a great consumption under his hand', or Judea shall be consumed and ruined under his hand. We originally stated, that the angel's mission did not authorize him to treat these events as military exploits are usually narrated by historians. Enough is revealed to lead the faithful to acknowledge God's continual regard for their safety. Experience also assures us of every occurrence being divinely foreseen, and thus they would acknowledge how everything tended to promote their welfare. God's predictions of future events were never in vain, and the angel now declares the future coming of Antiochus 'to the desirable land'. We have previously given the reason for the use of this epithet as applied to Judea, not through any natural excellence over other lands, but because God had chosen it for Himself as His seat and dwelling-place. The excellence of this land depended entirely on the gratuitous beneficence of God. It might seem inconsistent to grant such license to an impious tyrant and robber, and to allow him to overrun Judea, which God had marked out with peculiar honour, in adopting it as His dwelling-place, and calling it His residence. (Psalm 132:14.) But we know that the Church, while on its pilgrimage in this world, enjoys no freedom from many afflictions; for it is profitable for the sons of God to be humbled under the cross, lest they should grow restive in the world, and give themselves up to luxuries, and sleep upon the desires of the flesh. The angel, indeed, omits the reason why God suffered Antiochus thus cruelly to oppress the sacred land; but the faithful had been taught by the Law and the Prophets how the Church was subject to various tribulations. It is sufficient, then, to relate the event with simplicity: 'and the pleasant land shall be consumed under his hand', or there shall be a consumption. It matters but little which way we read it as far as the sense is concerned. The angel here encourages Daniel and all others to the exercise of patience, lest they should faint under this divine scourge; for he permitted Antiochus to wander about like a robber, and to exercise severe tyranny and cruelty against the Jews. I need not discuss these events at greater length, as they are found in the Books of the Maccabees. I will only touch on one point briefly; Antiochus did not of his own accord harass the Jews by leading his army into their country, but he was stirred up by impious priests. So great was their perfidy and barbarity that they willingly betrayed God's Temple, and exposed their nation to the most distressing calamities. That was a severe trial: hence God consulted the interests of His own worshippers by predicting events which might weaken their confidence and cause them to indulge in despair. It follows," 11:17. "He here describes the second war of Antiochus against Epiphanes, who was then growing old; and so he gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, hoping in this way, by subtle contrivances, to subdue the kingdom of Egypt. For he thought his daughter would remain faithful to his interests; but she rather preserved her conjugal fidelity to her husband, and hesitated not to espouse her husband's quarrel against her father. She faithfully adhered to her husband's interests according to her duty, and never listened to the cunning designs of Antiochus. Thus he was deprived of his expectation, and his daughter never became the means of his acquiring authority over Egypt. Before this marriage of his daughter with Ptolemy, he had tried the effect of war, but in this he failed; and when he perceived the interposition of the Romans, he desisted from future hostilities, and consoled himself with the thought which we have already expressed, of receiving immediate assistance against Egypt through his daughter. 'He turns', therefore, 'to come with the power of his whole kingdom'; meaning, he collects all his forces to overwhelm Ptolemy Epiphanes, who was then but a young man, and had neither obtained any great authority, nor arrived at sound wisdom and discretion. When he perceived his want of success in the fortune of war, 'he gave him the daughter of women', referring to her beauty. This is the explanation of interpreters, who suppose the phrase to imply her remarkable beauty.

As to the next clause, those who translate it, 'and the upright with him', think the Jews are intended, for Antiochus had received them in surrender, and there were many who openly espoused his cause. They think the Jews so called as a mark of honour, and as upright with respect to the worship of God. But this appears to me too forced. I hesitate not to suppose the angel to signify the superior character of the agreement between Antiochus and Ptolemy, when the former found the impossibility of obtaining his adversary's kingdom by open warfare. Although the Romans had not yet sent forth any armament, yet Antiochus began to fear them, and he preferred the use of cunning in providing for his own interests. Besides this, as we lately mentioned, he was longing for other booty, for he immediately transferred the war into Greece, as the angel will inform us. But he first announces, 'his giving away his daughter to destroy her'. He here reproves the artifice of Antiochus the Great, in thus basely selling his daughter, as if she were a harlot. As far as he possibly could, he induced her to slay her husband either by poison or by other devices. Hence, 'he gave up his daughter to destroy her, but she did not stand by him', and was not for him; meaning, she did not assent to her father's impious desires, and was unwilling to favour such monstrous wickedness. We read in profane writers the fulfilment of these predictions of the angel, and thus it more clearly appears how God placed before the eyes of the pious, a mirror in which they might behold His providence in ruling and preserving His Church. It now follows," 11:18. "There is some obscurity in these words, but the history will afterwards determine the angel's meaning. First (1st), as to the word "islands," he doubtless means Asia Minor and the maritime coasts; also Greece, Cyprus, and all the islands of the Mediterranean Sea. It was a Jewish custom to call all places beyond the sea "islands," as they were not very well skilled in navigation. Therefore he says, 'He will turn his face to the islands'; that is, he shall turn to the opposite regions of the world. The Mediterranean Sea is known to be between Syria and Asia Minor; Cilicia, too, is between them, which was also under the dominion of Antiochus, although the seat of his power was Syria. Hence he calls Asia Minor, and Greece, and the Mediterranean islands, all "isles," with respect to Syria and Judea. This occurred when the Aetolians renewed the war after the defeat of Philip. The Romans were the originators of this war in Greece, and they had the honourable pretext of liberating the whole of Greece after Philip of Macedon had seized upon many cities most skilfully fortified. But the Aetolians were proud and puffed up with the desire of superiority, as the event ultimately proved. They boasted themselves to be the liberators of Greece; they used the help of the Romans, but professed to be the principal leaders in the war, and when they saw Chalcis and other cities held by the Romans, the spirit of envy took possession of them. Titus Flaminius withdrew his garrisons from their cities, but yet the Aetolians were not satisfied; for they wished for the sole pre-eminence and the entire departure of the Romans. With this view they sent their ambassadors to Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedaemonians, to king Philip, and also to Antiochus. Thoas was the principal author of this contention, for after stirring up the neighbouring nations, he set out himself to Antiochus. When the Aetolians were puffed up by the large promises which he brought back, they expected to produce peace throughout Greece without the slightest trouble. Meanwhile Antiochus only advanced as far as Asia Minor with but a small force. He led Hannibal with him, whose fame alone inspired the Romans with dread; and had he taken his advice, he would certainly have had no difficulty in expelling the Romans. But the flatterers of his court did not allow Hannibal's advice to prevail with this foolish king. Then Willius also cunningly rendered Antiochus suspicious of his advice: for he had been sent as ambassador into Asia Minor, had insinuated himself into his favour, and had acquired his friendship, and was so engaged in daily conference with him, that Antiochus suspected the fidelity of Hannibal to his interests. Hence he carried on that war entirely without method, or plan, or perseverance. When he arrived at Chalcis, he was smitten with the passion for a damsel there, and celebrated a foolish marriage with her, as if he had been completely at peace. Thus he had a citizen of Chalcis for his father-in-law, while he was a mighty monarch, unequalled by any throughout the world. Although he conducted himself thus inconsiderately, yet the celebrity of his fame rather than his personal exertions, enabled him at first to take many cities, not only in Asia Minor and on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, but also in Greece itself. He recovered Chalcis and other cities which had been seized upon by the Romans. The angel relates this as if the event had already occurred, and yet we are aware of them all being as yet future.

'He will turn his face to the islands, and will take many, and a general shall cause him to cease, and shall turn his reproach against himself'. Antiochus often fought against the Romans, and always without success, although he sometimes thought himself superior; but from the time when Attilius the prefect of the fleet intercepted his supplies, and thus stopped his progress, M. Acilius the consul began to gain the mastery by land, and his power became gradually more and more enfeebled. When conquered in a naval engagement by Livius the praetor, he suffered a severe loss, and then when too late he acknowledged his error in not obeying the counsels of Hannibal; but he had lost the opportunity of renewing the war. Hence the angel here says, 'A leader should make his reproach return upon himself'. This signifies how Antiochus should be puffed up with foolish pride, and how his insane boastings should rebound upon his own head, as he had vomited them forth with open mouth against the Romans. When he speaks here of his disgrace, I interpret it actively, as making his reproach remain; for the word (chrphth), 'cherepheth', means reproach, but there are two (2) ways of interpreting it, actively and passively. But as I have already said, the angel more probably speaks of his foolish boasting, for he had despised the Romans with contempt and insult. We know how foolishly he insulted them by his ambassadors among all the assemblies of Greece. 'A leader', then, either Acilius or Lucius Scipio, who drove him beyond Mount Taurus, 'made his disgrace rest upon himself', and 'he shall not turn away his own disgrace'; that is, Antiochus vomited forth his reproaches against the Romans with swollen cheeks, but with utter futility. All these disgraceful speeches came to nothing, and never injured the Romans in the least; 'but that leader', either Lucius Scipio or Acilius, according to my statement, returned these reproaches upon himself by which he hoped to lay the Romans prostrate, but they turned out nothing but wind. The angel therefore derides the pride of Antiochus by saying, 'A leader should come who should throw back these reproaches upon himself', and prevent them from returning upon either this leader or the Romans. He takes the head as representing the whole body." }}

Lecture 59th.

{{ 11:19. "Here either the base end of Antiochus is denoted, who was slain in a popular tumult while spoiling the temple of Belus, or else the event of the war between him and the Romans is described. This war was conducted under the auspices of Lucius Scipio, because Cneius Scipio, the conqueror of Africa, had offered himself as his brother's lieutenant-general, and after his death that province was committed to him. But, as we have said, the resources of Antiochus had been cut off before this. He had lost the cities of Asia, and if he had ceded them at first, he might have quietly retained the greater part of Asia Minor. But as he extended his wings over Greece, and hoped by this means to become completely master of the whole of Greece and Macedonia, he could not be induced to withdraw his garrisons from those cities, but at length was compelled to give up Asia Minor. In this way, then, the angel describes the progress of the war by saying, He will turn his face to wards the fortifications of his own land; that is, when compelled to relinquish Greece, he will betake himself to fortified places. He was very safe there, and in a region sufficiently at peace; he had almost impregnable towns on all sides, and appeared to be free from warfare. Historians relate this to have been done by the skill of Cheius Scipio. For his son was then a captive under Antiochus, and he knew him to have greater authority than his brother, although he only possessed the title of lieutenant-general. They record his persuading Antiochus not to try his fortune by any decisive engagement. However it was, it is quite evident that he delayed fighting till he was compelled by a sense of shame, as all men accused him of cowardice in not daring to try the issue of an engagement when he possessed so large an army. The Romans had scarcely ever taken the field against so strong a force, and yet, according to the narrative of Titus Livius, they never displayed less terror or concern. The extent of the forces of Antiochus is readily apparent from the slaughter which occurred; in one day 50,000 men perished; and this would be almost incredible, unless it were borne out by numerous and trustworthy testimonies. In this way the angel said, Antiochus should return, as he did not go forth to meet Lucius Scipio, but suffered him to pass on. Had he given the least sign of resistance, without doubt Philip had in his hand and power the whole force of the Romans. Many indeed pronounced the conduct of L. Scipio to be rash, in daring to allow Philip such license, as he had been lately conquered, and was still exasperated in consequence of the loss and disgrace which he had suffered. For if Antiochus had been on the alert to restrain the enemy, it would have been all over with the Roman army in those narrow and rugged defiles; but, as we have stated, he kept his army in idleness and luxury among fortified towns. If another and a probable sense is preferred, the sentence applies to his base retreat to further Asia, where he fell, slain by the rustic population. 'He shall fall, and shall not be found'. Antiochus in truth continued to reign from the period of the destruction of his army and of his acceptance of the conditions which the Romans imposed. He obtained peace, but not without the payment of a heavy fine while he retained the name of king. Although he united with the Romans in an honourable treaty, yet he was forced to retire beyond Mount Taurus, to pay a large sum of money on account of the expenses of the war, to give hostages, and to divide the ships equally with the Romans. In this latter case he was grossly and fraudulently deluded, for L. Scipio commanded all the ships to be cut to pieces, and delivered the materials to Antiochus, to whom they were utterly worthless. He knew the man to be deceptive and restless, and so he treated him with barbarity, according to his deserts. As far as the hostages are concerned, we find Antiochus and Demetrius his sons as hostages at Rome even after his death. He was left in peace indeed, but was deprived of the cities of Asia Minor, and was ordered to betake himself beyond Mount Taurus. Those ravines were the boundary of his empire; a part of Asia was assigned to Eumenes, and many cities became independent. Antiochus, by way of concealing his disgrace, made a joke of it, saying he had managed cleverly, for the government of Asia Minor was a great trouble to him. He had another ample and opulent kingdom with which he might well be content: I have hitherto been but a steward in Asia, he used to say, and the Romans have relieved me of that encumbrance.

When, therefore, the angel says, 'After his fall, he should be no longer king'; this may be understood of his ignominious death which followed shortly afterwards. His avarice was insatiable, and when compelled to pay a large tribute to the Romans, he pretended to be reduced to extreme poverty; then he wished to spoil the temple of Jupiter Dodoneus, and was slain there during a tumult. This last word ought properly to be referred to this event, for King Antiochus was not found, because these rustics slew him in the tumult which arose. Thus far concerning Antiochus the Great; Seleucus now follows, who was his first successor. He had three (3) sons, Seleucus whom many call Ceraunus, then Antiochus Epiphanes, and Demetrius. Concerning Seleucus the angel speaks as follows:

11:20. "Seleucus, it is well known, did not long survive his father, for he was put to death either by poison, or by his domestics. Suspicion fell upon his brother Antiochus, who was sent back to his country after his father's death was known. Demetrius alone was retained, who afterwards escaped by flight, for he left the city under the pretence of hunting, and followed the bank of the Tiber as far as Ostia, where he embarked on a small vessel, preferring to run all risk to remaining in perpetual banishment. Concerning Seleucus the angel says, 'he shall stand in his place', meaning, he shall succeed by hereditary right to the office of Antiochus the Great. Thus 'he shall cause the exactor to pass over'. Some translate, He shall take away the exactor; for the verb ('br), 'gneber', in Hiphil, signifies to take away. The Hebrews use the verb of this clause in the sense of excluding. Some interpreters think this language implies the praise of Seleucus for lessening the tributes imposed by his father, but historians shew this view to be false, and condemn his avarice and rapacity. In some points he was superior to his brother Antiochus; although both lustful and cruel to those around him. Through indulgence in great expenses, he could not be moderate and lenient towards his subjects; for luxury and prodigality always draw with them cruelty in the exaction of tribute. For he who is thus profuse, must necessarily extract the very blood from his people. As Seleucus was thus devoted to self-indulgence, this sense is more appropriate — 'he made the exactor to pass through', meaning, he laid new and fresh taxes on all his subjects. Nothing but this is said of him, since he was immediately put to death, as the second clause of the verse informs us. If we prefer taking the words — the glory of the kingdom — by way of opposition, Seleucus will be praised as an honour and an ornament. But I think we must supply the letter (l), 'l', and understand the passage thus: 'He who shall cause the exactor to pass through shall stand in his place, and shall be destroyed in a few days'. By the word "destroyed," he signifies a bloody death. 'But not in anger', says he. I wonder why some translate it "in mutual conflict," because the Hebrews imply "anger" by this word; meaning, he should not perish in open warfare, or in the course of a battle, but by the hands of his domestics. Historians differ as to the kind of death which he died, some saying he was poisoned, and others, slain by the sword. But this difference is of no consequence. Antiochus Epiphanes next succeeds him."

11:21. "Historians agree in representing Antiochus Epiphanes to have been of a very crafty disposition, and some state his departure from Rome to have been by stealth. He was most probably dismissed by the Romans, on the news of his father's death, as they were content with his brother Demetrius. They had other hostages besides, who were among the chief nobles of the land, as well as this third (3rd) son of the king. However this was, all are agreed in relating his cunning. He was so cruel and fierce, that Polybius says he was called 'Epimanes' by way of a nickname, and as he assumed the name of 'Illustrious', he was called the 'Madman', on account of his turbulent disposition. He was a monster puffed up with various vices; being of a slavish and flattering temperament, he endeavoured to acquire the favour of Rome by artifice, as we shall afterwards discover. But when he was not actuated by fear, his cruelty and ferocity were beyond all bounds. For this reason he is called 'contemptible'. He was held in some esteem at Rome, and was received by a portion of his people with great applause. But he was not endued with any heroic or even regal qualities, for he always flattered the Romans, and insinuated himself into the favour of the citizens in this way, until he came to his kingdom as a suppliant; and then the angel calls him a contemptible or despicable person. Another reason equally probable may be brought forward, namely, his seizing upon the throne by fraud and wickedness, after setting aside the legitimate heir. For Seleucus left a successor whom this perfidious plotter deprived of his rights, and thus fraudulently acquired the kingdom for himself. We know of what importance God makes every one's calling, and how He restrains men from rashly arrogating anything to themselves, as they ought always to be satisfied with that station which is assigned them by God. As, therefore, Antiochus seized on the kingdom without any right to it, and drove out the lawful heir, he was contemptible before God, and would never have been king at all except by violence and tyranny on his part, as well as by deceit and cunning devices. I have no hesitation in stating that the angel here censures the perverse conduct of Antiochus, by calling him 'despised' through the absence of all nobleness of feeling.

He next adds, 'They shall not confer upon him the honour of royalty'. By these words he announces the injustice of his reign through not being chosen by the votes of the people. We have stated that the son of Seleucus ought to have reigned without any dispute, but the very person who should have been his nephew's guardian, wickedly deprived his ward of his paternal inheritance. Hence the angel speaks of him rather as a robber than as a king, because he seized upon the kingdom, and was not elected by the popular choice. It follows: 'he shall come in peace, and seize the kingdom by flatteries'. This is the explanation of the last clause. It might be asked, how did he deprive his nephew of his kingdom? the reply is —he shall come peacefully, meaning, he shall lay aside everything which he was agitating in his mind, and should not openly boast of his being king, but should deceitfully act in the character of guardian until he had the power of ruining his ward. He shall come, then, peacefully, and shall seize the kingdom by flatteries. Thus we see the angel's meaning in these words. Besides, although Daniel did not see all these things, nor even many of the chosen people, yet they tasted enough of these prophecies to satisfy them, and to banish anxiety from their minds. They were permitted to perceive God speaking through His angel, and experience taught them the truth of everything which is contained here, even if many events should be hidden from them. But it was God's object to support the spirits of the pious, even to the advent of Christ, and to retain them in tranquillity amidst the greatest disturbances. Thus they would acknowledge the value of the promise of the Redeemer, after he had been set forth, as will be mentioned at the close of the chapter. I will now proceed to the next words."

11:22. "We may naturally conjecture that the dominions of Antiochus were not immediately at peace, because a portion of his court favoured the lawful heir. As it always happens in every change of government, there were many tumults in Syria before Antiochus could remove his adversaries out of his way. For although the kingdom of Egypt was then destitute of a head, as Ptolemy, called Philometor, was then only a boy, his counsellors were in favour of the son of Seleucus, and so by secret supplies afforded their aid to the faction opposed to Antiochus. He had much trouble not only with his own people, but also with the neighbouring nations. All pitied the lot of his ward, and his being quite undeserving of it, moved many to render him every possible help. The boy was aided by the favour of Egypt, and of other nations. Thus Antiochus was subject to many severe commotions, but the angel announces his final conquest. 'The arms', he says, 'shall be inundated'. This is a metaphorical expression; for whatever aid the son of Seleucus acquired, was not by his own efforts, for he could use none, but by that of his friends. 'The arms', then, meaning, all the auxiliaries which should assist in the restoration of the son of Seleucus, 'should be overwhelmed by an inundation'. This is another metaphor, signifying, they shall be drowned as by a deluge; and by this figure the angel hints not only at the victory of Antiochus, but at its great facility. It was like a deluge, not by its own strength, but because God wished to use the hand of this tyrant in afflicting the Israelites, as we shall afterwards see, and also in harassing both Egypt and Syria. Antiochus was in truth God's scourge, and is thus compared to a deluge. Hence he says, 'out of his sight'. He shews the terror of Antiochus to be so great, that at his very appearance he should dispirit and prostrate his enemies, although he was without forces, and was neither a bold nor a persevering warrior.

'And they shall be broken', says he, 'and also the leader of the covenant'; meaning, Ptolemy shall take the part of his relative in vain. For the son of Seleucus was the cousin of Ptolemy Philometor, since, as we have said, Cleopatra had married Ptolemy Philopator, whence this Philometor was sprung, and Seleucus was the brother of Cleopatra. He, then, was the 'leader of the covenant'. Ptolemy, indeed, who was but a boy, could neither undertake nor accomplish anything by his own counsel, but such was his dignity in the kingdom of Egypt, that he was deservedly called 'leader of the covenant', since all others followed the power of that king. The event fully proved with what ill success all who endeavoured to eject Antiochus from his possessions, contended against him. It now follows:"

11:23. "The angel points out some interruption of the wars, because Antiochus would be content for a time with Syria, and would not make an attempt of Egypt. It was a great point to repel the attempts of all those who wished to recover the rights of his nephew. There is no doubt that the whole country was impoverished and exhausted with the continual expense of these wars; for whenever fresh commotions arose, it was necessary to draw new levies from these provinces, and this occasioned very great expense. It is not surprising, then, if Antiochus, who was of a cunning disposition, negotiated a temporary peace with his nephew Ptolemy Philometor the king of Egypt. His sister Cleopatra still survived, and this was an honourable excuse. The angel, then, states first, the proposal of a truce leading to settled peace between the two (2) sovereigns. He adds, however, the perfidious conduct of Antiochus in his friendships. 'During', or 'after these agreements', he 'shall deal treacherously with him'. Although, therefore, he pretended to be the friend and ally of his nephew, yet he conducted himself deceitfully towards him. 'And he shall ascend, and shall prevail by a small band'; meaning, he shall attack the boy suddenly. For when Ptolemy anticipated a lasting friendship with his uncle, Antiochus took the opportunity of fraudulently attacking some cities with a small force: He thus deceived his enemy, who thought all things would be tranquil with him; and so when Ptolemy had no fear of his uncle, he suddenly lost some of his cities. The angel means this; 'he shall rise' by deceit, and 'shall prevail without large forces', because there shall be no suspicion of warfare. It is easy enough to oppress an enemy in a state of tranquillity, and in the absence of all fear. It is afterwards added,— "

11:24. "The history is here continued: The angel shews how Antiochus in a short time and with a small band should acquire many cities, 'as he should come in peace upon the fatness of the province', implying his oppressing them while sleeping in security. He shews also how he should become conqueror, not by any hostile invasion of Egypt, but by cunning and stealth he should deprive King Ptolemy of his cities when he least expected it. There should be no appearance of war; hence he says, 'he shall come in peace upon the fatness of the land'. The word "fatness" is used metaphorically for "richness." When the Egyptians supposed all danger to be far removed, and were persuaded of the friendship of Antiochus towards them, and relied on him as an ally should any adversity arise, they indulged themselves in luxuries till Antiochus came suddenly and subdued them. He next adds, 'He shall despise the spoil, and prey, and goods, which belonged to them'. Some take the words for spoil and prey in the sense of "soldiers," and join it with the verb (ybzur), 'ibzor', "he shall disperse," meaning, he shall distribute their possessions among his soldiers, to conciliate their good will, and to prepare them for new wars, as we know how easily soldiers are enticed when they receive the rewards of their service; for they are actuated solely by covetousness and avarice. Some writers expound it in this way — Antiochus shall divide the prey among his soldiers, but I prefer the other sense — 'he shall disperse the prey, and the spoil, and the goods, of the Egyptians'. After suddenly oppressing the Egyptians, he shall proceed to spoil them like a robber.

He afterwards adds, 'And against the fortifications shall he devise machinations', meaning, he shall lay his plans for seizing the fortified cities. For at first (1st) he penetrated as far as certain cities, and occupied first (1st) Coelo-Syria, and afterwards Phoenice, but could not quickly possess the fortified towns; hence he deferred the execution of his plans to a more suitable time. Therefore, the angel says, 'he shall arrange his plans against the fortified cities, but only for the time'; meaning, he shall not immediately bring forward his intentions, hoping to oppress his nephew when off his guard. Thus under the disguise of peace an access to these cities would always be open to him, and he would reconcile to himself all whom he could corrupt by either gifts or other devices. We perceive, then, how a summary is here presented to us of the arts and schemes by which Antiochus should deprive his nephew of a portion of his territory and its towns, how suddenly he should invade some of the weakest in a state of unsuspecting tranquillity; and how by degrees he should invent machinations for seizing upon the stronger towns as well as he could. He also says, 'for the time'. The cunning and malice of Antiochus was always apparent throughout these transactions. He did not engage in open warfare, but was always endeavouring to add to his possessions by indirect frauds, — a course which was not without its success.

When it is said, 'He shall do what neither his fathers nor his fathers' fathers did', this must be restricted solely to Egypt. For Seleucus the first (1st) king of Syria enjoyed a wide extent of dominion: then he prospered in warfare, and his fame flourished even to a good old age, and though at last he was unsuccessful in battle, yet on the whole he was a superior and celebrated warrior. Besides this we know him to have been one (1) of the chief generals of Alexander the Great. As to his son Antiochus, we have previously observed the wide extent of his dominion, and how highly he was esteemed for prudence and valour. The angel does not compare Antiochus Epiphanes generally with either his father, or grandfather, or great-grandfather, but only with respect to Egypt. For his ancestors always longed after Egypt, but their designs against it were entirely frustrated; he, however, was more successful in his aggression where his ancestors had failed in their attempts. Hence it becomes manifest how God overrules the events of war, so that the conqueror and the triumphant hero is not the man who excels in counsel, or in prudence, or valour, but he who fights under the heavenly leader. It pleases God at one time to afflict nations, and at another to set over them kings who are really His servants. So He wished to punish Egypt by the hands of this robber. It afterwards follows."

11:25. "The angel here announces how Antiochus Epiphanes after prevailing by fraud, should become bolder in his daring. He should venture to levy a hostile army and invade Egypt openly, without any further dissimulation. He therefore says, 'at length he shall rouse his strength and his courage'. He had previously crept along through hiding-places and fastnesses, and had not roused either his strength or his courage when remaining quiet at home; meanwhile he obtained the possession of various towns by treachery and other artifices. This was only creeping on by burrowing underground. But he now openly declares war, and brings his forces into the field of battle, and thus 'stirs up his strength and his courage'. As I have already said, his new method of warfare is here described as unusual with him, as his audacity, doubtless, gradually increased through that series of success which he had enjoyed, and by which he had become more powerful than his nephew, through the practice of deceit. He afterwards adds, 'with a great army'. He had mentioned a small band, he now places opposite to it a large army; for it required a long space of time to collect extensive pecuniary resources for carrying on the war, and also for enlarging and extending his own boundaries. He was thus able to enrol fresh levies, while his prosperity induced many to become his auxiliaries. As he found himself in every way superior to his nephew, he collected a great army. 'The king of the south also shall be irritated'; that is, he shall not dare to harass his own uncle Antiochus, but shall be forced to open warfare. 'He shall come, then, with a great army', very great, strong, and powerful, says he, 'but he shall not stand, because they shall devise devices against him'; meaning, he shall be conquered by treachery. Here the angel signifies that Ptolemy should have sufficient courage to resist, had he not been betrayed by his adherents. We shall more clearly perceive this in the next verse to-morrow." }}

Lecture 60th.

11:26. "The angel predicted, yesterday, that Ptolemy should not stand forth in battle, through the treachery of his own adherents. He now expresses the kind of treachery, for his chief courtiers or counsellors should be the authors of this perfidy. He opposes the common soldiers to their leaders, for in the second (2nd) clause, he shews how the soldiers should discharge their duty without sparing either their life or their blood. We now understand the Holy Spirit's intention in this verse, for he says the authors of this perfidy should not be ordinary men, but the chief among the counsellors. They are said to eat at the king's table, as in the first (1st) chapter we saw how a portion was given to Daniel, and to his companions, from the royal food at the king's table. Thus he shews how dishonourable this perfidy was, as they eat at his table, and were his intimate companions. 'They shall destroy him', says he, 'and his army shall be overwhelmed'. He shews that many were prepared for this duty, who would boldly and freely expose their lives to danger for their king's safety and their country's defence, 'but many should fall wounded'. He signifies that there should be a great slaughter in his army, and the issue of the battle would not be according to his wish, because his generals would not preserve their fidelity to their sovereign. By this example the angel describes to us the ordinary situation of kings. They choose their counsellors not by their honesty, but by the mere appearance of congeniality in their affections and tastes. If a king is avaricious, or cunning, or cruel, or sensual, he desires to have friends and attendants who will not check either his avarice or his craftiness, his cruelty or his lust. Hence they deserve the conduct which they receive, and experience treachery from those whom they ought not to treat with so much honour, if they considered themselves in duty bound to God and to their people. It now follows,"

11:27. "The angel here narrates that the close of this war should be by treaties and a hollow pretence of peace after the slaughter which Ptolemy had sustained. Although Antiochus might have followed up his own good fortune, yet he durst not venture to push his advantage to the extremity, but according to his disposition, he thought it more to his interest to make peace with his enemy. We have already alluded to his craftiness and his want of openness and integrity. The angel predicts the existence of bad faith in both these kings; the uncle and nephew will meet, says he, and sup together, and pretend the greatest friendship, 'but they shall speak lies', says he, 'at the same table'; meaning, they shall plot against each other, and each shall act fraudulently for his own ends. This prophecy indeed seems to be of little consequence to the faithful; but it was needful to shew that in such a state of confusion they could not hold out without being furnished with all kinds of support. If the angel had only said generally, first there shall be war, and then a temporary peace, this would not have been sufficient to sustain the minds of the pious; but when the details are so clearly pointed out, a remarkable confirmation is afforded them. Thus the faithful have no reason for doubting that God has spoken, when the angel predicts the future so exactly, and so openly narrates it, as if a matter of history.

He next adds, 'Yet it shall not prosper, because the end is for the time', says he. The angel recalls the faithful to the providence of God, as our minds always naturally rest in the midst of earthly things. We apprehend with our minds only as far as we see with our eyes. We always ask the reasons "why this happens" and "why that course of proceeding has not turned out well," entirely omitting the will of God. Hence the angel meets this fault and stupidity of men by saying, that whatever these kings were plotting should fail of success, 'since the end was for the time'; meaning, God would hold many occurrences in suspense. While, therefore, we are considering only second (2nd) causes, we perceive how the supreme power resides with God alone, and He governs by His will the mutual transactions of mankind. No slight advantage would result to the faithful from this instruction, because, while kings are devising many schemes, and using great cunning and all the perverse artifices of diplomacy, God still restrains their minds. He holds events by His secret bridle, and allows nothing to happen without His heavenly decree. Although we may gather this general instruction from this passage, yet the angel doubtless restricts what I have said to the historical events immediately before us. The end had not yet approached, yet the fitting time was fixed beforehand by God's secret counsel, so that Antiochus conquers at one (1) period and retreats at another, as we shall see. It follows:"

11:28. "Here the angel predicts the calamitous nature of that peace for the people of God, because Antiochus should turn his arms against Jerusalem and the whole Jewish people. It is said, 'He shall return to his own land', because he shall not possess Egypt. This return implies the victory of Antiochus, and yet his betaking himself within the boundaries of his own realm. When he adds, with great pomp, or great riches, he shews the source whence that wealth should be derived, —'his heart should be against the holy covenant'. He partially destroyed Jerusalem and the temple of God. He was compelled to leave the temple and many treasures, through either shame, or reverence, or a miracle, as we read in the 2nd Book of Maccabees. (Chap. 5:2.) He would willingly have stripped the whole temple, but God then restrained him, while he had gathered for himself great wealth. Hence the angel joins the two (2) events, he should return to Syria with great wealth, and his heart should be against the holy covenant. Some refer this to persons, as if the angel meant the people who were in covenant with God. But the simpler sense pleases me better, he should carry on war against God, because he was not enriched with such ample spoils as he had expected. We have mentioned his making peace with his enemy: lest, therefore, this expedition should be fruitless, he spoiled the temple of God. 'Thus his heart was elated against God and against his holy covenant'. The other exposition is too cold and too forced.

'And he shall do it and shall return to his own land'. This return at the end of the verse is taken in a different sense from that at the beginning, as now he should use his own will as a conqueror, and no one should oppose his arrival in his own territories. These two expressions are to be read together, 'he shall do it and return to his own dominions'. The meaning of the word for "do" we have already explained. The angel signifies the absence of every obstacle which could prevent the destruction of the city and temple by Antiochus. This was a severe trial, and would cause the minds of the faithful to be disturbed and tossed about because God gave up His temple to this cruel tyrant, and permitted the sacred vessels and the hidden treasures to be carried off with the greatest ignominy. It was necessary, then, to inform the faithful beforehand of this grievous slaughter, lest its novelty should astonish them and overthrow the constancy of their faith. Hence we gather this practical instruction —God often predicts many sorrowful events for us, and yet this instruction ought not to imbitter our feelings; for He wishes to fortify us against the trial which the novelty of the event must occasion. Thus the angel, while treating of occurrences by no means agreeable, was a useful herald of all the calamities which must happen, lest anything unusual or unexpected should fall upon the pious. Thus they would acknowledge the affliction to proceed from God's hand; and while they were exposed to the lust of Antiochus, yet God by His certain and incomprehensible counsel allowed much license to this impious tyrant. It afterwards follows:"

11:29-30. "First of all, the angel says, Antiochus should return a short time afterwards and take possession of Egypt. This was the fruit of that pretended peace and perfidious friendship which has already been mentioned. For the uncle and nephew banqueted together in mutual distrust, as the angel has already stated, and as we found in the 27th verse of this chapter. This deception was shortly afterwards dissolved, when Antiochus, without any reasonable impulse, returned to Egypt. In this way he shewed his want of nothing but an opportunity for-breaking the truce, and he only delayed it for a time, because he had no wish to oppress his nephew in haste. This, then, is one point. We may take the word (mw`d), 'mogued', "time," for a period divinely predetermined; but as this explanation may seem too forced, I am contented with the common one. 'He shall return', then, 'for a time, and shall come', says he, 'to Egypt; but the latter exposition shall not be like the former'; for the whole preparation for war which had struck such terror into Egypt should lose its effect. He had seized on a portion of the kingdom, and King Ptolemy Philometor was besieged when Publius Popilius arrived, of whom the angel will presently speak. For the cause of his return is added, — 'ships shall come from Chittim'. We have explained this word elsewhere. By comparing all the passages of Scripture in which the word occurs, we shall find all the Gentiles denoted by it, from Macedon through the whole of Greece, as far as Illyricum and Italy. The ancients used another term for the Macedonians; they call them 'Maketae', and some think the letter 'M' a useless addition. But whether this be so or not, the circumstances shew the Macedonians, and Greeks, and other transmarine nations, to have been called Chittim. If any one still disputes about this word, let us desist from all contention; still, we cannot help observing what the perpetual tenor of Scripture enables us to discover, — that the Macedonians, Greeks, and Italians are included under this term. This passage is free from all doubt, because Antiochus was restrained not by the Greeks but by the Romans. Ambassadors were sent by them, not for this purpose alone, but to investigate the whole state of Greece and Asia Minor. The affairs of Greece were then very unsettled, and the Romans were turning their attention towards Achaia, for they thought the Achaean league would become too powerful. Among these ambassadors was P. Popilius, a stern man, as we may venture to conjecture, but austere and barbarous. When he met with Antiochus, who was then besieging Alexandria, and held the boy-king in captivity, he addressed him after his own manner. King Antiochus received him graciously, and mildly, and even blandly, and wished even to salute him, for, as we have already stated, his disposition was naturally servile. Popilius rejected all these advances, and ordered him to keep his familiarities for private intercourse; for Antiochus had been intimate with him when a hostage at Rome, during his father's lifetime. He rejected all these acts of courtesy, and explained to him the commands of the Senate, and ordered him instantly to depart from Egypt. The king said he would consult with his friends. But he was unable to lay aside his accustomed sternness; he drew a circle with the wand which he held in his hand, and ordered the king to summon his counsellors, and to deliberate on the spot, otherwise he must declare war at once. When the king perceived this barbarian acting so decisively, he dared no longer to hesitate or dissemble, but threw himself at once into the power of the Senate, and suddenly retired from the country. This history is now described by the angel. All these events were as yet unperformed, but God set before the eyes of the pious what was then entirely concealed and contrary to the expectation of mankind. The angel therefore states the reason why that expedition of Antiochus should be quite unlike the last one (1). 'There shall come against him', says he, 'ships of Chittim', meaning Italy, and he shall grieve and return; that is, he shall obey, although he shall feel indignant at such imperious treatment, and be compelled to retreat with every mark of disgrace. It was unworthy of a king to demean himself so humbly at the mere word of his adversary.

This accounts for his indignation: 'But he shall return and be indignant against the covenant of holiness'; meaning, he shall turn his rage against the temple and city of God. This second return involved the Jews in a far longer period of slaughter than the former one. Antiochus was then unwilling to return home, unless laden with spoil, after pretending to establish peace; but now he was compelled to retreat with great disgrace, and this only exasperated and enraged him. Hence he acted most outrageously towards both the people and the temple of God. Thus the angel says, 'He shall be indignant against the holy covenant, and shall do so and return'. He repeats the same language twice; as if he had said, Antiochus should return to Syria without effecting his object, through obeying the Roman Senate, or rather his old friend whom he had known at Rome. We have already stated the reason, which we shall afterwards more fully explain, why the angel predicted the fury of the king as turned against the holy covenant. It is this, —the confidence of the pious would naturally be injured by observing the divine permission granted to the tyrant for spoiling the temple.

He next adds, 'And he shall act with intelligence towards the forsakers of the holy covenant'. The angel here points out the manner in which secret agreements should take place between Antiochus and those apostates who should desert God's holy covenant. It is quite clear that he was summoned to Jerusalem, first (1st), by Jason, and then by Menelaus. (2nd Macc. 4:19-23.) I shall touch but briefly events recorded in history. Profane authors inform us accurately of these occurrences, and besides this, a whole book of Maccabees gives us similar information, and places clearly before us what the angel here predicts. Every one who wishes to read these prophecies with profit, must make himself familiar with these books, and must try to remember the whole history. Onias the elder was a holy man; his son has been previously mentioned. (2nd Macc. 3:1.) For, with the view of escaping from snares, he set out for Egypt and built a temple, as Josephus informs us, and pretended to fulfil that passage in Isaiah which says, "There shall be an altar to God in Egypt". But Onias the elder, who discharged faithfully and sacredly the office of high priest, was put to flight, and eventually put to death. Then Jason, whom he had sent to appease Antiochus, assumed the high priesthood, and betrayed the temple and the whole nation, as well as the worship of God. (2nd Macc. 4:35-37; also 7) He afterwards met with the reward which he deserved, for he was slain, and then Menelaus succeeded him, and conciliated the favour of Antiochus. (2nd Macc. 5:9; 4:27.) The authority of the priesthood prevailed so far as to enable him to draw with him a great portion of the people. Here, then, the angel predicts how Antiochus, on approaching the city, should have deserters and apostates as his companions. The words are, 'He shall apply his mind to the forsakers of the holy covenant', and the sense is by no means obscure. Antiochus should not make open war against the Jews, but one faction should go forth to meet him and ingratiate themselves with him. I run through these events briefly, because when I afterwards arrive at a general summary, it will be far more convenient to elicit the general improvement. The angel says next:"

11:31-32. "Here the angel describes the intestine evils of the Church, and more fully explains what he touched on in the last verse. He says, 'The arms shall stand up for Antiochus'. Some explain this of the garrison which that tyrant imposed on Jerusalem. But this seems too far-fetched. I do not hesitate to suppose the angel to refer here to the apostates and forsakers of the Law. 'Arms', then, 'shall stand up from him', meaning, he shall not contend in his own strength, but shall rely upon the people's assistance. Many should offer themselves in obedience to him, and thus Antiochus would find a party devoted to himself at Jerusalem, which should willingly prostitute itself to his will. He afterwards adds, 'They shall profane the sanctuary of strength'. The angel here joins together Antiochus and these impious apostates. (2nd Macc. 6:2.) To favour him, the temple is said to be polluted, and this was fulfilled when the statue of Jupiter Olympius was erected there. The tyranny and violence of Antiochus continued long afterwards, as we shall see in its own place. He brought the statue of the Olympian Jove into the temple, for the purpose of overthrowing the worship of God, and then he introduced other corruptions, which vitiated the purity of God's service. He might in one moment have overthrown the whole Law, but he first tried to mingle many superstitions with God's Law, and thus to estrange the Jews by degrees from true and sincere piety. The angel speaks of 'the sanctuary of power', to shew the faithful that Antiochus is not the conqueror of God, who was never deprived of his power, but continued the guardian and keeper of his temple even unto the end. He uses this epithet for the temple, to assure the pious that God had not given way to the violence of the tyrant. His authority stood untouched and untainted, although his temple was exposed to such foul pollution.

Lastly, he wished the faithful to retain by this teaching a sense of God's unconquered power in choosing that temple for His dwelling-place, although for a time Antiochus was so insulting, and was permitted to profane it with His impious crew. This instruction urged the pious to look upon God's power with the eye of faith, although it was then hidden from their view, and was trampled under foot by the impious in the pride of their audacity. Sorrowful indeed was the spectacle of this statue erected within the temple, for God, according to our previous statement, promised to be the defender of that sacred mountain. When the impious were raging thus insultingly, who would not have thought God to be altogether conquered and unable to defend His residence any longer? The angel then here encourages the faithful to cultivate far different thoughts from those suggested by the prospect before them. The temple, then, seemed weak and deprived of every protection, and yet with respect to God it was still a sanctuary of strength. He next adds, 'And they shall abolish the continual sacrifice', which really occurred; but I pass it over shortly now, as I shall have another opportunity of explaining it suitably and fully. 'And they shall place', or set up, 'that abomination which shall cause astonishment'. For who would not have been astonished when he saw the temple deserted by the Almighty? For if God cared for the temple services, why did He not resist rage like this? Why did He suffer Himself to be subjected to such disgraceful indignity? The angel meets such temptations as these by saying, even if the very best men are astonished at such disgrace, yet nothing happens by chance; for God had already foreseen and decreed all things. They would not have been predicted, unless God had wished to prove the people's faith, and to exact the penalty for their ingratitude. But I cannot complete the subject to-day." }}

Lecture 61st.

{{ 11:31-32. "We stated in the last Lecture, the seriousness of the test by which God proved the faithfulness of His people, in allowing Antiochus such unbounded liberty to pollute the Temple, and to abolish, for a time, all the sacrifices and services. He next set up in the midst of the Temple that abomination which cast down the spirits of the pious; for that prodigy could not be witnessed without the most profound astonishment. No one could suppose it possible, that God would expose His own sanctuary to such dishonour, as it was the only one which He had chosen in the whole world. It now follows, 'And he shall deceive the transgressors of the covenant with blandishment, but a people knowing their God will retain it firmly and practise it'. Here Daniel more clearly expresses what he had previously said of the corruption and overthrow of God's worship, as Antiochus should enticingly win over to himself a perfidious portion of those who were nominally, at least, God's people. He thus repeats what we observed before. These hypocrites were like the arms of Antiochus; for had he captured the city by the force of arms, still he would not have dared to offer these insults to God's Temple, unless he had received assistance from those apostates who rejected all fear of the Almighty, and whom ambition and avarice alone had impelled to unite with that impious tyrant, who was the avowed and professed enemy of their religion. The angel, then, here confirms what he had previously said, shewing how the wicked and impious despisers of the covenant should be tools in the hand of this robber. For the first word of verse 32 is derived from (rsh'), 'reshegn', "to do wickedly," and refers to that special act of sinfulness, their despising God's covenant. This refers to those intestine enemies who had previously boasted themselves to be sons of Abraham, and who were masked by circumcision, the sign of that covenant. He does not here point out any of the mere dregs of the people, but the impious priests, Menelaus, Jason, and others like them, as the passage has already been explained. He says then, 'these should be deceived by the blandishments of Antiochus'. He doubtless offered to the priests and to others what he thought they would value most; one he set over the Temple, another he deceived with vain and fallacious promises for a time, by distributing a variety of gifts among them. In this way he corrupted them all by his flatteries. To these the Prophet opposes the sincere worshippers of God, and the Hebrew copula ought to be understood here as implying this contrast. He had already spoken of many as deceived by vain promises, and had called them transgressors of the covenant: he now adds, 'But the people who know God shall strengthen themselves and shall do it'. The angel means that the perfidy of those of whom he had spoken, should not prevail with the pious to lead them into the same alliance of wickedness, and to hurl them headlong into the same snares. Although such was the perfidy of these revolvers, yet 'all who know God', says he, 'shall strengthen themselves'-....

11:33-34....."God shews how He would afford help to His elect, although it might possibly seem of no consequence to them. For He dwells on 'the smallness of the assistance' —which literally happened. Without doubt the angel referred to Mattathias and his sons, usually called the Maccabees. (1st Macc. 2:1.).....

This passage may lead us to inquire whether the angel approved of all the exploits of the Maccabees. We may reply to the question in two opposite ways. First of all, if any one persists in contending from the angel's words for God's approval of every action of the Maccabees, this view is by no means correct. God might use the Maccabees in succouring the wretched Israelites, and yet it does not follow that they conducted the good cause properly and lawfully. It very often occurs, when the faithful offer their services to God, and have one object set before them, that they fail either through inconsiderate zeal, or through partial ignorance. Whether we take this view or not, our object is often good when our manner of proceeding is objectionable. And thus it was with the Maccabees; God, doubtless, stirred up Mattathias to collect the dispersed remnant of the people, to restore His worship, and to purge His temple from the abominations which Antiochus had set up. Yet in the troublous times which occurred, his sons, doubtless, failed in many points of duty. The cause which they undertook was just, while particular actions of theirs cannot be approved by us. It now follows.

11:35.....The severity of the despotism of Antiochus is notorious, no one dared to utter a word, all the sacred books were burnt, and he thought the worship of God entirely abolished. Women with their children were promiscuously seized for burning, and the satellites of this tyrant did not spare the mothers with infants hanging on their breasts. (1st Macc. 1) During the progress of such atrocious cruelty, who would not have thought the whole seed of God to have been extinct? "

11:36. "This passage is very obscure, and has consequently been explained in very opposite ways by interpreters. And whatever is obscure, is usually doubtful, and there would be little utility and no termination, if I were to narrate the opinions of them all. I shall therefore follow another method, and omitting all superfluous labour, I shall simply inquire the angel's meaning. I must, however, refer briefly to opinions received by the consent of the majority, because they occupy the minds of many, and thus close the door to the correct interpretation. The Jews, for instance, are not agreed among themselves, and their difference of opinion only serves to produce and perpetuate darkness, rather than to diffuse the clearness of light. Some explain it of Antiochus, and others of the Romans, but in a manner different to that which I shall afterwards state. The Christian expositors present much variety, but the greater number incline towards Antichrist as fulfilling the prophecy. Others, again, use greater moderation by supposing Antichrist to be here obliquely hinted at, while they do not exclude Antiochus as the type and image of Antichrist. This last opinion has great probability, but I do not approve of it, and can easily refute it. Antiochus did not long survive the pollution of the Temple, and then the following events by no means suit the occurrences of his time. Nor can his sons be fairly substituted in his place, and hence we must pass on to some other king, distinct from Antiochus and his heirs. As I have already stated, some of the Rabbis explain this of the Romans, but without judgment, for they first apply the passage to Vespasian, and Titus his son, and then extend it to the present times, which is utterly without reason, as they chatter foolishly, according to their usual custom. Those who explain it of Antichrist, have some colour of reason for their view, but there is no soundness in their conclusion, and we shall perceive this better in the progress of our exposition. We must now discover what king the angel here designates. First of all, I apply it entirely to the Roman Empire, but I do not consider it to begin at the reign of the Caesars, for this would be unsuitable and out of date, as we shall see. By the word "king" I do not think a single person indicated, but an empire, whatever be its government, whether by a senate, or by consuls, or by proconsuls. This need not appear either harsh or absurd, as the Prophet had previously discussed the four (4) monarchies, and when treating of the Romans he calls their power a kingdom, as if they had but a single (1) ruler over them. And when he spoke of the Persian monarchy, he did not refer to a single (1) ruler, but included them all, from Cyrus to the last Darius, who was conquered by Alexander. This method of speech is already very familiar to us, as the word "king" often means "kingdom." The angel, then, when saying, 'a king shall do' anything, does not allude to Antiochus, for all history refutes this. Again, he does not mean any single (1) individual, for where shall we find one (1) who exalted himself against all gods? who oppressed God's Church, and fixed his palace between two seas, and seized upon the whole East! The Romans alone did this. I intend to shew more clearly to-morrow how beautifully and appositely everything related by the angel applies to the Roman empire; and if anything should appear either obscure or doubtful, a continued interpretation will bring it to light and confirm it.

We lay this down at once; the angel did not prophesy of Antiochus, or any single (1) monarch, but of a new empire, meaning, the Roman. We have the reason at hand why the angel passes directly from Antiochus to the Romans. God desired to support the spirits of the pious, lest they should be overwhelmed by the number and weight of the massacres which awaited them and the whole Church even to the advent of Christ. It was not sufficient to predict the occurrences under the tyranny of Antiochus; for after his time, the Jewish religion was more and more injured, not only by foreign enemies, but by their own priesthood. Nothing remained unpolluted, since their avarice and ambition had arrived at such a pitch, that they trode under foot the whole glory of God, and the law itself. The faithful required to be fortified against such numerous temptations, until Christ came, and then God renewed the condition of his Church. The time, therefore, which intervened between the Maccabees and the manifestation of Christ ought not to be omitted. The reason is now clear enough why the angel passes at once from Antiochus to the Romans.

We must next ascertain how the Romans became connected with the elect people of God. Had their dominion been limited to Europe alone, the allusion to them would have been useless and out of place. But from the period of the kings of Syria being oppressed by many and constant devastations in war, both at home and abroad, they were unable to injure the Jews as they had previously done; then new troubles sprang up through the Romans. We know, indeed, when many of the kings of Syria were indulging in arrogance, how the Romans interposed their authority, and that, too, with bad faith, for the purpose of subjecting the east to themselves. Then when Attalus made the Roman people his heir, the whole of Asia Minor became absorbed by them. They became masters of Syria by the will of this foolish king, who defrauded his legal heirs, thinking by this conduct to acquire some regard for his memory after his death. From that period, when the Romans first acquired a taste of the wealth of these regions, they never failed to find some cause for warfare. At length Pompey subdued Syria, and Lucullus, who had previously carried on war with Mithridates, restored the kingdom to Tigranes. Pompey, as I have already remarked, subjected Syria to the Romans. He left, indeed, the Temple untouched, but we may conjecture the cruelty which he exercised towards the Jews by the ordinary practice of this people. The clemency of the Romans towards the nations which they subdued is notorious enough. After Crassus, the most rapacious of all men, had heard much of the wealth of the Jews, he desired that province as his own. We know, too, how Pompey and Caesar, while they were friends, partitioned the whole world among themselves. Gaul and Italy were assigned entirely to Caesar; Pompey obtained Spain, and part of Africa and Sicily; while Crassus obtained Syria and the regions of the east, where he miserably perished, and his head, filled with gold, was carried about in mockery from place to place. A second calamity occurred during that incursion of Crassus, and from this time the Jews were harassed by many and continual wars. Before this period, they had entered into an alliance with the Romans, as we are informed by the books of the Maccabees, as well as by profane writers. Therefore, when they granted liberty to the Jews, (1st Macc. 8 & 14) it was said, they were generous at the expense of others. This was their ordinary and usual practice; at first they received with friendship all who sought their alliance by treaty, and then they treated them with the utmost cruelty. The wretched Jews were treated in this way. The angel then alludes to them first, and afterwards speaks of Antiochus. All these points, thus briefly mentioned, we must bear in mind, to enable us to understand the context, and to shew the impossibility of interpreting the prophecy otherwise than of the Romans.

I now proceed to the words, 'The king shall do according to his will'. I have stated that we need not restrict this expression to a single person, as the angel prophesies of the continued course of the Roman monarchy. 'He shall raise himself, and magnify himself', says he, 'above every god'. This will be explained by and by, where the king is said to be a despiser of all deities. But with reference to the present passage, although impiety and contempt of God spread throughout the whole world, we know how peculiarly this may be said of the Romans, because their pride led them to pass an opinion upon the right of each deity to be worshipped. And, therefore, the angel will use an epithet for God, meaning fortitudes and munitions, (m'zym), 'megnezim', as in verse 38. That passage, I shall shew you to-morrow, has been badly explained; for interpreters, as we shall discover, are utterly "at sea" as to its meaning." But here the angel, by attributing contempt of the one God and of all deities to the Romans, implies their intense pride and haughtiness, in which they surpassed other profane nations. And, truly, they did not preserve even a superstitious fear of God; and while they vauntingly paraded the superior piety of both their ancestors and themselves, yet an accurate perusal of their writings will disclose what they really thought. They made a laughingstock of all divinities, and ridiculed the very name and appearance of piety, and used it only for the purpose of retaining their subjects in obedience. The angel then says most truly of this empire, 'it shall magnify itself against all deities'; and 'it shall speak wonderful things against the God of gods', by which the Jewish religion is intended. For before they had passed into Asia Minor, and penetrated beyond Mount Taurus, they were ignorant of the law of God, and had never heard of the name of Moses. They then began to take notice of the worship of some peculiar god by that nation, and of the form of their piety being distinct from that of all other people. From the period of the knowledge of the peculiarities of the Jewish religion being spread among the Romans, they began to vomit forth their blasphemies against 'the God of gods'. We need not gather together the proof of this from their histories; but Cicero in his oration for Flaccus, (sec. 28,) tears most contemptuously to pieces the name of the true God; and that impure slanderer—for he deserves the name—so blurts out his calumnies, as if the God who had revealed Himself to His elect people by His law, was unworthy of being reckoned with Venus or Bacchus, or their other idols. Lastly, he treats the numerous massacres to which the Jews were exposed, as a proof of their religion being hated by all the deities; and this he thinks ought to be a sufficient sign of the detestable character of their religion. The angel then has every reason to declare the Romans puffed up with pride and haughtiness, as they did not hesitate to treat the name of the true God with such marked contempt.

'He shall utter', says he, 'remarkable things against the God of gods'. The angel seems to refer to a single (1) individual, but we have stated his reference to be to this empire. He adds next, 'And he shall prosper until the consumption', or completion, or consummation 'of the indignation, since the determination has been made'. Here also the angel treats of a long succession and series of victories, which prevent the application of the passage to Antiochus. For he died immediately after he had spoiled the Temple; all his offspring perished by each other's hands; and the Romans, to their great disgrace, acquired possession of Syria and that portion of the East. We must necessarily explain this of the Romans, as they notoriously prospered in their wars, especially on the continent of Asia. And if they were sometimes in difficulties, as we shall see to-morrow when treating the words which the angel will then use, they soon recovered their usual success. The angel here says, 'This king shall prosper till the end of the indignation'; meaning, until God should punish the hypocrites, and thus humble His Church. I refer this to God, as I shall explain more at length tomorrow." }}

Lecture 63rd.

{{ 11:37. "We yesterday commenced an explanation of the prophecy, in which the angel begins to treat of the Roman Empire. I then shewed the impossibility of applying any other exposition to the passage, as it would have been absurd to pass by the point most necessary to be known. At the very beginning, we stated that God did not inform Daniel of other occurrences for the purpose of pandering to the foolish and vain curiosity of the many, but to fortify his servants, and to prevent their falling away in the midst of these most grievous contests. But after the death of Antiochus, we know by what various and grievous machinations Satan had endeavoured to overthrow the faith of all the pious. For this reason their courage required propping up. If the whole of this period had been passed over in silence, God would have appeared to have neglected His servants. Therefore either our yesterday's subject of comment would have been useless, or else this clause ought to be added, lest the prophecy should appear either defective or mutilated. And we previously observed, while the angel was predicting future changes, there was no omission of the Roman Empire, which is again introduced here. Let us remember, then, that the angel is not now speaking of Antiochus, nor does he make a leap forwards to Antichrist, as some think, but he means a perpetual series. Thus the faithful would be prepared for all assaults which might be made upon their faith, if this rampart had not been interposed. The remainder of the verse now remains to be explained, 'Even to the end of the wrath, because the decision has been made'. The angel had narrated the perverseness of this king in not sparing the living God, but in darting his calumnies against Him....."

11:37. "I do not wonder at those who explain this prophecy of Antiochus, experiencing some trouble with these words; for they cannot satisfy themselves, because this prediction of the angel's was never accomplished by Antiochus, who did neither neglect all deities nor the god of his fathers. Then, with regard to the love of women, this will not suit this person. But it is easy to prove by other reasons already mentioned, the absence of all allusion here to Antiochus. Some refer this prophecy to the Pope and to Mahomet, and the phrase, the love of women, seems to give probability to this view. For Mahomet allowed to men the brutal liberty of chastising their wives, and thus he corrupted that conjugal love and fidelity which binds the husband to the wife. Unless every man is content with a single (1) wife, there can be no love, because there can be no conjugal happiness whenever rivalry exists between the inferior wives. As, therefore, Mahomet allowed full scope to various lusts, by permitting a man to have a number of wives, this seems like an explanation of his being inattentive to the love of women. Those who think the Pope to be intended here remind us of their enforcing celibacy, by means of which the honour of marriage is trodden under foot. We know with what foulness the Roman Pontiffs bark when marriage is hinted to them, as we may see in the decrees of Pope Siricius, in the seventh (7th) chapter of the first (1st) volume of the Councils." They quote the passage, 'Those who are in the flesh cannot please God'; and thus compare marriage with fornication, thereby disgracefully and reproachfully throwing scorn upon an ordinance sanctioned by God. We observe, then, some slight correspondence, but the remaining points will not suit this idea. Some assert that as Mahomet invented a new form of religion, so did the Pope; true indeed, but neither of them are intended here, and the reason is, because God wished to sustain the spirits of His people until the first coming of Christ. Hence He predicts by His angel the sufferings to be endured by the Church until Christ was manifest in the flesh. We must now come to the Romans, of whom we began to explain the passage.

The angel says, 'The king shall pay no regard to the 'gods' of his fathers'. The application of this clause is at first (1st) sight obscure; but if we come to reflect upon the outrageous pride and barbarity of the Romans, we shall no longer doubt the meaning of the Prophet's words. The angel states two circumstances; this king should be a despiser of all deities, and yet he should worship one (1) 'god', while the singular (1) and magnificent pomp displayed should exceed all common practices. These two (2) points, so apparently opposite, were found united in the Romans. Our explanation will appear clearer by adding the following verses:"

11:38-39. "As I have already hinted, at the first glance these statements seem opposed to each other; the king of whom we are now treating shall despise all deities, and yet shall worship a certain 'god' in no ordinary way. This agrees very well with the Romans, if we study their dispositions and manners. As they treated the worship of their deities simply as a matter of business, they were evidently destitute of any perception of the divinity, and were only pretenders to religion. Although other profane nations groped their way in darkness, yet they offered a superstitious worship to some divinities. The Romans, however, were not subject to either error or ignorance, but they manifested a gross contempt of God, while they maintained the appearance of piety. We gather this opinion from a review of their whole conduct. For although they fetched many deities from every quarter of the world, and worshipped in common with other nations Minerva, Apollo, Mercury, and others, yet we observe how they treated all other rites as worthless. They considered Jupiter as the supreme deity. But what was Jupiter to them in his own country? Did they value him a single farthing, or the Olympian deity? Nay, they derided both his worshippers and himself. What then really was their supreme 'god'? why the glory of the Capitol; without the additional title of 'Lord' of the Capitol, he was nobody at all. That title distinguished him as specially bound to themselves. For this reason the Prophet calls this Roman Jupiter 'a god of bulwarks', or of powers. The Romans could never be persuaded that any other Jupiter or Juno were worthy of worship; they relied upon their own inherent strength, considered themselves of more importance than the 'gods', and claimed Jupiter as theirs alone. Because his seat was in their capital, he was more to them than a hundred (100) heavenly rulers, for their pride had centred the whole power of the deity in their own capital. They thought themselves beyond the reach of all changes of fortune, and such was their audacity, that everyone fashioned new deities according to his pleasure. There was a temple dedicated to fortune on horseback; for this gratified the vanity of the general who had made good use of his cavalry, and obtained a victory by their means; and in building a temple to equestrian fortune, he wished the multitude to esteem himself as a deity. Then Jupiter Stator was a 'god', and why because this pleased somebody else; and thus Rome became full of temples. One (1) erected an image of fortune, another (1) of virtue, a third (3rd) of prudence, and a fourth (4th) of any other divinity, and every one dared to set up his own idols according to his fancy, till Rome was completely filled with them. In this way Romulus was deified; and what claim had he to this honour? If anyone object here —other nations did the same— we admit it, but we also know in what a foolish, brutal, and barbarous state of antiquity they continued. But the Romans, as I have already intimated, were not instigated to this manufacture of idols by either error or superstition, but by an arrogant vanity which elevated themselves to the first rank among mankind, and claimed superiority over all deities. For instance, they allowed a temple to be erected to themselves in Asia, and sacrifices to be offered, and the name of deity to be applied to them. What pride is here! Is this a proof of belief in the existence of either one (1) 'god' or many? Rome is surely the only (1) deity —and she must be reverently worshipped before all others.

We observe then how the expression of this verse is very applicable to the Romans; they worshipped the 'god' of bulwarks, meaning, they claimed a divine power as their own, and only granted to their 'gods' what they thought useful for their own purposes. With the view of claiming certain virtues as their own, they invented all kinds of deities according to their taste. I omit the testimony of Plutarch as not quite applicable to the present subject. He says in his problems, it was unlawful to utter the name of any deity under whose protection and guardianship the Roman State was placed. He tells us how Valerius Soranus was carried off for foolishly uttering that deity's name, whether male or female. These are his very words. And he adds as the reason, their practice of using magical incantations in worshipping their unknown divinity. Again, we know in what remarkable honour they esteemed "the good 'goddess'." The male sex were entirely ignorant of her nature, and none but females entered the house of the high priest, and there celebrated her orgies. And for what purpose? What was that "good 'goddess'? Surely there always existed this 'god' of bulwarks, since the Romans acknowledged no deity but their own selves. They erected altars to themselves, and sacrificed all kinds of victims to their own success and good fortune; and in this way they reduced all deities within their own sway, while they offered them only the specious and deceptive picture of reverence. There is nothing forced in the expression of the angel, —he will pay no attention to the 'gods' of his fathers; meaning, he will not follow the usual custom of all nations in retaining superstitious ceremonies with error and ignorance. For although the Greeks were very acute, yet they did not dare to make any movement, or propose any discussions on religious matters. One thing we know to be fixed among them, to worship the 'gods' which had been handed down by their fathers. But the Romans dared to insult all religions with freedom and petulance, and to promote atheism as far as they possibly could. Therefore the angel says, 'he should pay no attention to the *'god' of his fathers'. And why? They will have regard to themselves, and acknowledge no deity except their own confidence in their peculiar fortitude. I interpret the phrase, 'the desire of women', as denoting by that figure of speech which puts a part for the whole, the barbarity of their manners. The love of women is a scriptural phrase for very peculiar affection; and God has instilled this mutual affection into the sexes to cause them to remain united together as long as they retain any spark of humanity. Thus David is said to have loved Jonathan beyond or surpassing the love of women. (2nd Sam. 1:26). No fault is there found with this agreement, otherwise the love of David towards Jonathan would be marked with disgrace. We know how sacred his feelings were towards him, but "the love of women" is here used 'par excellence', in plying the exceeding strength of this affection. As therefore God has appointed this very stringent bond of affection between the sexes as a natural bond of union throughout the human race, it is not surprising if all the duties of humanity are comprehended under this word by a figure of speech. It is just as if the angel had said; this king of whom he prophesies should be impious and sacrilegious, in thus daring to despise all deities; then he should be so evil, as to be utterly devoid of every feeling of charity. We observe then how completely the Romans were without natural affection, loving neither their wives nor the female sex. I need not refer to even a few examples by which this assertion may be proved. But throughout the whole nation such extreme barbarity existed, that it ought really to fill us with horror. None can obtain an adequate idea of this, without becoming thoroughly versed in their histories; but whoever will study their exploits, will behold as in a mirror the angel's meaning. This king, then, should cultivate neither piety nor humanity.

'And he shall not pay attention to other 'gods', because he shall magnify himself against them all'. The cause is here assigned why this king should be a gross despiser of all deities, and fierce and barbarous against all mortals, 'because he should magnify himself above them all'. That pride so blinded the Romans, as to cause them to forget both piety and humanity; and so this intolerable self-confidence of theirs was the reason why they paid no honour to any deity, and trampled all mortals under foot. Humility is certainly the beginning of all true piety; and this seed of religion is implanted in the heart of man, causing them whether they will or not to acknowledge some deity. But the Romans were so puffed up by self-consequence, as to exalt themselves above every object of adoration, and to treat all religions with contemptuous scorn; and in thus despising all celestial beings, they necessarily looked down on all mankind, which was literally and notoriously the fact. Now, the second clause is opposed to this, 'He shall worship' or honour 'the god of fortitudes'. He had previously used this word of the Temple, but this explanation does not seem suitable here, because the angel had before expressed the unity of God, while he now enumerates many 'gods'. But the angel uses the word "fortitudes," or "munitions," for that perverse confidence by which the Romans were puffed up, and were induced to treat both God and men as nothing in comparison to themselves. How then did these two (2) points agree —the contempt of all deities among the Romans, and yet the existence of some worship! First, they despised all tradition respecting the 'gods', but afterwards they raised themselves above every celestial object, and becoming ashamed of their barbarous impiety, they pretended to honour their deities. But where did they seek those deities, as Jupiter for instance, to whom all the tribe of them were subject? why, in their own capitol. Their deities were the offspring of their own imaginations, and nothing was esteemed divine but what pleased themselves. Hence it is said, 'He shall honour him in his own place'. Here the angel removes all doubt, by mentioning the place in which this 'god' of fortitudes should be honoured. The Romans venerated other deities wherever they met with them, but this was mere outward pretence. Without doubt they limited Jupiter to his own capitol and city; and whatever they professed respecting other divinities, there was no true religion in them, because they adored themselves in preference to those fictitious beings. Hence 'he shall worship the 'god' of ramparts in his place, and shall honour a strange 'god' whom his fathers knew not'.

Again, 'He shall honour him in gold, and silver, and precious stones, and all desirable things'; meaning, he shall worship his own deity magnificently and with remarkable pomp. And we know how the riches of the whole world were heaped together to ornament their temples. For as soon as any one purposed to erect any temple, he was compelled to seize all things in every direction, and so to spoil all provinces to enrich their own temples. Rome, too, did not originate this splendour for the sake of superstition, but only to raise itself and to become the admiration of all nations; and thus we observe how well this prophecy is explained by the course of subsequent events. Some nations, in truth, were superstitious in the worship of their idols, but the Romans were superior to all the rest. When first they became masters of Sicily, we know what an amount of wealth they abstracted from a single (1) city. For if ever any temples were adorned with great and copious splendour and much riches, surely they would confess the extreme excellence of those of Sicily. But Marcellus stripped almost all temples to enrich Rome and to ornament the shrines of their false deities. And why so? Was it because Jupiter, and Juno, and Apollo, and Mercury, were better at Rome than elsewhere? By no means; but because he wished to enrich the city, and to turn all sorts of deities into a laughingstock, and to lead them in triumph, to shew that there was no other deity or excellence except at Rome, the mistress of the world. He afterwards adds, 'He shall perform'. Here, again, the angel seems to speak of prosperity. Without doubt he would here supply courage to the pious, who would otherwise vacillate and become backsliders when they observed such continued and incredible success, in a nation so impious and sacrilegious, and remarkable for such barbarous cruelty. Hence he states how the Romans should obtain their ends in whatever they attempted, as their fortitude should prevail, as if it were their deity. Although they should despise all deities, and only fabricate a 'god' for themselves through a spirit of ambition; yet even this should bring them success. This is now called a 'foreign deity'. Scripture uses this word to distinguish between fictitious idols and the one (1) true God. The angel seems to say nothing which applies especially to the Romans. For the Athenians and Spartans, the Persians and the Asiatics, as well as all other nations, worshipped strange 'gods'. What, then, is the meaning of the name? for clearly the angel did not speak after the ordinary manner. He calls him 'strange', as he was not handed down from one to another; for while they boasted vainly in their veneration of the idols received from their ancestors, together with all their sacred institutions and their inviolable rites, yet they inwardly derided them, and did not esteem them worth a straw, but only wished to retain some fallacious form of religion through a sense of shame. We remember the saying of Cato concerning the augurs, "I wonder when one (1) meets another how he can refrain from laughing!" thus shewing how he ridiculed them. If any one (1) had asked Cato either in the senate or privately, What think you of the augurs and all our religion? he would reply, "Ah let the whole world perish before the augurs; for these constitute the very safety of the people and of the whole republic: we received them from our ancestors, therefore let us keep them forever!" Thus that crafty fellow would have spoken, and thus also would all others. But while they prated thus to each other, they were not ashamed to deny the existence of a Deity, and so to ridicule whatever had been believed from the very beginning, as entirely to reduce to nothing the traditions received from their forefathers. It does not surprise us to find the angel speaking of a strange 'god' which was worshipped at Rome, not, as I have said, through superstition or mistake, but only to prevent their barbarity from becoming abominable throughout the world. 'That God', says he, 'whom he had acknowledged': great weight is attached to this word. The angel means, that the whole divinity rested on the opinion and will of the sovereign people, because it was agreeable to its inclination, and promoted its private interest. As the plan of worshipping any 'gods' would be approved, and they would pride themselves in their own pleasure, they should boast with great confidence, that there could be no piety but at Rome. But why so

Because they acknowledge strange 'gods', and determine and decree the form of worship which was to be preserved. The angel thus places the whole of the religion of Rome in lust, and shews them to be impure despisers of God.

He afterwards says, 'He shall multiply the glory'. This may be referred to God, but I rather approve of a different interpretation. The Romans should acquire great wealth for themselves, and should increase wonderfully in opulence, in the magnitude of their empire, and in all other sources of strength. Therefore 'they shall multiply the glory', meaning, they shall acquire new territories, and increase their power, and accumulate a multitude of treasures. This explanation fits in very well with the close of the verse, where he adds, 'he shall make them rule far and wide'. This is a portion of that glory which this king shall heap upon himself, for he should be superior to the kings over many lands, and should distribute the booty which he had acquired, and that, too, for a price. He says, therefore, he shall make them rule over many; for the relative is without a subject, which is a frequent practice of the Hebrews. Whom, then, should the Roman king, or the Roman empire, thus cause to have dominion? Whoever rendered them any assistance should receive his reward from a stranger, as we know Eumenes to have been enriched by the booty and spoil of Antiochus. The provinces also were distributed according to their will. The island was given up to the Rhodians, while a kingdom was wrested from another, and the Aetolians enlarged their dominions. As each party laboured hard for their benefit, and incurred large expenses, so the Romans conferred riches upon them. After conquering Antiochus, they became the more liberal towards Attalus and Eumenes, and thus they became masters of the greater part of Asia. Again, when they had deprived Nabis, the tyrant of Sparta, of the greater part of his territories, those who had taken care to gratify the Romans, were favoured with the spoils they had seized from him. We have another instance in the favours conferred upon Massinissa after the conquest of Carthage; for after being expelled from his own kingdom, his dominion extended far and wide throughout the continent of Africa: after being deprived of his paternal sovereignty, he had not a spot in the world on which to plant his foot until they bestowed upon him what they had seized from the Carthaginians. And how did they manage this? 'They shall divide the soil for a price', says the angel; thus obliquely reproving the cunning of the senate and Roman people, because they did not give away these ample dominions gratuitously; they would willingly have devoured whatever they had acquired, but they found it better policy to sell them than to retain them. They did not sell at any fixed price —for the word "price" here need not be restricted to a definite sum of money —but displayed their avarice, and sold and distributed for the sake of gain, just as much as if all these territories had been immediately reduced into provinces of their empire. They had need of great resources; it was objectionable to continue their garrison in perpetuity in the cities of Greece, and hence they proclaim perfect freedom through them all. But what sort of liberty was this? Each state might choose its senate according to the pleasure of the Romans, and thus as each acquired rank and honour in his own nation, he would become attached and enslaved to the Roman people. And then, in this condition of affairs, if any war should spring up, they sought aid from these friends and allies. For had they been only confederate, the Romans would never have dared to exact so much from each tributary state. Let us take the case of the Carthaginians. After being reduced by many exactions to the lowest pitch of poverty, yet when the Romans made war against Philip and Macedon, and against Antiochus, they demanded ships from these allies. They demanded besides, as a subsidy, an immense quantity of gold, silver, provisions, garments, and armour, till at length these wretched Carthaginians, whose very life-blood the Romans had drained, still sent for the war whatever gold they had remaining, and all they could scrape together. Thus Philip king of Macedon is compelled to destroy himself, by plunging his own sword into his body; for every state of Greece was forced to contribute its own portion of the expenses of the war.

We perceive, then, how 'the lands were divided for a price', each with regard to its own utility, not by fixing a certain defined money value, but according to the standard of political expediency. And what kind of bargaining did they afterwards mutually execute? We have an instance of it in the prevalence of proscription among the Romans, by which they turned their rapacity against their own vitals. They had previously confiscated the goods of their enemies. Philip, for instance, was forced to pay a large sum of money to repurchase the name of king and the portion of territory which remained his own. Antiochus and the Carthaginians were subject to the same hardship. The Romans, in short, never conquered any one without exhausting both the monarch and his dominions to satisfy their insatiable avarice and cupidity. We now perceive 'how they divided the lands for a price', holding all kings in subjection to themselves, and bestowing largesses upon one from the property of another.

We now perceive the angel's meaning throughout this verse, 'The king should be so powerful as to bestow dominion on whomsoever he pleased in many' and ample territories, but not gratuitously. We have had examples of some despoiled of their royal dignity and power, and of others restored to the authority of which they had been deprived. Lucullus, for instance, chose to eject one king from his dominions, while another general restored him to his possessions. A single Roman citizen could thus create a great monarch; and thus it often happened. Claudius proposed to the people to proscribe the king of Cyprus, although he was of the royal race; his father had been the friend and ally of the Roman people, he had committed no crime against the Roman empire, and there was no reason for declaring war against him. Meanwhile he remained in security at home, while none of those ceremonies by which war is usually declared took place. He was proscribed in the market-place by a few vagabonds, and Cato is immediately sent to ravage the whole island. He took possession of it for the Romans, and this wretched man is compelled to cast himself into the sea in a fit of despair. We observe, then, how this prediction of the angel was by no means in vain; the Roman proconsuls distributed kingdoms and provinces, 'but yet for a price', for they seized everything in the world, and drew all riches, all treasures, and every particle of value into the whirlpool of their unsatisfied covetousness. We shall put off the remainder." }}

Lecture 64th.

11:40. "As to the time here mentioned, it is a certain or predetermined period: the kings of the south and the north we have already shewn to refer to Egypt and Syria, such being their position with respect to Judea. The word (negch), 'negech', 'confliget', is literally he shall "push with the horns," while the word translated, "he shall rush as a whirlwind," is deduced from (sh`r), 'segmer', "to be stormy." The angel here predicts the numerous victories by means of which the Romans should extend their empire far and wide, although not without great difficulties and dangers. He states, 'The king of the south should carry on war with the Romans for a definite period'. I dare not fix the precise time intended by the angel. So great was the power of Egypt, that had the kings of that country relied upon their native resources, they might have summoned courage to make war upon the Romans. Gabinius the proconsul led his army there for the sake of restoring Ptolemy. He expelled Archelaus without much trouble, and then like a mercenary he risked his life and his fame there, as well as his army. Caesar was in danger there, after vanquishing Pompey; then Antony next made war upon Augustus, assisted by the forces of Cleopatra; then Egypt put forth all her strength, and at his failure was reduced herself to a province of Rome. The angel did not propose to mark a continued series of times, but only briefly to admonish the faithful to stand firm amidst those most grievous concussions which were then at hand. Whatever be the precise meaning, the angel doubtless signified the difficult nature of the struggle between the Romans and the Egyptians. I have already stated the witness of history to the fact, that the Egyptians never made war against the Romans in their own name; sometimes events were so confused that the Egyptians coalesced with the Syrians, and then we must read the words conjointly —thus the king of the south, assisted by the king of the north, should carry on war with the Romans. The angel thus shews us how the king of Syria should furnish greater forces and supplies than the Egyptian monarch, and this really happened at the beginning of the triumvirate. He states next, 'The king of the south' should come 'with chariots and horses and many ships'. Nor is it necessary here to indicate the precise period, since the Romans carried on many wars in the east, during which they occupied Asia, while a part of Lybia fell to them by the will of its king without arms or force of any kind.

With reference to these two (2) kingdoms which have been so frequently mentioned, many chiefs ruled over Syria within a short period. First(1st) one of the natives was raised to the throne and then another (1), till the people grew tired of them, and transferred the sovereignty to strangers. Then Alexander rose gradually to power, and ultimately acquired very great fame: he was not of noble birth, for his father was of unknown origin. This man sprang from an obscure family, and at one period possessed neither authority nor resources. He was made king of Syria, because he pretended to be the son of Seleucus, and was slain immediately, while his immediate successor reigned for but a short period. Thus Syria passed over to the Romans on the death of this Seleucus. Tigranes the king of Armenia was then sent for, and he was made ruler over Syria till Lucullus conquered him, and Syria was reduced to a province. The vilest of men reigned over Egypt. Physcon, who was restrained by the Romans when attempting to wrest Syria from the power of its sovereign, was exceedingly depraved both in body and mind: and hence he obtained this disgraceful appellation. For the word is a Greek one (1), equivalent to the French 'andauille'; for 'physce' means that thicker intestine into which the others are usually inserted. This deformity gave rise to his usual name, signifying "pot-bellied," implying both bodily deformity and likeness to the brutes, while he was not endowed with either intellect or ingenuity. The last king who made the Romans his son's guardians, received the name of Auletes, and Cicero uses this epithet of "flute-player," because he was immoderately fond of this musical instrument. In each kingdom then there was horrible deformity, since those who exercised the royal authority were more like dogs or swine than mankind. Tigranes, it is well known, gave the Romans much trouble. On the other side, Mithridates occupied their attention for a very long period, and with various and opposite success. The Romans throughout all Asia were at one (1) period put to the sword, and when a close engagement was fought, Mithridates was often superior, and he afterwards united his forces with those of Tigranes, his father-in-law. When Tigranes held Armenia, he was a king of other kings, and afterwards added to his dominions a portion of Syria. At length when the last Antiochus was set over the kingdom of Syria by Lucullus, he was removed from his command by the orders of Pompey, and then, as we have stated, Syria became a province of Rome. Pompey crossed the sea, and subdued the whole of Judea as well as Syria: he afterwards entered the Temple, and took away some part of its possessions, but spared the sacred treasures. Crassus succeeded him —an insatiable whirlpool, who longed for this province for no other reason than his unbounded eagerness for wealth. He despoiled the Temple at Jerusalem; and lastly, after Cleopatra was conquered, Egypt lost its royal race, and passed into a Roman province. If the Romans had conquered a hundred (100) other provinces, the angel would not have mentioned them here; for I have previously noticed his special regard to the chosen people. Therefore he dwells only on those slaughters which had more or less relation to the wretched Jews. First (1st) of all he predicts the great contest which should arise between the kings of Egypt and Syria, 'who should come on like a whirlwind', while the Romans 'should rush upon the lands like a deluge, and pass over them'. He compares the king of Syria to a whirlwind, for at first he should rush on impetuously, filling both land and sea with his forces. Thus he should possess a well-manned fleet, and thus excite fresh terrors, and yet vanish away rapidly like a whirlwind. But the Romans are compared to a deluge. The new king of whom he had spoken 'should come', says he, 'and overflow', burying all the forces of both Egypt and Syria; implying the whole foundations of both realms should be swept away when the Romans passed over them. 'He shall pass over', he says; meaning, wherever they come, the way shall be open for them and nothing closed against them. He will repeat this idea in another form. He does not speak now of one (1) region only, but says, 'they should come over the lands', implying a wide-spread desolation, while no one should dare to oppose them by resisting their fury."

11:41-42. "The land of Judea is called the pleasant or desirable land, because God thought it worthy of His peculiar favour. He chose it for His dwelling-place, called it His resting-place, and caused

His blessing to remain in it. In this verse also, regions are treated, and not merely cities, as the regions of Edom and of Moab. After the angel had briefly predicted the occurrence of the most grievous wars with the Romans, he now adds what he had briefly commenced in the last verse, namely, their becoming conquerors of all nations. 'They shall come', he says, 'into the desirable land'. This is the reason why the angel prophesies of the Roman empire, for he was not sent to explain to Daniel the history of the whole world, but to retain the faithful in their allegiance, and to persuade them under the most harassing convulsions to remain under the protection and guardianship of God. For this reason he states, 'they shall come into the desirable land'. This would be a dreadful temptation, and might overthrow all feelings of piety, as the Jews would be harassed on all sides, first by the Syrians and then by the Egyptians. And we know with what cruelty Antiochus endeavoured not only to oppress but utterly to blot out the whole nation. Neither the Syrians nor the Egyptians spared them. The Romans came almost from the other side of the globe; at first they made an alliance with these states, and then entered Judea as enemies. Who would have supposed that region under God's protection, when it was so exposed to all attacks of robbery and oppression? Hence it was necessary to admonish the faithful not to fall away through this utter confusion.

'They shall come', then, 'into the desirable land, and many regions shall fall'; meaning, no hope should remain for the Jews after the arrival of the Romans, as victory was already prepared to their hand. The angel's setting before the faithful this material for despair was not likely to induce confidence and comfort, but as they were aware of these divine predictions, they knew also that the remedy was prepared by the same God who had admonished them by means of the angel. It was in His power to save His Church from a hundred (100) deaths. This prophecy became an inestimable treasury, inspiring the faithful with the hope of the promised deliverance. The angel will afterwards add the promise intended to support and strengthen and revive their drooping spirits. But he here announces that God's aid should not immediately appear, because He would give the Romans full permission to exercise a cruel sway, tyranny, and robbery, throughout the whole of Asia and the East. He says, 'The lands of Edom, Moab, and a portion of Ammon should escape from their slaughter'. This trial would in no slight degree affect the minds of the pious: What does he mean He suffers the land that He promised should be at rest, to be now seized and laid waste by its enemies. The land of Moab is at peace and enjoys the greatest tranquillity, and the condition of the sons of Ammon is prosperous! We should here bear in mind what the prophets say of these lands: Esau was banished into the rugged mountains, and God assigned to the Moabites a territory beyond the borders of the land of blessings. (Malachi 1:3.) The Jews alone had any peculiar right and privilege to claim that territory in which the Lord had promised them perfect repose. Now, when Judea is laid waste and their foes according to their pleasure not only seize upon everything valuable in the city and the country, but seem to have a special permission to ravage the land at their will, what could the Jews conjecture? The angel therefore meets this objection, and alleviates these feelings of anxiety to which the faithful could be subject from such slaughters. He states that the territories of 'Edom and Moab, and of the children of Ammon', should be tranquil and safe from those calamities. By the expression, 'to the beginning of the children of Ammon', he most probably refers to that retreat whence the Ammonites originated. For doubtless the Romans would not have spared the Ammonites unless they had been concealed among the mountains, for every district in the neighbourhood of Judea was subject to the same distress. Those who interpret this passage of Antichrist, suppose safety to be extended only to that portion of the faithful who shall escape from the world and take refuge in the deserts. But there is no reason in this opinion, and it is sufficient to retain the sense already proposed as the genuine one (1). He afterwards adds, 'The Romans should send their army into the land, and even in the land of Egypt, they should not escape'. The angel without doubt here treats of the numerous victories which the Romans should obtain in a short time. They carried on war with Mithridates for a long period, and then Asia was almost lost; but they soon afterwards began to extend their power, first over all Asia Minor, and then over Syria; Armenia was next added to their sway, and Egypt after that: meanwhile this was but a moderate addition, till at length they ruled over the Persians, and thus their power became formidable. Wherefore this prophecy was fulfilled by 'their extending their power over many regions', and 'by the land of Egypt becoming a portion of their booty'. It follows:"

11:43. "I have previously stated that though the language applies to a single (1) king, yet a kingdom is to be understood, and our former observations are here confirmed. Although many nations should endeavour to resist the Romans, they should yet be completely victorious, and finally acquire immense booty. Their avarice and covetousness were perfectly astonishing; for he says, 'they should acquire dominion over the treasures of gold and silver, and should draw to themselves all the precious things of Egypt, Lybia, and Ethiopia; and that, too, in their footsteps'. In these words he more clearly explains our previous remarks upon the emblem of the deluge. All lands should be laid open to them; although the cities were fortified, and would thus resist them by their closed gates, yet the way should be open to them, and none should hinder them from bursting forth over the whole east, and subduing at the same time cities, towns, and villages. This we know to have been actually accomplished. Hence there is nothing forced in the whole of this context, and the prophecy is fairly interpreted by the history. He afterwards adds: "

11:44. "The angel's narrative seems here to differ somewhat from the preceding one, as the Romans should not succeed so completely as to avoid being arrested in the midst of their victorious course. He says, 'they shall be frightened by rumours', and the events suit this case, for although the Romans subdued the whole east with scarcely any trouble, and in a few years, yet they were afterwards checked by adversity. For Crassus perished miserably after spoiling the temple, and destroyed himself and the flower of the Roman army; he was conquered at Carrae, near Babylon, in an important engagement, through betrayal by a spy in whom he had placed too much confidence. Antony, again, after dividing the world into three (3) parts between himself, and Octavius, and Lepidus, suffered miserably in the same neighbourhood against the Parthians. We are not surprised at the angel's saying, 'The Romans should be frightened from the east and the north', as this really came to pass. Then he adds, 'they should come in great wrath'; meaning, although they should lose many troops, yet this severe massacre should not depress their spirits. When their circumstances were desperate, they were excited to fury like savage beasts of prey, until they rushed upon their own destruction. This came to pass more especially under the reign of Augustus; for a short period he contended successfully with the Parthians, and compelled them to surrender. He then imposed upon them conditions of peace; and as the Roman eagles had been carried into Persia, much to their disgrace, he compelled this people to return them. By this compulsion he blotted out the disgrace which they had suffered under Antony. We see, then, how exceedingly well this suits the context, — 'the Romans shall come with great wrath to destroy many'; as the Parthians expected to enjoy tranquillity for many ages, and to be perfectly free from any future attempt or attack from the Romans. It now follows, "

11:45. "The angel at length concludes with the settled sway of the Romans in Asia Minor and the regions of the east, as well as in Syria, Judea, and Persia. We have already shewn how everything here predicted is related by profane historians, and each event is well known to all who are moderately versed in the knowledge of those times. We must now notice the phrase, The Roman king 'should fix the tents of his palace'. This expression signifies not only the carrying on of the war by the Romans in the east, but their being lords of the whole of that region. When he had said they should fix their tents according to the usual practice of warfare, he might have been content with the usual method of speech, but he contrasts the word "palace" with frequent migrations, and signifies their not measuring their camp according to the usage of warfare, but their occupying a fixed station for a permanence. Why then does he speak of tents? Because Asia was not the seat of their empire; for they were careful in not attributing more dignity to any place than was expedient for themselves. For this reason the proconsuls took with them numerous attendants, to avoid the necessity of any fixed palace: they had their own tents, and often remained in such temporary dwellings as they found on their road. This language of the angel — 'they shall fix the tents of their palace'— will suit the Romans exceedingly well, because they reigned there in tranquillity after the east was subdued; and yet they had no fixed habitation, because they did not wish any place to become strong enough to rebel against them. When he says, 'between the seas', some think the Dead Sea intended, and the Lake of Asphalt, as opposed to the Mediterranean Sea. I do not hesitate to think the Persian Sea is intended by the angel. He does not say the Romans should become masters of all the lands lying between the two (2) seas, but he only says 'they should fix the tents of their palace between the seas'; and we know this to have been done when they held the dominion between the Euxine and the Persian Gulf. The extent of the sway of Mithridates is well known, for historians record twenty-two (22) nations as subject to his power. Afterwards, on one side stood Asia Minor, which consisted of many nations, according to our statement elsewhere, and Armenia became theirs after Tigranes was conquered, while Cilicia, though only a part of a province, was a very extensive and wealthy region. It had many deserts and many stony and uncultivated mountains, while there were in Cilicia many rich cities, though it did not form a single province, like Syria and Judea, so that it is not surprising when the angel says the Romans 'should fix their tents between the seas', for their habitation was beyond the Mediterranean Sea. They first passed over into Sicily and then into Spain; thirdly (3rd), they began to extend their power into Greece and Asia Minor against Antiochus, and then they seized upon the whole east. On the one shore was Asia Minor and many other nations; and on the other side was the Syrian Sea, including Judea as far as the Egyptian Sea. We observe, then, the tranquillity of the Roman empire between the seas, and yet it had no permanent seat there, because the proconsuls spent their time as foreigners in the midst of a strange country.

At length he adds, 'They should come to the mountain of the desire of holiness'. I have already expressed the reason why this prophecy was uttered; it was to prevent the novelty of these events from disturbing the minds of the pious, when they saw so barbarous and distant a nation trampling upon them, and ruling with pride, insolence, and cruelty. When, therefore, so sorrowful a spectacle was set before the eyes of the pious, they required no ordinary supports lest they should yield to the pressure of despair. The angel therefore predicts future events, to produce the acknowledgment of nothing really happening by chance; and next, to shew how all these turbulent motions throughout the world are governed by a divine power. The consolation follows, 'they shall come at length to their end, and no one shall bring them help'. This was not fulfilled immediately, for after Crassus had despoiled the temple, and had suffered in an adverse engagement against the Parthians, the Romans did not fail all at once, but their monarchy flourished even more and more under Augustus. The city was then razed to the ground by Titus, and the very name and existence of the Jewish nation all but annihilated. Then, after this, the Romans suffered disgraceful defeats; they were cast out of nearly the whole east, and compelled to treat with the Parthians, the Persians, and other nations, till their empire was entirely ruined. If we study the history of the next hundred (100) years, no nation will be found to have suffered such severe punishments as the Romans, and no monarchy was ever overthrown with greater disgrace. God then poured such fury upon that nation as to render them the gaze of the world. The angel's words are not in vain, 'their own end should soon come'; after they had devastated and depopulated all lands, and penetrated and pervaded everywhere, and all the world had given themselves up to their power, then the Romans became utterly ruined and swept away. 'They should have none to help them'. Without doubt this prophecy may be here extended to the promulgation of the gospel; for although Christ was born about one (1) age before the preaching of the gospel, yet he truly shone forth to the world by means of that promulgation. The angel therefore brought up his prophecy to that point of time. He now subjoins:". }}

{{ 12:1. "The twelfth chapter commenced, as we stated in yesterday's Lecture, with the angel's prediction as to the future state of the Church after the manifestation of Christ. It was to be subject to many miseries, and hence this passage would soothe the sorrow of Daniel, and of all the pious, as he still promises safety to the Church through the help of God. Daniel therefore represented Michael as the guardian of the Church, and God had enjoined this duty upon Christ, as we learn from the 10th chapter of John, (ver. 28,29). As we stated yesterday, Michael may mean an angel; but I embrace the opinion of those who refer this to the person of Christ, because it suits the subject best to represent Him as standing forward for the defence of His elect people. He is called the 'mighty prince', because He naturally opposed the unconquered fortitude of God to those dangers to which the angel represents the Church to be subject. We well know the very slight causes for which terror often seizes our minds, and when we begin to tremble, nothing can calm our tumult and agitation. The angel then in treating of very grievous contests, and of the imminent danger of the Church, calls 'Michael the mighty prince'. As if he had said, Michael should be the guardian and protector of the elect people, He should exercise immense power, and He alone without the slightest doubt should be sufficient for their protection. Christ confirms the same assertion, as we just now saw, in the 10th chapter of John. He says all His elect were given Him by His Father, and none of them should perish, because His Father was greater than all; no one, says He, shall pluck My sheep out of My hand. My Father, who gave them Me, is greater than all; meaning, God possesses infinite power, and displays it for the safety of those whom He has chosen before the creation of the world, and He has committed it to Me, or has deposited it in My hands. We now perceive the reason of this epithet, which designates 'Michael as the great prince'. For in consequence of the magnitude of the contest, we ought to enjoy the offer of insuperable strength, to enable us to attain tranquillity in the midst of the greatest commotions. It was in no degree superfluous for the angel to predict such great calamities as impending over the Church, and in the present day the same expressions are most useful to us. We perceive then how the Jews imagined a state of happiness under Christ, and the same error was adopted by the Apostles, who, when Christ discoursed on the destruction of the temple and the city, thought the end of the world was at hand, and this they connected with their own glory and triumph. (Matth. 24:3.) The Prophet then is here instructed by the angel how God should direct the course of His Church when He should manifest to them His Only-begotten Son. Still the severity of distress awaited all the pious; as if he had said, 'The time of your triumph is not yet arrived; you must still continue your warfare, which will prove both laborious and harassing'. The condition of the new people is here compared with that of the ancient one, who suffered many perils and afflictions at God's hands. The angel therefore says, even although the faithful suffered very severely under the law and the prophets, yet a more oppressive season was at hand, during which God would treat his Church far more strictly than before, and submit it to far more excruciating trials. This is the meaning of the passage, 'a season full of afflictions should arise, such as the nations had never seen since they began to exist'. This may refer to the creation of the world, and if we refer it to the people themselves, the exposition will prove correct; for although the Church had in former periods been wretched, yet after the appearance of Christ, it should suffer far more calamities than before. We remember the language of the Psalmist: 'The impious have often opposed me from my youth; they have drawn the plough across my back'. (Ps. 129:1-3.) Through all ages then God subjected His Church to many evils and disasters. But a comparison is here instituted between two different states of the Church, and the angel shews how after Christ's appearance it should be far from either quietness or happiness. As it should be oppressed with heavier afflictions, it is not surprising that the fathers should wish us to be conformed to the image of His Only-begotten Son. (Rom. 8:29). Since the period of Christ's resurrection, even if a more harassing warfare awaits us, we ought to bear it with great equanimity, because the glory of heaven is placed before our eyes far more clearly than it was before theirs.

At length he adds, 'At that time thy people shall be preserved'. By this expression the angel points out to us the great importance of the protection of Michael. He promises certain salvation to His elect people, as if he had said, although the Church should be exposed to the greatest dangers, yet with respect to God Himself, it should always be safe and victorious in all contests, because Michael should be superior to every enemy. The angel then, in thus exhorting the faithful to bear their cross, shews how free they should be from all doubt as to the event, and the absolute certainty of their victory. Although at first sight this prophecy might inspire us with fear and dismay, yet this comfort ought to be sufficient for us: "We shall be conquerors amidst fire and sword, and amidst many deaths we are sure of life." As perfect safety is here set before us, we ought to feel secure, and to enter with alacrity into every engagement. We are in truth obliged to fight, but Christ has conquered for us, as He says Himself, 'Trust in Me, I have overcome the world'. (John 16:33.) But the angel restricts what he had said generally by way of correction. Many professed to belong to the people of God, and every one naturally sprung from the stock of Israel boasted of being the offspring of divine seed. As all wished promiscuously to belong to God's people, the angel restricts his expression by a limiting phrase, 'all people', says he, 'who were found written in the book'. This clause does not mean all Israel after "the flesh," (Rom. 9:6-8) but such as God esteems to be real Israelites according to gratuitous election alone. He here distinguishes between the carnal and spiritual children of Abraham, between the outward Church and that inward and true community which the Almighty approves. Upon what then does the difference depend between those who boast of being Abraham's children, while they are rejected by God, and those who are really and truly His sons? On the mere grace and favour of God. He declares His election when He regenerates His elect by His Holy Spirit, and thus inscribes them with a certain mark, while they prove the reality of this sonship by the whole course of their lives, and confirm their own adoption. Meanwhile we are compelled to go to the fountain at once; God alone by His gratuitous election distinguishes the outward Church, which has nothing but the title, from the true Church, which can never either perish or fall away. Thus we observe in how many passages of Scripture hypocrites are rejected in the midst of their swelling pride, as they have nothing in common with the sons of God but the external symbols of profession....."

12:11-12. "In consequence of the obscurity of this passage it has been twisted in a variety of ways. At the end of the ninth (9th) chapter I have shewn the impossibility of its referring to the profanation of the Temple which occurred under the tyranny of Antiochus; on this occasion the angel bears witness to such a complete destruction of the Temple, as to leave no room for the hope of its repair and restoration. Then the circumstances of the time convinces us of this. For he then said, Christ shall confirm the covenant with many for one (1) week, and shall cause the sacrifices and oblation to cease. 'Afterwards, the abomination that stupifieth shall be added', and desolation or stupor, 'and then death will distil', says he, 'upon the astonished or stupified one'. The angel, therefore, there treats of the perpetual devastation of the Temple. So in this passage, without doubt, he treats of the period after the destruction of the Temple; there could be no hope of restoration, as the law with all its ceremonies would then arrive at its termination. With this view Christ quotes this passage in Matthew 24, where He admonishes His hearers diligently to attend to it. 'Let him who reads, understand', says He. We have stated this prophecy to be obscure, and hence it requires no ordinary degree of the closest attention. First of all, we must hold this point; the time now treated by the angel begins at the last destruction of the Temple. That devastation happened as soon as the gospel began to be promulgated. God then deserted His Temple, because it was only founded for a time, and was but a shadow, until the Jews so completely violated the whole covenant that no sanctity remained in either the Temple, the nation, or the land itself. Some restrict this to those standards which Tiberius erected on the very highest pinnacle of the Temple, and others to the statue of Caligula, but I have already stated my view of these opinions as too forced. I have no hesitation in referring this language of the angel to that profanation of the Temple which happened after the manifestation of Christ, when sacrifices ceased, and the shadows of the law were abolished. 'From the time', therefore, 'at which the sacrifice really ceased to be offered'; this refers to the period at which Christ by His advent should abolish the shadows of the law, thus making all offering of sacrifices to God totally valueless. 'From that time', therefore. Next, 'from the time at which the stupifying abomination shall have been set up'. God's wrath followed the profanation of the Temple. The Jews never anticipated the final cessation of their ceremonies, and always boasted in their peculiar external worship, and unless God had openly demonstrated it before their eyes, they would never have renounced their sacrifices and rites as mere shadowy representations. Hence Jerusalem and their Temple were exposed to the vengeance of the Gentiles. This, therefore, was the setting up of this stupifying abomination; it was a clear testimony to the wrath of God, exhorting the Jews in their confusion to boast no longer in their Temple and its holiness.

Therefore, from that period there shall be 1290 days. These days make up three years and a half (3 1/2 yrs). I have no hesitation in supposing the angel to speak metaphorically. As he previously put one (1) year, or two (2) years, and half a (1/2) year, for a long duration of time, and a happy issue, so he now puts 1290 'days'. And for what reason? To shew us what must happen when anxieties and troubles oppress us. If a man should fall sick, he will not say, Here I have already been one (1) month, but I have a year before me—he will not say, Here I have been three (3) days, but now I languish wretchedly for thirty (30) or sixty (60). The angel, then, purposely puts days for years, implying—although that time may seem immeasurably prolonged, and may frighten us by its duration, and completely prostrate the spirits of the pious, yet it must be endured. The number of days then is 1290, yet there is no reason why the sons of God should despair in consequence of this number, because they ought always to return to this principle—if those afflictions await us for a time and times, the half time will follow afterwards.

Then he adds, 'Happy is he who shall have waited and endured until the 1335 days'. In numerical calculations I am no conjurer, and those who expound this passage with too great subtlety, only trifle in their own speculations, and detract from the authority of the prophecy. Some think the days should be understood as years, and thus make the number of years 2600. The time which elapsed from this prophecy to the advent of Christ was about 600 years. From this advent 2000 years remain, and they think this is the assigned period until the end of the world, as the law also flourished about 2000 years from the date of its promulgation to its fulfilment at Christ's advent. Hence they fix upon this sense. But they are quite wrong in separating the 1290 days from the 1335, for they clearly refer to the same period, with a slight exception. It is as if the angel had said, although half the time should be prorogued, yet the faithful ought constantly to persist in the hope of deliverance. For he adds, about two (2) months, or a month and a half (1 1/2 mnths), or thereabouts. By half (1/2) a time, we said, the issue was pointed out, as Christ informs us in Matt. 24:22. Unless those days had been shortened, no flesh would have been safe. Reference is clearly made here to that abbreviation of the time for the Church's sake. But the angel now adds forty-five (45) days, which make a month and a half (1 1/2), implying—God will put off the deliverance of His Church beyond six (6) months, and yet ye must be strong and of good courage, and persevere in your watchfulness. God at length will not disappoint you—He will succour you in all your woes, and gather you to His blessed rest. Hence, the next clause of the prophecy is this.".....

Prayer: Grant, Almighty God, since Thou proposest to us no other end than that of constant warfare during our whole life, and subjectest us to many cares until we arrive at the goal of this temporary race course: Grant, I pray Thee, that we may never grow fatigued. May we ever be armed and equipped for battle, and whatever the trials by which Thou dost prove us, may we never be found deficient. May we always aspire towards heaven with upright souls, and strive with all our endeavours to attain that blessed rest which is laid up for us in heaven, in Jesus Christ our Lord. —Amen. 'Praise be to God'.

Dissertations on Some Important Subjects Treated in this Volume:

Chapter 7th:

- I. Vision of Four Beasts.
- II. Ten Horns.
- III. Little Horn.
- IV. Ancient of Days & Son of Man.
- V. Prophetic Meaning of Time.

Chapter 8th:

- VI. Place of Vision.
- VII. Ram & He-Goat.
- VIII. Wonderful Numberer.

Chapter 9th:

- IX. Seventy Weeks.
- X. Hippolytus, Nicolaus Lyranus, &c.
- XI. Abomination of Desolation.

Chapter 10th:

- XII. Vision on Bank of Hiddekel.
- XIII. Michael the Prince.

Chapter 11th:

- XIV. Historical Proofs.
- XV. Wilful King.
- XVI. Pollution of Sanctuary.
- XVII. Conquest of Glorious Land.

Chapter 12th:

- XVIII. Sealing of the Book.
- XIX. Expressions Relative to Time.
- XX. Modern Discoveries Throwing its Light on Daniel's Prophecies.

Chapter 7th:

Dissertation I: Vision of Four Beasts. 7:1-6.

{{ "Our preceding (1st) volume having closed the historical portion of Daniel's Prophecies, our second (2nd) volume is occupied with Calvin's comments upon those Prophetic Visions, which have ever excited the deepest interest in the minds of thoughtful Christians. The interval of time from the first (1st) verse of this chapter to the beginning of chap. 10, is about twenty-two (22) years. The vision of this chapter is the only one written in Chaldee, and its similarity to that of chap. 2 may account for the same language being used in both. The most appropriate method of illustrating these Lectures, is that of quoting the views of various eminent Reformers and later divines who have ably discussed the Prophet's language, and then comparing them with the solutions proposed by our Lecturer.

7: 4. —The lion with eagle's wings is supposed to bear some likeness to the vulture-headed Nisroch, with which the late Assyrian discoveries have rendered us familiar. 'Vaux', in his "Nineveh and Persepolis," p. 32, quotes the inquiry of 'Beyer' in his notes to Selden's work 'De Diis Syriis', as to a connection between this far-famed Assyrian deity and the representation recorded in this verse.

'Rosenmüller' explains the plucking of the wings as a deprivation of any ornament, or faculty, or innate vigour, and quotes Cicero, Ep. ad Att., lib. iv. ep. 2, in reference to this 'deplumatio'. The last clause, "a man's heart was given to it," is well explained by Jerome of Nebuchadnezzar's return to his kingdom after his banishment, and his receiving the heart which he had lost. The frontispiece on the title-page of 'Bonomi's' "Nineveh and its Palaces," is a most accurate representation of this verse. The work contains many excellent engravings, explanatory of the symbolic language of this Prophet.

7: 5. —The raising of the bear on one side is interpreted by Theodoret and Jerome of the invasion of the Chaldean empire by the Persian. The protrusions from its mouth are thought by 'Wintle' to be "tusks," but 'Rosenmüller' objects to this supposition. 'Wintle's' notes are on the whole so very judicious, that we do not hesitate again to recommend the reader to peruse them, as in most instances they confirm the interpretations adopted in these Lectures. 'Hippolytus', as quoted by OElampadius 'in loc.', explains the three "ribs" of the three people, Assyrians, Medes, and Babylonians. The opinion of our Reformer, vol. ii. p. 16, is sound and satisfactory.

7:6. —"Four wings on its back." This symbolical representation occurs in the Nineveh sculptures. See 'Bonomi', p. 257, and elsewhere.

7:7. —The Fourth Beast of this verse has so usually been treated as the Roman Empire, that it simply becomes necessary to cite the exceptions to this opinion. 'Rosenmüller' records an attempt to refute this interpretation by J. C. Becman, in a "Dissertation on the Fourth Monarchy", published in 1671, at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and gives a slight sketch of his argument. 'Dr. Todd', in his able "Lectures on Antichrist," has made use of every possible argument against applying this to the Roman Empire, and his theory has been fairly stated and ably opposed by 'Birks' in his "First (1st) Elements of Sacred Prophecy." London, 1843. With reference to this fourth (4th) beast, 'Dr. Todd' believes it to be still future; and hence his expositions are classed with those of the Futurists. Our readers will remember, that as an expositor of prophecy, Calvin is a Praeterist, and that his general system of interpretation is as remote from the year-day theory of Birks, Faber, and others, as from the futurist speculations of Maitland, Tyso, and Todd. Notwithstanding the disagreement between these Lectures and the writings of Birks, we strongly recommend their perusal by every student who would become thoroughly proficient in the prophecies of Daniel. The first (1st) step towards progress, is to surrender all our preconceived notions, and to prepare for the possibility of their vanishing away before the force of sanctified reason and all-pervading truth.

The Jewish commentators are specially careful to deny the application of this fourth (4th) empire to the Romans. Rabbis 'Aben Ezra' and 'Saadia' interpret it of the Turkish sway, and extend it to times still present and yet future. The Son of man they hold to be Messiah, who in their opinion has not yet arrived. A different interpretation has been suggested by Lacunza in "La Venda del Messias en Gloria, y Magestad", translated by the Rev. E. Irving. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1827. Parte ii. Fenemeno i. The opinion that the fourth (4th) empire is Alexander and his successors, is contained in 'Venema's' Dissert. ad Vatican. Dan. emblem. 4to. Leovard, 1745.

'Rabbi Sal. Jarchi' understands the three (3) ribs of ver. 5, to be those kings of Persia, Cyrus, Ahasuerus, and Darius who destroyed the Temple. The ten (10) kings he thinks to be the emperors of Rome from Julius Caesar to Vespasian. The mouth speaking proud things of ver. 8, he refers to Titus, thus adopting the supposition that the fourth (4th) empire is heathen Rome.

'Maldonatus' expounds the passage of heathen Rome, and feels his wrath stirred up against those "Heretics and Lutherans" who bring it down to Papal times, and rejoices in the opportunity of quoting 'Calvin', "their master," against "the absurdity" of his disciples. See 'Comment'. in Dan, p. 673. But the learned Jesuit ought to have known that the celebrated Abbot Joachim, the founder of the Florentine order at the close of the 12th century, interpreted this empire of the mystic Babylon and the Papal Antichrist. He did not hesitate to apply the dates of this prophecy to the definite period of three years and a half (3 1/2 yrs), from A.D. 1256 to 1260. He was a bold forerunner of those modern expounders, who take exactly the same view of the Papacy as himself. See 'British Mag.', vol. xvi. pp. 370 and following; also pp. 494 and following; and 'Liber de Flore' Telesforus Cusentinus. Fol. 29, a. apud Todd, p. 460." }}

Dissertation II. Ten Horns. 7:7.

"The controversy which has arisen between commentators respecting these ten (10) horns, refers first (1st) to the question, were they "kings" or "kingdoms?" And next, if "kings," who are they? and if kingdoms, what are they? They are usually supposed to be the kingdoms into which the Roman Empire was divided. 'Vitringa' in his Commentary on the Apocalypse, p. 788, enumerates them after his own method, and the variety in the reckoning of these kingdoms is so great, that it has been used by many writers as an objection to their being kingdoms at all. 'Augustine' ('De civit. Dei', lib. xx. c. 23) considers the number "ten" (10) to be indefinite, and to include all the kings of the Roman Empire. 'Willet, in loc.', has collected a variety of interpretations from different writers; while 'Tyso' gives a table of twenty-nine distinct lists, shewing that sixty-five different kingdoms and persons have been suggested. Elucidation of the Prophecies. 8vo, London, 1838, pp. 100-114.

'Rosenmüller' treats them as kings. With him the fourth (4th) empire is not Rome, but that of the Seleucidae and Lagidae. By this assumption ten (10) kings are easily found among those who reigned over both Egypt and Syria between Alexander and Antiochus Epiphanes, who on this plan is the Little Horn. He simply states his opinion without supporting it by any arguments. It by no means requires any, as the statement itself becomes its best refutation. This view was adopted by 'Bertholdt', and has been overthrown by 'Hengstenberg', with his usual learning and ability. See pp. 164 and following, of the work cited in vol. i. The determination of some German writers to make Antiochus Epiphanes the Little Horn, has induced them to divide the four (4) empires thus: —the Chaldean, Median, Persian, and Macedonian, the last including the various kingdoms which sprung from it. See 'Eichhorn' 'Einl.', 4to, Aug., B. 4, p. 484; also the works of 'Jahn', 'Dereser', 'De Wette', and 'Bleek, ap. Heng.', pp. 161-169.

Some light is thrown on this subject by 'Fry' in his 'Second (2nd) Advent', vol. ii. p. 16, edit. 1822, London. He translates this and other visions and prophecies of Daniel with great clearness, and the hundred pages which he devotes to their explanation are well worthy of perusal. They contain many judicious quotations from Sir Isaac Newton, Mede, Faber, and the most celebrated English expounders of prophecy. As he considers the fourth (4th) beast the Roman Empire, and extends its duration throughout the modern history of Europe, he adopts the views of Bishop Chandler and Faber, as to the ten (10) horns being ten (10) kingdoms into which that empire was divided after the irruption of the barbarians. The northern nations parcelled out the Roman Empire among themselves. These nations invaded the empire and settled within it. Now, it appears from history, that there were: ten (10) principal kingdoms into which the Roman Empire was divided. These ten (10) primary kingdoms are then enumerated according to Machiavel; but it is beyond our province to pursue this view of the subject further; it is enough to refer to 'Fry's' translations of difficult passages of this Prophet, as clear, sound, and judicious. The Editor deems it his duty to point out the best opinions and explanations wherever he may find them; and to direct the reader's attention especially to those which illustrate our Reformer's Commentary." }}

Dissertation III. Little Horn. 7:8.

{{ "The Expositor who sympathizes most with our Lecturer among writers of our own day, is the late Professor 'Lee' of Cambridge. In his translations of the Hebrew Scriptures he is unrivalled; no scholar of our age can approach him in the extent of his learning or the soundness of his erudition. His expository system of the prophecies of Daniel and St. John will meet in these days with the most vehement condemnation, and it happily does not fall within the province of the Editor of these Lectures to express any other opinion, than that they throw light upon the views of our Reformer. It will be sufficient at present to refer the reader to his valuable work, entitled "An Inquiry into the Nature, Progress, and End of Prophecy," Cambridge, 1849. He discusses the subject of our second volume from p. 152, to p. 230, and translates the Hebrew and Chaldee text of Daniel, adding valuable explanatory notes. Before the student is competent to pass an opinion on the Professor's hermeneutical conclusions, he should be intimately familiar with his elaborate verbal criticisms.

The fourth (4th) kingdom he holds to be the Roman, and specifies, especially, "the Lower Roman Empire;" the ten (10) horns are "a series of kings, each series constituting a universal empire for the time being." The Little Horn is said to be "the latter rule of the Roman power," (p. 165.) All reference to Antiochus Epiphanes is denied; and the argument is concluded by the following sentence, —"By every consideration, therefore, it is evident that the Little Horn of Daniel's seventh (7th) and eighth (8th) chapters is identically the same, and that this symbolized that system of Roman rule which ruined Jerusalem, and then made war upon the sainted servants and followers of the Son of man; and in this he prospered and practised, until he in his turn fell, as did his predecessors, to rise no more at all," (p. 168.)

This vision has been ably and fully illustrated by Professor 'Bush' of New York, in "the Hierophant," 1844; and as the American Professor's "exposition" is exceedingly clear, and full, and instructive, a few quotations from it are inserted here. "We propose, if possible, to ascertain the true character of the judgment here depicted, and by a careful collation of other Scriptures to determine its relations to the series of events connected with the second (2nd) coming of Christ and its grand cognate futurities." "This Little Horn," he asserts, "is unquestionably the ecclesiastical power of the Papacy," and "the judgment commences a considerable time prior to the transition of the beast from his pagan to his Christian state."... "This horn did not arise till after the empire received its deadly wound by the hands of the Goths." This divergence from the sentiments of our Reformer compels us to avoid quoting at greater length Professor Bush's scheme of interpretation. It is ably planned and carefully executed. He supposes the Little Horn to prevail against the saints for 1260 years; adding, "nothing is more notorious than that the Roman Empire, after subsisting not far from the space of 1260 years from its foundation, did succumb to the sword of its Gothic invader, and about A.D. 476 became imperially extinct, under its then existing head." This forms another period for the supposed termination of the 1260 years, very different from that usually maintained by British authors. It is said to be renewed again in the time of Charlemagne, and the testimony of Sigonius, Hist. de Reg. Ital, Book iv. p. 158, is quoted in proof of this. See Hierophant, p. 156." }}

Dissertation IV. Ancient of Days & Son of Man. 7:9, 13, 18.

{{ "This expression is treated actively by 'Wintle', —"He that maketh the days old," and, consequently, ready to expire or cease. The Deity he supposes to be meant by this term, and refers us for an explanation of the human attributes assigned to the Divine Being, to Dr. Sam. Clarke's Sermons, vol. i., Dis. v. 'Grotius' very appositely reminds us that the ancient thrones and 'sellae curules' had wheels; and 'Rosenmüller' treats them as indicating the velocity with which God beholds and judges all things. Some Jewish writers read —thrones were taken away; implying the overthrow of the dominions of this world, and the setting up of that of Messiah. Both Rabbis 'Levi' and 'Saadias' apply this passage to the future prosperity of Israel alone.

'OEcolumpius' supposes Christ to be here signified as the 'lamb slain from the beginning of the world', and therefore "Ancient." After quoting Chrysostom and Basil on the phrase, "The books were opened," he pointedly inquires, "But what need of books? every man's conscience will be its own open volume." The Christian tone of this commentator's sentiments renders his writings far more valuable than most of those of his own and of succeeding ages. He treats this chapter with his usual skill and spirituality, differing however in some points from the general tenor of these Lectures. He enumerates the four (4) visions of these last six (6) chapters: the first (1st) and last (4th) of them, he states, relate to the persecutions to arise under Antichrist; the second (2nd), in chapter 8, to the profanation of the Temple under Antiochus; and the third (3rd), in the ninth (9th) chapter, to its devastation under Titus. He does not take the word "kings" for the monarch simply, but includes under the term their counsellors, warriors, and ministers of state. "A king" with him, refers to a monarch's successors as well as himself. He quotes at length from Eusebius, Evan. Dem, book xv., the well-known passage in which this vision is recorded at full length. His illustrations of the first (1st) three (3) beasts is judicious, and we have previously stated (vol. i. p. 427) his view of the fourth (4th) empire as coinciding with Calvin's. He refutes the comments of Polychronius and Aben Ezra, who apply the fourth (4th) kingdom to Alexander's successors; and objects to Jerome, and Lactantius, and Irenaeus, who treat the ten (10) kings as ten (10) monarchies springing from heathen Rome. The number ten (10) is not taken literally, but mystically, for a perfect number, that is, one (1) made up by adding one (1) and two (2), and three (3) and four (4). The ten (10) horns, he thinks, follow the fourth (4th) beast, existing during his own age and leading on directly to Antichrist. He approves of Apollinarius, who interprets the 8th verse of Antichrist, and then explains, very copiously, his sentiments as to where he is to be found. "Very possibly," he remarks, "the Gregories, the Alexanders, and the Julii, did not displease God so strikingly while occupying the Papal chair: God only is their judge. But during this reign such innumerable enormities are committed as are worthy of the true Antichrist, and thus rebound upon their heads." He then runs the parallel between Mahomet and the Papacy, and with great accuracy and spirit treats the false prophet as the Antichrist of the east, and the Roman Pontiff as corresponding to him throughout the west. The "eyes of a man" of verse 8, are explained of the bland and benignant appearance of this insinuating personage, while the blasphemies of his mouth are interpreted of the impious boastings of Mahomet and the Pope. The manner in which both Mahomet and the Papacy have "changed the times," is amply discussed, and the language of both Daniel and St. John made applicable to the modern history of the religions of the Crescent and the Cross throughout both Asia and Europe.

In commenting on verse 9, he refers it to the future destination of Antichrist, and comparing this passage with St. John, states his view of the three and a half (3 1/2) years, or forty-two (42) months, or half-week (1/2 wk). Seven (7) is a perfect number representing perpetuity, and God who is perpetually angry stops half (1/2) way in His course of punishment. OEcolampadius is severe upon the Chiliasts, similar to the Futurists of our day, who expect one personal Antichrist yet to be revealed. Although he calls them "semi-Jews," yet their solution of this great problem of prophecy may after all turn out to be the right one, and Christendom hereafter may yet vindicate their far-seeing sagacity. The remainder of the chapter is connected with the second (2nd) coming of Christ to judgment, and the final victory of the saints when the harvest of the world shall be gathered in, and "the righteous shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." The introduction of the Antichrist and the Papacy with the Mahomedan imposture, existing as they have done for many years since the first (1st) advent, and as it is assumed they will do till the second (2nd) advent, gives a tone to the comments of OEcolampadius very different from that of 'Calvin'. It becomes highly instructive to compare and contrast them, as in this way we may derive profit from both, and correct our own presumption, if we are tempted to esteem either as necessarily and exclusively perfect.

7:9 — "The thrones were cast down" — Authorized Version. Professor 'Bush' agrees with Calvin, vol. ii. p. 32, in preferring were 'set, placed', or 'arranged', bringing forward as his supporters, Jerome, Arias Montanus, the Syriac, Arabic, and Genevan versions, besides Luther's and Diodati's. "The saints who are subsequently said to have possessed the kingdom formed the celestial conclave, and sat upon the encircling thrones." He prefers the meaning, "Permanent of days," or, "Enduring of days," to the common rendering "Ancient of days." Cocceius favours this expression, and also Michaelis, who assigns the primary sense of enduring and abiding to the Hebrew word. See also Job 31:7, and Isaiah 33:18. The designation, 'enduring of days', undoubtedly carries with it a latent contrast to the many vicissitudes, and the transient nature of the thrones and kingdoms here shadowed forth as the antagonist dominions to that of God everlasting. He then quotes 'Calvin's' remarks on this verse as "singularly appropriate and striking." His garment (literally) was as the white snow. The resplendent white of His spotless garments indicated the exquisite equity, justice, and impartiality of His judgments, while the locks of His hair, purer than the washen wool of the fairest fleeces, indicate nothing of the imbecility of extreme old age, but the considerate gravity, the ripened reflection, the mature wisdom, the enlightened experience, the venerable authority, and the calm decision, which are naturally associated with the "hoary head." Referring to the fairy throne and the burning wheels, he adds, "As the entire gorgeous apparatus described by the Prophet, has reference primarily to a period anterior to New Testament times, when the kingdom of God had not yet obtained that fixedness which is attributed to it in subsequent visions, therefore His throne is represented with the accompaniment of wheels." The scene, he states, "Is a judgment which transpires on the earth in the providence of God, and not a judgment at the end of the world, as often understood by the readers of revelation." . . . "The scenery is to be regarded as 'ideal' and not 'real'. It is the celestial shadow of a terrestrial reality. The whole scene, which is impartially described as transpiring in heaven, does really take place in the providence of God on earth, so these judges and co-assessors are really men, who are made agents in executing the divine purposes relative to the overthrow of the anti-christian dominion represented by the Beast and the Little Horn." The professor, though differing from 'Calvin' on some points, strongly corroborates his opinions on others. The statements on pp. 26 and 28 of this volume are expanded and enforced in various passages in the Hierophant. For instance, on p. 109, "That the visioned scene does not refer to what is usually termed 'the last judgment' to take place at some future period, and simultaneously with the final resurrection and consummation of all things, is obvious from the whole tenor of the vision. The judgment is a local judgment, and the object of it, not the whole race of men, but a particular despotic, persecuting, idolatrous, and blasphemous power, which the counsels of heaven have doomed to destruction." This is entirely in accordance with 'Faber'. See Cal. of Proph., vol. ii. p. 108.

7:13. —The Son of Man. He is usually admitted to be the Messiah. 'Hengstenberg' remarks upon our Lord's reasons for using this designation of himself. He aptly compares various passages in St. Matthew's Gospel with those of this chapter, and shews how they bear upon the genuineness of Daniel's prophecies, (p. 220.)

'OEcoulampadius' refutes the notions of the Jews who treat the phrase "the Son of man," as their own nation. He argues against Rabbi Saadias and the Chiliasts, and after fully upholding the union of the divine with the human natures in Christ, he approves of the instructive comments of Chrysostom and Cyril. His coming to the Ancient of days is explained by St. Paul's assertion, He shall deliver up the kingdom to his Father; and thus the victory of the saints becomes that final triumph of righteousness, which shall be visibly displayed at the second (2nd) advent of the Redeemer.

The possession of the kingdom by the saints of the most High, (ver. 22,) was interpreted by the early Fathers, of the general spread of Christianity after 'the first' (1st) advent. Professor 'Lee', in replying to Dr. Todd, has collected their testimony to the reign of Christ and His saints, as spread far and wide in the very earliest period of the Gospel history. His list of authorities will support the system of interpretation adopted by Calvin. See 'Tertullian adv. Jud.', p. 105. Ed. 1580. 'Irenaeus'. Edit. Grabe, pp. 45, 46, 22.1, &c. 'Justin Martyr'. Edit. Thirlby, pp. 369, 328, 400." 'Cyprian adv. Jud.', Bk. ii. 'passim', and 'De Unit. Eccl.', p. 108. Edit. Dodwell. 'Euseb. Hist. Eccl.', Bk. viii. and elsewhere. 'De Vit. Const.', Bk. i. chaps. vii., viii., and his other writings. 'Fabricii Lua. Sanct. Evan'. contains similar extracts from the earliest Fathers to the same purpose. For the Professor's own view, see his Treatise on the Covenants, p. 112 and following. He is ably supported by Professor 'Bush', who correctly limits this vision to the first (1st) establishment of the reign of Messiah, and the early preaching of the Gospel. The American Professor throws great light on the passage, by a clear and comprehensive criticism on the Hebrew words. His remarks on the Son of man coming with the clouds of heaven, are ingenious. He does not understand the word "clouds" in its ordinary sense, but as denoting "a multitude of heavenly attendants." He quotes 1st Thess. 4:19, from which he concludes that the meaning is not that we shall be caught up into the clouds, but in multitudes. The Son of man being brought to the Ancient of days is said to set forth the investiture of the Son of man with that vice-regal lordship, which He, in the divine economy, held over the nations of the earth and through the perpetuity of time. "The paramount question to be resolved, is that of the true epoch of this ordained assumption by the Messiah of the majesty of the kingdom." He then determines the question exactly as Calvin does, by saying, "This we think is plainly to be placed at the Saviour's ascension." . . . "It is in this passage of Daniel that we find the germ of nearly all the announcements of the New Testament, relative to the founding of that spiritual monarchy." . . . "Conceiving the clouds then, in the Prophet's vision, as being really clouds of angels, we shall be better prepared to understand the drift of the New Testament narrative, Acts 1:9. It was by this cloud of celestial attendants that He was brought, in the language of Daniel, to the Ancient of days, for Him to receive the seals, as it were, of that high office which He was to fill as head of the universal spiritual empire now to be set up." There is, therefore, we conceive, no greater mistake in regard to the whole rationale of this prophecy, than to understand the judgment and the coming of the Son of man here mentioned, as the final judgment and final coming of Christ synchronical with an anticipated physical catastrophe of the globe.

Professor 'Bush' quotes 'Calvin' on verse 12 with approbation, and adds the Rabbinical paraphrase of Jaachiades, in support of their joint conclusions. 'Vitringa', in his Dissertations on the Emblems of this Prophet, p. 504, elicits a different sense. He makes the "life" and the "dominion" identical. Sir J. Newton maintains that the three (3) beasts were, in the eye of prophecy, still living in his day, and were to be sought for where their geographical seat existed at the time of their ascendancy. — 'Observ. on Daniel', p. 31. Although Bishop Newton and others agree with him, there is no foundation for this ingenious conjecture. 'Mede's' view is different still, and 'Bush' points out "a serious and probably an insuperable objection to it;" while he glides off himself to the "leading despotisms of the East, including perhaps those of Russia and Turkey," contrary to the sentiments expressed in p. 26 of this vol. See pp. 162, 163.

An important question has arisen among Commentators, as to the import of the word "kings" in verse 17. Does it refer to 'persons' or to 'dynasties'? Professor 'Bush' argues for a symbolical sense, and quotes Theodotion, who renders it "kingdoms." It is next asserted, that the term kingdom is not to be applied to "a purely regal form of government," but to "any form of national existence in which we can recognise an established ruling power." 'Havernick' remarks, that "kings" here stands in the concrete for dynasties or kingdoms, the representation of kingdoms for the kingdoms themselves. The word "kingship" expresses this idea of Havernick's better than kingdom. 'Bush' treats it as a 'denominatio potiore', which he aptly translates "a titling from the chief."

7:18. — 'The Saints of the Most High'. This phrase is said by 'Bush' to indicate the Jews, "as forming a part at least of the saints who are to be the possessors of the kingdom here spoken of" There are strong grounds for believing that the holy people which were to be destroyed and scattered, (chap. 8:24, & 12:7) were the Jews. Daniel's grief was occasioned, in great measure, by a foresight of the cruel oppressions to which 'his own people' were to be subjected during the dominion of the Beast and Little Horn." The plural form of the word, which 'Calvin' accurately preserves and notices, is said to mean, "that holy and devoted people who are born from above." 'Bush' translates 'sancti altissimorum', the saints of the most High Ones." }}

{{ "It is important to determine accurately the meaning of this and similar phrases. The word "time" is, as 'Calvin' remarks, naturally indefinite, while its use in this Prophet leads to the conclusion that it means "years." The passage in chap. 4:16, "Seven (7) times," is usually understood to mean seven (7) years, although nothing can fairly rest upon this interpretation. The phrase of this verse is usually taken to mean half (1/2) of seven (7) times, and is used again in chap. 12:7. The other passages which refer to periods of time are expressed more definitely, for instance, 2300 "evenings and mornings," chap. 8:14-26; the seventy (70) weeks or seven (7), chap. 9:24; the 1290 "days," chap. 12:11, and the 1335 days, chap. 12:12. "The terms in the first (1st) four (4) instances," says Bickersteth, in his Practical Guide to the Prophecies, edit. sixth, 1839, p. 184, "are in themselves quite ambiguous and general. There is nothing to determine, respecting the number 2300, and the seventy (70) weeks, whether years or days be intended; but analogy would lead us to suppose that all were to be interpreted on a common principle." He goes on to say, "It appears from Daniel 12:7, that the close of the three (3) times and a half (1/2) is closely connected with the gathering of the Jews; and from Zech. 1:18-21, that the power of the four (4) Gentile monarchies is then broken; and this confirms the extended meaning of both. God looks at the whole course of this world's history as but a few days. Daniel, when he heard the period of the times and a half announced by the angel, understood not, and on inquiry received the answer, 'The words are sealed to the time of the end'; and an intimation is given, that even when unsealed, only 'the wise would understand'. We thus learn that the meaning couched under this expression was purposely concealed for a time, but was afterwards to be unfolded to the wise. The promise is not of a fresh revelation, but of an explanation of a period already given. And there seems to have been a wise end in this veiling of the time, as it would have been staggering to the faith, and deadening to the hopes of the Israelites, if the whole of the interval had been openly and explicitly declared," p. 186. This excellent man was an advocate of the symbolizing sense of chronological expressions; thus on the "seven (7) times," he says; "this seems plainly to denote the season during which the Gentile dominion of the four (4) monarchies should be corrupt and worldly, as afterwards exhibited in the four (4) beasts coming up from the sea." Again, "the seven (7) times" would then answer to "the times of the Gentiles" mentioned by our Lord. He also makes the following statements — "The time, times, and half a time, the forty-two (42) months and 1260 days, are the same interval; the time, times, and half, of Daniel and the Revelation are the same period; a prophetic day is a natural year; the three and a half (3 1/2) times are the half (1/2) of seven (7) times, the whole season of Gentile power, and the same with the latter times of St. Paul. A time denotes 360 years, and 'chronos' is equivalent to 'kairos,'" (p. 365.) As these assertions are not to be found anywhere in Holy Scripture, 'Calvin' has manifested his wisdom, by expounding the text as he finds it, and avoiding all conjectural statements. As a specimen, however, of a scheme on the opposite principles to those maintained in these Lectures, we will quote one final passage on this subject, headed Particular Times, (p. 366.) "The time, times, and half, and 1260 days of Revelation are the same period. The forty-two (42) months have a date rather later, like the two (2) dates of the seventy (70) years' captivity;" (yet observe the previous extract.—ED.) "The 1290 and 1335 days of Daniel both commence with the 1260 days of Revelation, or time, times, and a half, of both prophecies; the seven (7) times of the Gentiles begin with the subjection of Israel under Shalmanezar; the three and a half times (3 1/2) begin with Justinian's eternal code, A.D. 532-3; the forty-two (42) months close nearly with the 1335 days; the forty-two (42) months begin A.D. 604, or A.D. 607-8, with the re-union of the ten (10) kingdoms, or the public establishment of idolatry; the 1335 days end in A.D. 1867-8." The arguments in favour of this theory, directed chiefly against the Futurists, are found in the "First Elements of Sacred Prophecy," from chap. xii., p. 308, to the end of the volume. Similar discussions are contained in "The Morning Watch," 'passim', especially one on "The Sacred Numbers," vol. v. pp. 273-285, London, 1832. The reader who is curious in such numerical calculations will find much to his taste in the volumes of this periodical.

'Brooks', in his useful compendium, "Elements of Prophetic Interpretation," has devoted chap. 10 to "Time mystically expressed." He examines at full length the argument of 'Maitland', who contends for the literal meaning of days, in "An Inquiry into the grounds on which the prophetic period of Daniel and St. John has been supposed to consist of 1260 years." 'Brooks' brings forward the usual reasonings by which the literal meaning of the word "day" is supposed to be overthrown, and combats Maitland with much spirit. He settles it rather positively, that "the literal meaning of a time is a year, and then considers the expression of this verse 25, "may signify, mystically, if calculated by lunar time, a period of 1260 years." Some, it is added, "have considered that a time means mystically a century of years." Vitringa states this to be the view of the Waldenses, who hoped for a speedy termination to their persecutions, and were persuaded that the antichristian power which opposed them could only last 350 years. Bengelius at one time adopts, and at another rejects the year-day explanation, and modifies it according to his pleasure in his "Introduction to the Interpretation of the Apocalypse," translated by Robertson, pp. 147, 212, 258. "Another important principle to be kept in view is, the high probability that there may be a mystical fulfilment of some of the dates and facts connected with the chronological prophecies, and a literal fulfilment likewise." Speculations of this kind are by no means in the spirit of 'Calvin's' comments; he carefully avoids all such expressions as "mystical days," yet the reader will find in this little volume many extracts from writers of repute, illustrating the prominent features of Daniel's prophecies.

Professor Bush, in the Hierophant, p. 180, comments with great critical ability upon the Hebrew word signifying "time" in this verse. He compares it with the word of, (zmn), 'zemen' correctly rendered "season" in the authorized version. The leading sense of this word, he states, "is that of a fixed, prescribed, determinate season," and in this respect it differs from the more general word time, as the Greek 'kairos', "season," differs from 'chronos', time. As to the other word ('dn), 'gneden', it is used for the most part in a wider sense, and answers more accurately to the Hebrew ('th), 'gneth', "time." "We find mention made in the last chapter of Daniel of two (2) other periods, one (1) of 1290, the other of 1335 years." The additional numbers expressing 30 and 45 similar periods, are called supplementary terms. At p. 241 there is an able letter to Professor 'Stuart' of Andover, U.S., on prophetic designations of time. This learned writer is like 'Calvin', a praeterist, and consequently his writings on this subject are an able elucidation of the principles of these lectures. He approves of Davidson's statement in his "Sacred Hermeneutics," that days are days, and years years. So the writer maintains with no small skill and power of argumentation. Professor Bush, on the other hand, replies, "the grand principle into which the usage of employing a day for a year is to be resolved, is that of 'miniature symbolization'." The argument between the two American divines is then carried on at some length; it is only necessary here to refer to it, on the general principle which we have adopted in illustrating these lectures, namely, to shew that 'Calvin's' decision meets with many able supporters and expounders among British, Continental, and American writers, as well as numerous, earnest, and voluminous opponents." }}

Chapter 8th:

Dissertation VI. Place of Vision. 8:2.

{{ "Differences have arisen as to the reality of Daniel's transfer to Shushan and the banks of the Ulai or Choaspes. Dr. Blayney thinks Elam was a province of Babylon over which Daniel actually presided; but in its more extended sense it comprised the whole country on either side of the Eulaeus, one side being Elymais, and the other Susiana. See Pliny, Nat. Hist, Book vi. "Susiana," says Birks, "close to the Tigris, was distinct from Persia Proper, and might still be under the power of Belshazzar."

In this eighth (8th) chapter the Hebrew language is resumed, and used in all the following visions. This has been considered emblematical of the subject-matter which relates mainly to the future state of Israel, and of the kingdoms in political relation to it. The visions of this chapter clearly refer to the Persian and Grecian empires. These are intimately connected with those persecutions under which the Jews groaned so heavily, through the profanation of their Temple, and the removal of their daily sacrifice. These distresses continue for 2300 days till the sanctuary is cleansed. The reader will find these points clearly and historically illustrated in "the two later visions of Daniel" previously referred to, chap. 1 & 2. The exposition of the Duke of Manchester is worthy of notice. He compares and connects the visions and prophecies of chap. 8 & 9, and differs from the usual schemes hitherto submitted to our notice. See pp. 392–397. "The vision embraces a period of time commencing from after the conquest of India by Darius, until the last end of the indignation, for the ram was pushing westward, northward, and southward, but not eastward." " "}}

Dissertation VII. Ram & He-Goat. 8:3.

{{ "The clearest modern exposition with which the Editor is acquainted is that of 'Birks', and it will be sufficient for our purpose to make a few extracts from his work. "The ram is expounded by the angel to be the kings of Media and Persia." It is clear, then, that the word 'kings' is not used in a personal sense. It is plain they are the two ruling dynasties or powers, confederate in conquest, and of which Media was superior at first (1st), and Persia after the sole reign of Cyrus. The ram itself, and not the two (2) horns, denotes the compound Median and Persian power. The ram was seen "pushing westward, and northward, and southward." These words are a very clear prediction of the conquests of Cyrus, though, perhaps, they may include the later conquest of Egypt by his son Cambyses. "The vision was in the sixth (6th) or seventh (7th) year of Cyrus, when his career of victory had already begun," (p. 10.) Two (2) objections to this explanation are then answered; one (1) is, that the chronology seems to require a later commencement, and the other (1), that the place of the ram before the river, has been thought to imply the previous establishment of the Persian empire. The most natural sense of the words "before the river," is, "with its face to the river." The accomplishment of this prophecy is then traced through Herodotus, and Xenophon. The narratives of Herod. Book i. 71-95, respecting the overthrow of Croesus, and 152-216, respecting his victories in Upper Asia, clearly support this view of the fulfilment.

The he-goat is so clearly fulfilled in Alexander, that no further remark seems required. Birks has translated at length the passages in Diodorus, and given a correct summary of the chronology of this period. See also Alexander in Phutarch, chap. xxiv., Diod. Sic, lib. xvii. sec. 46, and Quint. Curtius, lib. iv. sec. 4, 19.

Alexander & His Successors.

The classical passages from which correct information is obtained respecting the kingdom of Macedon, Syria, and Egypt, as far as they illustrate Daniel's prophecies, are as follow :

'Quintus Curtius', fol. Col. Agripp., 1628, p. 670 and following. This is the edition of Raderus under the title of Q. Curtii Rufi de Alexandro M. historiam Mathæi Raderi S. J. Commentarii.

'Diodori Siculi', lib. xviii. p. 587. Wesseling, Amst., 1746, vol. ii. p. 258.

'Polybius', lxxvi. cap. 10, vol. iv. p. 353 and following. Schweigheuser's edition.

'Athenæus', Deipnosophist, lib. v. cap. 5, and lib. x. cap. 10.

'Photius', cod. 82, and cod. 92 in epit, lib. ix.

'Justin', lib. xiii.

'Crosius', Hist., lib. iii. chap. xxiii.

'Decippus and Arrian' in fragments preserved by Photius. Biblioth., cod. lxxxii., and cod. xcii.

'Andrew Schott', in his edition of the Bibliotheca of Photius, has given a tabular view of the various divisions of Alexander's kingdom, classifying them according to the authority of each of the above-mentioned authors. See fol. Gen., 1612, p. 230.

'Venema', in his dissertations on the emblematical prophecies of Daniel, gives a full statement of every event, with a separate classical authority for each. His object was to shew that Alexander's kingdom was divided into ten (10) after his death, and that the portion of this prophecy interpreted by 'Calvin' of the Roman empire was really fulfilled by the Greeks. Dr. Todd has quoted the original Latin, (p. 504 and following.) from Diss. v. sec. 3 to 12, pp. 347 to 364. 4to. Leovard, 1745." }}

Dissertation VIII. Wonderful Numberer: One Holy One Speaking to Another. 8:13.

{{ "A very peculiar Hebrew word is used to designate the second Holy One. Lowth intimates its connection with the Logos. It may properly be, translated, "To the excellent one." The original word (phlmwny) 'palmoni', is supposed to be formed of two (2) nouns (phlwny), 'peloni', and ('almwny), 'almoni', which are found in Ruth 4:1, and 2nd Kings 6:8. 'Glass. gram', 4, 3, 864, as quoted in Poole's Syn., calls them fictitious nouns, being used when the real name is purposely concealed, like the ('ho deiva' of the Greeks. Hence it does not signify any angel, but some remarkable one. 'Calvin's' opinion that it refers to Messiah is held by many other interpreters, as given by Poole 'in loc'. 'Wintle' adopts another view, "the numberer of segrets," or, "the wonderful numberer," from the two words (phl'a), 'phla', "wonderful," used by Isaiah of Messiah in the well-known passage in chap. 9, and (mnh), "to number," which has already come before us. He refers to Glass. Phil., p. 644, 4to, and translates, "And another saint said unto that excellent one that was speaking." Holy One is preferable to saint in this passage. 'Gesenius' adopts the statement of Glasse; the quadriliteral arising from the combination of two words in common use. See also "The Times of Daniel," p. 399, and "The Morning Watch," vol. v. p. 276, where 'palmoni' is translated "the numberer of secrets."

8:13. —The Vision of the Daily Sacrifice. The translation of this passage is of great importance. Professor 'Lee' translates as follows: —11. By him the daily sacrifice was to be taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was to be cast down. 12. And an army was to be given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, ('i.e.', because the transgressors had now come to the full: see note, p. 165) and it cast the truth to the ground, and it practised and prospered. 13. How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? 14. The answer is, unto 2300 days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.

The wording of the Hebrew is peculiar here and highly deserving of remark. It stands literally thus, "Until (the) evening (and) morning, or it may be until the evening of the morning, two thousand and three hundred (2300), and the sanctuary (lit. holiness) shall be sanctified." Evening and morning, I take here to be a mere periphrasis for a day; and so our translators have taken it, Gen. 1:5. The day here had in view, continues Professor Lee, "must mark the period of Daniel's seventieth (70th) week —the numbers given above must be understood indefinitely, and as intended to designate a considerable length of time." Referring again to verse 11, he states, this consummation could not be effected by Antiochus Epiphanes: he only suspended the service of the Temple for about three (3) years and-a half (1/2). By every consideration, therefore, it is evident that the Little Horn of Daniel's seventh (7th) and eighth (8th) chapters, is identically the same, and that this symbolized that system of 'Roman rule' which ruined Jerusalem, and then made war upon the sainted servants and followers of the Son of man; and in this he prospered and practised, until he in his turn fell, as did his predecessors, to rise no more at all. (P. 168.) 'Wintle', with his usual judgment, translates, "until the evening (and) morning 2300." "I insert the word 'and', because the 'vau' is repeated at verse 26. I am inclined to think this 'vesperamane' should induce us to understand these days in the first (1st) instance literally, rather than of months and years." The great difficulty, he states, is to reconcile this period with the tyranny of Antiochus; while he does not forget the reference to Antichrist, of whom Antiochus was the type. See also Sir Isaac Newton, Obs., chap. ix. Rosenmüller has collected various explanations, especially C. B. Bertram; Kirms, in his historical and critical commentary, p. 39; Melancthon, p. 131; and Eichhorn in Apoc, t. ii. p. 60. "The Times of Daniel" also contains a translation of this passage which is worth notice, p. 400, although it is not so scholar-like as that quoted above.

The opinion that this period refers to the rise and duration of the Mahomedan power in the East, is ably advocated by 'Fry', "Second (2nd) Advent," vol. ii. p. 43 and following; where various explanations of the dates are given at length." }}

Chapter 9th:

Dissertation IX. Seventy (70) Weeks. 9:24.

{{ "A great variety of opinions have been published upon this interesting period; it would be impossible to enumerate them all, and it will be sufficient to allude to those which illustrate 'Calvin's' assertions. The titled author of "The Times of Daniel" writes as follows, "I endeavoured to shew in the chronology that there were two (2) periods of seventy (70) years, one (1), the service of Babylon, the other (1) the desolation of Jerusalem, and that the desolations terminated with the first (1st) year of Darius Nothus. I hope to establish presently that the termination of each of these periods is a fresh epoch," p. 400. "The decree dates from the time of Daniel's prayer. The command came forth, therefore, in the first (1st) year of Darius son of Ahasuerus," p. 402. He then strongly approves of the rendering of the passage by Hengstenberg: "Seventy (70) weeks are cut off over thy people and over thy holy city." Exactly 'Calvin's' use of the preposition 'super'. And he adds, most Commentators observe that "cut off" is used figuratively for determined. 'Mede' is also quoted to the same effect, works, fol. p. 497. I am still able to follow Dr. Hengstenberg in the following clause, "to restrain transgression and to seal sin." All senses of the verb, says he, unite in that of restraining. To seal sin, holds forth God's judicial hardening of persons in sin. This passage, the Duke thinks, was fulfilled "before the passover, in the year A.D. 67." The 'terminus a quo' is said to be the first (1st) year of Darius the son of Ahasuerus, whose date is given in Ptolemy's Canon An. Nabonassar 325, which, according to the method of verifying the date here used, is B.C. 424, "which, added to the year when apostasy was no longer restrained, A.D. 66, makes 70 weeks or 490 years." Original views of the "sealing" and the sixty-two (62) weeks are also proposed, to which we can only refer: see pp. 410-422. The closing calculation, that "we may look for the cleansing of the sanctuary A.D. 1877," is so adverse to the interpretation of these Lectures, that we must be content with this passing allusion to it.

The opinions of certain celebrated writers upon this point are here collected. 'Clement' of Alexandria, according to the late Bishop of Lincoln, p. 383, explains it thus: "The Temple was rebuilt in seven (7) weeks: then, after an interval of sixty-two (62) weeks, the Messiah came: then, after an interval of half (1/2) a week, Nero placed an abomination in the Temple of Jerusalem: and, after another half-week (1/2 wk), the Temple was destroyed by Vespasian." 'Theodoret' closes the period three years and a half (3 1/2 yrs) after the suffering of Christ: "and so they begin the last week at the baptism of Christ," says Willet. He quotes Zonaras, tom. i., 'Annal', who commences the period at the 20th year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and ends the 62 weeks at the death of Hyrcanus. From this point to Christ's baptism they reckon seven (7) weeks more, and then in the midst of the last week, Messiah was slain; so there remained afterwards three (3) years and a half (1/2) for the preaching of the Gospel. 'Eusebius' begins the 69 weeks in the sixth (6th) year of Darius Hystaspes, and ends them in the first (1st) year of Herod, about the death of Hyrcanus. He begins the 70th week at Christ's baptism, and ends the period three (3) years and a half (1/2) afterwards. 'Tertullian', by beginning in the first (1st) year of Darius, counts 490 years, to the destruction of Jerusalem.

'Oecolampadius' confesses this passage to be one of the most difficult in Scripture, and can scarcely satisfy himself with any solution. He rather unwisely introduces chronological tables of the events of Scripture, from Adam to the time of the Herods. "With Christ," he says, "is the fulness of the times and the completion of the seventy (70) weeks." He quotes the expressions of Jewish authorities, and refers to the cruelty of Herod, and the anointing of Jesus as Messiah. "They are not weeks of days, or of jubilees, or of ages," he asserts, but of years. They most probably begin at either the first year of Cyrus, or the second of Darius. He calculates it both ways: the first period closing at the death of Antiochus the brother of Alexander, and the other at the reign of Herod. He afterwards adopts the division of this period into three (3) parts, and explains his method of reckoning the seven (7) weeks. The question is discussed with great judgment, and its perusal will amply repay the attentive student of this remarkable prophecy.

'J. D. Michaelis' has elucidated this subject, in a letter to Sir John Pringle, which the English reader will find noticed in the Monthly Review, O. S., vol. xlix. p. 263 and following. 'Dr. Blayney', in a Dissertation, Oxford, 1775, 4to, contradicts the Professor's opinions: see Monthly Review, O. S., vol. lii. p. 487 and following. 'John Uri' also published at Oxford, 1788, an "Interpretation, paraphrase, and computation of this passage." 'Faber's' well known Dissertation, London, 1811, only needs to be mentioned to be valued; while that of 'Dr. Stonard', London, 1826, is exceedingly elaborate, being a masterly scholastic work. 'Dr. Wells' has prefixed to his "Help to the Understanding of Daniel," some observations on the chronology of this prophecy. From him we learn the different methods of 'Scaliger', 'Mede', and 'Bishop Lloyd', while his own paraphrase and his solution of some of the difficulties in the schemes of preceding writers, are worthy of attentive perusal. 'Willet' presents us with "The several interpretations of Daniel's seventy (70) weeks dispersedly handled before, summed together," in his 55th question on this chapter, and continues the subject through the ten (10) succeeding questions. From his comments, we ascertain the views of 'J. Lucidus', lib. vii., 'De emendatione temporis', 'Osiander', 'Junius', 'Montanus in apparat', lib. Dan', and others. His remarks on 'Calvin' are worthy of notice here. "'M. Calvin' beginneth these years in the first (1st) year of Cyrus, and endeth them in the sixth (6th) of Darius the son of Hystaspes, the third (3rd) king of Persia; but this cannot be; for they that give the most years unto Cyrus and Cambyzes, allow but the one 30 and the other seven (7); excepting only 'Luther', who following 'Eusebius De Demon. Evan', giveth to each of them 20 years. Then add the six (6) years of Darius, they will make but 43. How, then, can the seven (7) weeks be here fulfilled? Beside, that Darius, in whose sixth (6th) (year) the Temple was re-edified, called Darius of Persia, was not Darius Hystaspes the third (3rd) king of Persia; but before this Darius, three (3) other kings are named Cyrus, Assuerus, Artashasht, Ezra 4:6,7". This reference to 'Calvin's' occurs in his 58th question, 'When the terme of seven (7) weekes, that is 49 yeares beganne and when it ended," p. 323, Edit., 1610. One remark of 'Wintle's' is most important, as its correctness vindicates 'Calvin' from every charge of inconsistency in his interpretation of these prophecies. "The original word rendered weeks throughout the prophecy, strictly signifies sevens (7s), which word is adopted in Purver's translation, and may be referred either to days or years." Professor 'Jahn' also adopts the same correct and simple translation, and his satisfactory criticism is found in his Appendia to Enchir. Hermen, Fasc. i. p. 124 and following. Vienna, 1813. The subject is also discussed by the present Editor, in his Norrisian Prize Essay for 1834, p. 81. Dathe also, in his Prophetæ Majores, Edit. 3d., Halae, 1831, translates as follows, "The seventy (70), yea the seventy (70), are drawing to a close." The only difference in the original is in the pointing of the Masorets; and thus the chronology which they introduced, requires all the ingenious apparatus of the profound astronomy of Sir Isaac Newton to reconcile it with the historical facts. See his Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel, part i. chap. x. Archbishop 'Secker' has dwelt much on this point, and every commentator on the Prophet has treated it with more or less wisdom and discretion. 'Wintle' is on the whole very judicious. Professor 'Lee's' translation of the passage, and explanation of the Hebrew words, is exceedingly valuable. His exegetical comments admit of some variety of opinion as to their value. The seventy (70) weeks, says he, were not "to be considered chronological in any sense, but only to name an 'indefinite' period, the events of which, as in most similar cases, should make all sufficiently clear," Bk. ii., chap. i. p. 160. This chronological period, and the dependent minor divisions, are ably treated by 'Rosenmüller', who has devoted more than usual space to their illustration. He quotes some of the best opinions of the most celebrated German writers, and throws great light upon the historical points connected with the inquiry. See his comments on this chap. ix. pp. 313-324.

'Broughton' has quoted largely from Jewish Rabbis; he treats Daniel's prayer as a compendium of theology, and applies Gabriel's answer to the baptism, miracles, and life of our Lord.

Professor 'Stuart', whom we have already quoted, has treated this subject with great precision by commenting critically on the Hebrew words. He adopts the rendering seventy (70) sevens (7s), or "'seventy (70) heptades' are determined upon thy people. Heptades of what? of days or of years? No one can doubt what the answer is. Daniel had been making diligent search respecting the seventy (70) years; and in such a connection, nothing but seventy (70) heptades of years could be reasonably supposed to be meant by the angel." An argument is also drawn from the double gender of the plural of this word, which is noticed by Ewald, Gram. Heb., sec. 373. London, 1836. Many other arguments in favour of its general sense of "sevens (7s)" are added, implying that the connection only determines whether years or days be intended. 'Professor Bush' brings forward the opposite views to those of 'Stuart', and discusses the subject with the utmost exactness of Hebrew criticism. 'Mede' should also be consulted, works, Bk. iii. chap. ix. p. 599. 'Hengstenberg' treats the form of the word as participial and indicating a septenized (70s) period, like 'hebdomas' in Greek, 'septimana' in Latin, 'settimana' in Italian, and 'semaine' in French [& 'setenta' in Spanish, & 'siebzig' in German]. Views in accordance with these are found in "The Morning Watch," vol. v. p. 327. London, 1832. This article is the more worthy of perusal, as it presents us, in an intelligible English form, the criticism of Professor 'Jahn', extracted from his Appendix ad Enchiridion Hermeneutica, Fasc. i. p. 124 and following. Edit., Vienna, 1813. The English translation of the passage, in accordance with Jahn's critical exposition, is worthy of notice, particularly by those readers who wish to keep before their minds the most valuable explanations which have ever been published, by British, Continental, and American Divines." }}

Dissertation X. Hippolytus, Nicolaus Lyranus, Burgensis, Africanus, Apollinares, &c. 9:25.

{{ "Hippolytus," says Mosheim, "whose history is much involved in darkness, is also esteemed among the most celebrated authors and martyrs of this age." (Vol. i. p. 270, edit. 1823.) Although the learned Benedictines have assisted in dispelling this darkness in their History of the Literature of France, vol. i. p. 361, yet the greatest light has been thrown upon the life and opinions of this writer by the Chevalier 'Bunsen', in his work, "Hippolytus and his Age," 4 vols., 1852. Dr. 'Christopher Wordsworth' has also discussed the same subject, giving an English version of the newly discovered 'philosophumena', with an introductory inquiry into the authorship of the treatise, and on the life and works of the writer. It is out of our province to enter on the important questions raised by these well-known writers; we must confine ourselves strictly to whatever illustrates 'Daniel'. He wrote commentaries on various parts of the Old and New Testaments, and among these Bunsen enumerates one "On the Prophets, in particular on Ezekiel and Daniel," vol. i. p. 282. A fragment of his comment on Daniel is preserved in the edition of 'Fabricius', in which the Greek text is printed from a Vatican MS., tom. i. p. 271, "named by Theodoret and by Photius, c. 203. Jerome says 'Hippolytus historical explanation of the seventy (70) weeks did not tally with history and chronology'. Fabricius, i. p. 272. We have a genuine fragment of this explanation in Fabricius, i. p. 278, on "Daniel's life and times." The Syrian MSS. discovered in the Lybian

Desert, and explored by Cureton, contain, says Bunsen, quotations from the Commentary on Daniel by Hippolytus. Calvin, most probably, knew no more of his view of the seventy (70) weeks than he found in Jerome. The existence of his treatise on Antichrist was known to the Reformers chiefly from ancient writers who had given a list of his works, but especially from Jerome. From 'Fabricius, Appendix' ad. l. i. p. 2, we learn that a forgery was published in 1556, and that the genuine work was first edited in 1661 from two French MSS. A Latin translation was added in 1672. "His calculations," says Bunsen, "based upon Daniel and the Apocalypse, are quite as absurd as those which we have been doomed to see printed, and praised, and believed in our days. He makes out that Antichrist will come 500 years after Christ, from the tribe of Dan, and rebuild the Jewish temple at Jerusalem." This remark has caused the censure of a writer in "The Record," who accuses Bunsen of making this bishop and martyr "the mouthpiece of his own unbelief in the prophecies of Daniel." "Some writers have conceived," says Bunsen, "that Hippolytus alludes, in his interpretation of the ten (10) horns of the fourth (4th) beast in Daniel, to some great convulsions of the empire in his time; but this opinion seems to me entirely unfounded. All I can find in these passages indicative of the time in which they were written, (sec. 28,29,) is the existence of a very strong, iron, military government; and this seems to point to the time when the power of Septimius Severus was firmly established, after fierce contests and sanguinary battles. The rest relates to things to come, to the last age of the world, which he thought about three (3) centuries distant." (Vol. i. p. 274.) On page 290 we have three (3) lists of the works of this "father," as noticed by Eusebius, Jerome, and Lycellus. Eusebius does not mention his work on Daniel; both Jerome and Lycellus do; and Nicephorus adds it among others to the Eusebian list; and on page 242 many of his works are recorded as existing among the Escorial manuscripts. See the Catalogue des Manuscrits Grecs de la Bibliothèque de l'Escorial, par E. Miller, 8vo, Paris, 1848. Cardinal Main, in his "Scriptorum Veterum nova Collectio," vol. i., part 2, gives such fragments of Hippolytus' Daniel as were formerly inedited, (pp. 161-222.) On page 205, ver. 13, he illustrates Daniel's phrase, "the old of the days," referring it to God the Father, the Master of all, even of Christ Himself.

The interest excited by the recent publications of 'Bunsen' and 'Wordsworth', makes it desirable to state that fresh light has been thrown upon his life and times. 'Cave', in his elaborate work, is unsuccessful respecting Hippolytus. He takes up the opinion of Le Moyne, a French ecclesiastical writer of the seventeenth (17th) century, who conjectured that he was bishop of 'Portus Romanus', Aden in Arabia. The additional supposition that he was an Arabian by birth is also a mistake. He was bishop of the "portus," a harbour of the city of Rome, during the time of the Emperor Alexander Severus, at the beginning of the third (3rd) century. He suffered martyrdom during the persecution of Maximus the Thracian, about A.D. 236. The Chevalier's narrative of the manner in which a lost book of his has been recovered is worthy of notice. "A French scholar and statesman of high merit, M. Willemain, sent a Greek to Mount Athos to look out for new treasures in the domain of Greek literature. The fruits of this mission were deposited, in 1842, in the great national library, already possessed of so many treasures. Among them was a MS. of no great antiquity, written in the fourteenth (14th) century, not on parchment, but on cotton paper, and it was registered as a book "on all heresies," without any indication of its author or age.... It fell to the lot of a distinguished Greek scholar and writer on literature, a functionary of that great institution, M. Emmanuel Miller, to bring forward the hidden treasure.... In 1850 he offered it to the University Press at Oxford, as a work of undoubted authenticity, and as a lost treatise of Origen, "Against all Heresies." It was published in 1851, and Bunsen, on reading it, pronounced it not to be the work of Origen, but of Hippolytus; and in letters to Archdeacon Hare, he has thrown great light upon the subject, and enabled us to peruse some fragments of his comments on Daniel and the Antichrist, which Calvin could only have known through Eusebius and Jerome.

It is worthy of notice that 'Sir Isaac Newton', in his "Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel," &c., quotes Hippolytus thus, "If divers of the ancients, as Irenaeus, Julius Africanus, Hippolytus the martyr, and Apollinaris bishop of Laodicea, applied the half (1/2) week to the times of Antichrist, why may not we, by the same liberty of interpretation, apply the seven (7) weeks to the time when Antichrist shall be destroyed by the brightness of Christ's coming?"

'Nicolaus de Lyra' received his name from the place of his birth, Lire, a small town in Normandy. He flourished at the beginning of the fourteenth (14th) century: he was one of the Society of the Friars Minors at Verneuil, although he is supposed to have been born a Jew. His 'postills' were repeatedly printed at the close of the fifteenth (15th) and the early part of the sixteenth (16th) centuries, and were familiar to the biblical students of Calvin's day. He was a good Hebrew scholar, and has enriched his comments with the best specimens of Rabbinical learning. He is a good interpreter of the literal sense; but his views were attacked by Paulus Burgensis, Paul bishop of Burgos, who was a converted Jew, and defended by Matthias Doring. His works, with those of his opponent and champion, were published at 'Duaci', A.D. 1617; also at Antwerp, A.D. 1634, in 6 vols. folio. See also Hart. Horne, vol. ii. part ii. ch. v. In the Morning Watch, vol. i. p. 147, he is considered as a forerunner of the Reformation. Luther is there said to have written of him thus: "Ego Lyram ideo amo, et inter optimos pono, quod ubique diligenter retinet et persequitur historiam."

"'Burgensis'." A notice of Paul of Burgos is found in 'Allport's' edition of Bishop Davenant on Justification, vol. ii. p. 86, 'note'.

The 'Africanus' here mentioned was Julius Africanus of Nicopolis, (Emmaus,) a friend of Origen's, and rather his senior in years. He is a very early writer on chronology, about A.D. 232; and his epistle concerning the history of Susannah, together with Origen's reply, is in 'Wetstein's' edition, annexed to the dialogue against the Marcionites. Mosheim calls him "a man of the most profound erudition, but the greatest part of whose learned labours are unhappily lost." Cent. iii. part. ii.; see also Gieseler's Eccl. Hist, vol. i. p. 145, American translation. The treatise to which 'Calvin' probably refers is the fragment on the genealogy of Christ preserved by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., lib. i. chap. vii., especially as Eusebius himself had just quoted this chapter of Daniel (v. 24) at the close of his sixth (6th) chapter. Other writings of his are quoted by Eusebius, lib. vi. chap. xxxi., entitled "Concerning Africanus."

'Apollinaris', bishop of Hierapolis, flourished in the second (2nd) century. He is included by Gieseler among the writers against the Montanists, and is united with Melito of Sardis by Eusebius, as writers of great repute. See Euseb. Eccl. Hist., lib. iv. chap. xxvi., xxvii. In the latter chapter he gives a list of his works. See also lib. v. chap. xvi., xix. Another of the fourth (4th) century is mentioned by Mosheim as Bishop of Laodicea. An account of this writer is found in the English edition of Bailey's Dictionary." }}

Dissertation XI. Abomination of Desolation. 9:27.

{{ "Various questions have arisen respecting the correct interpretation of this phrase. The prophecy has been supposed to be accomplished first (1st) under Antiochus Epiphanes, and again by the Roman armies under Titus. 'Hengstenberg's' remarks were chiefly in reply to 'Bertholdt, Com'. ii. p. 584, and in explanation of our Saviour's comments, as recorded by St. Matthew. He thinks "it was then regarded by the Jews as relating to a still future occurrence —the yet impending conquest and destruction of Jerusalem." . . . "A sufficient proof of this is afforded by the passage, Josephus Arch (Antiq.). x. 11, 7, 'Daniel predicted also the Roman supremacy, and that our country should be desolated by them.'" The passage 'De Bell. Jud'. 4:6, 3, is also quoted with this conclusion, "How general the reference of the prophecy then was to a future destruction of the city, appears from the express observation of Josephus, that even the zealots had no doubt of the correctness of this interpretation. The same interpretation is found also in the Babylonian and Jerusalem 'Gemarah'." (P. 215.) This reference to "the zealots" is explained in a note to 'Bishop Kidder's' Demonstration of the Messiah, pt. ii. p. 11. They were slain standing on the battlements of the temple, and their carcasses and blood were scattered and sprinkled about the sanctuary before its final destruction. This is supposed to be a fulfilment of the prediction. Professor 'Lee' states, "It is to be understood rather of the Roman armies, with their heathen ensigns, stationed over against the Temple, than of anything else.” (Book ii. chap. ii. p. 202.) He translates thus, “For the overspreading of abominations he shall make it (i.e., Jerusalem) desolate; even until the consummation (i.e., the complete end) and (until) that determined shall be poured upon the desolate, rather desolator;” meaning, “the people of the prince who should come as a desolator and destroy the city and the sanctuary.” (Book ii. chap. i. p. 142.) “Let it be remembered,” says he, “all is here indefinite. No mathematical measure of time or portion of time is therefore to be thought of. The occurrence of their several events will supply the only measures of time now to be had recourse to.”

The early Reformers, OEcolumpadius, Bullinger, and Osiander, treated the word “overspreading” in its literal sense of “wing,” and applied it to the wings or pinnacles of the Temple; the first of these three (3) takes it for “the very altar and holy place where the winged cherubim were.” Augustine in his 'Epis'. 80, 'ad Hesychium', interprets it of the legions and wings of the Roman armies which compassed and defiled the Temple. 'Irenaeus', lib. v. ad. haer, explains it of Antichrist, whom he imagined should sit in the Temple at Jerusalem, and be worshipped as Messiah. 'Rosenmüller' illustrates the use of the word wing from Isaiah 8:8, and 18:1, and also from Cicero, Offic. lib. ii. chap. 13. C. B. 'Michaelis' objects to the usual sense of the “abomination of desolations,” while 'Gesenius' and 'Winer' refer the wing to the pinnacle of the Temple. 'Rosenmüller' prefers the active sense of “the desolator,” according to the marginal reading of our authorized version, and applies the passage to Antiochus Epiphanes, quoting 1st Macc. 1:11, 63, as fulfilling the prediction. 'Dr. Wells' approves of this translation, but he interprets the desolator to mean “the Gentile people inhabiting the (once) countries of the Roman Empire.” (Paraphrase, p. 101.)” }}

Chapter 10th:

Dissertation XII. Vision on Bank of Hiddekel. 10:1, 13.

{{ "This vision is referred to by 'Bertholdt' and 'Griesinger' in an attempt to shew its contradiction to chap. 1:21, but their cavils have been ably answered by 'Hengstenberg', pp. 54, 55. The error in the Alexandrine translation of this verse is discussed on p. 239. With regard to the fasting of ver. 2, 'Staudlin' assumes that Daniel abstracted himself as far as possible from sensible objects, in order to obtain very high revelations, and that the reason why only Daniel saw the appearance lies in the fact, that only he had been fasting a long season and doing penance, and had thereby sharpened and sanctified his vision; see 'N. Beitr'., p. 279, ap. 'Heng'., p. 120. The celestial appearance of ver. 5 and 6 is said to be “identical with the angel of the Lord, and thus also with Michael. Daniel finds himself on the banks of the Tigris, and sees hovering over its waters a human form clothed in linen, with a golden girdle about his loins.” 'Hengstenberg' objects to the opinion that this is a representation of Gabriel. He is so terrified by the voice of the apparition that he falls into a deep swoon, and for a long time cannot recover, whereas with Gabriel, on his former single appearance, chap. 11, he converses quite freely and without restraint. The angel of the Lord is present in calm silent majesty, and works with an unseen power. The man clothed in linen cannot be, as 'Staudlin' assumes, absolutely identified with the Most High God, but is as distinct from him as the angel of the Lord from the Lord Himself. For he swears not by himself, but, with his right hand lifted up to heaven, by the eternal God. The supposition of a distinction between the man clothed in linen and Gabriel has the analogy of chap. 8:16 in its favour. The names Gabriel and Michael are peculiar to Daniel, and occur only in such visions as from their dramatic character demand the most exact description possible of the persons concerned and the bringing of them out into stronger relief. This opinion is discussed more at length on pp. 136-138.

'Rosenmüller' objects to consider this vision as either an ecstasy or dream. He quotes Theodoret and Jerome on the phrase, "desirable food," and explains the period of the Prophet's fasting according to the view of C. B. Michaelis. The attire of ver. 5 is that of the high priest, although it is by no means certain that this representation portrayed "the prince of the army of Jehovah." The likeness to chrysolite is said to be not with respect to colour, but clearness and brilliancy. Bochart and Calmet suppose Uphaz and Ophir to be the same place; see Wintle's note, which is full of information. In illustration of the "voice," ver. 6, Rosenmüller quotes Iliad xi. l. 148 and following, and enters fully into the Jewish theory of various orders of angels, in the first of which were Michael and Raphael. On this very interesting subject he has selected with great judgment the opinions of various ancient interpreters, especially Theodoret and Jerome, as well as those of Luther, Geier, Gesenius, and Winer. "The hand that touched him," observes Wintle, "was probably one of the attendant angels. The form of the superior spirit was scarcely visible by Daniel, and therefore it seems likely to have been one of an inferior order, whose hand he could discover as reached out unto him. (Wer. 18.) The Son of God is seldom introduced to human notice without a retinue of angels."

10:13. The prince of the kingdom of Persia is supposed by some writers to be either Cyrus or Cambyses opposing the building of the Temple; and by others to refer to those guardian angels which the Orientals believed to protect different countries. 'Wintle' adopts Theodotion's translation of the last clause of this verse, as the sense then becomes very clear; but Rosenmüller prefers the Syriac version, "I was delayed there," in preference to "I left him there." }

Dissertation XIII. Michael the Prince. 10:13.

{{ "The appearance of angels, as recorded in these prophecies, has always given rise to much inquiry and conjecture. 'Hengstenberg' contends for the identity of Michael and the angel of the Lord, as recognised by the elder Jews, perhaps on the testimony of tradition. He contends against the assertion of 'Bertholdt', that the Jews derived their distinction between superior and inferior angels from the Persians, after the end of the Babylonish captivity, (ii. 528.) 'Gesenius' recognises angel-princes, "as the earthly monarch is surrounded by his nobles, so here is Jehovah by princes of heaven." Traces of a gradation of rank among the angels are also found in Job 33:23, according to the explanation suggested by 'Winer'. "We go further," adds 'Hengstenberg', "we can shew that those angels of higher rank who play a particular part in our book, are the very same that meet us in just the same character in the oldest books. We have already pointed out in the 'Christologie', that the doctrine of the angel or revealer of God, runs through the whole of the Old Testament, who in a twofold (2-fold) respect, first (1st) as the highest of all angels, then as connected with the hidden God by a oneness of essence, appears as his revealer." He then argues for the identity of Michael with the angel of Jehovah, the leader of the Israelites, the prince of the army of Jehovah, according to Exod. 32:34, and Joshua 5:13, and Zech. 1:5. In some passages in the Talmud, Michael as the angel of Jehovah is associated with the Shekinah. See on this interesting point 'Baumgarten-Crusius Bibl. Theol.', pp. 282, 287. 'Jerome' on Zech. i.; and 'Danz in Meuschen', Illustrations of the New Testament from the Talmud, pp. 718, 733." }}

Chapter 11th:

Dissertation XIV. Historical Proofs: Three Kings of Persia. 11:2.

{{ "The speaker in this last vision is the Son of God Himself. There are two (2) things which in my judgment may be clearly proved; that the princes of Persia and Javan, as also Michael and Gabriel, are created angels; and that the speaker in this last vision is the angel of the covenant, the Son of God. . . . The phrase, "to strengthen him," is also very significant. The word is 'mahoz', the same which occurs in the plural 'mahuzzim', at the close of the prophecy. Here it plainly denotes a tutelary or guardian power, exercised on behalf of Darius by the Son of God. At the close of the vision it must bear a similar meaning. The Mahuzzim are those tutelary powers, whether saints, angels, or demons, who are objects of great horror to the wilful king." —'Birks', p. 33. Herodotus is still a safe guide in the interpretation of this prediction. His narrative of Cambyses and Darius Hystaspes, amply illustrates and confirms it. The canon of Ptolemy agrees in the same account, only Smerdisis omitted, as usual, because his reign was less than a year. In the reign of Darius, the third (3rd) successor of Cyrus, the rebuilding of the temple was renewed, under the exhortations of Haggai and Zechariah. "The fourth (4th) king," who is far richer than all, and stirs up all against the realm of Greece, plainly answers to Xerxes, the son and successor of Darius. Those three (3) reigns reach forward through fifty (50) years of the world's history, A.C. 534-485.

11:2. The fourth (4th) king was Xerxes. The four (4) last books of Herodotus, and the eleventh (11th) of Diodorus, are entirely occupied with his invasion of Greece. The Greek play of AEschylus, called the Persae, written within eight (8) years to celebrate the triumph of the Greeks, is useful in conveying a vivid impression of this predicted invasion. 'Willet' may be consulted, as he enters very fully into all the historical details, and gives his authorities in abundance; but his arrangement is very cumbrous; and his want of critical skill often renders his judgment valueless. He has raw materials in abundance, but seldom produces it "ready made to hand." See Quest. vi., for various opinions on the identity of this fourth (4th) king, p. 398, Edit. 1610.

11:3-5. "The mighty king who shall stand up," clearly refers to Alexander. The exposition of 'Calvin' is substantially correct throughout this chapter; it will be sufficient to add a few dates and references.

'Diodorus', lib. xviii. ch. 43, narrates the career of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, who received Egypt as his share, and successfully repelled the attacks of Perdiccas. Lib. xix. ch. 79, continues the exploits of Ptolemy. 'Justin', lib. xiii. ch. 6, and xvi. ch. 2, confirms the statement of Diodorus.

11:5. "One of his princes shall be great." This refers to Seleucus Nicator, the founder of the kingdom of Syria. His strength is related by Appian, de Bel. Syr. sect. 164, who says he could stop a bull in his career by laying hold of him by the horn. The Arabs called the era of the Seleucidae 'Dilcarnain', two-horned. —See Prideaux, Connex., part i. b. 8 ; Justin xix. ch. 12, and 55, 56, 58, 62, 90, 91, 100; Gibbon's Decline and Fall, ch. viii.; Grey on Hist. of the Seleucidae, viii. 35.

11:6-9. We have here the marriage of Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, with Antiochus Theus, the grandson of the great Seleucus. 'Birks' has drawn up an elaborate list of each king of Syria and Egypt, from B.C. 323 to 164; and states the following monarchs as referred to in the corresponding verses of this chapter; viz.,

- 5. Ptolemy Soter, and Seleucus Nicator.
- 7, 8. Ptolemy Philadelphus, and Antiochus Theus.
- 9. Ptolemy Euergetes, and Seleucus Callinicus.
- 10. Seleucus Ceraunus, and Antiochus Magnus.
- 11, 12. Ptolemy Philopator.
- 14, 17. Ptolemy Epiphanes.
- 20. Seleucus Philopator.
- 21. Antiochus Epiphanes.
- 25. Ptolemy Philometor.

He has also treated the details of the history so plainly, that we may satisfy ourselves by simply referring to chapters 6 to 11 pp. 73-171. 'Wintle's' notes are also very explanatory; both these authors supply all the 'Historical Proofs' which the reader of 'Calvin's' Daniel can require.

The annexed authorities will explain some of the historical allusions of the text. Villius, p. 298, was Publius Villius, the Roman ambassador to the court of Antiochus, who there held a conference with Hannibal.

P. Popilius Laenas, p. 317. The narrative is founded on Valerius Maximus, vi. ch. 5; Livy, xlv. ch. 12; Paterculus, i. ch. 10. 'Calvin' probably adopted this anecdote from Jerome. See Fry, vol. ii. p. 55.
 Valerius Soranus, p. 349 —a Latin poet of the period of Julius Caesar.
 Alexander, king of Syria, p. 358. The events of his career are detailed by Josephus, Ant., xiii. ch. 9.
 Physcon, p. 359. See Josephus as before, and Athenaeus, ii. ch. 23.
 Carrae, p. 364. For the death of Crassus there, see Lucan i. ver, 105, and Pliny, lib. v. c. 14." }}

Dissertation XV. Wilful King. 11:36-38.

{{ "The subject here commenced is of the deepest interest, and needs peculiar caution in its treatment. The words in which it is conveyed are obscure in themselves, and, consequently, all the early translations of them are imperfect. 'Calvin' has thrown great light upon the original phraseology, but still reference may be profitably made to some modern translators. The sixteenth (16th) chapter of the "Two Later Visions of Daniel," is occupied with this discussion; various views are clearly and fairly stated; some conjectures are refuted, and some conclusions enforced which differ very materially from 'Calvin's'. The translation of obscure passages adopted in this work are excellent, as well as those given by 'Elliott' in his notes to pages 1327 and following, of vol. iii. of his Horae Apocalypticae. Professor 'Lee's' translations are exceedingly full and explanatory, while his hermeneutical views agree more with 'Calvin's' than either Elliott's or Birks'. See his Inquiry into the Nature, Progress, and end of Prophecy, Bk. ii., chap. ii. p. 189 and following. 'Wintle's' notes are much to the point. And Bishop Newton traces the analogy between this king and Antichrist in his Dissert, vol. iii, chap. xxvi. The annexed comments from 'Birks', p. 271 and following, will explain some grammatical difficulties.

11:37. —“ He shall not regard the 'elohim' of his fathers.” The clause is ambiguous, as the word “elohim” may receive two opposite constructions. Bishop Newton and others think it to mean, the one true God; but Mede, with many able writers, render it correctly, the 'gods' of his fathers, implying the false deities of the heathens. Arguments are then given in support of this view, and objections forcibly answered. “Neither shall he regard the desire of women.” The meaning of this phrase is shortly discussed. The received view, that it refers to the Messiah, is set aside, and it is taken in the enlarged sense of despising and trampling upon these humanizing affections of which women are the object. Elliott, after a good Hebrew criticism, applies it to the Messiah, fortifying his opinion by 'Faber' on the Prophecies, pp. 380-385, vol. i., edit. v.; so 'Lee' in his preface, p. cxxvi, to Euseb. Theophania —“This occurring as it does in a context speaking of deities, was probably intended to designate the Messiah.”

11:38. —“But in his estate with 'Eloah' he will honour 'Mahuzzim'.” We now enter upon the second (2nd) part of this description, which exhibits the new worship set up by the Wilful King. Here several questions of some difficulty will arise. I will first (1st) offer what appears to me the most natural translation, and consider afterwards the chief points in dispute one by one. “But in his estate with 'Eloah', he will honour 'Mahuzzim'; even with an 'eloah' whom his fathers knew not, he will honour them with gold, and with silver, and with precious stones, and with pleasant things. And he will offer to the strongholds of 'Mahuzzim', with a foreign 'eloah' whom he will acknowledge; he will increase their glory, and will cause them to rule over many, and will divide the land for gain.” The meaning of the word 'Mahuzzim', fortresses or strongholds, is next described, and in conclusion, it is decided, that 'Mahuzzim' “must here denote guardian deities or tutelary persons, who receive worship as protectors and guardians, defences and fortresses, from their votaries.” Professor 'Lee's' translation is as follows: “But in his estate he shall honour the 'god' of forces; and a 'god' whom his fathers knew not shall he honour with gold, and silver, and with precious stones, and with pleasant things.” “Nero was the first of this series.” “Domitian was the first (1st) emperor who generally persecuted, and who, during his lifetime, assumed the title of the 'Lord God', and insisted upon being worshipped as a deity.” This is the Professor's interpretation, p. 192. The translations of 'Mede', Bishop 'Newton', and Dr. 'Gill', vary slightly from each other, but none of them are so correct as that given above. The original word, translated "offer," has very wide and various meanings. In Exodus 10:25, it is rendered "sacrifice" to the Lord our God, and is very frequently used in this sense. The words, "a foreign 'god' whom he will acknowledge," are probably an explanation of the previous phrase, "a 'god' whom his fathers knew not ;" implying that the worship of this divinity was borrowed by the Wilful King from some other nation, and was unknown to his fathers.

"Such, in conclusion," says Birks, "are the results which flow from a careful inquiry into the natural meaning of this passage. The Wilful King here described is one which might be expected to rise after the renewed persecution of the faithful, when imperial help had been given them, and to continue perhaps for ages, until the restoration of Israel. His title as the king, and the time appointed him in the words of the angel, prove him to be the same with the Little Horn, speaking great words against the most High. He will reject every form of heathen worship, commended to him by the long practice of his fathers, utter proud speeches of surprising arrogance, and of real blasphemy against the God of heaven, trample under his feet the strongest instincts of domestic love, and thus magnify himself against God and man. He will, however, adopt a foreign 'eloah' derived from the Jews for his own; but will turn the very worship he pays to the Son of God into the key-stone to a wide and spreading system of idolatry, in which he will pay reverence to a multitude of guardian powers, and cause them to receive homage and worship from his people." The comments of this able writer on verses 36–39 are so contrary to the views of 'Calvin', that it is only necessary here to state their variance with those of our Reformer. Some explanations are worthy of notice, as, for instance, the following: —"These words apply accurately to the local persecutions of believers under the Arian emperors, and the fierce and savage cruelties of the Vandals against the confessors of the faith. When, however, the time of the end, or the predicted three (3) times and a half (1/2) should begin, these persecutions would gradually become more systematic and severe. So that the prophecy at once proceeds to describe the king, who would prosper in the time of the end, and by whom the fires would be kindled afresh with more than Pagan cruelty, against the followers of God."

'Elliott' in his Horae Apocalypticae, vol. iii. p. 1294, has devoted a section to the elucidation of this chapter. His comments upon the Hebrew words of the original text are valuable, displaying great judgment, and throwing much light upon the Prophet's meaning. His chronological list of the kings of Syria and Egypt is correct, and very clearly explains the history of this prophetic period. This prophecy, he states, naturally divides itself into two (2) parts: first (1st), that from ver. 1-31, sketching the times of the Persians and Greeks; secondly (2nd), that from chap. 11:32 to the end of chap. 12, sketching the sequel. His comments upon the whole of chap. 11 to ver. 35, are illustrative of 'Calvin's' views in these Lectures; but this writer interprets ver. 36 and following, in accordance with the expositions of Mede and the two Newtons. These are so fundamentally at variance with 'Calvin's' writings, that it would be out of place to dwell upon them here. 'Elliott's' notes on the Hebrew words throughout the latter portion of this chapter are most excellent, and may be trusted as scholarlike, sound, and judicious.

Chapter 6 of the "First (1st) Elements of Sacred Prophecy" is occupied by a refutation of Dr. Todd's theory. The details of the fulfilment of each verse are plainly and accurately stated, and the objections of the Fourth (4th) Donnellan Lecture are shewn to be futile. This work is chiefly devoted to the refutation of the Futurist theories, which are directly opposite to that of 'Calvin'. See particularly pp. 135-149.

'Fry' in his 'Second (2nd) Adven', chap. v. sect. 21, has collected the views of various English Commentators, but they all vary exceedingly from those of 'Calvin'." }}

Dissertation XVI. Pollution of Sanctuary. 11:36, &c.

{{ "The various occasions on which the sanctuary was polluted by heathen foes are as follows:—

1. By Antiochus Epiphanes, when he set up the image of Jupiter Olympius on the divine altar. The daily sacrifice was then taken away, and Acra fortified so as to overlook the Temple.
2. The Romans polluted it under Pompey the Great, as recorded by 'Josephus, Antiq.', xiv. § 4, 2, 6. It was transitory and quickly repaired, although this was the first step towards the complete loss of liberty.
3. The next profanation occurred under Crassus, who carried off the gold and the treasures which Pompey had left. Eleazer the priest, who had the custody of the vail of the Temple, gave him a beam of solid gold as a ransom for the whole, and yet he afterwards carried away all the wealth of the sacred edifice. ('Antiq.', xiv. 7, 1.)
4. When Herod obtained the kingdom, A.C. 38, the Romans under Sosius took the city by storm; the Jews took refuge within the Temple, but were unmercifully massacred by their cruel foes. ('Antiq.', xiv. 16, 3.) So again a slaughter took place in the Temple by Archelaus on the first (1st) passover after Herod's death, while the cruelties of Sabinus form a similar instance. ('Wars', ii. 3, 2.)
5. When Titus pitched his camp on the Mount of Olives, and the Romans brought their ensigns within the Temple, and offered sacrifices to them. ('Wars', vi. 6, 1.)
6. During the reign of Hadrian, after the revolt of Bar chochebas, a temple was built and consecrated to Jupiter Capitolinus on the very site of the sanctuary. " }}

Dissertation XVII. Conquest of Glorious Land. 11:41.

{{ "The sober views of our Reformer form a striking contrast to the speculations of some modern writers. 'Birks', for instance, considers the spread of the Turkish power as accomplishing this verse. He quotes 'Rycault's' History of the Ottoman Kings, and considers the conquest of Thessalonica and the subjugation of Greece by Amurath II, A.D. 1432, as the intended fulfilment. In 1514, Selim the third Turkish Emperor overthrew the Sultan of Egypt, and obtained possession of Aleppo. After other victories, he turned aside to visit Jerusalem. The next verse is also supposed to predict his conquests; and the facts detailed by 'Rycault', vol. i. pp. 246-248, respecting the conquest of Judea, Arabia, and Egypt, at the commencement of the sixteenth (16th) century of the Christian era, are asserted to fulfil verses 41 to 43. The last verse of this chapter is also supposed to be accomplished by the historical events recorded by Rycault, vol. i. pp. 249-251. A similar opinion is given by the author of "The Revelation of St. John Considered," Append. i. p. 467. 'Elliott's' sentiments are similar to these, but less precise, and not very clearly expressed. 'Mede' and Bishop 'Newton' think the closing verses of this chapter remain yet unfulfilled. Professor 'Lee' treats this as accomplished by Constantine and Licinius; see pp. 195-197, and gives as his authority 'Hist. Univers', vol. xv. pp. 582-584. Before the reader has arrived at this "point of observation," he will probably have decided whether the Praeterist or the Futurist interpretations of these verses is the more acceptable to his own mind, and will value these references according to the conclusions to which he has already arrived." }}

Chapter 12th:

Dissertation XVIII. Sealing of the Book. 12:4.

{{ "It will not be necessary here to add more than a quotation from 'Hengstenberg', who answers objections with his usual success, "The command to the Prophets to shut up and seal the prophecies relates only to a symbolical action, to be understood of something internal; and after the removal of the mere drapery, the imperatives are to be resolved into futures, thus —these prophecies will be closed and sealed till the time of the end, in nearly the same manner as Zechariah (chap. 11:15) is commanded in a vision to take the instruments of a foolish shepherd, to intimate that some day ungodly rulers will ruin the people. . . . But the external acceptance of the words is still more strongly opposed by chap. 12:9. There the angel answers Daniel's request for more precise disclosures respecting the prophecy, by saying that he cannot furnish him with them because it is closed and sealed up till the last time." The objections here answered are those of 'Bertholdt', Comm., p. 795; 'De Wette'; 'Bleek', pp. 186, 207; and 'Sack', Apol., p. 285. 'Alexander', W. L., (Edinburgh,) in his Congregational Lectures, seventh series, 1841, has a short but explanatory criticism on the meaning of "to seal" and "to shut up;" see Lect. vii. p. 372. " }}

Dissertation XIX. Expressions Relative to Time. 12:11.

{{ "The variety of opinion as to the expressions of Time in this chapter renders it difficult to illustrate our author with sufficient brevity. The wisdom of the early reformers is conspicuous. 'O'Ecolampadius' agrees with 'Calvin' in treating these periods of days, as implying long and indefinite times —"multiplicatione dierum longum tempus antichristianae impietatis agnoscas" —by the multiplication of the days you will perceive the lengthened period of the antichristian impiety. 'Junius' and 'Polanus', as quoted by 'Willet', consider the days to be literal ones, and the accomplishment to have taken place during Maccabean times. He also gives the views of 'Hippolytus' and 'Nicolaus de Lyra', to whom 'Calvin' has previously referred. 'Melancthon' adds together the 1290 and the 1335 days, making seven (7) years and three (3) months, beginning B.C. 145, and ending B.C. 151, when Nicanor was overcome. 'Bullinger' understands them of the times of Antiochus, and 'Osiander' of the duration of Antichrist, but thinks this prophecy does not properly, "but by way of analogie, concern the latter times." The opinions of those modern interpreters who adopt the principles of 'Mede' will be found in the works already quoted. He reckons the years from the time of Antiochus, B.C. 167, which brings us down to the 12th century, when the Waldenses and Albigenses protested against the tyranny of the Papacy; and between the forty-five (45) years, 1123 and 1 168 A.D., a great secession occurred from the dominion of the Pope, by which he thinks the prophecy to have been fulfilled. Bishop 'Newton', Dissert. xxvi. p. 387, writes as follows, "It is, I conceive, to these great events, the fall of Antichrist, the re-establishment of the Jews, and the beginning of the glorious millennium, that the three (3) different dates in Daniel of the 1260 years, 1290 years, and 1335 years, are to be referred." Here the word "years" is used as if it occurred in the scriptural text.

Professor 'Lee' considers that the events which occurred at the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus fulfilled the prediction of ver, 1. "The children of thy people," found written in the book, are said not to be the Jews at large, but the holy remnant who embraced Jesus as Messiah, and escaped to carry the tidings of salvation to the ends of the earth. The many who slept in the dust of the earth were to awake "in a first (1st) resurrection with Christ," Rom. 6:3-6, and "some to shame and everlasting contempt, i.e., awakened to hear through the preaching of the gospel, the judgments denounced against unbelief, and to feel this in a general overthrow." The resurrection is here interpreted of our regeneration and union with the Saviour through the Spirit, and the precise period of its accomplishment is confined to the early spread of the gospel among mankind.

The "time, times, and a half" of ver. 7, "must, of necessity, signify the time that should elapse from the fall of Jerusalem, to the end of Daniel's seventieth (70th) week; for, according to the prediction enouncing this, the Temple and the City were to fall in the midst of this week," p. 199. In direct contrast to this extract, 'Elliott's' reference of this chapter to times yet future occurs in vol. ii. p. 1343. Assuming the 1260, 1290, and 1335 days to be years, the former (1st) period is said to close at the French Revolution in 1790 A.D., the second (2nd) at the Greek Revolution in 1820 A.D.; and as they are "unhesitatingly" pronounced to be all three (3) "measured from one and the same commencing epoch," the last (3rd) date must terminate A.D. 1865. 'Frere' terminates the 1290 days in A.D. 1822, and the 1335 in A.D. 1847. See his Letter dated September 9, 1848, to the Editor of the Quarterly Journal of Prophecy, October 1848. 'Wintle' refers this verse to the struggle with antichristian powers, when Michael should stand up "to defend the cause of the Jews, and to destroy the enemies of true religion." Note in loc.

'The Duke of Manchester' has devoted an Appendix to the discussion of these expressions. He justly observes; if they "are to be taken literally, then the important events of the latter part of this prophecy will be within the compass of a man's life, and will relate to the actions of an individual. If, on the other hand, the 1290 and 1335 are years, they will extend far beyond the life of any individual, and must therefore be applied, not to a person, but to a system. Thus the whole character of the prophecy will be different." "The prophecy of chapters 10-12 is not symbolical, nor even figurative, but is literal. The expression translated days in chap. 8, is different from the term rendered days in chap. 12. The character of the prophecy, chapters 10-12, is rather what we may call biographical, for it details the actions of individuals. I see no more warrant for saying the wilful king denotes a system, than for saying the vile person, or the raiser of taxes, or a dozen other kings, mentioned in the prophecy, denote systems. The genius of the prophecy, therefore, seems to require that the measure of time connected with the actions of the wilful king, should be suitable to the reign of an individual king, and not elongated into times suitable to the continuance of a system from generation to generation. 'Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the 1335 days,' seems to imply that some individuals would endure for the whole 1335 days." Thus far the noble author's remarks are completely in the spirit of 'Calvin', but a few sentences afterwards, he supposes the "abomination of desolation" to belong to the last days of the world, thus giving countenance to the Futurist expositions. The curious reader may consult a Review in "The Morning Watch," vol. v. p. 161, of 'Faber's Second Calendar of Prophecy, in which many ingenious speculations are brought forward illustrative of Daniel's expressions relative to Time. The various numbers of this work contain a multiplicity of laborious investigations of this subject, chiefly based upon the year-day theory." }}

Dissertation XX. Modern Discoveries Throwing its Light on Daniel's Prophecies. 12:13.

{{ "We now conclude these our Dissertations by a further allusion to the subject which occupied our attention in the Preface —the marble commentary on the inspired text presented by the Nineveh monuments. Three thousand (3000) years have passed over the Assyrian mounds, and at length, while we are closing our volume, the grave is giving up its dead at the call of the intellect of modern Europe. The crusted earth, beneath which Nineveh has been so long inhumed, has now revealed the monumental history of its grandeur, the imperishable witness of its incomparable renown. We must leave the interesting narrative of the discovery of these unrivalled treasures, and the description of these singular sculptures; our attention must be directed solely to the inscriptions, by the reading of which alone these monuments become available for our purpose. Had we been unable to read them, "all the excavations must have been to no purpose, and the sculptured monuments would have been worthless as the dust from which they have been torn." Well may we ask, in the language of an able review of Layard's 'second (2nd) series of monuments of Nineveh', May 16, 1853, "By what splendid accidents, then, has it happened that illumination has been thrown into the heaps, and that art, interred for 3000 years, becomes, when brought to light, in an instant as familiar to us all as though it were but the dainty work of yesterday? How comes it that these arrow-headed, or, as they are more generally styled, cuneiform characters, which bear no analogy whatever to modern writing of any kind, and which have been lost to the world since the Macedonian conquest, are read by our countrymen with a facility that commands astonishment, and a correctness that admits of no dispute? The history is very plain, but certainly as remarkable as it is simple. Fifty (50) years ago the key that has finally opened the treasure-house was picked up, unawares, by Professor Grotefend of Göttingen. In the year 1802 this scholar took it into his head to decipher some inscriptions which were, and still are to be found on the walls of Persepolis, in Persia. These inscriptions, written in three different languages, are all in the cuneiform (or wedge-like) character, and were addressed, as it now appears, to the three (3) distinct races acknowledging, in the time of Darius, the Persian sway—viz., to the Persians proper, to the Scythians, and to the Assyrians. It is worthy of remark, that although the cuneiform character is extinct, the practice of addressing these races in the language peculiar to each still prevails on the spot. The modern governor of Bagdad, when he issues his edicts, must, like the great Persian king, note down his behests in three distinct forms of language, or the Persian, the Turk, and the Arab who submit to his rule will find it difficult to possess themselves of his wishes. When Grotefend first saw the three kinds of inscription, he concluded the first to be Persian, and proceeded to his task with this conviction. He had not studied the writing long before he discerned that all the words of all the inscriptions were separated from each other by a wedge, placed diagonally at the beginning or end of each word. With this slight knowledge for his guide, he went on a little further. He next observed that in the Persian inscription one word occurred three or four times over, with a slight terminal difference. This word he concluded to be a title. Further investigation and comparison of words induced him to guess that the inscription recorded a genealogy. The assumption was a happy one. But to whom did the titles belong? With no clue whatever to help him, how should he decide? By an examination of all the authorities, ancient and modern, he satisfied himself at least of the dynasty that had founded Persepolis, and then he tried all the names of the dynasty in succession, in the hope that some would fit. He was not disappointed. The names were Hystaspes, Darius, and Xerxes. Although the actual pronunciation of these names had to be discovered, yet by the aid of the Zend (the language of the ancient Persians) and of the Greek, the true method of spelling was so nearly arrived at that no doubt of the accuracy of the guess could reasonably be entertained. The achievement had been worth the pains, for twelve (12) characters of the Persian cuneiform inscription were now well secured. Twenty-eight (28) characters remained to be deciphered before the inscriptions could be mastered. Grotefend here rested.

"The next step was taken by M. Bournouf, a scholar intimately acquainted with the Zend language. In 1836 he added considerably to the Persian cuneiform alphabet by reading twenty-four (24) names on one (1) of the inscriptions at Persepolis; but a more rapid stride was made subsequently by Professor Lassen of Bonn, who, between the years 1836 and 1844, to use the words of Mr. Fergusson, the learned and ingenious restorer of the palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis, "all but completed the task of alphabetical discovery."

"While progress was thus making in Europe, Colonel Rawlinson, stationed at Kermanshah, in Persia, and ignorant of what had already been done in the west, was arriving at similar results by a process of his own. He, too, had begun to read the Persian cuneiform character on two inscriptions at Hamadan, the ancient Ecbatana. This was in 1835. In 1837 he had been able to decipher the most extensive Persian cuneiform inscription in the world. On the high road from Babylonia to the east stands the celebrated rock of Behistun. It is almost perpendicular, and rises abruptly to the height of 1700 feet. A portion of the rock, about 300 feet from the plain, and still very perfect, is sculptured, and contains inscriptions in the three (3) languages already spoken of. The sculpture represents King Darius and the vanquished chiefs before him—the inscriptions detail the victories obtained over the latter by the Persian monarch. This monument, at least 2350 years old, deciphered for the first time by Colonel Rawlinson, gave to that distinguished Orientalist more than eighty proper names to deal with. It enabled him to form an alphabet. Between the Colonel and Professor Lassen no communication whatever had taken place, yet when their alphabets were compared they were found to differ only in one single character. The proof of the value of their discoveries was perfect.

"Thus far the 'Persian' cuneiform character! To decipher it was to take the first essential step towards reading the cuneiform inscriptions on the walls at Nineveh. But for the Persepolis walls, the Behistun rock, and Colonel Rawlinson, it would have been a physical impossibility to decipher one line of the Assyrian remains. In the Persian text only forty distinct characters had to be arrived at; and when once they were ascertained, the light afforded by the Zend, the Greek, and other aids, rendered translation not only possible, but certain to the patient and laborious student. The Assyrian alphabet, on the other hand, has no fewer than 150 letters; many of the characters are ideographs or hieroglyphics, representing a thing by a non-phonetic sign, and no collateral aids whatever exist to help the student to their interpretation. The reader will at once apprehend, however, that the moment the Persian cuneiform character on the Behistun rock was overcome, it must have been a comparatively easy task for the conqueror to break the mystery of the Assyrian cuneiform inscription, which, following the Persian writing on the rock, only repeated the same short history. Darius, who carved the monument in order to impress his victories upon his Assyrian subjects, was compelled to place before their eye the cuneiform character which they alone could comprehend. The Assyrian characters on the rock are the same as those on the bas-reliefs in the Assyrian palaces. Rawlinson, who first read the Persian inscriptions at Behistun, and then by their aid made out the adjacent Assyrian inscriptions, has handed over to Layard the firstfruits of his fortunate and splendid discovery, and enabled him for himself to ascertain and fix the value of the treasures he has so unexpectedly rescued from annihilation. As yet, as may readily be imagined, the knowledge of the Assyrian writing is not perfect; but the discovery has already survived its infancy. Another year or two of scholastic investigation, another practical visit to the ancient mounds, and the decipherment will be complete! Fortunate Englishmen Envious day-labourers in the noblest vocation that can engage the immortal faculties of man! What glory shall surpass that of the enterprising, painstaking, and heroic men who shall have restored to us, after the lapse of thousands of years, the history and actual stony presence of the world-renowned Nineveh, and enabled us to read with our own eyes, as if it were our mother tongue, the language suspended on the lips of men for ages, though written to record events in which the prophets of Almighty God took a living interest!"

The following narrative of discoveries which have been made since our Preface was written, will most appropriately close our attempt to illustrate in every possible way these valuable Lectures: — "When Mr. Layard returned to the scene of operations in 1848, he lost no time in proceeding with his excavations. During his absence a small number of men had been employed at Kouyunjik by Mr. Rassam, the English vice-consul, who, as the agent of the British Museum, had carried on the works suspended by Mr. Layard, though rather with the view of preventing interference on the part of others than of prosecuting excavations to any great extent. Mr. Rassam's labours, limited as they were, had not been fruitless. He had dug his way to new chambers, and had exposed additional sculptures. The latter were of great interest, and portrayed more completely than any yet discovered the history of an Assyrian conquest, from the going out of the monarch to battle to his triumphal return after a complete victory. The opinion formerly entertained by Mr. Layard with respect to this palace was now confirmed. He was convinced that the ruins at Kouyunjik constituted one great building, built by one and the same king. He was still further satisfied that Kouyunjik and Khorsabad were contemporary structures, and that the north-west palace at Nimroud had a much higher antiquity than either."

That portion of the subject which applies most to our purpose is the result obtained from the inscriptions with which the sculptures are accompanied. In the language of the review already quoted — "The king of Assyria himself is represented superintending the building of the mounds upon which the palace with its bulls is to be built. This king, as the cuneiform inscription shews, is Sennacherib; and the sculptures, as Rawlinson and the initiated are permitted to read, celebrate the building at Nineveh of the great palace and its adjacent temples — the work of this great king. The inscriptions on the bulls at Kouyunjik record most minutely the manner in which the edifice was built, its general plan, and the various materials employed in decorating the halls, chambers, and roofs. Some of the inscriptions have a thrilling interest. They indicate that the Jews, taken in captivity by the Assyrian king, were compelled to assist in the erection of the palaces of their conquerors, and that wood for the building was brought from Mount Lebanon, precisely as Solomon had conveyed its cedars for the choice woodwork of the temple of the Lord. There is an awful strangeness in thus being brought face to face, as it were, with the solemn mysteries of the Bible and with our own earliest sacred recollections.

“During the month of December (1848) the treasure seekers were rewarded with a rare harvest. A façade of the south-east side of the palace at Kouyunjik, forming apparently the chief entrance to the building, was discovered. It was 180 feet long, and presented no fewer than ten (10) colossal bulls, with six (6) human figures of gigantic proportions. The bulls were more or less injured; some of them were even shattered to pieces, but fortunately the lower parts of all remained untouched, and consequently the inscriptions were preserved. Two (2) of these inscriptions contained the annals of six (6) years of the reign of Sennacherib, ‘besides numerous particulars connected with the religion of the Assyrians, their ‘gods’, their temples, and the erection of their palaces.’ There can be no reasonable doubt of the accuracy of the translation made of these writings, and now given in Mr. Layard’s volume. (‘Discoveries in the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon’. Being the result of a Second (2nd) Expedition, undertaken for the Trustees of the British Museum, by Austin H. Layard, M.P. London: Murray, 1853. ‘Layard’s Monuments of Nineveh’. Second (2nd) Series. London: Murray, 1853). The very differences and variations that occur when the cuneiform character is submitted to more than one translator attest to the correctness of the general interpretation. Colonel Rawlinson has translated into English the particular inscriptions of which we speak; and Dr. Hincks, an equally competent scholar, has done the same —both independently of each other; and there is no material discrepancy in their views. The inscription informs us that in the first (1st) year of his reign Sennacherib defeated Berodach-Baladan, king of Car Duniyas, a city and country frequently mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions. It is not for the first (1st) time that the reader hears of this king, for he will remember how, when Hezekiah was sick, “at that time Berodach-Baladan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a present unto Hezekiah,” who boastfully shewed to the messengers all the treasures of his house. The Assyrian monument and holy writ thus begin to reflect light upon each other. But this is only a gleam of the illumination that follows. In the third (3rd) year of his reign, according to the inscriptions, Sennacherib overran with his armies the whole of Syria. ‘Hezekiah,’ so runs the cuneiform writing, ‘king of Judah, who had not submitted to my authority, forty-six (46) of his principal cities, and fortresses and villages depending upon them of which I took no account, I captured, and carried away their spoil. I shut up himself within Jerusalem, his capital city.’ The next passage, says Mr. Layard, is somewhat defaced, but enough remains to shew that he took from Hezekiah the treasure he had collected in Jerusalem —thirty (30) talents of gold and eight hundred (800) talents of silver, besides his sons, his daughters, and his slaves. The reader has not waited for us to remind him that in the 2nd Book of Kings it is written how “in the fourteenth (14th) year of king Hezekiah did Sennacherib, king of Assyria, come up against all the fenced cities of Judah and took them. And the king of Assyria appointed unto Hezekiah, king of Judah, three hundred (300) talents of silver and ‘Thirty (30) Talents of Gold’. And Hezekiah gave him all the silver that was found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king’s house.” It is something to have won from the earth such testimony on behalf of inspired Scripture. It is also something to have obtained from holy writ such evidence in favour of the monumental records of long-buried Nineveh.

“At a later period a chamber was discovered in which the sculptures were in better preservation than any before found at Kouyunjik. The slabs were almost entire, and the inscription was complete. The bas-reliefs represented the siege and capture, by the Assyrians, of a city of great extent and importance. “In no other sculptures were so many armed warriors seen drawn up in array before a besieged city.” The sculptures occupied thirteen (13) slabs, and told the whole narrative of the attack, the conquest, and the destruction of the enemy. The captives, as they appear in the bas-reliefs, have been stripped of their ornaments and fine raiment, are barefooted and half-clothed. But it is impossible to mistake the race to which they belong. They are Jews; for the stamp is on the countenance as it is impressed upon the features of their descendants at this very hour. The Assyrian sculptor has noted the characteristic lines and drawn them with surprising truth. To what city they belong we likewise know, for, above the figure of the king, who commands in person, it is declared, that “Sennacherib, the mighty king, king of the country of Assyria, sitting on the throne of judgment before the city of Lachish, gives permission for its slaughter." That it was slaughtered we have good reason to believe, for is it not written in the Bible that Sennacherib had quitted Lachish, having vanquished it, before his generals returned with the tribute extorted from Hezekiah?

"If evidence were still wanting to prove the identity of the king who built Kouyunjik with the Sennacherib of the Old Testament, it would be sufficient to call attention to one (1) other most remarkable discovery that has been made in these mysterious mounds. In a passage in the south-west corner of the Kouyunjik palace, Mr. Layard stumbled upon a large number of pieces of fine clay, bearing the impressions of seals, which there can be no doubt had been affixed, like modern official seals of wax, to documents written on leather or parchment. The writings themselves have, of course, decayed, but, curiously enough, the holes for the string by which the seal was fastened are still visible; and in some instances the ashes of the string itself may be seen, together with the unmistakable marks of the finger and thumb. Four (4) of these seals are purely Egyptian. Two (2) of them are impressions of a royal signet. "It is," says Mr. Layard, "one well known to Egyptian scholars, as that of the second (2nd) Sabaco, the AEthiopian of the twenty-fifth (25th) dynasty. On the same piece of clay is impressed an Assyrian seal, with a device representing a priest ministering before the king, probably a royal signet." We entreat the reader's attention to what follows. Sabaco reigned in Egypt at the end of the seventh (7th) century before Christ, the very time at which Sennacherib ascended the throne. 'He is probably the So mentioned in the 2nd Book of Kings (17:4) as having received ambassadors from Hoshea, king of Israel, who, by entering into a league with the Egyptians, called down the vengeance of Shalmaneser, whose tributary he was, which led to the first (1st) great captivity of the people of Samaria. Shalmaneser we know to have been an immediate predecessor of Sennacherib, and Tirhakah, the Egyptian king, who was defeated by the Assyrians near Lachish, was the immediate successor of Sabaco II. It would seem, that a peace having been concluded between the Egyptians and one of the Assyrian monarchs, probably Sennacherib, the royal signets of the two (2) kings, thus found together, were attached to the treaty, which was deposited among the archives of the kingdom.' The document itself has perished, but the proof of the alliance between the two (2) kings remains, and is actually reproduced from the archive-chamber of the old Assyrian king. The illustration of Scripture-history is complete, and the testimony in favour of the correct interpretation of the cuneiform character perfect."

Long as this extract is, it gives but a slight specimen of the surprising amount of scriptural illustration derived from this new and unexpected source. We add a last and final one:—"Ten (10) years have scarcely elapsed since the first discovery of ruins on the site of Nineveh was made, and already there lies before us an amount of information, having regard to the history of the old Assyrian people, of which we had previously not the most distant conception. When Mr. Layard published, in 1849, the account of his first Assyrian researches, the monuments recovered were comparatively scanty, and the inscriptions impressed upon them could not be deciphered. Now, a connected history can be traced in the sculptured remains, and the inscriptions may be followed with the same facility as the Greek or any other character. That they may be read with immense profit and instruction is evident from the startling facts which they have hitherto revealed. Some of these facts we venture briefly to place before the reader. We have previously hinted that the earliest king of whose reign we have any detailed account is the builder of the north-west palace at Nimroud, the most ancient edifice yet beheld in Assyria. His records, however, furnish the names of five (5), if not seven (7), of his predecessors, some of whom it is believed founded palaces, afterwards erected by their successors. The son of this king, it is certain, built the centre palace of Nimroud, and raised the obelisk, now in the British Museum, upon which the principal events of his reign are inscribed. Upon that obelisk are names corresponding to names that are found in the Old Testament. The fortunate coincidence furnishes at once the means of fixing specific dates, and enables Mr. Layard to place the accession of the Assyrian monarch who built the oldest Nimroud palace at the latter part of the tenth (10th) century before Christ. The builder of the palace of Khorsabad is proved to have been the Sargon mentioned by Isaiah. The ruins of his palace supply the most complete details of his reign; and from the reign of Sargon a complete list has been obtained of all the kings down to the fall of the empire. The son of Sargon was Sennacherib, who ascended the throne in the year 703 B.C. We know from the Bible that Sennacherib was succeeded by his son Esarhaddon, and we now ascertain from the monuments that one of the palaces at Nimroud was the work of his reign. The son of Esarhaddon built the south-east palace on the mound of Nimroud; and, although no part of his history has been as yet recovered, there is good reason for concluding him to have been the Sardanapalus who, conquered (B.C. 606) by the Medes and Babylonians under Cyaxares, made one funeral pile of his palace, his wealth, and his wives.

"While it is certain that there is no mention of Nineveh before the 12th century B.C., Mr. Layard is still of opinion that the city and empire existed long before that period. Egyptian remains found at Karnak refer to a country called Assyria, and the enterprising explorer is not without hope that further investigation will supply him with still more ancient records than any he now possesses. The monuments of Nineveh, as far as they go, corroborate all extant history in describing the monarch as a thorough Eastern despot, 'unchecked by popular opinion, and having complete power over the lives and property of his subjects; rather adored as a god than feared as a man, and yet himself claiming that authority and general obedience in virtue of his reverence for the national deities and the national religion.'" The dominion of the king, according to the inscriptions, extended to the central provinces of Asia Minor and Armenia northward; to the western provinces of Persia eastward; to the west as far as Lydia and Syria; and to the south to Babylonia and the northern part of Arabia. 'The empire appears to have been at all times a kind of confederation formed by many tributary States, whose kings were so far independent that they were only bound to furnish troops to the supreme lord in time of war, and to pay him yearly a certain tribute.'

The Jewish tribes, it is now proved, held their dependent position upon the Assyrian king from a very early period; and it is curious to observe that, wherever an expedition against the kings of Israel is mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions, it is invariably stated to have been undertaken on the ground that they had not paid their customary tribute.

"At every step sacred history is illustrated, illuminated, and explained by the speaking stones of Nineveh; and in this regard alone the Assyrian discoveries have a significance beyond any revelation that has been made in modern times. Even the architecture of the sacred people may be rendered visible to the eye by comparing it with that of the Assyrian structures; and certainly not the least instructive result of all Mr. Layard's labours is the ingenious analogy drawn by Mr. Fergusson in his 'Palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis Restored,' between the temple of Solomon and the palace of the Assyrian king." }

3. Newton

Observations upon the Prophecies of Daniel & the Apocalypse of St. John. In Two Parts. By Sir Isaac Newton. Lon. JDTB. 1733. gs. (The original italics & archaic spellings have been retained as much as possible; the archaic 's' that looked like a 'f' has been changed whenever found. In the PDF or Word format the original italics are reproduced, but to indicate them in 'text format' I have added single quotes.) (The original italics & archaic spellings have been retained as much as possible; the archaic 's' that looked like a 'f' has been changed whenever found. In the PDF or Word format the original italics are reproduced, but to indicate them in 'text format' I have added single quotes.)

Contents: Part I: Observations upon the Prophecies of 'Daniel'.

Chapters:

I. Introduction: Compilers of Books of Old Testament.

II. Prophetic Language.

III. Vision of Image Composed of Four (4) Metals.

IV. Vision of Four (4) Beasts.

V. Kingdoms Represented by Feet of Image Composed of Iron & Clay.

VI. Ten (10) Kingdoms Represented by Ten (10) Horns of Fourth (4th) Beast.

VH. Eleventh Horn of 'Daniel's' Fourth (4th) Beast.

VIII. Power of Eleventh (11th) Horn of 'Daniel's' Fourth (4th) Beast, to Change Times & Laws.

IX. Kingdoms Represented in 'Daniel' by Ram & He-Goat.

X. Prophecy of Seventy (70) Weeks.

XI. Times of the Birth & Passion of 'Christ'.

XII. Prophecy of Scripture of Truth.

XIII. "King who did according to his will, & magnified himself above every 'God', & honoured 'Mahuzzims', & regarded not the desire of women".

XIV. "Mahuzzims", honoured by the King who doth according to his will'.

I. Introduction: Compilers of Books of Old Testament.

{{ "When Manasses set up a carved image in the house of the Lord, and built altars in the two (2) courts of the house, to all the host of Heaven, and us'd enchantments and witchcraft, and familiar spirits, and for his great wickedness was invaded by the army of 'Asserhadon' King of 'Assyria', and carried captive to 'Babylon'; the book of the Law was lost till the eighteenth (18th) year of his grandson 'Josiah'. Then 'Hilkiah' the High Priest, upon repairing the Temple, found it there: and the King lamented that their lathers had not done after the words of the book, and commanded that it mould be read to the people, and caused the people to renew the holy covenant with God. This is the book of the Law now extant.

When 'Shishak' came out of 'Egypt' and spoiled the temple, and brought 'Judah' into subjection to the monarchy of 'Egypt', (which was in the fifth (5th) year of 'Rehoboam') the 'Jews' continued under great troubles for about twenty years; being without the true God, and without a teaching Priest, and without Law: and in those times there was no peace to him that went out, nor to him that came in, but great vexations were upon all the inhabitants of the countries, and nation was destroyed of nation, and city of city, for God did vex them with all adversity'. But when 'Shishak' was dead, and 'Egypt' fell into troubles, 'Judah' had quiet ten (10) years; and in that time 'Asa' built fenced cities in 'Judah', and got up an army of 580,000 (over 1/2 million) men, with which, in the 15th year of his reign, he met and overcame 'Zerah' the 'Ethiopian', who had conquered 'Egypt' and 'Lybia', and 'Troglodytica', and came out with an army of 1,00,000 (1 million) 'Lybians' and 'Ethiopians', to recover the countries conquered by 'Sesac'. And after this victory 'Asa' dethroned his mother for idolatry, and he renewed the Altar, and brought new vessels of gold and silver into the Temple; and he and the people entered into a new covenant to seek the Lord God of their fathers, upon pain of death to those who worshiped other 'Gods'; and his son 'Jehosaphat' took away the high places, and in the third (3rd) year of his reign sent some of his Princes, and of the Priests and Levites, to teach in the cities of 'Judah': and they had the book of the Law with them, and went about throughout all the cities of Judah, and taught the people. This is that book of the Law which was afterwards lost in the reign of 'Manasses', and found again in the reign of 'Josiah', and therefore it was written before the third (3rd) year of 'Jehosaphat'.

The same book of the Law was preserved and handed down to posterity by the 'Samaritans', and therefore was received by the ten (10) Tribes before their captivity. For when the ten (10) Tribes were captivated, a Priest of the captivity was sent back to 'Bethel', by order of the King of 'Assyria', to instruct the new inhabitants of 'Samaria', in 'the manner of the 'God' of the land'; and the 'Samaritans' had the 'Pentateuch' from this Priest, as containing the law or 'manner of the God of the land', which he was to teach them. For they persevered in the religion which he taught them, joining with it the worship of their own 'Gods'; and by persevering in what they had been taught, they preserved this book of their Law in the original character of the 'Hebrews', while the two (2) Tribes, after their return from 'Babylon' changed the character to that of the 'Chaldees', which they had learned at 'Babylon'.

And since the 'Pentateuch' was received as the book of the Law, both by the two (2) Tribes and by the ten (10) Tribes, it follows that they received it before they became divided into two (2) Kingdoms. For after the division, they received not laws from one another, but continued at variance. 'Judah' could not reclaim 'Israel' from the sin of 'Jeroboam', and 'Israel' could not bring Judah to it. The 'Pentateuch' therefore was the book of the Law in the days of 'David' and 'Solomon'. The affairs of the Tabernacle and Temple were ordered by 'David' and 'Solomon', according to the Law of this book; and 'David' in the 78th 'Psalm', admonishing the people to give ear to the Law of God, means the Law of this book. For in describing how their forefathers kept it not, he quotes many historical things out of the books of 'Exodus' and 'Numbers' [& 'Deuteronomy'].

The race of the Kings of 'Edom', before there reigned any King over 'Israel', is set down in the book of 'Genesis', and therefore that book was not written entirely in the form now extant, before the reign of 'Saul'. The writer set down the race of those Kings till his own time, and therefore wrote before 'David' conquered 'Edom'. The 'Pentateuch' is composed of the Law and the history of Gods people together, and the history hath been collected from several books, such as were the history of the Creation composed by 'Moses', 'Gen'. 2:4; the book of the generations of 'Adam', 'Gen'. 5:1; and the book of the wars of the Lord, 'Num'. 21:14. This book of wars contained what was done at the 'Red-sea', and in the journeying of 'Israel' thro' the Wilderness, and therefore was begun by 'Moses'. And 'Joshua' might carry it on to the conquest of 'Canaan'. For 'Joshua' wrote some things in the book of the Law of God, 'Josh'. 24:26; and therefore might write his own wars in the book of wars, thole being the principal wars of God. These were publick books, and therefore not written without the authority of 'Moses' and 'Joshua'. And 'Samuel' had leisure in the reign of 'Saul', to put them into the form of the books of 'Moses' and 'Joshua' now extant, inserting into the book of 'Genesis', the race of the Kings of 'Edom', until there reigned a King in 'Israel'.

The book of the 'Judges' is a continued history of the 'Judges' down to the death of 'Samson', and therefore was compiled after his death, out of the Acts of the 'Judges'. Several things in this book are said to be done when there was no King in 'Israel', 'Judg'. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25; and therefore this book was written after the beginning of the reign of 'Saul'. When it was written, the 'Jebusites' dwelt in 'Jerusalem', 'Jud'. 1:11, and therefore it was written before the eighth (8th) year of 'David', 2nd 'Sam'. 5:8, and 1st 'Chron'. 11:6. The books of 'Moses', 'Joshua', and 'Judges', contain one continued history, down from the Creation to the death of 'Samson'. Where the 'Pentateuch' ends, the book of 'Joshua' begins, and where the book of 'Joshua' ends, the book of 'Judges' begins. Therefore all these books have been composed out of the writings of 'Moses', 'Joshua', and other records, by one (1) and the same hand, after the beginning of the reign of 'Saul', and before the eighth (8th) year of 'David'. And 'Samuel' was a sacred writer, 1st 'Sam'. 10:25, acquainted with the history of 'Moses' and the 'Judges', 1st 'Sam'. 12:8, 9,10,11,12; and had leisure in the reign of 'Saul', and sufficient authority to compose these books. He was a Prophet, and judged 'Israel' all the days of his life, and was in the greatest esteem with the people; and the Law by which he was to judge the people was not to be published by less authority than his own, the Law-maker being not inferior to the judge. And the book of 'Jasher', which is quoted in the book of 'Joshua', 'Josh'. 10:13, was in being at the death of 'Saul', 2nd 'Sam'. 1:18.

At the dedication of the Temple of 'Solomon', when the Ark was brought into the most holy place, there was nothing in it but the two (2) tables, 1st 'Kings' 8:9, and therefore when the 'Philistines' took the Ark, they took out of it the book of the Law, and the golden pot of Manna, and 'Aarons' Rod. And this and other losses in the desolation of 'Israel', by the conquering 'Philistines', might give occasion to 'Samuel', after some respite from those enemies, to recollect the scattered writings of 'Moses' and 'Joshua', and the records of the Patriarchs and 'Judges', and compose them, in the form now extant.

The book of 'Ruth' is a history of things done in the days of the 'Judges', and may be looked upon as an addition to the book of the 'Judges', written by the same author, and at the same time. For it was written after the birth of 'David', 'Ruth' 4:17, 11, and not long after, because the history of 'Boaz' and 'Ruth', the great grandfather and great grandmother of 'David', and that of their contemporaries, could not well be remembered above two (2) or three (3) generations. And since this book derives the genealogy of 'David' from 'Boaz' and 'Ruth', and omits 'David's' elder brothers and his sons; it was written in honour of 'David', after he was anointed King by 'Samuel', and before he had children in 'Hebron', and by consequence in the reign of 'Saul'. It proceeds not to the history of 'David', and therefore seems to have, been written presently after he was anointed. They judge well therefore who ascribe to 'Samuel' the books of 'Joshua', 'Judges', and 'Ruth'.

'Samuel' is also reputed the author of the first (1st) book of 'Samuel', till the time of his death. The two books of 'Samuel' cite no authors, and therefore seem to be originals. They begin with his genealogy, birth and education, and might be written partly in his life-time by himself, or his disciples the Prophets at 'Naioth' in 'Ramah', 1st 'Sam'. 19:18, 19,20, and partly after his death by the same disciples.

The books of the 'Kings' cite other authors, as the book of the Acts of 'Solomon', the book of the 'Chronicles' of the Kings of 'Israel', and the book of the 'Chronicles' of the Kings of 'Judah'. The books of the 'Chronicles' cite the book of 'Samuel' the Seer, the book of 'Nathan' the Prophet, and the book of 'Gad' the Seer, for the Acts of 'David'; the book of 'Nathan' the Prophet, the Prophecy of 'Ahijah' the 'Shilonite', and the visions of 'Iddo' the Seer, for the Acts of 'Solomon', the book of 'Shemajah' the Prophet, and the book of 'Iddo' the Seer concerning genealogies, for the Acts of 'Rehoboam' and 'Abijah'; the book of the Kings of 'Judah' and 'Israel' for the Acts of 'Asa', 'Joash', 'Amaziah', 'Jotham', 'Ahaz', 'Hezekiah', 'Manasseh', and 'Josiah'; the book of 'Hanani' the Seer, for the Acts of 'Jehosaphat'; and the visions of 'Isaiah' for the Acts of 'Uzziah' and 'Hezekiah'. These books were therefore collected out of the historical writings of the antient Seers and Prophets. And because the books of the 'Kings' and 'Chronicles' quote one another, they were written at one (1) and the same time. And this time was after the return from the 'Babylonian' captivity, because they bring down the history of 'Judah', and the genealogies of the Kings of 'Judah', and of the High Priests, to that captivity. The book of 'Ezra' was originally a part of the book of the 'Chronicles', and has been divided from it. For it begins with the two (2) last verses of the books of 'Chronicles', and the first (1st) book of 'Esdras' begins with the two (2) last chapters thereof. 'Ezra' was therefore the compiler of the books of 'Kings' and 'Chronicles', and brought down the history to his own time. He was a ready Scribe in the Law of God; and for assisting him in this work 'Nehemias' founded a library, and gathered together the Acts of the 'Kings' and the 'Prophets', and of 'David', and the Epistles of the Kings concerning the holy gifts, 2nd 'Maccab'. 2:15. By the Acts of 'David' I understand here the two (2) books of 'Samuel', or at least the second (2nd) book. Out of the Acts of the 'Kings', written from time to time by the Prophets, he compos'd the books of the Kings of 'Judah' and 'Israel', the 'Chronicles' of the Kings of 'Judah', and the 'Chronicles' of the Kings of 'Israel'. And in doing this he joined those Acts together, in due order of time, copying the very words of the authors, as is manifest from hence, that the books of the 'Kings' and 'Chronicles' frequently agree with one another in words for many sentences together. Where they agree in senses there they agree in words also.

So the Prophecies of 'Isaiahs' written at several times, he has collected into one body. And the like he did for those of 'Jeremiah', and the rest of the Prophets [i.e. 'Ezekiel' & the Minor Prophets], down to the days of the second (2nd) Temple. The book of 'Jonah' is the history of 'Jonah' written by another hand. The book of 'Daniel' is a collection of papers written at several times. The six (6) last chapters contain Prophecies written at several times by 'Daniel' himself: the six (6) first are a collection of historical papers written by others. The fourth (4th) chapter is a decree of 'Nebuchadnezzar'. The first (1st) chapter was written after 'Daniel's' death: for the author saith, that 'Daniel' continued to the first (1st) year of 'Cyrus'; that is, to his first (1st) year over the 'Persians' and 'Medes', and third (3rd) year over 'Babylon'. And, for the same reason, the fifth (5th) and sixth (6th) chapters were also written after his death. For they end with these words: "So this 'Daniel' prospered in the reign of 'Darius', and in the reign of 'Cyrus' the 'Persian'". Yet these words might be added by the collector of the papers, whom I take to be 'Ezra'.

The Psalms composed by 'Moses', 'David', and others, seem to have been also collected by 'Ezra' into one (1) volume. I reckon him the collector, because in this collection I meet with Psalms as late as the 'Babylonian' captivity, but with none later.

After these things 'Antiochus Epiphanes' spoiled the Temple, commanded the 'Jews' to forsake the Law upon pain of death, and caused the sacred books to be burnt wherever they could be found: and in these troubles the book of the 'Chronicles' of the Kings of 'Israel' was entirely lost. But upon recovering from this oppression, 'Judas Maccabæus' gathered together all those writings that were to be met with, 2nd Maccab'. 2:14. and in reducing them into order, part of the Prophecies of 'Isaiah', or some other Prophet, have been added to the end of the Prophecies of 'Zechariah'; and the book of 'Ezra' has been separated from the book of 'Chronicles', and set together in two (2) different orders; in one (1) order in the book of 'Ezra', received into the Canon, and in another order in the first (1st) book of 'Esdras'.

After the 'Roman' captivity, the 'Jews' for preserving their traditions, put them in writing in their 'Talmud', and for preserving their scriptures, agreed upon an Edition, and pointed it, and counted the letters of every sort in every book: and by preserving only this Edition, the antienter various lections, except what can be discovered by means of the 'Septuagint' Version, are now lost; and such marginal notes, or other corruptions, as by the errors of the transcribers, before this Edition was made, had crept into the text, are now scarce to be corrected.

The 'Jews' before the 'Roman' captivity, distinguished the sacred books into the Law, the Prophets, and the 'Hagiographa', or holy writings; and read only the Law and the Prophets in their Synagogues. And Christ and His Apostles laid the stress of religion upon the Law and the Prophets, 'Matt'. 7:12; 22:4; 'Luke' 16:16, 29, 31; 24:44; 'Acts' 24:14; 26:22; 'Rom'. 3:21. By the 'Hagiographa' they meant the historical books called 'Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah', and 'Esther', the book of 'Job', the 'Psalms', the books of 'Solomon', and the 'Lamentations'. The 'Samaritans' read only the 'Pentateuch': and when 'Jehosaphat' sent men to teach in the cities, they had with them only the book of the Law; for the Prophecies now extant were not then written. And upon the return from the 'Babylonian' captivity, 'Ezra' read only the book of the Law to the people, from morning to noon on the first day of the seventh month; and from day to day in the feast of Tabernacles: for he had not yet collected the writings of the Prophets into the volume now extant; but instituted the reading of them after the collection was made. By reading the Law and the Prophets in the Synagogues, those books have been kept freer from corruption than the 'Hagiographa'.

In the infancy of the nation of 'Israel', when God had given them a Law, and made a covenant with them to be their God if they would keep his commandments, he sent Prophets to reclaim them, as often as they revolted to the worship of other Gods: and upon their returning to him, they sometimes renewed the covenant which they had broken. These Prophets he continued to send, till the days of 'Ezra': but after their Prophecies were read in the Synagogues, those Prophecies were thought sufficient. For if the people would not hear 'Moses' and the old Prophets, they would hear no new ones, no not 'tho they should rise from the dead'. At length when a new truth was to be preached to the 'Gentiles', namely, 'that Jesus was the Christ', God sent new Prophets and Teachers: but after their writings were also received and read in the Synagogues of the Christians, Prophecy ceased a second time. We have 'Moses', the Prophets, and Apostles, and the words of Christ Himself; and if we will not hear them, we shall be more inexcusable than the 'Jews'. For the Prophets and Apostles have foretold, that as 'Israel' often revolted and brake the covenant, and upon repentance renewed it; so there should be a falling away among the Christians, soon after the days of the Apostles; and that in the latter days God would destroy the impenitent revolvers, and make a new covenant with His people. And the giving ear to the Prophets is a fundamental character of the true Church. For God has so ordered the Prophecies, that in the latter days 'the wise may understand, but the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand', Dan. 12:9,10. The authority of Emperors, Kings, and Princes, is human. The authority of Councils, Synods, Bishops, and Presbyters, is human. The authority of the Prophets is divine, and comprehends the sum of religion, reckoning 'Moses' and the Apostles among the Prophets; and 'if an Angel from Heaven preach any other gospel', than what they have delivered, 'let him be accursed'. Their writings contain the covenant between God and His people, with instructions for keeping this covenant; instances of God's judgments upon them that break it: and predictions of things to come. While the people of God keep the covenant, they continue to be His people: when they break it they cease to be His people or church, and become 'the Synagogue of Satan, who say they are Jews and are not'. And no power on earth is authorized to alter this covenant.

'The predictions of things to come relate to the state of the Church in all ages: and amongst the old Prophets, 'Daniel' is most distinct in order of time, and easiest to be understood: and therefore in those things which relate to the last times, he must be made the key to the rest.' (Notes to Chap. I: 2nd Chron. 33:5, 6,7; 34; 12:2, 3,4, 8,9; & 15:3, 5,6; 14:1, 6,7, 8,9, 12; 15:3, 12,13, 16, 18. 2nd Kings 17:27,28, 32, 33; 17:34, 41. Gen. 36:31.) }}

II. Prophetic Language.

{{ "For understanding the Prophecies, we are, in the first place, to acquaint our-selves with the figurative language of the Prophets. This language is taken from the analogy between the world natural, and an empire or kingdom considered as a world politic.

Accordingly, the whole world natural consisting of heaven and earth, signifies the whole world politic, consisting of thrones and people, or so much of it as is considered in the Prophecy: and the things in that world signify the analogous things in this. For the heavens, and the things therein, signify thrones and dignities, and those who enjoy them; and the earth, with the things thereon, the inferior people; and the lowest parts of the earth, called 'Hades' or Hell, the lowest or most miserable part of them. Whence ascending towards heaven, and descending to the earth, are put for rising and falling in power and honour: rising out of the earth, or waters, and falling into them, for the rising up to any dignity or dominion, out of the inferior state of the people, or falling down from the same into that inferior state; descending into the lower parts of the earth, for descending to a very low and unhappy estate; speaking with a faint voice out of the dust, for being in a weak and low condition; moving from one place to another, for translation from one office, dignity, or dominion, to another; great earthquakes, and the shaking of heaven and earth, for the shaking of kingdoms, so as to distract or overthrow them; the creating a new heaven and earth, and the passing away of an old one, or the beginning and end of the world, for the rise and ruin of the body politic signified thereby. [Compare this doctrine of 'analogy' between the 'world natural' & the 'world politic' with Swedenborg's 'correspondence' between the 'natural world' & the 'spiritual world' with their Heavens & Hells.]

In the heavens, the Sun and Moon are, by interpreters of dreams, put for the persons of Kings and Queens; but in sacred Prophecy, which regards not single persons, the Sun is put for the whole species and race of Kings, in the kingdom or kingdoms of the world politic, shining with regal power and glory; the Moon for the body of the common people, considered as the King's wife; the Stars for subordinate Princes and great men, or for Bishops and Rulers of the people of God, when the Sun is Christ; light for the glory, truth, and knowledge, wherewith great and good men shine and illuminate others; darkness for obscurity of condition, and for error, blindness and ignorance; darkning, smiting, or setting of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, for the ceasing of a kingdom, or for the desolation thereof, proportional to the darkness; darkning the Sun, turning the Moon into blood, and falling of the Stars, for the same; new Moons, for the return of a dispersed people into a body politic or ecclesiastic.

Fire and meteors refer to both heaven and earth, and signify as follows; burning any thing with fire, is put for the consuming thereof by war; a conflagration of the earth, or turning a country into a lake of fire, for the consumption of a kingdom by war; the being in a furnace, for the being in slavery under another nation; the ascending up of the smoke of any burning thing for ever and ever, for the continuation of a conquered people under the misery of perpetual subjection and slavery; the scorching heat of the sun, for vexatious wars, persecutions and troubles inflicted by the King; riding on the clouds, for reigning over much people; covering the sun with a cloud, or with smoke, for oppression of the King by the armies of an enemy; tempestuous winds, or the motion of clouds, for wars; thunder, or the voice of a cloud, for the voice of a multitude; a storm of thunder, lightning, hail, and overflowing rain, for a tempest of war descending from the heavens and clouds politic, on the heads of their enemies; rain, if not immoderate, and dew, and living water, for the graces and doctrines of the Spirit; and the defect of rain, for spiritual barrenness.

In the earth, the dry land and congregated waters, as a sea, a river, a flood, are put for the people of several regions, nations, and dominions; embittering of waters, for great affliction of the people by war and persecution; turning things into blood, for the mystical death of bodies politic, that is, for their dissolution; the overflowing of a sea or river, for the invasion of the earth politic, by the people of the waters; drying up of waters, for the conquest of their regions by the earth; fountains of waters for cities, the permanent heads of rivers politic; mountains and islands, for the cities of the earth and sea politic, with the territories and dominions belonging to those cities; dens and rocks of mountains, for the temples of cities; the hiding of men in those dens and rocks, for the shutting up of Idols in their temples; houses and ships, for families, assemblies, and towns, in the earth and sea politic; and a navy of ships of war, for an army of that kingdom that is signified by the sea.

Animals also and vegetables are put for the people of several regions and conditions; and particularly, trees, herbs, and land animals, for the people of the earth politic: flags, reeds, and fishes, for those of the waters politic; birds and insects, for those of the politic heaven and earth; a forest for a kingdom; and a wilderness for a desolate and thin people.

If the world politic, considered in prophecy, consists of many kingdoms, they are represented by as many parts of the world natural; as the noblest by the celestial frame, and then the Moon and Clouds are put for the common people; the less noble, by the earth, sea, and rivers, and by the animals or vegetables, or buildings therein; and then the greater and more powerful animals and taller trees, are put for Kings, Princes, and Nobles. And because the whole kingdom is the body politic of the King, therefore the Sun, or a Tree, or a Beast, or Bird, or a Man, whereby the King is represented, is put in a large signification for the whole kingdom; and several animals, as a Lion, a Bear, a Leopard, a Goat, according to their qualities, are put for several kingdoms and bodies politic; and sacrificing of beasts, for slaughtering and conquering of kingdoms; and friendship between beasts, for peace between kingdoms. Yet sometimes vegetables and animals are, by certain epithets or circumstances, extended to other significations; as a Tree, when called the 'tree of life or of knowledge'; and a Beast, when called 'the old serpent', or worshipped.

When a Beast or Man is put for a kingdom, his parts and qualities are put for the analogous parts and qualities of the kingdom; as the head of a Beast, for the great men who precede and govern; the tail for the inferior people, who follow and are governed; the heads, if more than one, for the number of capital parts, or dynasties, or dominions in the kingdom, whether collateral or successive, with respect to the civil government; the horns on any head, for the number of kingdoms in that head, with respect to military power; seeing for understanding, and the eyes for men of understanding and policy, and in matters of religion for 'Επισκοποι' ('Episkopoi'), Bishops; speaking, for making laws; the mouth, for a law-giver, whether civil or sacred; the loudness of the voice, for might and power; the faintness thereof, for weakness; eating and drinking, for acquiring what is signified by the things eaten and drank; the hairs of a beast, or man, and the feathers of a bird, for people; the wings, for the number of kingdoms represented by the beast; the arm of a man, for his power, or for any people wherein his strength and power consists; his feet, for the lowest of the people, or for the latter end of the kingdom; the feet, nails, and teeth of beasts of prey, for armies and squadrons of armies; the bones, for strength, and for fortified places; the flesh, for riches and possessions; and the days of their acting, for years; and when a tree is put for a kingdom, its branches, leaves and fruit, signify as do the wings, feathers, and food of a bird or beast.

When a man is taken in a mystical sense, his qualities are often signified by his actions, and by the circumstances of things about him. So a Ruler is signified by his riding on a beast; a Warrior and Conqueror, by his having a sword and bow; a potent man, by his gigantic stature; a Judge, by weights and measures; a sentence of absolution, or condemnation, by a white or a black stone; a new dignity, by a new name; moral or civil qualifications, by garments; honour and glory, by splendid apparel; royal dignity, by purple or scarlet, or by a crown; righteousness, by white and clean robes; wickedness, by spotted and filthy garments; affliction, mourning, and humiliation, by clothing in sackcloth; dishonour, shame, and want of good works, by nakedness; error and misery, by drinking a cup of his or her wine that causeth it; propagating any religion for gain, by exercising traffick and merchandize with that people whose religion it is; worshipping or serving the false Gods of any nation, by committing adultery with their princes, or by worshipping them; a Council of a kingdom, by its image; idolatry, by blasphemy; overthrow in war, by a wound of man or beast; a durable plague of war, by a sore and pain; the affliction or persecution which a people suffers in labouring to bring forth a new kingdom, by the pain of a woman in labour to bring forth a man-child; the dissolution of a body politic or ecclesiastic, by the death of a man or beast; and the revival of a dissolved dominion, by the resurrection of the dead." }}

III. Vision of Image Composed of Four (4) Metals.

{{ "The Prophecies of 'Daniel' are all of them related to one another, as if they were but several parts of one general Prophecy, given at several times. The first is the easiest to be understood, and every following Prophecy adds something new to the former. The first was given in a dream to 'Nebuchadnezzar', King of 'Babylon', in the second (2nd) year of his reign; but the King forgetting his dream, it was given again to 'Daniel' in a dream, and by him revealed to the King. And thereby, 'Daniel' presently became famous for wisdom, and revealing of secrets: insomuch that 'Ezekiel' his contemporary, in the nineteenth year of 'Nebuchadnezzar', spake thus of him to the King of 'Tyre': 'Behold', saith he, 'thou art wiser than 'Daniel', there is no secret that they can hide from thee', Ezek. xxviii. 28:3. And the same 'Ezekiel', in another place, joins 'Daniel' with 'Noah' and 'Job', as most high in the favour of God, Ezek. 14:14, 16, 18, 20. And in the last year of 'Belshazzar', the Queen-mother said of him to the King: 'Behold there is a man in thy kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy 'gods'; and in the days of thy father, light and understanding and wisdom, like the wisdom of the 'gods', was found in him; whom the king 'Nebuchadnezzar' thy father, the king, I say, thy father made master of the magicians, astrologers, 'Chaldeans' and soothsayers: forasmuch as an excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, interpreting of dreams, and shewing of hard sentences, and dissolving of doubts, were found in the same 'Daniel', whom the king named 'Belteshazzar'", Dan. 5:11,12. 'Daniel' was in the greatest credit amongst the 'Jews', till the reign of the 'Roman' Emperor 'Hadrian': and to reject his Prophecies, is to reject the Christian religion. For this religion is founded upon his Prophecy concerning the 'Messiah'".

Now in this vision of the Image composed of four (4) Metals, the foundation of all 'Daniel's' Prophecies is laid. It represents a body of four (4) great nations, which should reign over the earth successively, 'viz'. the people of 'Babylonia', the 'Persians', the 'Greeks', and the 'Romans'. And by a stone cut out without hands, which fell upon the feet of the Image, and brake all the four (4) Metals to pieces, and 'became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth'; it further represents that a new kingdom should arise, after the four (4), and conquer all those nations, and grow very great, and last to the end of all ages.

The head of the Image was of gold, and signifies the nations of 'Babylonia', who reigned first, as 'Daniel' himself interprets. 'Thou art this head of gold'", saith he to 'Nebuchadnezzar'. These nations reigned till 'Cyrus' conquered 'Babylon', and within a few months after that conquest revolted to the 'Persians', and set them up above the 'Medes'. The breast and arms of the Image were of silver, and represent the 'Persians' who reigned next. The belly and thighs of the Image were of brass, and represent the Greeks, who, under the dominion of 'Alexander' the great, conquered the 'Persians', and reigned next after them. The legs were of iron, and represent the 'Romans' who reigned next after the 'Greeks', and began to conquer them in the eighth (8th) year of 'Antiochus Epiphanes'. For in that year they conquered 'Perseus' King of 'Macedon', the fundamental kingdom of the 'Greeks'; and from thence forward grew into a mighty empire, and reigned with great power till the days of 'Theodosius' the great. Then by the incursion of many northern nations, they brake into many smaller kingdoms, which are represented by the feet and toes of the Image, composed part of iron, and part of clay. For then, saith 'Daniel, the kingdom shall be divided, and there shall be in it of the strength of iron, but they shall not cleave one (1) to another (1)'. 'And in the days of these Kings, saith 'Daniel', shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people; but it shall break in pieces, and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountains without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver and the gold'. (Notes to Chap. III: Chap. 2:41, &c.)" }}

IV: Vision of the Four (4) Beasts.

{{ "In the next vision, which is of the four (4) Beasts, the Prophecy of the four (4) Empires is repeated, with several new additions; such as are the two (2) wings of the Lion, the three (3) ribs in the mouth of the Bear, the four (4) wings and four (4) heads of the Leopard, the eleven (11) horns of the fourth (4) Beast, and the son of man coming in the clouds of Heaven, to the Antient of Days sitting in judgment.

The first (1st) Beast was like a lion, and had eagle's wings, to denote the kingdoms of 'Babylonia' and 'Media', which overthrew the 'Assyrian' Empire, and divided it between them, and thereby became considerable, and grew into great Empires. In the former Prophecy, the Empire of 'Babylonia' was represented by the head of gold; in this both Empires are represented together by the two (2) wings of the lion. 'And I beheld', saith 'Daniel, till the wings thereof were pluckt, and it was lifted up from the earth, and made to stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart was given to it'; that is, till it was humbled and subdued, and made to know its human state.

The second (2nd) Beast was like a bear, and represents the Empire which reigned next after the 'Babylonians', that is, the Empire of the 'Persians'. 'Thy kingdom is divided', or broken, saith 'Daniel' to the last King of 'Babylon', 'and given to the Medes and Persians', 'Dan'. v. 28. This Beast 'raised itself up on one side'; the 'Persians' being under the 'Medes' at the fall of 'Babylon', but presently rising up above them. 'And it had three ribs in the mouth of it, between the teeth of it', to signify the kingdoms of 'Sardes', 'Babylon', and 'Egypt', which were conquered by it, but did not belong to its proper body. And it devoured much flesh, the riches of those three (3) kingdoms.

The third (3rd) Beast was the kingdom which succeeded the 'Persian'; and this was the empire of the 'Greeks', 'Dan'. 8:6,7, 20,21. It was 'like a Leopard', to signify its fierceness; and had four (4) heads and four (4) wings, to signify that it should become divided into four (4) kingdoms, 'Dan'. 8:22 for it continued in a monarchical form during the reign of 'Alexander' the great, and his brother 'Aridæus', and young sons 'Alexander' and 'Hercules'; and then brake into four (4) kingdoms, by the governors of provinces putting crowns on their own heads, and by mutual consent reigning over their provinces. 'Cassander' reigned over 'Macedon', 'Greece', and 'Epirus'; 'Lysimachus' over 'Thrace' and 'Bithynia'; 'Ptolemy' over 'Egypt', 'Lybia', 'Arabia', 'Cælosyria', and 'Palestine'; and 'Seleucus' over 'Syria'.

The fourth (4th) Beast was the empire which succeeded that of the 'Greeks', and this was the 'Roman'. This beast was exceeding dreadful and terrible, and had great iron teeth, and devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with its feet; and such was the 'Roman' empire. It was larger, stronger, and more formidable and lasting than any of the former. It conquered the kingdom of 'Macedon', with 'Illyricum' and 'Epirus', in the eighth (8th) year of 'Antiochus Epiphanes, Anno Nabonass'. 580; and inherited that of 'Pergamus, Anno Nabonass'. 615; and conquered that of 'Syria, Anno Nabonass'. 679, and that of 'Egypt, Anno Nabonass'. 718. And by these and other conquests it became greater and more terrible than any of the three (3) former Beasts. This Empire continued in its greatness till the reign of 'Theodosius' the great; and then brake into ten (10) kingdoms, represented by the ten (10) horns of this Beast; and continued in a broken form, 'till the Antient of days sat in a throne like fiery flame, and the judgment was set, and the books were opened, and the Beast was slain and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flames; and one like the son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Antient of days', and received dominion over all nations, and judgment was given to the saints of the most high, and the time came that they possessed the kingdom'.

'I beheld', saith 'Daniel, till the Beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flames. As concerning the rest of the Beasts, they had their dominion taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and a time'. And therefore all the four (4) Beasts are still alive, tho the dominion of the three (3) first (1st) be taken away. The nations of 'Chaldea' and 'Assyria' are still the first (1st) Beast. Those of 'Media' and 'Persia' are still the second (2nd) Beast. Those of 'Macedon, Greece and Thrace, Asia minor, Syria and Egypt', are still the third (3rd). And those of 'Europe', on this side 'Greece', are still the fourth (4th). Seeing therefore the body of the third (3rd) Beast is confined to the nations on this side the river 'Euphrates', and the body of the fourth (4th) Beast is confined to the nations on this side 'Greece'; we are to look for all the four (4) heads of the third (3rd) Beast, among the nations on this side of the river 'Euphrates'; and for all the eleven (11) horns of the fourth (4th) Beast, among the nations on this side of 'Greece'. And therefore, at the breaking of the 'Greek' empire into four (4) kingdoms of the 'Greeks', we include no part of the 'Chaldeans, Medes' and 'Persians' in those kingdoms, because they belonged to the bodies of the two (2) first Beasts. Nor do we reckon the 'Greek' empire seated at 'Constantinople', among the horns of the fourth (4th) Beast, because it belonged to the body of the third (3rd). (Notes to Chap. IV: Chap. 7:4; 7:5; 7:13; 7:11,12.)" }}

V: Kingdoms Represented by Feet of Image Composed of Iron & Clay.

{{ "'Dacia' was a large country bounded on the south by the 'Danube', on the east by the 'Euxine' sea, on the north by the river 'Neister' and the mountain 'Crapac', and on the west by the river 'Tibesis', or '*Tey*s', which runs southward into the 'Danube' a little above 'Belgrade'. It comprehended the countries now called 'Transylvania, Moldavia', and 'Wallachia', and the eastern part of the upper 'Hungary'. Its antient inhabitants were called 'Getæ' by the 'Greeks', 'Daci' by the 'Latins', and 'Goths' by themselves. 'Alexander' the great attacked them, and 'Trajan' conquered them, and reduced their country into a Province of the 'Roman' Empire: and thereby the propagation of the Gospel among them was much promoted. They were composed of several 'Gothic' nations, called 'Ostrogoths, Visigoths, Vandals, Gepides, Lombards, Burgundians, Alans', &c. who all agreed in their manners, and spake the same language, as 'Procopius' represents. While they lived under the 'Romans', the 'Goths' or 'Ostrogoths' were seated in the eastern parts of 'Dacia', the 'Vandals' in the western part upon the river '*Tey*s', where the rivers 'Maresh' and 'Keresh' run into it. The 'Visigoths' were between them. The 'Gepides', according to 'Jornandes', were upon the 'Vistula'. The 'Burgundians', a 'Vandalic' nation, were between the 'Vistula' and the southern fountain of the 'Boristhenes', at some distance from the mountain 'Crapac' northwards, where 'Ptolemy' places them, by the names of 'Phrugundiones' and 'Burgiones'. The 'Alans', another 'Gothic' nation, were between the northern fountain of the 'Boristhenes' and the mouth of the river 'Tanais', where 'Ptolemy' placeth the mountain 'Alanus', and western side of the 'Palus Mæotis'.

These nations continued under the dominion of the 'Romans' till the second (2nd) year of the Emperor 'Philip', and then for want of their military pay began to revolt; the 'Ostrogoths' setting up a kingdom, which, under their Kings 'Ostrogotha, 'Cniva, 'Araric, 'Geperic', and 'Hermanaric', increased till the year of Christ 376; and then by an incursion of the 'Huns' from beyond the 'Tanais', and the death of 'Hermanaric', brake into several smaller kingdoms. 'Hunnimund', the son of 'Hermanaric', became King over the 'Ostrogoths'; 'Fridigern' over the 'Visigoths'; 'Winithar', or 'Vinithar', over a part of the 'Goths' called 'Gruthungi' by 'Ammian', 'Gothunni' by 'Claudian', and 'Sarmatæ' and 'Scythians' by others: 'Athanaric' reign'd over another part of the 'Goths' in 'Dacia', called 'Thervingi'; 'Box' over the 'Antes' in 'Sarmatia'; and the 'Gepides' had also their King. The 'Vandals' fled over the 'Danube' from 'Geberic' in the latter end of the reign of 'Constantine' the great, and had seats granted them in 'Pannonia' by that Emperor, where they lived quietly forty (40) years, 'viz.' till the year 377, when several 'Gothic' nations flying from the 'Hunns' came over the 'Danube', and had seats granted them in 'Mæsia' and 'Thrace' by the 'Greek' Emperor 'Valens'. But the next year they revolted, called in some 'Goths, 'Alans and 'Hunns', from beyond the 'Danube', and routed the 'Roman' army, slew the Emperor 'Valens', and spread themselves into 'Greece' and 'Pannonia' as far as the 'Alps'. In the years 379 and 380 they were checkt by the arms of the Emperors 'Gratian' and 'Theodosius', and made a submissive peace; the 'Visigoths' and 'Thervingi' returned to their seats in 'Mæsia' and 'Thrace', the 'Hunns' retired over the 'Danube', and the 'Alans' and 'Gruthungi' obtained seats in 'Pannonia'.

About the year 373, or 374, the 'Burgundians' rose from their seats upon the 'Vistula', with an army of eighty thousand (80,000) men to invade 'Gallia'; and being opposed, seated themselves upon the northern side of the 'Rhine' over against 'Mentz'. In the year 358, a body of the 'Salian Franks', with their King, coming from the river 'Sala', were received into the Empire by the Emperor 'Julian', and seated in 'Gallia' between 'Brabant' and the 'Rhine': and their King 'Mellobaudes' was made 'Comes domesticorum', by the Emperor 'Gratian'. 'Richomer', another noble 'Salian Frank', was made 'Comes domesticorum', and 'Magister utriusque Militiæ', by 'Theodosius'; and A.C. 384, was Consul with 'Clearchus'. He was a great favourite of 'Theodosius', and accompanied him in his wars against 'Eugenius', but died in the expedition, and left a son called 'Theudomir', who afterwards became King of the 'Salian Franks' in 'Brabant'. In the time of this war some 'Franks' from beyond the 'Rhine' invaded 'Gallia' under the conduct of 'Genobald, 'Marcomir' and 'Suno', but were repulsed by 'Stilico'; and 'Marcomir' being slain, was succeeded in 'Germany' by his son 'Pharamond'.

While these nations remained quiet within the Empire, subject to the 'Romans', many others continued so beyond the 'Danube' till the death of the Emperor 'Theodosius', and then rose up in arms. For 'Paulus Diaconus' in his 'Historia Miscell. lib. xiv. speaking of the times next after the death of this Emperor, tells us: 'Eodem tempore erant Gothi & aliæ gentes maximæ trans Danubium habitantes: ex quibus rationabiliores quatuor sunt, Gothi scilicet, Huisogothi, Gepides & Vandali; & nomen tantum & nihil aliud mutantes. Isti sub Arcadia & Honorio Danubium transeuntes, locati sunt in terra Romanorum: & Gepides quidem, ex quibus postea divisi sunt Longobardi & Avars, villas, quæ sunt circa Singidonum & Sirmium, habitavere': and 'Procopius' in the beginning of his 'Historia Vandalica' writes to the same purpose. Hitherto the 'Western Empire' continued entire, but now brake into many kingdoms.

'Theodosius' died A.C. 395; and then the 'Visigoths', under the conduct of 'Alaric' the successor of 'Fridigern', rose from their seats in 'Thrace' and wasted 'Macedon, 'Thessaly, 'Achaia, 'Peloponnesus', and 'Epirus', with fire and sword for five (5) years together; when turning westward, they invaded 'Dalmatia, Illyricum' and 'Pannonia'; and from thence went into 'Italy' A.C. 402; and the next year were so beaten at 'Pollentia' and 'Verona', by 'Stilico' the commander of the forces of the 'Western Empire', that 'Claudian' calls the remainder of the forces of 'Alaric, tanta ex gente reliquias breves', and 'Prudentius, Gentem deletam'. Thereupon 'Alaric' made peace with the Emperor, being so far humbled, that 'Orosius' saith, he did, 'pro pace optima & quibuscunque sedibus suppliciter & simpliciter orare'. This peace was ratified by mutual hostages; 'Ætius' was sent hostage to 'Alaric'; and 'Alaric' continued a free Prince in the seats now granted to him.

When 'Alaric' took up arms, the nations beyond the 'Danube' began to be in motion; and the next winter, between A.C. 395 and 396, a great body of 'Hunns, Alans, Ostrogoths, Gepides', and other northern nations, came over the frozen 'Danube', being invited by 'Rufinus': when their brethren, who had obtained seats within the Empire, took up arms also. 'Jerome' calls this great multitude, 'Hunns, Alans, Vandals, Goths, Sarmatians, Quades', and 'Marcomans'; and saith, that they invaded all places between 'Constantinople' and the 'Julian Alps', wasting 'Scythia, Thrace, Macedon, Dardania, Dacia, Thessaly, Achaia, Epirus, Dalmatia', and all 'Pannonia'. The 'Suevians' also invaded 'Rhætia': for when 'Alaric' ravaged 'Pannonia', the 'Romans' were defending 'Rhætia'; which gave 'Alaric' an opportunity of invading 'Italy', as 'Claudian' thus mentions.

'Non nisi perfidiâ nacti penetrabile tempus,
Irrupere Getæ, nostras dum Rhætia vires
Occupat, atque alio desudant Marte cohortes'.

And when 'Alaric' went from those parts into 'Italy', some other barbarous nations invaded 'Noricum' and 'Vindelicia', as the same Poet 'Claudian' thus writes:

'—Jam fœdera gentes
Exuerant, Latique auditâ clade feroces
Vendelicos saltus & Norica rura tenebant'.

This was in the years 402 and 403. And among these nations I reckon the 'Suevians, Quades', and 'Marcomans'; for they were all in arms at this time. The 'Quades' and 'Marcomans' were 'Suevian' nations; and they and the 'Suevians' came originally from 'Bohemia', and the river 'Suevus' or 'Sprake' in 'Lusatia'; and were now united under one common King called 'Ermeric', who soon after led them into 'Gallia'. The 'Vandals' and 'Alans' might also about this time extend themselves into 'Noricum'. 'Uldin' also with a great body of 'Hunns' passed the 'Danube' about the time of 'Chrysostom's' banishment, that is, A.C. 404, and wasted 'Thrace' and 'Mæsia'. 'Radagaisus', King of the 'Gruthunni' and successor of 'Winithar', inviting over more barbarians from beyond the 'Danube', invaded 'Italy' with an army of above two hundred thousand 'Goths'; and within a year or two, A.C. 405 or 406., was overcome by 'Stilico', and perished with his army. In this war 'Stilico' was assisted with a great body of 'Hunns' and 'Ostrogoths', under the conduct of 'Uldin' and 'Sarus', who were hired by the Emperor 'Honorius'. In all this confusion it was necessary for the 'Lombards' in 'Pannonia' to arm themselves in their own defence, and assert their liberty, the 'Romans' being no longer able to protect them.

And now 'Stilico' purposing to make himself Emperor, procured a military prefecture for; 'Alaric', and sent him into the 'East' in the service of 'Honorius' the 'Western' Emperor, committing some 'Roman' troops to his conduct to strengthen his army of 'Goths', and promising to follow soon after with his own army. His pretence was to recover some regions of 'Illyricum', which the 'Eastern' Emperor was accused to detain injuriously from the 'Western'; but his secret design was to make himself Emperor, by the assistance of the 'Vandals' and their allies: for he himself was a 'Vandal'. For facilitating this design, he invited a great body of the barbarous nations to invade the 'Western Empire', while he and 'Alaric' invaded the 'Eastern'. And these nations under their several Kings, the 'Vandals' under 'Godegisilus', the 'Alans' in two (2) bodies, the one (1) under 'Goar', the other (1) under 'Resplendial', and the 'Suevians', 'Quades', and 'Marcomans', under 'Ermeric', marched thro' 'Rhætia' to the side of the 'Rhine', leaving their seats in 'Pannonia' to the 'Hunns' and 'Ostrogoths', and joined the 'Burgundians' under 'Gundicar', and ruffled the 'Franks' in their further march. On the last of 'December' A.C. 406, they passed the 'Rhine' at 'Ments', and spread themselves into 'Germania prima' and the adjacent regions; and amongst other actions the 'Vandals' took 'Triers'. Then they advanced into 'Belgium', and began to waste that country. Whereupon the 'Salian Franks' in 'Brabant' took up arms, and under the conduct of 'Theudomir', the son of 'Ricimer', or 'Richomer', abovementioned, made so stout a resistance, that they slew almost twenty thousand (20,000) of the 'Vandals', with their King 'Godegisilus', in battel; the rest escaping only by a party of 'Resplendial's Alans' which came timely to their assistance.

Then the 'British' soldiers, alarm'd by the rumour of these things, revolted, and set up Tyrants there; first 'Marcus', whom they slew presently; then 'Gratian', whom they slew within four months; and lastly 'Constantine', under whom they invaded 'Gallia' A.C. 408, being favoured by 'Goar' and 'Gundicar'. And 'Constantine' having possessed a good part of 'Gallia', created his son 'Constans Cæsar', and sent him into 'Spain' to order his affairs there, A.C. 409.

In the mean time 'Resplendial', seeing the aforesaid disaster of the 'Vandals', and that 'Goar' was gone over to the 'Romans', led his army from the 'Rhine'; and, together with the 'Suevians' and residue of the 'Vandals', went towards 'Spain'; the 'Franks' in the mean time prosecuting their victory so far as to retake 'Triers', which after they had plundered they left to the 'Romans'. The 'Barbarians' were at first stopt by the 'Pyrenean' mountains, which made them spread themselves into 'Aquitain': but the next year they had the passage betrayed by some soldiers of 'Constans'; and entering 'Spain' 4 Kal. Octob. A.C. 409, they conquered every one what he could; and at length, A.C. 411, divided their conquests by lot; the 'Vandals' obtained 'Bætica', and part of 'Gallæcia'; the 'Suevians' the rest of 'Gallæcia'; and the 'Alans Lusitania' and the 'Carthaginian' Province: the Emperor for the sake of peace confirming them in those seats by grant A.C. 413.

The 'Roman Franks' above mentioned, having made 'Theudomir' their King, began strait after their conquest of the 'Vandals' to invade their neighbours also. The first they set upon were the 'Gauls' of 'Brabant': but meeting with notable resistance, they desired their alliance: and so those 'Gauls' fell off from the 'Romans', and made an intimate league with the 'Franks' to be as one people, marrying with one another, and conforming to one another's manners, till they became one without distinction. Thus by the access of these 'Gauls', and of the foreign 'Franks' also, who afterwards came over the 'Rhine', the 'Salian' kingdom soon grew very great and powerful.

'Stilico's' expedition against the 'Greek' Emperor was stopt by the order of 'Honorius'; and then 'Alaric' came out of 'Epirus' into 'Noricum', and requested a sum of money for his service. The Senate were inclined to deny him, but by 'Stilico's' mediation granted it. But after some time 'Stilico' being accused of a traitorous conspiracy with 'Alaric', and slain 10 Kal. 'Sept'. A.C. 408; 'Alaric' was thereby disappointed of his money, and reputed an enemy to the Empire; he then broke strait into 'Italy' with the army he brought out of 'Epirus', and sent to his brother 'Adolphus' to follow him with what forces he had in 'Pannonia', which were not great, but yet not to be despised. Thereupon 'Honorius' fearing to be shut up in 'Rome', retired to 'Ravenna' in October A.C. 408. And from that time 'Ravenna' continued to be the seat of the 'Western' Emperors. In those days the 'Hunns' also invaded 'Pannonia'; and seizing the deserted seats of the 'Vandals, Alans', and 'Goths', founded a new kingdom there. 'Alaric' advancing to 'Rome' besieged it, and 9 Kal. 'Sept'. A.C. 410 took it: and afterwards attempting to pass into 'Africa', was shipwrackt. After which 'Honorius' made peace with him, and got up an army to send against the Tyrant 'Constantine'.

At the same time 'Gerontius', one of 'Constantine's' captains, revolted from him, and set up 'Maximus' Emperor in 'Spain'. Whereupon 'Constantine' sent 'Edobec', another of his captains, to draw to his assistance, the 'Barbarians' under 'Goar' and 'Gundicar' in 'Gallia', and supplies of 'Franks' and 'Alemans' from beyond the 'Rhine'; and committed the custody of 'Vienne' in 'Gallia Narbonensis' to his son 'Constans'. 'Gerontius' advancing, first slew 'Constans' at 'Vienne', and then began to besiege 'Constantine' at 'Arles'. But 'Honorius' at the same time sending 'Constantius' with an army on the same errand, 'Gerontius' fled, and 'Constantius' continued the siege, strengthened by the access of the greatest part of the soldiers of 'Gerontius'. After four (4) months siege, 'Edobec' having procured succours, the 'Barbarian' Kings at 'Ments, Goar and Gundicar', constitute 'Jovinus' Emperor, and together with him set forward to relieve Arles. At their approach Constantius retired. They pursued, and he beat them by surprize; but not prosecuting his victory, the 'Barbarians' soon recovered themselves; yet not so as to hinder the fall of the tyrants 'Constantine, Jovinus' and 'Maximus. Britain' could not be recovered to the Empire, but remained ever after a distinct kingdom.

The next year, A.C. 412, the 'Visigoths' being beaten in 'Italy', had 'Aquitain' granted them to retire into: and they invaded it with much violence, causing the 'Alans' and 'Burgundians' to retreat, who were then depopulating of it. At the same time the 'Burgundians' were brought to peace; and the Emperor granted them for inheritance a region upon the 'Rhine' which they had invaded: and the same, I presume, he did with the 'Alans'. But the 'Franks' not long after retaking and burning 'Triers, Castinus', A.C. 415, was sent against them with an army, who routed them and slew 'Theudomir' their King This was the second (2nd) taking of 'Triers' by the 'Franks'. It was therefore taken four (4) times, once by the 'Vandals' and thrice by the 'Franks'. 'Theudomir' was succeeded by 'Pharamond', the Prince or King of the 'Salian Franks' in 'Germany'. From thence he brought new forces, reigned over the whole, and had seats granted to his people within the Empire near the 'Rhine'.

And now the 'Barbarians' were all quieted, and settled in several kingdoms within the Empire, not only by conquest, but also by the grants of the Emperor 'Honorius'. For 'Rutilius' in his 'Itinerary', written in Autumn, 'Anno Urbis' 1169, that is, according to 'Varro's' computation then in use, A.C. 416, thus laments the wasted fields: 'Illa quidem longis nimium deformia bellis'; And then adds, 'Jam tempus laceris post longa incendia fundis Vel pastorales ædificare casas'. And a little after, 'Æternum tibi Rhenus aret'.

And 'Orosius' in the end of his history, which was finished A.C. 417, represents now a general pacification of the barbarous nations by the words 'comprimere, coangustare, addicere gentes immanissimas'; terming them 'imperio addictas', because they had obtained seats in the Empire by league and compact; and 'coangustatas', because they did no longer invade all regions at pleasure, but by the same compact remained quiet in the seats then granted them. And these are the kingdoms, of which the feet of the Image were hence forward composed, and which are represented by iron and clay intermixed, which did not stick one to another, and were of different strength. (Notes to Chap. V: Procop. I. 1. de Bello Vandalico. Galli Arborici: 'whence the region was named' Arboricbant, 'and by contraction' Brabant.)" }}

VI: Ten (10) Kingdoms Represented by Ten Horns of Fourth (4th) Beast.

Now by the wars above described the 'Western' Empire of the 'Romans', about the time that 'Rome' was besieged and taken by the 'Goths', became broken into the following ten (10) kingdoms.

1. The kingdom of the 'Vandals' and 'Alans' in 'Spain' and 'Africa'.
2. The kingdom of the 'Suevians' in 'Spain'.
3. The kingdom of the 'Visigoths'.
4. The kingdom of the 'Alans' in 'Gallia'.
5. The kingdom of the 'Burgundians'.
6. The kingdom of the 'Franks'.
7. The kingdom of the 'Britains'.
8. The kingdom of the 'Hunns'.
9. The kingdom of the 'Lombards'.
10. The kingdom of 'Ravenna'.

Seven (7) of these kingdoms are thus mentioned by 'Sigonius'. ¹*Honorio regnante, in Pannoniam* ²*Hunni, in Hispaniam* ³*Vandali*, ⁴*Alani*, ⁵*Suevi* & ⁶*Gothi, in Galliam* ⁴*Alani* ⁷*Burgundiones* & ⁶*Gothi, certis sedibus permissis, accepti*'. Add the 'Franks, Britains', and 'Lombards', and you have the ten (10): for these arose about the same time with the seven (7). But let us view them severally.

1. The Kings of the 'Vandals' were, A.C. 407 'Godegesilus', 407 'Gunderic', 426 'Geiseric', 477 'Hunneric', 484 'Gundemund', 496 'Thrasamund', 513 'Geiseric', 530 'Gelimer'. 'Godegesilus' led them into 'Gallia' A.C. 406, 'Gunderic' into 'Spain' A.C. 409, 'Geiseric' into 'Africa' A.C. 427; and 'Gelimer' was conquered by 'Belisarius' A.C. 533. Their kingdom lasted in 'Gallia', 'Spain' and 'Africa' together 126 years; and in 'Africa' they were very potent. The 'Alans' had only two (2) Kings of their own in 'Spain', 'Resplendial', and 'Ataces, Utacus' or 'Othacar'. Under 'Resplendial' they went into 'France' A.C. 407, and into 'Spain' A.C. 409. 'Ataces' was slain with almost all his army by 'Vallia' King of the 'Visigoths' A.C. 419. And then the remainder of these 'Alans' subjected themselves to 'Gunderic' King of the 'Vandals' in 'Bætica', and went afterwards with them into 'Africa', as I learn out of 'Procopius'. Whence the Kings of the 'Vandals' styled themselves Kings of the 'Vandals' and 'Alans'; as may be seen in the Edict of 'Hunneric' recited by 'Victor' in his 'Vandalic' persecution. In conjunction with the 'Chatti', these 'Alans' gave the name of 'Cathalaunia', or 'Catth-Alania', to the Province which is still so called. These 'Alans' had also 'Gepides' among them; and therefore the 'Gepides' came into 'Pannonia' before the 'Alans' left it. There they became subject to the 'Hunns' till the death of 'Attila' A.C. 454, and at length were conquered by the 'Ostrogoths'.

2. The Kings of the 'Suevians' were, A.C. 407 'Ermeric', 458 'Rechila', 448 'Rechiarius', 458 'Maldra', 460 'Frumarius', 463 'Regismund'. And after some other Kings who are unknown, reigned A.C. 558 'Theudomir', 568 'Miro', 582 'Euboricus', and 583 'Andeca'. This kingdom, after it had been once seated in Spain, remained always in Gallæcia and Lusitania. 'Ermeric' after the fall of the 'Alan' kingdom, enlarged it into all 'Gallæcia', forcing the 'Vandals' to retire into 'Bætica' and the 'Carthaginian' Province. This kingdom lasted 177 years according to 'Isidorus', and then was subdued by 'Leovigildus' King of the 'Visigoths', and made a Province of his kingdom A.C. 585.

3. The Kings of the 'Visigoths' were, A.C. 400 'Alaric', 410 'Athaulphus', 415 'Sergeric' and 'Vallia', 419 'Theoderic', 451 'Thorismund', 452 'Theoderic', 465 'Euric', 482 'Alaric', 505 'Gensalaric', 526 'Amalaric', 531 'Theudius', 548 'Theudisclus', &c. I date this kingdom from the time that 'Alaric' left 'Thrace' and 'Greece' to invade the 'Western Empire'. In the end of the reign of 'Athaulphus' the 'Goths' were humbled by the 'Romans', and attempted to pass out of 'France' into 'Spain'. 'Sergeric' reigned but a few days. In the beginning of 'Vallia's' reign they assaulted the 'Romans' afresh, but were again repulsed, and then made peace on this condition, that they should on the behalf of the Empire invade the 'Barbarian' kingdoms in 'Spain': and this they did, together with the 'Romans', in the years 417 and 418, overthrowing the 'Alans' and part of the 'Vandals'. Then they received 'Aquitain' of the Emperor by a full donation, leaving their conquests in 'Spain' to the Emperor: and thereby the seats of the conquered 'Alans' came into the hands of the 'Romans'. In the year 455, 'Theoderic', assisted by the 'Burgundians', invaded 'Spain', which was then almost all subject to the 'Suevians', and took a part of it from them. A.C. 506, the 'Goths' were driven out of 'Gallia' by the 'Franks'. A.C. 585, they conquered the 'Suevian' kingdom, and became Lords of all 'Spain'. A.C. 713, the 'Saracens' invaded them, but in time they recovered their dominions, and have reigned in 'Spain' ever since.

4. The Kings of the 'Alans' in 'Gallia' were 'Goar, Sambida, Eocharic, Sangibanus, Beurgus', &c. Under 'Goar' they invaded 'Gallia' A.C. 407, and had seats given them near the 'Rhine', A.C. 412. Under 'Sambida', whom 'Bucher' makes the successor, if not the son of 'Goar', they had the territories of 'Valence' given them by 'Ætius' the Emperor's General, A.C. 440. Under 'Eocharic' they conquered a region of the rebelling 'Galli Arborici', given them also by 'Ætius'. This region was from them named 'Alenconium, quasi Alanorum conventus'. Under 'Sangibanus' they were invaded, and their regal city 'Orleans' was besieged by 'Attila' King of the 'Hunns', with a vast army of 500,000 (1/2 million) men. 'Ætius' and the 'Barbarian' Kings of 'Gallia' came to raise the siege, and beat the 'Hunns' in a very memorable battle, A.C. 451, 'in campis Catalaunicis', so called from these 'Alans' mixt with the 'Chatti'. The region is now called 'Campania' or 'Champagne'. In that battle were slain on both sides 162,000 men. A year or two (2) after, 'Attila' returned with an immense army to conquer this kingdom, but was again beaten by them and the 'Visigoths' together in a battle of three (3) days continuance, with a slaughter almost as great as the former. Under 'Beurgus', or 'Biorgor', they infested 'Gallia' round about, till the reign of 'Maximus' the Emperor; and then they passed the 'Alps' in winter, and came into 'Liguria', but were there beaten, and 'Beurgus' slain, by 'Ricimer' commander of the Emperor's forces, A.C. 464. Afterwards they were again beaten, by the joint force of 'Odoacer' King of 'Italy' and 'Childeric' King of the 'Franks', about the year 480, and again by 'Theudobert' King of the 'Austrian Franks' about the year 511.

5. The Kings of the 'Burgundians' were, A.C. 407 'Gundicar', 436 'Gundioc', 467 'Bilimer', 473 'Gundobaldus' with his brothers, 510 'Sigismund', 517 'Godomarus'. Under 'Gundicar' they invaded 'Gallia' A.C. 407, and had seats given them by the Emperor near the 'Rhine' in 'Gallia Belgica', A.C. 412. They had 'Saxons' among them, and were now so potent, that 'Orosius' A.C. 417 wrote of them: 'Burgundionum esse prævalidam manum, Galliæ hodieque testes sunt, in quibus præsumpta possessione consistunt'. About the year 435 they received great overthrows by 'Ætius', and soon after by the 'Hunns': but five years after had 'Savoy' granted them to be shared with the inhabitants; and from that time became again a potent kingdom, being bounded by the river 'Rhodanus', but afterwards extending much further into the heart of 'Gallia'. 'Gundobald' conquered the regions about the rivers 'Araris' and 'Rhodanus', with the territories of 'Marseilles'; and invading 'Italy' in the time of the Emperor 'Glycerius', conquered all his brethren. 'Godomarus' made 'Orleans' his royal seat: whence the kingdom was called 'Regnum Aurelianorum'. He was conquered by 'Clotharius' and 'Childebert', Kings of the 'Franks', A.C. 526. From thence forward this kingdom was sometimes united to the kingdom of the 'Franks', and sometimes divided from it, till the reign of 'Charles' the great, who made his son 'Carolottus' King of 'Burgundy'. From that time, for about 300 years together, it enjoyed its proper Kings; and was then broken into the Dukedom of 'Burgundy', County of 'Burgundy', and County of 'Savoy'; and afterwards those were broken into other lesser Counties.

6. The Kings of the 'Franks' were, A.C. 407 'Theudomir', 417 'Pharamond', 428 'Clodio', 448 'Merovæus', 456 'Childeric', 482 'Clodovæus', &c. 'Windeline' and 'Bucher', two (2) of the most diligent searchers into the originals of this kingdom, make it begin the same year with the 'Barbarian' invasions of 'Gallia', that is, A.C. 407. Of the first Kings there is in 'Labbe's Bibliotheca M.S.' this record.

'Historica quædam excerpta ex veteri stemmate genealogico Regum Franciæ. Genobaldus, Marcomerus, Suno, Theodemeris. Isti duces vel reguli extiterunt à principio gentis Francorum diversis temporibus. Sed incertum relinquunt historici quali sibi procreations lineâ successerunt. Pharamundus: sub hoc rege suo primo Franci legibus se subdunt, quas primores eorum tulerunt Wisogastus, Atrogastus, Salegastus. Chlochilo. Iste, transito Rheno, Romanos in Carbonaria sylva devicit, Camaracum cepit & obtinuit, annis 20 regnavit. Sub hoc rege Franci usque Summam progressi sunt. Merovechus. Sub hoc rege Franci Trevirim destruunt, Metim succendunt, usque Aurelianum perveniunt'.

Now for 'Genobaldus, Marcomer' and 'Sunò', they were captains of the 'Transrhenane Franks' in the reign of 'Theodosius', and concern us not. We are to begin with 'Theudomir' the first King of the rebelling 'Salii', called 'Didio' by 'Ivo Carnotensis', and 'Thiedo' and 'Theudemerus' by 'Rhenanus'. His face is extant in a coin of gold found with this inscription, 'THEUDEMIR REX', published by 'Petavius', and still or lately extant, as 'Windeline' testifies: which shews that he was a King, and that in 'Gallia'; seeing that rude 'Germany' understood not then the coining of money, nor used either 'Latin' words or letters. He was the son of 'Ricimer', or 'Richomer', the favourite of the Emperor 'Theodosius'; and so being a 'Roman Frank', and of the 'Salian' royal blood, they therefore upon the rebellion made him King. The whole time of his reign you have stated in 'Excerptis Gregorii Turonensis è Fredigario, cap'. 5,6,7,8, where the making him King, the tyranny of 'Jovinus', the slaughter of the associates of 'Jovinus', the second taking of 'Triers' by the 'Franks', and their war with 'Castinus', in which this King was slain, are as a series of successive things thus set down in order. 'Extinctis Ducibus in Francis, denuo Reges creantur ex eadem stirpe qua prius fuerant. Eodem tempore Jovinus ornatus regios assumpsit. Constantinus fugam versus Italiam dirigit; missis a Jovino Principe percussoribus super Mentio flumine, capite truncatur. Multi nobilium jussu Jovini apud Avernis capti, & a ducibus Honorii crudeliter interempti sunt. Trevirorum civitas, factione unius ex senatoribus nomine Lucii, à Francis captà & incensa est.—Castinus Domesticorum Comes expeditionem accipit contra Francos', &c. Then returning to speak of 'Theudomir', he adds: 'Franci electum à se regem, sicut prius fuerat, crinitum inquirentes diligenter ex genere Priami, Frigi & Francionis, super se crearunt nomine Theudemerum filium Richemeris, qui in hoc prælio quod supra memini, à Romanis interfectus est; that is, in the battle with 'Castinus's' army. Of his death 'Gregory Turonensis' makes this further mention: 'In consularibus legimus Theodemerem regem Francorum filium Ricimeris quondam, & Ascilam matrem ejus, gladio interfectos'.

Upon this victory of the 'Romans', the 'Franks' and rebelling 'Gauls', who in the time of 'Theudomir' were at war with one another, united to strengthen themselves, as 'Ordericus Vitalis' thus mentions. 'Cum Galli prius contra Romanos rebellâssent, Franci iis sociati sunt, & pariter juncti, Ferramundum Sunonis ducis filium, sibi regem præfecerunt'. 'Prosper' sets down the time; 'Anno' 25 'Honorii, Pharamundus regnat in Francia'. This, 'Bucher' well observes, refers to the end of the year 416, or the beginning of the next year, dating the years of 'Honorius' from the death of 'Valentinian'; and argues well, that at this time 'Pharamond' was not only King by the constitution of the 'Franks', but crowned also by the consent of 'Honorius', and had a part of 'Gallia' assigned him by covenant. And this might be the cause that 'Roman' writers reckoned him the first King: which some not understanding, have reputed him the founder of this kingdom by an army of the 'Transrhenane Franks'. He might come with such an army, but he succeeded 'Theudomir' by right of blood and consent of the people. For the above cited passage of 'Fredigarius, Extinctis Ducibus, in Francis denuo Reges creantur ex eadem stirpe quâ prius fuerant', implies that the kingdom continued to this new elected family during the reign of more Kings than one (1). If you date the years of 'Honorius' from the death of his father, the reign of 'Pharamond' might begin two (2) years later than is assigned by 'Bucher'. The 'Salique' laws made in his reign, which are yet extant, shew by their name that it was the kingdom of the 'Salii' over which he reigned; and, by the pecuniary mulcts in them, that the place where he reigned abounded much with money, and consequently was within the Empire; rude 'Germany' knowing not the use of money, till they mixed with the 'Romans'. In the Preface also to the 'Salique' laws, written and prefixed to them soon after the conversion of the 'Franks' to the Christian religion, that is, in the end of the reign of 'Merovæus', or soon after, the original of this kingdom is thus described: 'Hæc enim gens, quæ fortis dum esset & robore valida, Romanorum jugum durissimum de suis cervicibus excussit pugnando', &c. This kingdom therefore was erected, not by invasion but by rebellion, as was described above. 'Prosper' in registering their Kings in order, tells us: 'Pharamundus regnat in Francia; Clodio regnat in Francia; Merovæus regnat in Francia': and who can imagine but that in all these places he meant one and the same 'Francia'? And yet 'tis certain that the 'Francia' of 'Merovæus' was in 'Gallia'.

Yet the father of 'Pharamond', being king of a body of 'Franks' in 'Germany' in the reign of the Emperor 'Theodosius', as above, 'Pharamond' might reign over the same 'Franks' in 'Germany' before he succeeded 'Theudomir' in the kingdom of the 'Salians' within the Empire, and even before 'Theudomir' began his reign; suppose in the first year of 'Honorius', or when those 'Franks' being repulsed by 'Stilico', lost their Kings 'Marcomir' and 'Suno', one (1) of which was the father of 'Pharamond': and the 'Roman Franks', after the death of 'Theudomir', might invite Pharamond with his people from beyond the 'Rhine'. But we are not to regard the reign of 'Pharamond' in 'Germany': we are to date this kingdom from its rise within the Empire, and to look upon it as strengthened by the access of other 'Franks' coming from beyond the 'Rhine', whether in the reign of this King or in that of his successor 'Clodio'. For in the last year of 'Pharamond's' reign, 'Ætius' took from him a part of his possession in 'Gallia': but his successor 'Clodio', whom 'Fredigarius' represents as the son of 'Theudomir', and some call 'Clogio, Cloio', and 'Claudius', inviting from beyond the 'Rhine' a great body of 'Franks', recovered all, and carried on their conquests as far as the river 'Soame'. Then those 'Franks' dividing conquests with him, erected certain new kingdoms at 'Cologn' and 'Cambray', and some other cities: all which were afterwards conquered by 'Clodovæus', who also drove the 'Goths' out of 'Gallia', and fix'd his seat at 'Paris', where it has continued ever since. And this was the original of the present kingdom of 'France'.

7. The Kings of 'Britain' were, A.C. 407 or 408, 'Marcus, Gratian', and 'Constantine' successively; A.C. 425 'Vortigern', 466 'Aurelius Ambrosius', 498 'Uther Pendraco', 508 'Arthur', 542 'Constantinus', 545 'Aurelius Cunanus', 578 'Vortiporeus', 581 'Malgo', 586 'Careticus', 613 'Cadwan', 635 'Cadwalin', 676 'Cadwallader'. The three (3) first (1st) were 'Roman' Tyrants, who revolted from the Empire. 'Orosius, Prosper' and 'Zosimus' connect their revolt with the irruptions of the 'Barbarians' into 'Gallia', as consequent thereunto. 'Prosper', with whom 'Zosimus' agrees, puts it in the year which began the day after that irruption. The just time I thus collect: 'Marcus' reigned not many days, 'Gratian' four (4) months, and 'Constantine' three (3) years. He was slain the year after the taking of 'Rome', that is A.C. 411, 14 Kal. 'Octob'. Whence the revolt was in Spring A.C. 408. 'Sozomen' joins 'Constantine's' expedition into 'Gallia' with 'Arcadius's' death, or the times a little after; and 'Arcadius' died A.C. 408 'May' the 1st. Now tho the reign of these Tyrants was but short, yet they gave a beginning to the kingdom of 'Britain', and so may be reckoned the three (3) first (1st) Kings, especially since the posterity of 'Constantine, viz'. his sons 'Aurelius Ambrosius', and Uther Pendraco, and his grandson Arthur, reigned afterwards. For from the time of the revolt of these Tyrants 'Britain' continued a distinct kingdom absolved from subjection to the Empire, the Emperor not being able to spare soldiers to be sent thither to receive and keep the Island, and therefore neglecting it; as we learn by unquestionable records. For 'Prosper' tells us; A.C. 410, 'Variance Cos. Hac tempestate præ valetudine Romanorum, vires funditus attenuatæ Britanniaë'. And 'Sigebert', conjoining this with the siege of 'Rome', saith: 'Britannorum vires attenuatæ, & substrahunt se à Romanorum dominatione'. And 'Zosimus lib'. 6. 'The Transrhenane Barbarians' invading all places, reduced the inhabitants of the island of 'Britain', and also certain 'Celtic' nations to that pass, that they fell off from the 'Roman' Empire; and being no longer obedient to the 'Roman' laws, κατ' ἑαυτον βιατευειν (kat' heauton biateuein), they lived in separate bodies after their own pleasure. The 'Britons' therefore taking up arms, and hazarding themselves for their own safety, freed their cities from the imminent 'Barbarians'. In like manner all 'Brabant' and some other Provinces of the 'Gauls' imitating the 'Britons', freed themselves also, ejecting the 'Roman' Presidents, and forming themselves into a sort of commonwealth according to their own pleasure. This rebellion of 'Britain' and the 'Celtic' nations happened when 'Constantine' usurped the kingdom'. So also 'Procopius, lib'. 1. 'Vandal'. speaking of the same 'Constantine', saith: Constantine 'being overcome in battle, was slain with his children: Βρεταννιαν μεν τοι Ρωμαιοι ανασωσασθαι ουκετι εχον' αλλ' ουσα ὑπο τυραννους απ' αυτου εμενε (bretannian men toi Rōmaioi anasōsasthai ouketi echon, all' ousa ὑπο turannous ap' autou emene). Yet the Romans could not recover Britain any more, but from that time it remained under Tyrants'. And 'Beda, l'. 1. c. 11. 'Fracta est Roma à Gothis anno 1164 suæ conditionis; ex quo tempore Romani in Britannia regnare cessaverunt'. And 'Ethelwaldus: A tempore Romæ à Gothis expugnata, cessavit imperium Romanorum à Britannia insula, & ab aliis; quas sub iugo servitutis tenebant, multis terris'. And 'Theodoret, serm'. 9. 'de curand. Græc. affect'. about the year 424, reckons the 'Britons' among the nations which were not then in subjection to the 'Roman' Empire. Thus 'Sigonius: ad annum 411, Imperium Romanorum post excessum Constantini in Britannia nullum fuit'.

Between the death of 'Constantine' and the reign of 'Vortigern' was an interregnum of about 14 years, in which the 'Britons' had wars with the 'Picts' and 'Scots', and twice obtained the assistance of a 'Roman' Legion, who drove out the enemy, but told them positively at their departure that they would come no more. Of 'Vortigern's' beginning to reign there is this record in an old Chronicle in 'Nennius', quoted by 'Camden' and others: 'Guortigernus tenuit imperium in Britannia, Theodosio & Valentiniano Coss'. ['viz'. A.C. 425.] & 'in quarto anno regni sui Saxones ad Britanniam venerunt, Felice & Tauro Coss'. ['viz'. A.C. 428.] This coming of the 'Saxons, Sigebert' refers to the 4th year of 'Valentinian', which falls in with the year 428 assigned by this Chronicle: and two (2) years after, the 'Saxons' together with the 'Picts' were beaten by the 'Britons'. Afterwards in the reign of 'Martian' the Emperor, that is, between the years 450 and 456, the 'Saxons' under 'Hengist' were called in by the 'Britons', but six years after revolted from them, made war upon them with various success, and by degrees succeeded them. Yet the 'Britons' continued a flourishing kingdom till the reign of 'Careticus'; and the war between the two (2) nations continued till the pontificate of 'Sergius' A.C. 688.

8. The Kings of the 'Hunns' were, A.C. 406 'Octar' and 'Rugila', 433 'Bleda' and 'Attila'. 'Octar' and 'Rugila' were the brothers of 'Munzuc' King of the 'Hunns' in 'Gothia' beyond the 'Danube'; and 'Bleda' and 'Attila' were his sons, and 'Munzuc' was the son of 'Balamir'. The two (2) first, as 'Jornandes' tells us, were Kings of the 'Hunns', but not of them all; and had the two (2) last for their successors. I date the reign of the 'Hunns' in 'Pannonia' from the time that the 'Vandals' and 'Alans' relinquished 'Pannonia' to them, A.C. 407. 'Sigonius' from the time that the 'Visigoths' relinquished 'Pannonia' A. C. 408. 'Constat', saith he, 'quod Gothis ex Illyrico profectis, Hunni successerunt, atque imprimis Pannoniam tenuerunt. Neque enim Honorius viribus ad resistendum in tantis difficultatibus destitutus, prorsus eos prohibere potuit, sed meliore consilio, animo ad pacem converso, fœdus cum eis, datis acceptisque obsidibus fecit; ex quibus qui dati sunt, Ætius, qui etiam Alarico tributus fuerat, præcipue memoratur'. How 'Ætius' was hostage to the 'Goths' and 'Hunns' is related by 'Frigeridus', who when he had mentioned that 'Theodosius' Emperor of the 'East' had sent grievous commands to 'John', who after the death of 'Honorius' had usurped the crown of the 'Western Empire', he subjoins: 'Iis permotus Johannes, Ætium id tempus curam palatii gerentem cum ingenti auri pondere ad Chunnos transmisit, notos sibi obsidiatûs sui tempore & familiari amicitia devinctos'—And a little after: 'Ætius tribus annis Alarici obses, dehinc Chunnorum, postea Carpilionis gener ex Comite domesticorum & Joannis curopalatae. Now 'Bucher' shews that 'Ætius' was hostage to 'Alaric' till the year 410, when 'Alaric' died, and to the 'Hunns' between the years 411 and 415, and son-in-law to 'Carpilio' about the year 417 or 418, and 'Curopalates' to 'John' about the end of the year 423. Whence 'tis probable that he became hostage to the 'Hunns' about the year 412 or 413, when 'Honorius' made leagues with almost all the barbarous nations, and granted them seats: but I had rather say with 'Sigonius', that 'Ætius' became hostage to 'Alaric' A.C. 403. It is further manifest out of 'Prosper', that the 'Hunns' were in quiet possession of 'Pannonia' in the year 432. For in the first (1st) book of 'Eusebius's' Chronicle 'Prosper' writes: Anno decimo post obitum Honorii, cum ad Chunnorum gentem cui tunc Rugila præerat, post prælium cum Bonifacio se Ætius contulisset, impetrato auxilio ad Romanorum solum regreditur. And in the second (2nd) book: Ætio & Valerio Coss. Ætius depositâ potestate profugus ad Hunnos in Pannonia pervenit, quorum amicitia auxilioque usus, pacem principum interpellatæ potestatis obtinuit. Hereby it appears that at this time 'Rugila', or as 'Maximus' calls him, 'Rechilla', reigned over the 'Hunns' in 'Pannonia'; and that 'Pannonia' was not now so much as accounted within the soil of the Empire, being formerly granted away to the 'Hunns'; and that these were the very same body of 'Hunns' with which 'Ætius' had, in the time of his being an hostage, contracted friendship: by virtue of which, as he solicited them before to the aid of 'John' the Tyrant A.C. 424, so now he procured their intercession for himself with the Emperor. 'Octar' died A.C. 430; for 'Socrates' tells us, that about that time the Burgundians having been newly vexed by the Hunns, upon intelligence of 'Octar's' death, seeing them without a leader, set upon them suddenly with so much vigour, that 3000 'Burgundians' slew 10,000 'Hunns'. Of 'Rugila's' being now King in 'Pannonia' you have heard already. He died A.C. 433, and was succeeded by 'Bleda', as 'Prosper' and 'Maximus' inform us. This 'Bleda' with his brother 'Attila' were before this time Kings of the 'Hunns' beyond the 'Danube', their father 'Munzuc's' kingdom being divided between them; and now they united the kingdom 'Pannonia' to their own. Whence 'Paulus'Diaconus' saith, they did regnum intra Pannoniam Daciamque gerere. In the year 441, they began to invade the Empire afresh, adding to the 'Pannonian' forces new and great armies from 'Scythia'. But this war was presently composed, and then 'Attila', seeing 'Bleda' inclined to peace, slew him, A.C. 444, inherited his dominions, and invaded the Empire again. At length, after various great wars with the 'Romans, Attila' perished A.C. 454; and his sons quarrelling about his dominions, gave occasion to the 'Gepides, Ostrogoths' and other nations who were their subjects, to rebel and make war upon them. The same year the 'Ostrogoths' had seats granted them in 'Pannonia' by the Emperors 'Marcian' and 'Valentinian'; and with the 'Romans' ejected the 'Hunns' out of 'Pannonia', soon after the death of 'Attila', as all historians agree. This ejection was in the reign of 'Avitus', as is mentioned in the 'Chronicum Boiorum', and in 'Sidonius, Carm. 7 in Avitum', which speaks thus of that Emperor.

— — *Cujus solum amissas post sæcula multa
Pannonias revocavit iter, jam credere promptum est.
Quid faciet bellis.*

The Poet means, that by the coming of 'Avitus' the 'Hunns' yielded more easily to the 'Goths'. This was written by 'Sidonius' in the beginning of the reign of 'Avitus': and his reign began in the end of the year 455, and lasted not one (1) full year.

'Jornandes' tells us: Duodecimo anno regni Valiæ, quando & Hunni post pene quinquaginta annos invasa Pannonia, à Romanis & Gothis expulsi sunt. And 'Marcellinus: Hierio & Ardaburio Coss. Pannoniæ, quæ per quinquaginta annos ab Hunnis retinebantur, à Romanis receptæ sunt': whence it should seem that the 'Hunns' invaded and held 'Pannonia' from the year 378 or 379 to the year 427, and then were driven out of it. But this is a plain mistake: for it is certain that the Emperor 'Theodosius' left the Empire entire; and we have shewed out of 'Prosper', that the 'Hunns' were in quiet possession of 'Pannonia' in the year 432. The 'Visigoths' in those days had nothing to do with 'Pannonia', and the 'Ostrogoths' continued subject to the 'Hunns' till the death of 'Attila', A.C. 454; and 'Valia' King of the 'Visigoths' did not reign twelve (12) years. He began his reign in the end of the year 415, reigned three (3) years, and was slain A.C. 419, as 'Idacius, Isidorus', and the 'Spanish' manuscript Chronicles seen by 'Grotius' testify. And 'Olympiodorus', who carries his history only to the year 425, sets down therein the death of 'Valia' King of the 'Visigoths', and conjoins it with that of 'Constantius' which happened A.C. 420. Wherefore the 'Valia' of 'Jornandes', who reigned at the least twelve (12) years, is some other King. And I suspect that this name hath been put by mistake for 'Valamir' King of the 'Ostrogoths': for the action recorded was of the 'Romans' and 'Ostrogoths' driving the 'Hunns' out of 'Pannonia' after the death of 'Attila'; and it is not likely that the historian would refer the history of the 'Ostrogoths' to the years of the 'Visigothic' Kings. This action happened in the end of the year 455, which I take to be the twelfth (12th) year of 'Valamir' in 'Pannonia', and which was almost fifty (50) years after the year 406, in which the 'Hunns' succeeded the 'Vandals' and 'Alans' in 'Pannonia'. Upon the ceasing of the line of 'Hunnimund' the son of 'Hermaneric', the 'Ostrogoths' lived without Kings of their own nation about forty (40) years together, being subject to the 'Hunns'. And when 'Alaric' began to make war upon the 'Romans', which was in the year 444, he made 'Valamir', with his brothers 'Theodomir' and 'Videmir' the grandsons of 'Vinethar', captains or kings of these 'Ostrogoths' under him. In the twelfth (12th) year of 'Valamir's' reign dated from thence, the 'Hunns' were driven out of 'Pannonia'.

Yet the 'Hunns' were not so ejected, but that they had further contests with the 'Romans', till the head of 'Denfix' the son of 'Attila', was carried to 'Constantinople', A.C. 469, in the Consulship of 'Zeno' and 'Marcian', as 'Marcellinus' relates. Nor were they yet totally ejected the Empire: for besides their reliques in 'Pannonia', 'Sigonius' tells us, that when the Emperors 'Marcian' and 'Valentinian' granted 'Pannonia' to the 'Goths', which was in the year 454, they granted part of 'Illyricum' to some of the 'Hunns' and 'Sarmatians'. And in the year 526, when the 'Lombards' removing into 'Pannonia' made war there with the 'Gepides', the 'Avars', a part of the 'Hunns', who had taken the name of 'Avars' from one of their Kings, assisted the 'Lombards' in that war; and the 'Lombards' afterwards, when they went into 'Italy', left their seats in 'Pannonia' to the 'Avars' in recompence of their friendship. From that time the 'Hunns' grew again very powerful; their Kings, whom they called 'Chagan', troubling the Empire much in the reigns of the Emperors 'Mauritius, Phocas', and 'Heraclius': and this is the original of the present kingdom of 'Hungary', which from these 'Avars' and other 'Hunns' mixed together, took the name of 'Hun-Avaria', and by contraction 'Hungary'.

9. The 'Lombards', before they came over the 'Danube', were commanded by two (2) captains, 'Ibor' and 'Ayon': after whose death they had Kings, 'Agilmund, Lamisso, Lechu, Hildehoc, Gudehoc, Classo, Tato, Wacho, Walter, Audoin, Alboin, Cleophis', &c. 'Agilmund' was the son of 'Ayon', who became their King, according to 'Prosper', in the Consulship of 'Honorius' and 'Theodosius' A.C. 389, reigned thirty-three (33) years, according to 'Paulus Warnefridus', and was slain in battle by the 'Bulgarians'. 'Prosper' places his death in the Consulship of 'Marinianus' and 'Asclepiodorus', A.C. 413. 'Lamisso' routed the 'Bulgarians', and reigned three (3) years, and 'Lechu' almost forty (40). 'Gudehoc' was contemporary to 'Odoacer' King of the 'Heruli' in 'Italy', and led his people from 'Pannonia' into 'Rugia', a country on the north side of 'Noricum' next beyond the 'Danube'; from whence 'Odoacer' then carried his people into 'Italy'. 'Tato' overthrew the kingdom of the 'Heruli' beyond the 'Danube'. 'Wacho' conquered the 'Suevians', a kingdom then bounded on the east by 'Bavaria', on the west by 'France', and on the south by the 'Burgundians'. 'Audoin' returned into 'Pannonia' A.C. 526, and there overcame the 'Gepides'. 'Alboin' A.C. 551 overthrew the kingdom of the 'Gepides', and slew their King 'Chunnimund': A.C. 563 he assisted the 'Greek' Emperor against 'Totila' King of the 'Ostrogoths' in 'Italy'; and A.C. 568 led his people out of 'Pannonia' into Lombardi, where they reigned till the year 774.

According to 'Paulus Diaconus', the 'Lombards' with many other 'Gothic' nations came into the Empire from beyond the 'Danube' in the reign of 'Arcadius' and 'Honorius', that is, between the years 395 and 408. But they might come in a little earlier: for we are told that the 'Lombards', under their captains 'Ibor' and 'Ayon', beat the 'Vandals' in battle; and 'Prosper' placeth this victory in the Consulship of 'Ausonius' and 'Olybrius', that is, A.C. 379. Before this war the 'Vandals' had remained quiet forty (40) years in the seats granted them in 'Pannonia' by 'Constantine' the great. And therefore if these were the same 'Vandals', this war must have been in 'Pannonia'; and might be occasioned by the coming of the 'Lombards' over the 'Danube' into 'Pannonia', a (1) year or two (2) before the battle; and so have put an end to that quiet which had lasted forty (40) years. After 'Gratian' and 'Theodosius' had quieted the 'Barbarians', they might either retire over the 'Danube', or continue quiet under the 'Romans' till the death of 'Theodosius'; and then either invade the Empire anew, or throw off all subjection to it. By their wars, first with the 'Vandals', and then with the 'Bulgarians', a 'Scythian' nation so called from the river 'Volga' whence they came; it appears that even in those days they were a kingdom not contemptible.

10. These nine kingdoms being rent away, we are next to consider the residue of the Western Empire. While this Empire continued entire, it was the Beast itself: but the residue thereof is only a part of it. Now if this part be considered as a horn, the reign of this horn may be dated from the translation of the imperial seat from Rome to Ravenna, which was in October A.C. 408. For then the Emperor Honorius, fearing that Alaric would besiege him in Rome, if he staid there, retired to Millain, and thence to Ravenna: and the ensuing siege and sacking of Rome confirmed his residence there, so that he and his successors ever after made it their home. Accordingly Macchiavel in his Florentine history writes, that Valentinian having left Rome, translated the seat of the Empire to Ravenna.

'Rhætia' belonged to the 'Western' Emperors, so long as that Empire stood; and then it descended, with 'Italy' and the 'Roman' Senate, to 'Odoacer' King of the 'Heruli' in 'Italy', and after him to 'Theoderic' King of the 'Ostrogoths' and his successors, by the grant of the 'Greek' Emperors. Upon the death of 'Valentinian' the second (2nd), the 'Alemans' and 'Suevians' invaded 'Rhætia' A.C. 455. But I do not find they erected any settled kingdom there: for in the year 457, while they were yet depopulating 'Rhætia', they were attacked and beaten by 'Burto' Master of the horse to the Emperor 'Majoranus'; and I hear nothing more of their invading 'Rhætia'. 'Clodovæus' King of 'France', in or about the year 496, conquered a kingdom of the 'Alemans', and slew their last King 'Ermeric'. But this kingdom was seated in 'Germany', and only bordered upon 'Rhætia': for its people fled from 'Clodovæus' into the neighbouring kingdom of the 'Ostrogoths' under 'Theoderic', who received them as friends, and wrote a friendly letter to 'Clodovæus' in their behalf: and by this means they became inhabitants of 'Rhætia', as subjects under the dominion of the 'Ostrogoths'.

When the 'Greek' Emperor conquered the 'Ostrogoths', he succeeded them in the kingdom of 'Ravenna', not only by right of conquest but also by right of inheritance, the 'Roman' Senate still going along with this kingdom. Therefore we may reckon that this kingdom continued in the Exarchate of 'Ravenna' and Senate of 'Rome': for the remainder of the 'Western Empire' went along with the Senate of 'Rome', by reason of the right which this Senate still retained, and at length exerted, of chusing a new 'Western' Emperor.

I have now enumerated the ten (10) kingdoms, into which the 'Western Empire' became divided at its first breaking, that is, at the time of 'Rome's' being besieged and taken by the 'Goths'. Some of these kingdoms at length fell, and new ones arose: but whatever was their number afterwards, they are still called the 'Ten Kings' from their first (1st) number. (Notes to Chap. VI: Apud Bucherum, l. 14. c. 9. n. 8. Rolevinc's Antiqua Saxon. l. 1. c. 6.)" }}

VII. Eleventh (11th) Horn of 'Daniel's' Fourth (4th) Beast.

{{ "Now Daniel, considered the horns, and behold there came up among them another (1) horn, before whom there were three (3) of the first (1st) horns pluckt up by the roots; and behold in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things',—and his look was more stout than his fellows,—and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them: and one who stood by, and made Daniel know the interpretation of these things, told him, that the ten (10) horns were ten (10) kings that should arise, and another should arise after them, and be diverse from the first (1st), and he should subdue three (3) kings, and speak great words against the most High, and wear out the saints, and think to change times and laws: and that they should be given into his hands until a time and times and half a time'. Kings are put for kingdoms, as above; and therefore the little horn is a little kingdom. It was a horn of the fourth (4th) Beast, and rooted up three (3) of his first (1st) horns; and therefore we are to look for it among the nations of the 'Latin' Empire, after the rise of the ten (10) horns. But it was a kingdom of a different kind from the other ten (10) kingdoms, having a life or soul peculiar to itself, with eyes and a mouth. By its eyes it was a Seer; and by its mouth speaking great things and changing times and laws, it was a Prophet as well as a King. And such a Seer, a Prophet and a King, is the Church of 'Rome'.

A Seer, Επισκοπος [Episkopos = over-seer], is a Bishop in the literal sense of the word; and this Church claims the universal Bishoprick. With his mouth he gives laws to kings and nations as an Oracle; and pretends to Infallibility, and that his dictates are binding to the whole world; which is to be a Prophet in the highest degree. In the eighth (8th) century, by rooting up and subduing the Exarchate of 'Ravenna', the kingdom of the 'Lombards', and the Senate and Dukedom of 'Rome', he acquired 'Peter's' Patrimony out of their dominions; and thereby rose up as a temporal Prince or King, or horn of the fourth (4th) Beast.

In a small book printed at 'Paris' A.C. 1689, entitled, 'An historical dissertation upon some coins of Charles the great', Ludovicus Pius, Lotharius, 'and their successors stamped at Rome', it is recorded, that in the days of Pope 'Leo' X, there was remaining in the 'Vatican', and till those days exposed to public view, an inscription in honour of 'Pipin' the father of 'Charles' the great, in these words: 'Pipinum pium, primum fuisse qui amplificandæ Ecclesiæ Romanæ viam aperuerit, Exarchatu Ravennate, & plurimis aliis oblatis'; "That 'Pipin' the pious was the first who opened a way to the grandeur of the Church of 'Rome', conferring upon her the Exarchate of 'Ravenna' and many other oblations." In and before the reign of the Emperors 'Gratian' and 'Theodosius', the Bishop of 'Rome' lived splendidly; but this was by the oblations of the 'Roman' Ladies, as 'Ammianus' describes. After those reigns 'Italy' was invaded by foreign nations, and did not get rid of her troubles before the fall of the kingdom of 'Lombardy'. It was certainly by the victory of the see of 'Rome' over the 'Greek' Emperor, the King of 'Lombardy', and the Senate of 'Rome', that she acquired 'Peter's' Patrimony, and rose up to her greatness. The donation of 'Constantine' the Great is a fiction, and so is the donation of the 'Alpes Cottiae' to the Pope by 'Aripert' King of the 'Lombards': for the 'Alpes Cottiae' were a part of the Exarchate, and in the days of 'Aripert' belonged to the 'Greek' Emperor.

The invocation of the dead, and veneration of their images, being gradually introduced in the 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th centuries, the 'Greek' Emperor 'Philippicus' declared against the latter, A.C. 711 or 712. And the Emperor 'Leo Isaurus', to put a stop to it, called a meeting of Counsellors and Bishops in his Palace, A.C. 726; and by their advice put out an Edict against that worship, and wrote to Pope 'Gregory' II. that a general Council might be called. But the Pope thereupon called a Council at 'Rome', confirmed the worship of Images, excommunicated the 'Greek' Emperor, absolved the people from their allegiance, and forbade them to pay tribute, or otherwise be obedient to him. Then the people of 'Rome, Campania, Ravenna' and 'Pentapolis', with the cities under them, revolted and laid violent hands upon their magistrates, killing the Exarch 'Paul' at 'Ravenna', and laying aside 'Peter' Duke of 'Rome' who was become blind: and when Exhilaratus Duke of Campania incited the people against the Pope, the 'Romans' invaded 'Campania', and slew him with his son 'Hadrian'. Then a new Exarch, 'Eutychius', coming to 'Naples', sent some secretly to take away the lives of the Pope and the Nobles of 'Rome': but the plot being discovered, the 'Romans' revolted absolutely from the 'Greek' Emperor, and took an oath to preserve the life of the Pope, to defend his state, and be obedient to his authority in all things. Thus 'Rome' with its Duchy, including part of 'Tuscany' and part of 'Campania', revolted in the year 726, and became a free state under the government of the Senate of this city. The authority of the Senate in civil affairs was henceforward absolute, the authority of the Pope extending hitherto no farther than to the affairs of the Church only.

At that time the 'Lombards' also being zealous for the worship of images, and pretending to favour the cause of the Pope, invaded the cities of the Exarchate: and at length, 'viz'. A.C. 752, took 'Ravenna', and put an end to the Exarchate. And this was the first (1st) of the three (3) kingdoms which fell before the little horn.

In the year 751 Pope 'Zechary' deposed 'Childeric', a slothful and useless King of 'France', and the last of the race of 'Merovæus'; and absolving his subjects from their oath of allegiance, gave the kingdom to 'Pipin' the major of the Palace; and thereby made a new and potent friend. His successor Pope 'Stephen' III, knowing better how to deal with the 'Greek' Emperor than with the 'Lombards', went the next year to the King of the 'Lombards', to persuade him to return the Exarchate to the Emperor. But this not succeeding, he went into 'France', and persuaded 'Pipin' to take the Exarchate and 'Pentapolis' from the 'Lombards', and give it to St. 'Peter'. Accordingly 'Pipin' A.C. 754 came with an army into 'Italy', and made 'Aistulphus' King of the 'Lombards' promise the surrender: but the next year 'Aistulphus', on the contrary, to revenge himself on the Pope, besieged the city of 'Rome'. Whereupon the Pope sent letters to 'Pipin', wherein he told him that if he came not speedily against the 'Lombards, pro data sibi potentia, alienandum fore à regno Dei & vita æterna', he should be excommunicated. 'Pipin' therefore, fearing a revolt of his subjects, and being indebted to the Church of 'Rome', came speedily with an army into 'Italy', raised the siege, besieged the 'Lombards' in 'Pavia', and forced them to surrender the Exarchate and region of 'Pentapolis' to the Pope for a perpetual possession. Thus the Pope became Lord of 'Ravenna', and the Exarchate, some few cities excepted; and the keys were sent to 'Rome', and laid upon the confession of St. 'Peter', that is, upon his tomb at the high Altar, 'in signum veri perpetuæ dominii, sed pietate Regis gratuita, as the inscription of a coin of 'Pipin' hath it. This was in the year of Christ 755. And henceforward the Popes being temporal Princes, left off in their Epistles and Bulls to note the years of the 'Greek' Emperors, as they had hitherto done.

After this the 'Lombards' invading the Pope's countries, Pope 'Adrian' sent to 'Charles' the great, the son and successor of 'Pipin', to come to his assistance. Accordingly 'Charles' entered 'Italy' with an army, invaded the 'Lombards', overthrew their kingdom, became master of their countries, and restored to the Pope, not only what they had taken from him, but also the rest of the Exarchate which they had promised 'Pipin' to surrender to him, but had hitherto detained; and also gave him some cities of the 'Lombards', and was in return himself made 'Patricius' by the 'Romans', and had the authority of confirming the elections of the Popes conferred upon him. These things were done in the years 773 and 774. This kingdom of the 'Lombards' was the second (2nd) kingdom which fell before the little horn. But Rome, which was to be the seat of his kingdom, was not yet his own.

In the year 796, 'Leo' III being made Pope, notified his election to Charles the great by his Legates, sending to him for a present, the golden keys of the Confession of 'Peter', and the Banner of the city of 'Rome': the first as an acknowledgment of the Pope's holding the cities of the Exarchate and 'Lombardy' by the grant of 'Charles'; the other as a signification that 'Charles' should come and subdue the Senate and people of 'Rome', as he had done the Exarchate and the kingdom of the 'Lombards'. For the Pope at the same time desired 'Charles' to send some of his Princes to 'Rome', who might subject the 'Roman' people to him, and bind them by oath 'in fide & subjectione', in fealty and subjection, as his words are recited by 'Sigonius'. An anonymous Poet, publish'd by 'Boeclerus' at 'Strasburg', expresseth it thus:

'Admonuitque piis precibus, qui mittere vellet
Ex propriis aliquos primoribus, ac sibi plebem
Subdere Romanam, servandaque fœdera cogens
Hanc fidei sacramentis promittere magnis'.

[In Bengal's Gnomon on the Apocalypse on 13:1, prop. 15, observ. 15, we read: "An anonymous poet, edited by Boecler, at Strasburg, describes it in this manner:—"And he admonished him with pious prayers, that he might be pleased to send some of his own chiefs, and to render the people of Rome subject to him, and compelling them to promise the keeping of their compact of fidelity by great oaths."

Hence arose a misunderstanding between the Pope and the city: and the 'Romans' about two or three years after, by assistance of some of the Clergy, raised such tumults against him, as gave occasion to a new state of things in all the 'West'. For two (2) of the Clergy accused him of crimes, and the 'Romans' with an armed force, seized him, stript him of his sacerdotal habit, and imprisoned him in a monastery. But by assistance of his friends he made his escape, and fled into 'Germany' to 'Charles' the great, to whom he complained of the 'Romans' for acting against him out of a design to throw off all authority of the Church, and to recover their antient freedom. In his absence his accusers with their forces ravaged the possessions of the Church, and sent the accusations to 'Charles'; who before the end of the year sent the Pope back to 'Rome' with a large retinue. The Nobles and Bishops of 'France' who accompanied him, examined the chief of his accusers at 'Rome', and sent them into 'France' in custody. This was in the year 799. The next year 'Charles' himself went to 'Rome', and upon a day appointed presided in a Council of 'Italian' and 'French' Bishops to hear both parties. But when the Pope's adversaries expected to be heard, the Council declared that he who was the supreme judge of all men, was above being judged by any other than himself: whereupon he made a solemn declaration of his innocence before all the people, and by doing so was looked upon as acquitted.

Soon after, upon 'Christmas'-day, the people of 'Rome', who had hitherto elected their Bishop, and reckoned that they and their Senate inherited the rights of the antient Senate and people of 'Rome', voted 'Charles' their Emperor, and subjected themselves to him in such manner as the old 'Roman' Empire and their Senate were subjected to the old 'Roman' Emperors. The Pope crowned him, and anointed him with holy oil, and worshipped him on his knees after the manner of adoring the old 'Roman' Emperors; as the aforesaid Poet thus relates:

Post laudes igitur dictas & summus eundem
Præsul adoravit, sicut mos debitus olim
Principibus fuit antiquis.

[Bengal's Gnom., as above: 'Therefore after the giving of praises, the chief Pontiff also adored the same, as was formerly the custom due to great princes.']

The Emperor, on the other hand, took the following oath to the Pope: In nomine Christi spondeo atque polliceor, Ego Carolus Imperator coram Deo & beato Petro Apostolo, me protectorem ac defensorem fore hujus sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ in omnibus utilitatibus, quatenus divino fultus fuero adjutorio, prout sciero poteroque. The Emperor was also made Consul of Rome, and his son Pipin crowned King of Italy: and henceforward the Emperor stiled himself: Carolus serenissimus, Augustus, à Deo coronatus, magnus, pacificus, Romæ gubernans imperium, or Imperator Romanorum; and was prayed for in the Churches of Rome. His image was henceforward put upon the coins of Rome: while the enemies of the Pope, to the number of three hundred Romans and two or three of the Clergy, were sentenced to death. The three hundred Romans were beheaded in one day in the Lateran fields: but the Clergymen at the intercession of the Pope were pardoned, and banished into France. And thus the title of Roman Emperor, which had hitherto been in the Greek Emperors, was by this act transferred in the West to the Kings of France.

After these things Charles gave the City and Duchy of Rome to the Pope, subordinately to himself as Emperor of the Romans; spent the winter in ordering the affairs of Rome, and those of the Apostolic see, and of all Italy, both civil and ecclesiastical, and in making new laws for them; and returned the next summer into France: leaving the city under its Senate, and both under the Pope and himself. But hearing that his new laws were not observed by the judges in dictating the law, nor by the people in hearing it; and that the great men took servants from free men, and from the Churches and Monasteries, to labour in their vineyards, fields, pastures and houses, and continued to exact cattle and wine of them, and to oppress those that served the Churches: he wrote to his son Pipin to remedy these abuses, to take care of the Church, and see his laws executed.

Now the Senate and people and principality of 'Rome' I take to be the third (3rd) King the little horn overcame, and even the chief (1st) of the three (3). For this people elected the Pope and the Emperor; and now, by electing the Emperor and making him Consul, was acknowledged to retain the authority of the old 'Roman' Senate and people. This city was the Metropolis of the old 'Roman' Empire, represented in 'Daniel' by the fourth (4th) Beast; and by subduing the Senate and people and Duchy, it became the Metropolis of the little horn of that Beast, and completed 'Peter's' Patrimony, which was the kingdom of that horn. Besides, this victory was attended with greater consequences than those over the other two (2) Kings. For it set up the 'Western Empire', which continues to this day. It set up the Pope above the judicature of the 'Roman' Senate, and above that of a Council of 'Italian' and 'French' Bishops, and even above all human judicature; and gave him the supremacy over the 'Western' Churches and their Councils in a high degree. It gave him 'a look more stout than his fellows'; so that when this new religion began to be established in the minds of men, he grappled not only with Kings, but even with the 'Western' Emperor himself. It is observable also, that the custom of kissing the Pope's feet, an honour superior to that of Kings and Emperors, began about this time. There are some instances of it in the ninth (9th) century: 'Platina' tells us, that the feet of Pope 'Leo' IV were kissed, according to antient custom, by all who came to him: and some say that 'Leo' III began this custom, pretending that his hand was infected by the kiss of a woman. The Popes began also about this time to canonize saints, and to grant indulgences and pardons: and some represent that 'Leo' III was the first author of all these things. It is further observable, that 'Charles' the great, between the years 775 and 796, conquered all 'Germany' from the 'Rhine' and 'Danube' northward to the 'Baltic' sea, and eastward to the river 'Teis'; extending his conquests also into 'Spain' as far as the river 'Ebro': and by these conquests he laid the foundation of the new Empire; and at the same time propagated the 'Roman' Catholic religion into all his conquests, obliging the 'Saxons' and 'Hunns' who were heathens, to receive the 'Roman' faith, and distributing his northern conquests into Bishopricks, granting tithes to the Clergy and 'Peter-pence' to the Pope: by all which the Church of 'Rome' was highly enlarged, enriched, exalted, and established.

In the forementioned 'dissertation upon some coins of Charles the great, Ludovicus Pius, Lotharius, and their successors, stamped at Rome, there is a draught of a piece of Mosaic work which Pope Leo III caused to be made in his Palace near the Church of 'John Lateran', in memory of his sending the standard or banner of the city of 'Rome' curiously wrought, to 'Charles' the great; and which still remained there at the publishing of the said book. In the 'Mosaic' work there appeared 'Peter' with three (3) keys in his lap, reaching the 'Pallium' to the Pope with his right hand, and the banner of the city to 'Charles' the great with his left. By the Pope was this inscription, SCISSIMUS D.N. LEO PP; by the King this, D.N. CARVLO REGI; and under the feet of Peter this, BEATE PETRE, DONA VITAM LEONI PP, ET BICTORIAM CARVLO REGI DONA. This Monument gives the title of King to 'Charles', and therefore was erected before he was Emperor. It was erected when 'Peter' was reaching the 'Pallium' to the Pope, and the Pope was sending the banner of the city to 'Charles', that is, A.C. 796. The words above, 'Sanctissimus Dominus noster Leo Papa Domino nostro Carolo Regi', relate to the message; and the words below, 'Beate Petre, dona vitam Leoni Papæ & victoriam Carolo regi dona', are a prayer that in this undertaking God would preserve the life of the Pope, and give victory to the King over the 'Romans'. The three (3) keys in the lap of 'Peter' signify the keys of the three (3) parts of his Patrimony, that of 'Rome' with its Duchy, which the Pope claimed and was conquering, those of 'Ravenna' with the Exarchate, and of the territories taken from the 'Lombards'; both which he had newly conquered. These were the three (3) dominions, whose keys were in the lap of St. 'Peter', and whose Crowns are now worn by the 'Pope', and by the conquest of which he became the little horn of the fourth Beast. By 'Peter's' giving the 'Pallium' to the Pope with his right hand, and the banner of the city to the King with his left, and by naming the Pope before the King in the inscription, may be understood that the Pope was then reckoned superior in dignity to the Kings of the earth.

After the death of 'Charles' the great, his son and successor 'Ludovicus Pius', at the request of the Pope, confirmed the donations of his grandfather and father to the see of 'Rome'. And in the confirmation he names first 'Rome' with its Duchy extending into 'Tuscany' and 'Campania'; then the Exarchate of 'Ravenna', with 'Pentapolis'; and in the third (3rd) place, the territories taken from the 'Lombards'. These are his three (3) conquests, and he was to hold them of the Emperor for the use of the Church 'sub integritate', entirely, without the Emperor's meddling therewith, or with the jurisdiction or power of the Pope therein, unless called thereto in certain cases. This ratification the Emperor 'Ludovicus' made under an oath: and as the King of the 'Ostrogoths', for acknowledging that he held his kingdom of 'Italy' of the 'Greek' Emperor, stamped the effigies of the Emperor on one side of his coins and his own on the reverse; so the Pope made the like acknowledgment to the 'Western' Emperor. For the Pope began now to coin money, and the coins of 'Rome' are henceforward found with the heads of the Emperors, 'Charles, Ludovicus Pius, Lotharius', and their successors, on the one side, and the Pope's inscription on the reverse, for many years. (Notes to Chap. VII: Chap. 7:8. Ver. 20,21. Ver. 24. Ver. 25. Sigonius de Regno Italiæ, ad Ann. 726. Sigonius ib. ad Ann. 726, 752. Sigon. ib. Ann. 750. Sigon. ib. Ann. 753, 754, 755. Sigon. ib. Ann. 773. Sigon. de Regno Ital. ad Ann. 796. Vide Anastasium. Sigon. de Regno Ital. Confirmationem recitat Sigonius, lib. 4. de Regno Italiæ, ad An. 817.)

VIII: Power of Eleventh (11th) horn of 'Daniel's' Fourth (4th) Beast, to Change Times & Laws.

{{ "In the reign of the 'Greek' Emperor 'Justinian', and again in the reign of 'Phocas', the Bishop of 'Rome' obtained some dominion over the 'Greek' Churches, but of no long continuance. His standing dominion was only over the nations of the 'Western Empire', represented by 'Daniel's' fourth (4th) Beast. And this jurisdiction was set up by the following Edict of the Emperors 'Gratian' and 'Valentinian'.
'—Volumus ut quicunque iudicio Damasi, quod ille cum Concilio quinque vel septem habuerit Episcoporum, vel eorum qui Catholici sunt iudicio vel Concilio condemnatus fuerit, si juste voluerit Ecclesiam retentare, ut qui ad sacerdotale iudicium per contumeliam non ivisset: ut ab illustribus viris Præfectis Prætorio Galliæ atque Italiæ, auctoritate adhibitâ, ad Episcopale iudicium remittatur, sive à Consularibus vel Vicariis, ut ad Urbem Romam sub prosecutione perveniat. Aut si in longinquioribus partibus alicujus ferocitas talis emergerit, omnis ejus causæ edictio ad Metropolitæ in eadem Provincia Episcopi deduceretur examen. Vel si ipse Metropolitanus est, Romam necessariò, vel ad eos quos Romanus Episcopus iudices dederit, sine delatione contendat.—Quod si vel Metropolitanus Episcopi vel cujuscunque sacerdotis iniquitas est suspecta, aut gratia; ad Romanum Episcopum, vel ad Concilium quindecim finitimorum Episcoporum accersitum liceat provocare; modo ne post examen habitum, quod definitum fuerit, integretur. This Edict wanting the name of both 'Valens' and 'Theodosius' in the Title, was made in the time between their reigns, that is, in the end of the year 378, or the beginning of 379. It was directed to the 'Præfecti Prætorio Italiæ & Galliæ', and therefore was general. For the 'Præfectus Prætorio Italiæ' governed 'Italy, Illyricum occidentale' and 'Africa'; and the 'Præfectus Prætorio Galliæ' governed 'Gallia, Spain', and 'Britain'.

The granting of this jurisdiction to the Pope gave several Bishops occasion to write to him for his resolutions upon doubtful cases, whereupon he answered by decretal Epistles; and hence forward he gave laws to the 'Western' Churches by such Epistles. 'Himerius' Bishop of 'Tarraco', the head city of a province in 'Spain', writing to Pope 'Damasus' for his direction about certain Ecclesiastical matters, and the Letter not arriving at 'Rome' till after the death of 'Damasus', A.C. 384; his successor 'Siricius' answered the same with a legislative authority, telling him of one (1) thing: 'Cum hoc fieri—missa ad Provincias à venerandæ memoriæ prædecessore meo Liberio generalia decreta, prohibeant'. Of another: 'Noverint se ab omni ecclesiastico honore, quo indignè usi sunt, Apostolicæ Sedis auctoritate, dejectos'. Of another: 'Scituri posthac omnium Provinciarum summi Antistites, quod si ultrò ad sacros ordines quenquam de talibus esse assumendum, & de suo & de aliorum statu, quos contra Canones & interdicta nostra provexerint, congruam ab Apostolica Sede promendam esse sententiam'. And the Epistle he concludes thus: 'Explicuimus, ut arbitror, frater charissime, universa quæ digesta sunt in querelam; & ad singulas causas, de quibus ad Romanam Ecclesiam, utpote ad caput tui corporis, retulisti; sufficientia, quantum opinor, responsa reddidimus. Nunc fraternitatis tuæ animum ad servandos canones, & tenenda decretalia constituta, magis ac magis incitamus: ad hæc quæ ad tua consulta rescripsimus in omnium Coepiscoporum perferri facias notionem; & non solum eorum, qui in tua sunt diœcesi constituti, sed etiam ad universos Carthaginenses ac Bæticos, Lusitanos atque Gallicos, vel eos qui vicinis tibi collimitant hinc inde Provinciis, hæc quæ a nobis sunt salubri ordinatione disposita, sub literarum tuarum prosecutione mittantur. Et quanquam statuta sedis Apostolicæ vel Canonum venerabilia definita, nulli Sacerdotum Domini ignorare sit liberum: utilius tamen, atque pro antiquitate sacerdotii tui, dilectioni tuæ esse admodum poterit gloriosum, si ea quæ ad te speciali nomine generaliter scripta sunt, per unanimatis tuæ sollicitudinem in universorum fratrum nostrorum notitiam perferantur; quatenus & quæ à nobis non inconsultè sed providè sub nimia cautela & deliberatione sunt salubriter constituta, intemerata permaneant, & omnibus in posterum excusationibus aditus, qui jam nulli apud nos patere poterit, obstruatur. Dat. 3 Id. Febr. Arcadio & Bautone viris clarissimis Consulibus', A.C. 385. Pope 'Liberius' in the reign of 'Jovian' or 'Valentinian' I sent general Decrees to the Provinces, ordering that the 'Arians' should not be rebaptized: and this he did in favour of the Council of 'Alexandria', that nothing more should be required of them than to renounce their opinions. Pope 'Damasus' is said to have decreed in a 'Roman' Council, that 'Tithes' and 'Tenths' should be paid upon pain of an 'Anathema'; and that 'Glory be to the Father', &c. should be said or sung at the end of the 'Psalms'. But the first decretal Epistle now extant is this of 'Siricius' to 'Himerius'; by which the Pope made 'Himerius' his Vicar over all 'Spain' for promulging his Decrees, and seeing them observed. The Bishop of 'Sevill' was also the Pope's Vicar sometimes; for 'Simplicius' wrote thus to 'Zeno' Bishop of that place: 'Talibus idcirco gloriantes indiciis, congruum duximus vicariâ Sedis nostræ te auctoritate fulciri: cujus vigore munitus, Apostolicæ institutionis Decreta, vel sanctorum terminos Patrum, nullatenus transcendendi permittas'. And Pope 'Hormisda' made the Bishop of 'Sevill' his Vicar over 'Bætica' and 'Lusitania', and the Bishop of 'Tarraco' his Vicar over all the rest of 'Spain', as appears by his Epistles to them.

Pope 'Innocent' the first, in his decretal Epistle to 'Victricius' Bishop of 'Rouen' in 'France', A.C. 404, in pursuance of the Edict of 'Gratian', made this Decree: 'Si quæ autem causæ vel contentiones inter Clericos tam superioris ordinis quam etiam inferioris fuerint exortæ; ut secundum Synodum Nicenam congregatis ejusdem Provinciæ Episcopis jurgium terminetur: nec alicui liceat, Romanæ Ecclesiæ, cujus in omnibus causis debet reverentia custodiri, relictis his sacerdotibus, qui in eadem Provincia Dei Ecclesiam nutu Divino gubernant, ad alias convolare Provincias. Quod si quis fortè præsumpserit; & ab officio Clericatûs summotus, & injuriarum reus judicetur. Si autem majores causæ in medium fuerint devolutæ, ad Sedem Apostolicam sicut Synodus statuit, & beata consuetudo exigit, post judicium Episcopale referantur'. By these Letters it seems to me that 'Gallia' was now subject to the Pope, and had been so for some time, and that the Bishop of 'Rouen' was then his Vicar or one (1) of them: for the Pope directs him to refer the greater causes to the See of 'Rome', according to custom. But the Bishop of 'Arles' soon after became the Pope's Vicar over all 'Gallia': for Pope 'Zosimus', A.C. 417, ordaining that none should have access to him without the credentials of his Vicars, conferred upon 'Patroclus' the Bishop of 'Arles' this authority over all 'Gallia', by the following Decree.

'Zosimus universis Episcopis per Gallias & septem Provincias constitutis. Placuit Apostolicæ Sedi, ut si quis ex qualibet Galliarum parte sub quolibet ecclesiastico gradu ad nos Romæ venire contendit, vel aliò terrarum ire disponit, non aliter proficiscatur nisi Metropolitanus Episcopus Formatas acceperit, quibus sacerdotium suum vel locum ecclesiasticum quem habet, scriptorum ejus adstipulatione perdoceat: quod ex gratia statuimus quia plures episcopi sive presbyteri sive ecclesiastici simulantes, quia nullum documentum Formatarum extat per quod valeant confutari, in nomen venerationis irrepunt, & indebitam reverentiam promerentur. Quisquis igitur, fratres charissimi, prætermisâ supradicti Formatâ sive episcopus, sive presbyter, sive diaconus, aut deinceps inferiori gradu sit, ad nos venerit: sciat se omnino suscipi non posse. Quam auctoritatem ubique nos misisse manifestum est, ut cunctis regionibus innotescat id quod statuimus omnimodis esse servandum. Si quis autem hæc salubriter constituta temerare tentaverit sponte suâ, se a nostra noverit communione discretum. Hoc autem privilegium Formatarum sancto Patroclo fratri & coepiscopo nostro, meritorum ejus speciali contemplatione, concessimus'. And that the Bishop of 'Arles' was sometimes the Pope's Vicar over all 'France', is affirmed also by all the Bishops of the Diocese of 'Arles' in their Letter to Pope 'Leo' I. 'Cui id etiam honoris dignitatisque collatum est, say they, ut non tantum has Provincias potestate propriâ gubernaret; verum etiam omnes Gallias sibi Apostolicæ Sedis vice mandatas, sub omni ecclesiastica regula contineret'. And Pope 'Pelagius' I. A.C. 556, in his Epistle to 'Sapaudus' Bishop of 'Arles': 'Majorum nostrorum, operante Dei misericordiâ, cupientes inhærere vestigiis & eorum actus divino examine in omnibus imitari: Charitati tuæ per universam Galliam, sanctæ Sedis Apostolicæ, cui divinâ gratiâ præsidemus, vices injungimus'.

By the influence of the same imperial Edict, not only Spain and 'Gallia', but also 'Illyricum' became subject to the Pope. 'Damasus' made 'Ascholius', or 'Acholius', Bishop of 'Thessalonica' the Metropolis of 'Oriental Illyricum', his Vicar for hearing of causes; and in the year 382, 'Acholius' being summoned by Pope 'Damasus', came to a Council at 'Rome'. Pope 'Siricius' the successor of 'Damasus', decreed that no Bishop should be ordained in 'Illyricum' without the consent of 'Anysius' the successor of 'Acholius'. And the following Popes gave 'Rufus' the successor of 'Anysius', a power of calling Provincial Councils: for in the Collections of 'Holstenius' there is an account of a Council of 'Rome' convened under Pope 'Boniface' II in which were produced Letters of 'Damasus, Siricius, Innocent' I, 'Boniface' I, and 'Cælestine' Bishops of 'Rome', to 'Ascholius, Anysius' and 'Rufus', Bishops of 'Thessalonica': in which Letters they commend to them the hearing of causes in 'Illyricum', granted by the Lord and the holy Canons to the Apostolic See thro'out that Province. And Pope 'Siricius' saith in his Epistle to 'Anysius': 'Etiam dudum, frater charissime, per Candidianum Episcopum, qui nos præcessit ad Dominum, hujusmodi literas dederamus, ut nulla licentia esset, sine consensu tuo in Illyrico Episcopos ordinare præsumere, quæ utrum ad te pervenerint scire non potui. Multa enim gesta sunt per contentionem ab Episcopis in ordinationibus faciendis, quod tua melius caritas novit'. And a little after: 'Ad omnem enim hujusmodi audaciam comprimendam vigilare debet instantia tua, Spiritu in te Sancto fervente: ut vel ipse, si potes, vel quos judicaveris Episcopos idoneos, cum literis dirigas, dato consensu qui possit, in ejus locum qui defunctus vel depositus fuerit, Catholicum Episcopum vitæ & moribus probatum, secundum Nicænæ Synodi statuta vel Ecclesiæ Romanæ, Clericum de Clero meritum ordinare'. And Pope 'Innocent' I saith in his Epistle to 'Anysius': 'Cui [Anysio] etiam anteriores tanti ac tales viri prædecessores mei Episcopi, id est, sanctæ memoriæ Damasus, Siricius, atque supra memoratus vir ita detulerunt; ut omnia quæ in omnibus illis partibus gererentur, Sanctitati tuæ, quæ plena justitiæ est, traderent cognoscenda'. And in his Epistle to 'Rufus' the successor of 'Anysius': 'Ita longis intervallis disternatis à me ecclesiis discat consulendum; ut prudentiæ gravitæque tuæ committendam curam causasque, siquæ exoriantur, per Achaïæ, Thessaliæ, Epiri veteris, Epiri novæ, & Cretæ, Daciæ mediterraneæ, Daciæ ripensis, Mæsiæ, Dardaniæ, & Prævali ecclesias, Christo Domino annuente, censeam. Verè enim ejus sacratissimis monitis lectissimæ sinceritatis tuæ providentiæ & virtuti hanc injungimus sollicitudinem: non primitus hæc statuentes, sed Præcessores nostros Apostolicos imitati, qui beatissimis Acholio & Anysio injungi pro meritis ista voluerunt'. And Boniface I in his decretal Epistle to 'Rufus' and the rest of the Bishops in 'Illyricum': 'Nullus, ut frequenter dixi, alicujus ordinationem citra ejus [Episcopi Thessalonicensis] conscientiam celebrare præsumat: cui, ut supra dictum est, vice nostrâ cuncta committimus'. And Pope 'Cælestine', in his decretal Epistle to the Bishops thro'out 'Illyricum', saith: 'Vicem nostram per vestram Provinciam noveritis [Rufo] esse commissam, ita ut ad eum, fratres carissimi, quicquid de causis agitur, referatur. Sine ejus consilio nullus ordinetur. Nullus usurpet, eodem inconscio, commissam illi Provinciam; colligere nisi cum ejus voluntate Episcopus non præsumat'. And in the cause of 'Perigenes', in the title of his Epistle, he thus enumerates the Provinces under this Bishop: 'Rufo & cæteris Episcopis per Macedoniam, Achaïam, Thessaliam, Epirum veterem, Epirum novam, Prævalin, & Daciam constitutis'. And Pope 'Xistus' in a decretal Epistle to the same Bishops: 'Illyricanæ omnes Ecclesiæ, ut à decessoribus nostris recepimus, & nos quoque fecimus, ad curam nunc pertinent Thessalonicensis Antistitis, ut suâ sollicitudine, siquæ inter fratres nascentur, ut assolent, actiones distinguat atque definiat; & ad eum, quicquid à singulis sacerdotibus agitur, referatur. Sit Concilium, quotiens causæ fuerint, quotiens ille pro necessitatibus emergentium ratione decreverit'. And Pope 'Leo' I in his decretal Epistle to 'Anastasius' Bishop of 'Thessalonica': 'Singulis autem Metropolitanis sicut potestas ista committitur, ut in suis Provinciis jus habeant ordinandi; ita eos Metropolitanos à te volumus ordinari; maturo tamen & decocto judicio'.

'Occidental Illyricum' comprehended 'Pannonia prima' and 'secunda, Savia, Dalmatia, Noricum mediterraneum', and 'Noricum ripense'; and its Metropolis was 'Sirmium', till 'Attila' destroyed this city. Afterwards 'Laureacum' became the Metropolis of 'Noricum' and both 'Pannonias', and 'Salona' the Metropolis of 'Dalmatia'. Now the Bishops of 'Laureacum' and 'Salona' received the Pallium from the Pope: and 'Zosimus', in his decretal Epistle to 'Hesychius' Bishop of 'Salona', directed him to denounce the Apostolic decrees as well to the Bishops of his own, as to those of the neighbouring Provinces. The subjection of these Provinces to the See of 'Rome' seems to have begun in 'Anemius', who was ordained Bishop of 'Sirmium' by 'Ambrose' Bishop of 'Millain', and who in the Council of 'Aquileia' under Pope 'Damasus', A.C. 381, declared his sentence in these words: 'Caput Illyrici non nisi civitas Sirmiensis: Ego igitur illius civitatis Episcopus sum. Eum qui non confitetur filium Dei æternum, & coeternum patri, qui est sempiternus, anathema dico'. The next year 'Anemius' and 'Ambrose', with 'Valerian' Bishop of 'Aquileia, Acholias' Bishop of 'Thessalonica', and many others, went to the Council of 'Rome', which met for overruling the 'Greek' Church by majority of votes, and exalting the authority of the Apostolic See, as was attempted before in the Council of 'Sardica'.

'Aquileia' was the second (2nd) city of the 'Western Empire', and by some called the second (2nd) 'Rome'. It was the Metropolis of 'Istria, Forum Julium', and 'Venetia'; and its subjection to the See of 'Rome' is manifest by the decretal Epistle of 'Leo' I directed to 'Nicetas' Bishop of this city; for the Pope begins his Epistle thus: 'Regressus ad nos filius meus Adeodatus Diaconus Sedis nostræ, dilectionem tuam poposcisse memorat, ut de his à nobis auctoritatem Apostolicæ Sedis acciperes, quæ quidem magnam difficultatem dijudicationis videntur afferre'. Then he sets down an answer to the questions proposed by 'Nicetas', and concludes thus: 'Hanc autem Epistolam nostram, quam ad consultationem tuæ fraternitatis emisimus, ad omnes fratres & comprovinciales tuos Episcopos facies pervenire, ut in omnium observantia, data profit autoritas'. 'Data 1-2 Kal. Apr. Majorano Aug. Cos'. A.C. 458. 'Gregory' the great A.C. 591, cited 'Severus' Bishop of 'Aquileia' to appear before him in judgment in a Council at 'Rome'.

The Bishops of 'Aquileia' and 'Millain' created one another, and therefore were of equal authority, and alike subject to the See of 'Rome'. Pope 'Pelagius' about the year 557, testified this in the following words: 'Mos antiquus fuit', saith he, 'ut quia pro longinquitate vel difficultate itineris, ab Apostolico illis onerosum fuerit ordinari, ipsi se invicem Mediolanensis & Aquileiensis ordinare Episcopos debuissent'. These words imply that the ordination of these two (2) Bishops belonged to the See of 'Rome'. When 'Laurentius' Bishop of 'Millain' had excommunicated 'Magnus', one of his Presbyters, and was dead, 'Gregory' the great absolved 'Magnus', and sent the 'Pallium' to the new elected Bishop 'Constantius'; whom the next year he reprehended of partiality in judging 'Fortunatus', and commanded him to send 'Fortunatus' to 'Rome' to be judged there: four (4) years after he appointed the Bishops of 'Millain' and 'Ravenna' to hear the cause of one (1) 'Maximus'; and two (2) years after, 'viz'. A.C. 601, when 'Constantius' was dead, and the people of 'Millain' had elected 'Deusdedit' his successor, and the 'Lombard's' had elected another, 'Gregory' wrote to the Notary, Clergy, and People of 'Millain', that by the authority of his Letters 'Deusdedit' should be ordained, and that he whom the 'Lombards' had ordained was an unworthy successor of 'Ambrose': whence I gather, that the Church of 'Millain' had continued in this state of subordination to the See of 'Rome' ever since the days of 'Ambrose'; for 'Ambrose' himself acknowledged the authority of that See. 'Ecclesia Romana', saith he, 'hanc consuetudinem non habet, cujus typum in omnibus sequimur, & formam'. And a little after: 'In omnibus cupio sequi Ecclesiam Romanam'. And in his Commentary upon 1st 'Tim'. 3 'Cum totus mundus Dei sit, tamen domus ejus Ecclesia dicitur, cujus hodie rector est Damasus'. In his Oration on the death of his brother 'Satyrus', he relates how his brother coming to a certain city of 'Sardinia', 'advocavit Episcopum loci, percontatusque est ex eo utrum cum Episcopis Catholicis hoc est cum Romana Ecclesia conveniret?' And in conjunction with the Synod of 'Aquileia' A.C. 381, in a synodical Epistle to the Emperor 'Gratian', he saith: 'Totius orbis Romani caput Romanam Ecclesiam, atque illam sacrosanctam Apostolorum fidem, ne turbari sineret, obsecranda fuit clementia vestra; inde enim in omnes venerandæ communionis jura dimanant'. The Churches therefore of 'Aquileia' and 'Millain' were subject to the See of 'Rome' from the days of the Emperor 'Gratian'. 'Auxentius' the predecessor of 'Ambrose' was not subject to the see of 'Rome', and consequently the subjection of the Church of 'Millain' began in 'Ambrose'. This Diocese of 'Millain' contained 'Liguria' with 'Insubria', the 'Alpes Cottiae' and 'Rhætia'; and was divided from the Diocese of 'Aquileia' by the river 'Addua'. In the year 844, the Bishop of 'Millain' broke off from the See of 'Rome', and continued in this separation about 200 years, as is thus related by 'Sigonius': Eodem anno Angilbertus Mediolanensis Archiepiscopus ab Ecclesia Romana parum comperta de causa descivit, tantumque exemplo in posterum valuit, ut non nisi post ducentos annos Ecclesia Mediolanensis ad Romanæ obedientiam auctoritatemque redierit'.

The Bishop of 'Ravenna', the Metropolis of 'Flaminia' and 'Æmilia', was also subject to the Pope: for 'Zosimus', A.C. 417, excommunicated some of the Presbyters of that Church, and wrote a commonitory Epistle about them to the Clergy of that Church as a branch of the 'Roman' Church: 'In sua', saith he, 'hoc est, in Ecclesia nostra Romana'. When those of 'Ravenna', having elected a new Bishop, gave notice thereof to Pope 'Sixtus', the Pope set him aside, and ordained 'Peter Chrysologus' in his room. 'Chrysologus' in his Epistle to 'Eutyches', extant in the Acts of the Council of 'Chalcedon', wrote thus: 'Nos pro studio pacis & fidei, extra consensum Romanæ civitatis Episcopi, causas fidei audire non possumus'. Pope 'Leo' I being consulted by 'Leo' Bishop of 'Ravenna' about some questions, answered him by a decretal Epistle A.C. 451. And Pope 'Gregory' the great, reprehending 'John' Bishop of 'Ravenna' about the use of the 'Pallium', tells him of a Precept of one of his Predecessors, Pope 'John', commanding that all the Privileges formerly granted to the Bishop and Church of 'Ravenna' should be kept: to this 'John' returned a submissive answer; and after his death Pope 'Gregory' ordered a visitation of the Church of 'Ravenna', confirmed the privileges heretofore granted them, and sent his 'Pallium', as of antient custom, to their new Bishop 'Marinian'. Yet this Church revolted sometimes from the Church of 'Rome', but returned again to its obedience.

The rest of 'Italy', with the Islands adjacent, containing the 'suburbicarian' regions, or ten Provinces under the temporal Vicar of 'Rome', viz. ¹Campania, ²Tuscia and Umbria, ³Picenum suburbicarium, ⁴Sicily, ⁵Apulia and Calabria, ⁶Brutii and Lucania, ⁷Samnium, ⁸Sardinia, ⁹Corsica, and ¹⁰Valeria, constituted the proper Province of the Bishop of 'Rome'. For the Council of 'Nice' in their fifth (5th) Canon ordained that Councils should be held every spring and autumn in every Province; and according to this Canon, the Bishops of this Province met at 'Rome' every half year. In this sense Pope 'Leo' I. applied this Canon to 'Rome', in a decretal Epistle to the Bishops of 'Sicily', written 'Alippio & Ardabure Coss'. A.C. 447. 'Quia saluberrime', saith he, 'à sanctis patribus constitutum est, binos in annis singulis Episcoporum debere esse conventus, terni semper ex vobis ad diem tertium Kalendarum Octobrium Romam æterno concilio sociandi occurrant. Et indissimulanter à vobis hæc consuetudo servetur, quoniam adjuvante Dei gratiâ, facilius poterit provideri, ut in Ecclesiis Christi nulla scandala, nulli nascentur errores; cum coram Apostolo Petro semper in communione tractatum fuerit, ut omnia Canonum Decreta apud omnes Domini sacerdotes inviolata permaneant'. The Province of 'Rome' therefore comprehended 'Sicily', with so much of 'Italy' and the neighbouring Islands as sent Bishops to the annual Councils of 'Rome'; but extended not into the Provinces of 'Ravenna, Aquileia, Millain, Arles', &c. those Provinces having Councils of their own. The Bishops in every Province of the 'Roman' Empire were convened in Council by the Metropolitan or Bishop of the head city of the Province, and this Bishop presided in that Council: but the Bishop of 'Rome' did not only preside in his own Council of the Bishops of the 'suburbicarian' regions, but also gave Orders to the Metropolitans of all the other Provinces in the 'Western Empire', as their universal governor; as may be further perceived by the following instances.

Pope 'Zosimus' A.C. 417, cited 'Proculus' Bishop of 'Marseilles' to appear before a Council at 'Rome' for illegitimate Ordinations; and condemned him, as he mentions in several of his Epistles. Pope 'Boniface' I A.C. 419, upon a complaint of the Clergy of 'Valentia' against 'Maximus' a Bishop, summoned the Bishops of all 'Gallia' and the seven Provinces to convene in a Council against him; and saith in his Epistle, that his Predecessors had done the like. Pope 'Leo' I called a general Council of all the Provinces of 'Spain' to meet in 'Gallæcia' against the 'Manichees' and 'Priscillianists', as he says in his decretal Epistle to 'Turribius a Spanish' Bishop. And in one of his decretal Epistles to 'Nicetas' Bishop of 'Aquileia', he commands him to call a Council of the Bishops of that Province against the 'Pelagians', which might ratify all the Synodal Decrees which had been already ratified by the See of 'Rome' against this heresy. And in his decretal Epistle to 'Anastasius' Bishop of 'Thessalonica', he ordained that Bishop should hold two Provincial Councils every year, and refer the harder causes to the See of 'Rome': and if upon any extraordinary occasion it should be necessary to call a Council, he should not be troublesome to the Bishops under him, but content himself with two Bishops out of every Province, and not detain them above fifteen (15) days. In the same Epistle he describes the form of Church-Government then set up, to consist in a subordination of all the Churches to the See of 'Rome: De qua forma', saith he, 'Episcoporum quoque est orta distinctio, & magna dispositione provisum est ne omnes sibi omnia vindicarent, sed essent in singulis Provinciis singuli quorum inter fratres haberetur prima sententia, & rursus quidam in majoribus urbibus constituti sollicitudinem sumerent ampliolem, per quos ad unam Petri Sedem universalis Ecclesiæ cura conflueret, & nihil usque à suo capite dissideret. Qui ergo scit se quibusdam esse præpositum, non moleste ferat aliquem sibi esse præpositum; sed obedientiam quam exigit etiam ipse dependat; et sicut non vult gravis oneris sarcinam ferre, ita non audeat aliis importabile pondus imponere'. These words sufficiently shew the monarchical form of government then set up in the Churches of the 'Western Empire' under the Bishop of 'Rome', by means of the imperial Decree of 'Gratian', and the appeals and decretal Epistles grounded thereupon.

The same Pope 'Leo', having in a Council at 'Rome' passed sentence upon 'Hilary' Bishop of 'Arles', for what he had done by a Provincial Council in 'Gallia', took occasion from thence to procure the following Edict from the 'Western' Emperor 'Valentinian' III for the more absolute establishing the authority of his See over all the Churches of the 'Western Empire'.

'Impp. Theodosius & Valentinianus AA. Aetio Viro illustri, Comiti & Magistro utriusque militiæ & Patricio'.

'Certum est & nobis & imperio nostro unicum esse præsidium in supernæ Divinitatis favore, ad quem promerendum præcipue Christiana fides & veneranda nobis religio suffragatur. Cum igitur Sedis Apostolicæ Primatum sancti Petri meritum, qui princeps est Episcopalis coronæ & Romanæ dignitas civitatis, sacræ etiam Synodi firmavit auctoritas: ne quid præter auctoritatem Sedis istius illicitum præsumptio attemperare nitatur: tunc enim demum Ecclesiarum pax ubique servabitur, si Rectorem suum agnoscat Universitas. Hæc cum hactenus inviolabiliter suerint custodita, Hilarius Arelatensis, sicut venerabilis viri Leonis Romani Papæ fideli relatione comperimus, contumaci ausu illicita quædam præsumenda tentavit, & ideo Transalpinas Ecclesias abominabilis tumultus invasit, quod recens maximè testatur exemplum. Hilarius enim qui Episcopus Arelatensis vocatur, Ecclesiæ Romanæ urbis inconsulto Pontifice indebitas sibi ordinationes Episcoporum solâ temeritate usurpans invasit. Nam alios incompetenter removit; indecenter alios, invitis & repugnantibus civibus, ordinavit. Qui quidem, quoniam non facile ab his qui non elegerant, recipiebantur, manum sibi contrahebat armatam, & claustra murorum in hostilem morem vel obsidione cingebat, vel aggressionem reserabat, & ad sedem quietis pacem prædicaturus per bella ducebat: His talibus contra Imperii majestatem, & contra reverentiam Apostolicæ Sedis admissis, per ordinem religiosi viri Urbis Papæ cognitione discussis, certa in eum, ex his quos malè ordinaverat, lata sententia est. Erat quidem ipsa sententia per Gallias etiam sine Imperiali Sanctione valitura: quid enim Pontificis auctoritate non liceret? Sed nostram quoque præceptionem hæc ratio provocavit. Nec ulterius vel Hilario, quem adhuc Episcopum nuncupare sola mansueta Præsulis permittit humanitas, nec cuiquam alteri ecclesiasticis rebus arma miscere, aut præceptis Romani Antistitis liceat obviare: ausibus enim talibus fides & reverentia nostri violatur Imperii. Nec hoc solum, quod est maximi criminis, submovemus: verum ne levis saltem inter Ecclesias turba nascatur, vel in aliquo minui religionis disciplina videatur, hoc perenni sanctione discernimus; nequid tam Episcopis Gallicanis quam aliarum Provinciarum contra consuetudinem veterem liceat, sine viri venerabilis Papæ Urbis æternæ auctoritate, tentare. Sed illis omnibusque pro lege sit, quicquid sanxit vel sanxerit Apostolicæ Sedis auctoritas: ita ut quisquis Episcoporum ad iudicium Romani Antistitis evocatus venire neglexerit, per Moderatorem ejusdem Provinciæ adesse cogatur, per omnia servatis quæ Divi parentes nostri Romanæ Ecclesiæ detulerunt, Aetî pater carissime Augusti. Unde illustris & præclara magnificentia tua præsentis Edictalis Legis auctoritate faciet quæ sunt superius statuta servari, decem librarum auri multa protinus exigenda ab unoquoque Judice qui passus fuerit præcepta nostra violari. Divinitas te servet per multos annos, parens carissime'. 'Dat. viii. Id. Jun. Romæ, Valentiniano A. vi. Consule', A.C. 445. By this Edict the Emperor 'Valentinian' enjoined an absolute obedience to the will of the Bishop of 'Rome' thro'out all the Churches of his Empire; and declares, that for the Bishops to attempt any thing without the Pope's authority is contrary to antient custom, and that the Bishops summoned to appear before his judicature must be carried thither by the Governor of the Province; and he ascribes these privileges of the See of 'Rome' to the concessions of his dead Ancestors, that is, to the Edict of 'Gratian' and 'Valentinian' II as above: by which reckoning this dominion of the Church of 'Rome' was now of 66 years standing: and if in all this time it had not been sufficiently established, this new Edict was enough to settle it beyond all question thro'out the 'Western Empire'.

Hence all the Bishops of the Province of 'Arles' in their Letter to Pope 'Leo', A.C. 450, petitioning for a restitution of the privileges of their Metropolitan, say: 'Per beatum Petrum Apostolorum principem, sacrosancta Ecclesia Romana tenebat supra omnes totius mundi Ecclesias principatum'. And 'Ceratus, Salonius' and 'Veranus', three Bishops of 'Gallia', say, in their Epistle to the same Pope: 'Magna præterea & ineffabili quadam nos peculiares tui gratulatione succrescimus, quod illa specialis doctrinæ vestræ pagina ita per omnium Ecclesiarum conventicula celebratur, ut vere consona omnium sententia declaretur; merito illic principatum Sedis Apostolicæ constitutum, unde adhuc Apostolici spiritus oracula reserentur'. And Leo himself, in his Epistle to the metropolitan Bishops thro'out Illyricum: Quia per omnes Ecclesias cura nostra distenditur, exigente hoc à nobis Domino, qui Apostolicæ dignitatis beatissimo Apostolo Petro primum, fidei sui remuneratione commisit, universalem Ecclesiam in fundamenti ipsius soliditate constituens.

While this Ecclesiastical Dominion was rising up, the northern barbarous nations invaded the 'Western Empire', and founded several kingdoms therein, of different religions from the Church of 'Rome'. But these kingdoms by degrees embraced the 'Roman' faith, and at the same time submitted to the Pope's authority. The 'Franks' in 'Gaul' submitted in the end of the fifth (5th) Century, the 'Goths' in 'Spain' in the end of the sixth (6th); and the 'Lombards' in 'Italy' were conquered by 'Charles' the great A.C. 774. Between the years 775 and 794, the same 'Charles' extended the Pope's authority over all 'Germany' and 'Hungary' as far as the river 'Theysse' and the 'Baltic' sea; he then set him above all human judicature, and at the same time assisted him in subduing the City and Duchy of 'Rome'. By the conversion of the ten kingdoms to the 'Roman' religion, the Pope only enlarged his spiritual dominion, but did not yet rise up as a horn of the Beast. It was his temporal dominion which made him one of the horns: and this dominion he acquired in the latter half of the eighth century, by subduing three of the former horns as above. And now being arrived at a temporal dominion, and a power above all human judicature, he reigned 'with a look more stout than his fellows', and 'times and laws were' henceforward 'given into his hands, for a time times and half a time', or three (3) times and an half (1/2); that is, for 1260 solar years, reckoning a time for a Calendar year of 360 days, and a day for a solar year. After which 'the judgment is to sit, and they shall take away his dominion', not at once, but by degrees, 'to consume, and to destroy it unto the end. And the kingdom and dominion, and greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall', by degrees, 'be given unto the people of the saints of the most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him'.

(Notes to Chap. VIII. 'See the Annals of' Baronius, Anno 381. Sect. 6. Populos Gallicia. Hormisd. Epist. 24. 26. 'The words', sine auctoritate, 'seem wanting'. Vide Caroli a S. Paulo Geographiam sacram, p. 72, 73. Greg. M. lib. 1. Indic. 9. Epist. 16. Apud Gratianum de Mediolanensi & Aquileiensi Episcopis. Greg. M. lib. 3. Epist. 26. & lib. 4. Epist. 1. Greg. lib. 5. Epist. 4. Greg. lib. 9. Epist. 10 & 67. Greg. lib. 11. Epist. 3, 4. Ambros. l. 3. de sacramentis, c. 1. Sigonius de Regno Italiæ, lib. 5. 'See' Baronius, Anno 433. Sect. 24. Greg. M. lib. 3. Epist. 56, 57. & lib. 5. Epist. 25, 26, 56. Epist. 25. apud Holstenium. Dan. 7:20. Ver. 25. Ver. 26. Ver. 27.)"}}

IX: Kingdoms Represented in 'Daniel' by Ram & He-Goat.

{{ "The second (2nd) and third (3rd) Empires, represented by the Bear and Leopard, are again represented by the Ram and He-Goat; but with this difference, that the Ram represents the kingdoms of the 'Medes' and 'Persians' from the beginning of the four (4) Empires, and the Goat represents the kingdom of the 'Greeks' to the end of them. By this means, under the type of the Ram and He-Goat, the times of all the four (4) Empires are again described: 'I lifted up mine eyes', saith 'Daniel, and saw, and behold there stood before the river [Ulai] a Ram which had two (2) horns, and the two (2) horns were high, but one (1) was higher than the other (1), and the higher came up last'. — 'And the Ram having two (2) horns, are the kings of Media and Persia': not two (2) persons but two (2) kingdoms, the kingdoms of 'Media' and 'Persia'; and the kingdom of 'Persia' was the higher horn and came up last. The kingdom of 'Persia' rose up, when 'Cyrus' having newly conquered 'Babylon', revolted from 'Darius' King of the 'Medes', and beat him at 'Pasargadæ', and set up the 'Persians' above the 'Medes'. This was the horn which came up last. And the horn which came up first (1st) was the kingdom of the 'Medes', from the time that 'Cyaxares' and 'Nebuchadnezzar' overthrew 'Nineveh', and shared the Empire of the 'Assyrians' between them. The Empires of 'Media' and 'Babylon' were contemporary, and rose up together by the fall of the 'Assyrian' Empire; and the Prophecy of the four (4) Beasts begins with one (1) of them, and that of the Ram and He-Goat with the other. As the Ram represents the kingdom of 'Media' and 'Persia' from the beginning of the four Empires; so the He-Goat represents the Empire of the 'Greeks' to the end of those Monarchies. In the reign of his great horn, and of the four (4) horns which succeeded it, he represents this Empire during the reign of the Leopard: and in the reign of his little horn, which stood up in the latter time of the kingdom of the four (4), and after their fall became mighty but not by his own power, he represents it during the reign of the fourth (4th) Beast.

'The rough Goat', saith 'Daniel, is the King of Grecia', that is, the kingdom; 'and the great horn between his eyes is the first King': not the first Monarch, but the first kingdom, that which lasted during the reign of 'Alexander' the great, and his brother 'Aridæus' and two young sons, 'Alexander' and 'Hercules'. 'Now that [horn] being broken off, whereas four (4) [horns] stood up for it, four (4) kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation [of the Greeks], but not in his [the first horn's] power'. The four (4) horns are therefore four (4) kingdoms; and by consequence, the first (1st) great horn which they succeeded is the first (1st) great kingdom of the 'Greeks', that which was founded by 'Alexander' the great, 'An. Nabonass'. 414, and lasted till the death of his son 'Hercules, An. Nabonass'. 441. And the four (4) are those of 'Cassander, Lysimachus, Antigonus', and 'Ptolemy', as above.

'And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a King [or new kingdom] of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up: and his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power'. This King was the last horn of the Goat, the little horn which came up out of one (1) of the four (4) horns, and waxed exceeding great. The latter time of their kingdom was when the 'Romans' began to conquer them, that is, when they conquered 'Perseus' King of 'Macedonia', the fundamental kingdom of the 'Greeks'. And at that time the transgressors came to the full: for then the High-priesthood was exposed to sale, the Vessels of the Temple were sold to pay for the purchase; and the High-priest, with some of the 'Jews', procured a licence from 'Antiochus Epiphanes' to do after the ordinances of the heathen, and set up a school at 'Jerusalem' for teaching those ordinances. Then 'Antiochus' took 'Jerusalem' with an armed force, slew 4000 'Jews', took as many prisoners and sold them, spoiled the Temple, interdicted the worship, commanded the Law of 'Moses' to be burnt, and set up the worship of the heathen Gods in all 'Judea'. In the very same year, 'An. Nabonass'. 580, the 'Romans' conquered 'Macedonia', the chief of the four (4) horns. Hitherto the Goat was mighty by its own power, but henceforward began to be under the 'Romans'. 'Daniel' distinguishes the times, by describing very particularly the actions of the Kings of the north and south, those two (2) of the four (4) horns which bordered upon 'Judea', until the 'Romans' conquered 'Macedonia'; and thenceforward only touching upon the main revolutions which happened within the compass of the nations represented by the Goat. In this latter period of time the little horn was to stand up and grow mighty, but not by his own power.

The three first of 'Daniel's' Beasts had their dominions taken away, each of them at the rise of the next Beast; but their lives were prolonged, and they are all of them still alive. The third (3rd) Beast, or Leopard, reigned in his four (4) heads, till the rise of the fourth (4th) Beast, or Empire of the 'Latins'; and his life was prolonged under their power. This Leopard reigning in his four (4) heads, signifies the same thing with the He-Goat reigning in his four (4) horns: and therefore the He-Goat reigned in his four (4) horns till the rise of 'Daniel's' fourth (4th) Beast, or Empire of the 'Latins': then its dominion was taken away by the 'Latins', but its life was prolonged under their power. The 'Latins' are not comprehended among the nations represented by the He-Goat in this Prophecy: their power over the 'Greeks' is only named in it, to distinguish the times in which the He-Goat was mighty by his own power, from the times in which he was mighty but not by his own power. He was mighty by his own power till his dominion was taken away by the 'Latins'; after that, his life was prolonged under their dominion, and this prolonging of his life was in the days of his last horn: for in the days of this horn the Goat became mighty, but not by his own power.

Now because this horn was a horn of the Goat, we are to look for it among the nations which composed the body of the Goat. Among those nations he was to rise up and grow mighty: he grew mighty 'towards the south, and towards the east, and towards the pleasant land'; and therefore he was to rise up in the north-west parts of those nations, and extend his dominion towards 'Egypt, Syria' and 'Judea'. In the latter time of the kingdom of the four (4) horns, it was to rise up out of one (1) of them and subdue the rest, but not by its own power. It was to be assisted by a foreign power, a power superior to itself, the power which took away the dominion of the third (3rd) Beast, the power of the fourth (4th) Beast. And such a little horn was the kingdom of 'Macedonia', from the time that it became subject to the 'Romans'. This kingdom, by the victory of the 'Romans' over 'Persius' King of 'Macedonia, Anno Nabonass'. 580, ceased to be one (1) of the four (4) horns of the Goat, and became a dominion of a new sort: not a (1) horn of the fourth (4th) Beast, for 'Macedonia' belonged to the body of the third (3rd); but a (1) horn of the third (3rd) Beast of a new sort, a horn of the Goat which grew mighty but not by his own power, a horn which rose up and grew potent under a foreign power, the power of the 'Romans'.

The 'Romans', by the legacy of 'Attalus' the last King of 'Pergamus, An. Nabonass'. 615, inherited that kingdom, including all 'Asia Minor' on this side mount 'Taurus. An. Nabonass'. 684 and 685 they conquered 'Armenia, Syria' and 'Judea; An. Nabonass'. 718, they subdued 'Egypt'. And by these conquests the little horn 'waxed exceeding great towards the south, and towards the east, and towards the pleasant land. And it waxed great even to the host of heaven; and cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them', that is, upon the people and great men of the 'Jews'. 'Yea, he magnified himself even to the Prince of the Host, the Messiah', the Prince of the 'Jews', whom he put to death, 'An. Nabonass'. 780. 'And by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down, viz'. in the wars which the armies of the 'Eastern' nations under the conduct of the 'Romans' made against 'Judea', when 'Nero' and 'Vespasian' were Emperors, 'An. Nabonass'. 816, 817, 818. 'And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground, and it practised and prospered'. This transgression is in the next words called 'the transgression of desolation'; and in 'Dan'. 11:31 'the abomination which maketh desolate'; and in Matth. 24:15 'the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place'. It may relate chiefly to the worship of 'Jupiter Olympius' in his Temple built by the Emperor 'Hadrian', in the place of the Temple of the 'Jews', and to the revolt of the 'Jews' under 'Barchochab' occasioned thereby, and to the desolation of 'Judea' which followed thereupon; all the 'Jews', being thence forward banished 'Judea' upon pain of death. 'Then I heard', saith 'Daniel, one (1) saint speaking, and another (1) saint said unto that certain (1) saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred (2300) days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed'. 'Daniel's' days are years; and these years may perhaps be reckoned either from the destruction of the Temple by the 'Romans' in the reign of 'Vespasian', or from the pollution of the Sanctuary by the worship of 'Jupiter Olympius', or from the desolation of 'Judea' made in the end of the 'Jewish' war by the banishment of all the 'Jews' out of their own country, or from some other period which time will discover. Henceforward the last horn of the Goat continued mighty under the 'Romans', till the reign of 'Constantine' the great and his sons: and then by the division of the 'Roman' Empire between the 'Greek' and 'Latin' Emperors, it separated from the 'Latins', and became the 'Greek' Empire alone, but yet under the dominion of a 'Roman' family; and at present it is mighty under the dominion of the 'Turks'.

This last horn is by some taken for 'Antiochus Epiphanes', but not very judiciously. A horn of a Beast is never taken for a single (1) person: it always signifies a new kingdom, and the kingdom of 'Antiochus' was an old one (1). Antiochus reigned over one (1) of the four (4) horns, and the little horn was a fifth (5th) under its proper kings. This horn was at first (1st) a little one (1), and waxed exceeding great, but so did not 'Antiochus'. It is described great above all the former horns, and so was not 'Antiochus'. His kingdom on the contrary was weak, and tributary to the 'Romans', and he did not enlarge it. The horn was a 'King of fierce countenance, and destroyed wonderfully, and prospered and practised'; that is, he prospered in his practises against the holy people: but 'Antiochus' was frightened out of 'Egypt' by a mere message of the 'Romans', and afterwards routed and baffled by the 'Jews'. The horn was mighty by another's power, 'Antiochus' acted by his own. The horn stood up against the Prince of the Host of heaven, the Prince of Princes; and this is the character not of 'Antiochus' but of 'Antichrist'. The horn cast down the Sanctuary to the ground, and so did not 'Antiochus'; he left it standing. The Sanctuary and Host were trampled under foot 2300 days; and in 'Daniel's' Prophecies days are put for years: but the profanation of the Temple in the reign of 'Antiochus' did not last so many natural days. These were to last till the time of the end, till the last end of the indignation against the 'Jews'; and this indignation is not yet at an end. They were to last till the Sanctuary which had been cast down should be cleansed, and the Sanctuary is not yet cleansed.

This Prophecy of the Ram and He-Goat is repeated in the last Prophecy of 'Daniel'. There the Angel tells 'Daniel', that 'he stood up to strengthen Darius the Mede, and that there should stand up yet three (3) kings in Persia, [Cyrus, Cambyses, and Darius Hystaspis] and the fourth (4th) [Xerxes] should be far richer than they all; and by his wealth thro' his riches he should stir up all against the realm of Grecia'. This relates to the Ram, whose two (2) horns were the kingdoms of 'Media' and 'Persia'. Then he goes on to describe the horns of the Goat by the 'standing up of a mighty king, which should rule with great dominion, and do according to his will'; and by the breaking of his kingdom into four (4) smaller kingdoms, and not descending to his own posterity. Then he describes the actions of two (2) of those kingdoms which bordered on 'Judea, viz. Egypt' and 'Syria', calling them the Kings of the 'South' and 'North', that is, in respect of 'Judea'; and he carries on the description till the latter end of the kingdoms of the four (4), and till the reign of 'Antiochus Epiphanes', when transgressors were come to the full. In the eighth (8th) year of 'Antiochus', the year in which he profaned the Temple and set up the heathen 'Gods' in all 'Judea', and the 'Romans' conquered the kingdom of 'Macedon'; the prophetic Angel leaves off describing the affairs of the kings of the 'South' and 'North', and begins to describe those of the 'Greeks' under the dominion of the 'Romans', in these words: 'And after him Arms [the Romans] shall stand up, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength'. As (ממלך) (mmlk) signifies 'after the king', Dan. 11:8; so here (ממנו) (mmnw) may signify 'after him': and so (מִן־הָאֶחָת) (myn-h'achth) may signify 'after one (1) of them', Dan. 8:9. Arms are every where in these Prophecies of 'Daniel' put for the military power of a kingdom, and they stand up when they conquer and grow powerful. The 'Romans' conquered 'Illyricum, Epirus' and 'Macedonia', in the year of 'Nabonassar' 580; and thirty five (35) years after, by the last will and testament of 'Attalus' the last King of 'Pergamus', they inherited that rich and flourishing kingdom, that is, all 'Asia' on this side mount 'Taurus': and sixty nine (69) years after, they conquered the kingdom of 'Syria', and reduced it into a Province: and thirty four (34) years after they did the like to 'Egypt'. By all these steps the 'Roman' arms stood up over the 'Greeks'. And after 95 years more, by making war upon the 'Jews', 'they polluted the sanctuary of strength, and took away the daily sacrifice, and', in its room soon after, 'placed the abomination which made the Land desolate': for this abomination was placed after the days of Christ, Matth. 24:15. In the 16th year of the Emperor 'Hadrian', A. C. 132, they placed this abomination by building a Temple to 'Jupiter Capitolinus', where the Temple of God in 'Jerusalem' had stood. Thereupon the 'Jews' under the conduct of 'Barchochab' rose up in arms against the 'Romans', and in that war had 50 cities demolished, 985 of their best towns destroyed, and 580,000 (1/2 million plus) men slain by the sword: and in the end of the war, A.C. 136, they were all banished 'Judea' upon pain or death; and that time the land hath remained desolate of its old inhabitants.

Now that the prophetic Angel passes in this manner from the four (4) kingdoms of the 'Greeks' to the 'Romans' reigning over the 'Greeks', is confirmed from hence, that in the next place he describes the affairs of the 'Christians' unto the time of the end, in these words: 'And they that understand among the people shall instruct many, yet they shall fall by the sword and by flame, by captivity and by spoil many days. Now when they shall fall they shall be holpen with a little help', viz. in the reign of 'Constantine' the great; 'but many shall cleave to them with dissimulation. And some of them of understanding there shall fall to try them, and to purge them from the dissemblers; and to make them white even to the time of the end'. And a little after, the time of the end is said to be a time, times, and half a time: which is the duration of the reign of the last horn of 'Daniel's' fourth (4th) Beast, and of the 'Woman' and her 'Beast' in the 'Apocalypse'. (Notes to Chap. IX. Chap. 8:3. Ver. 22. Ver. 23. Chap. 8:9. Chap. 8:9,10. Ver. 11. Ver. 12. Ver. 13,14. Dan. 11:1,2. Ver. 3. Dan 11:31. Chap. xi. 11:33, &c.)" }}

X: Prophecy of Seventy (70) Weeks.

{{ The Vision of the Image composed of four (4) Metals was given first to 'Nebuchadnezzar', and then to 'Daniel' in a dream: and 'Daniel' began then to be celebrated for revealing of secrets, 'Ezek'. 28:3. The Vision of the four (4) Beasts, and of 'the Son of man' coming in the clouds of heaven, was also given to 'Daniel' in a dream. That of the Ram and the He-Goat appeared to him in the day time, when he was by the bank of the river 'Ulay'; and was explained to him by the prophetic Angel 'Gabriel'. It concerns the 'Prince of the host', and the 'Prince of Princes': and now in the first year of 'Darius' the 'Mede' over 'Babylon', the same prophetic Angel appears to 'Daniel' again, and explains to him what is meant by the 'Son of man', by the 'Prince of the host', and the 'Prince of Princes'. The Prophecy of the 'Son of man' coming in the clouds of heaven relates to the second (2nd) coming of 'Christ'; that of the 'Prince of the host' relates to his first (1st) coming: and this Prophecy of the 'Messiah', in explaining them, relates to both comings, and assigns the times thereof.

This Prophecy, like all the rest of 'Daniel's', consists of two (2) parts, an introductory Prophecy and an explanation thereof; the whole I thus translate and interpret.

'Seventy weeks are cut out upon thy people, and upon thy holy city, to finish transgression, and to make an end of sins, to expiate iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, to consummate the Vision and the Prophet, and to anoint the most Holy. Know also and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to cause to return and to build Jerusalem, unto the Anointed the Prince, shall be seven weeks. Yet threescore and two weeks shall it return, and the street be built and the wall; but in troublesome times: and after the threescore and two weeks, the Anointed shall be cut off, and it shall not be his; but the people of a Prince to come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary: and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war, desolations are determined. Yet shall he confirm the covenant with many for one week: and in half a week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease: and upon a wing of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that which is determined be poured upon the desolate.'

'Seventy weeks are cut out upon thy people, and upon thy holy city, to finish transgression', &c. Here, by putting a week for seven (7) years, are reckoned 490 years from the time that the dispersed 'Jews' should be re-incorporated into a people and a holy city, until the death and resurrection of 'Christ'; whereby 'transgression should be finished, and sins ended, iniquity be expiated, and everlasting righteousness brought in, and this Vision be accomplished, and the Prophet consummated', that Prophet whom the 'Jews' expected; and whereby 'the most Holy' should be 'anointed', he who is therefore in the next words called the 'Anointed', that is, the 'Messiah', or the 'Christ'. For by joining the accomplishment of the vision with the expiation of sins, the 490 years are ended with the death of 'Christ'. Now the dispersed 'Jews' became a people and city when they first returned into a polity or body politick; and this was in the seventh (7th) year of 'Artaxerxes Longimanus', when 'Ezra' returned with a body of 'Jews' from captivity, and revived the 'Jewish' worship; and by the King's commission created Magistrates in all the land, to judge and govern the people according to the laws of God and the King, 'Ezra' 7:25. There were but two (2) [principal] returns from captivity, 'Zerubbabel's' and 'Ezra's'; in 'Zerubbabel's' they had only commission to build the Temple, in 'Ezra's' they first (1st) became a polity or city by a government of their own. Now the years of this 'Artaxerxes' began about two (2) or three (3) months after the summer solstice, and his seventh (7th) year fell in with the third (3rd) year of the eightieth (80th) 'Olympiad'; and the latter part thereof, wherein 'Ezra' went up to 'Jerusalem', was in the year of the 'Julian Period' 4257. Count the time from thence to the death of 'Christ', and you will find it just 490 years. If you count in 'Judaic' years commencing in autumn, and date the reckoning from the first autumn after 'Ezra's' coming to 'Jerusalem', when he put the King's decree in execution; the death of 'Christ' will fall on the year of the 'Julian Period' 4747, 'Anno Domini' 34; and the weeks will be 'Judaic' weeks, ending with sabbatical years; and this I take to be the truth: but if you had rather place the death of 'Christ' in the year before, as is commonly done, you may take the year of 'Ezra's' journey into the reckoning.

'Know also and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to cause to return and to build Jerusalem, unto the Anointed the Prince, shall be seven (7) weeks'. The former part of the Prophecy related to the first (1st) coming of 'Christ', being dated to his coming as a Prophet; this being dated to his coming to be Prince or King, seems to relate to his second (2nd) coming. There, the Prophet was consummate, and the most holy anointed: here, he that was anointed comes to be Prince and to reign. For 'Daniel's' Prophecies reach to the end of the world; and there is scarce a Prophecy in the Old Testament concerning 'Christ', which doth not in something or other relate to his second coming. If divers of the antients, as 'Irenæus, Julius Africanus, Hippolytus' the martyr, and 'Apollinaris Bishop of 'Laodicea', applied the half (1/2) week to the times of 'Antichrist'; why may not we, by the same liberty of interpretation, apply the seven (7) weeks to the time when 'Antichrist' shall be destroyed by the brightness of 'Christ's' coming?

The 'Israelites' in the days of the antient Prophets, when the ten (10) Tribes were led into captivity, expected a double return; and that at the first the 'Jews' should build a new Temple inferior to 'Solomon's', until the time of that age should be fulfilled; and afterwards they should return from all places of their captivity, and build 'Jerusalem' and the Temple gloriously, 'Tobit' 14:4,5,6: and to express the glory and excellence of this city, it is figuratively said to be built of precious stones, 'Tobit' 13:16,17,18; 'Isa'. 54:11,12. 'Rev'. 11 and called the 'New Jerusalem, the Heavenly Jerusalem, the Holy City, the Lamb's Wife, the City of the Great King, the City into which the Kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour'. Now while such a return from captivity was the expectation of 'Israel', even before the times of 'Daniel', I know not why 'Daniel' should omit it in his Prophecy. This part of the Prophecy being therefore not yet fulfilled, I shall not attempt a particular interpretation of it, but content myself with observing, that as the 'seventy' (70) and the 'sixty two (62) weeks' were 'Jewish' weeks, ending with sabbatical years; so the 'seven (7) weeks' are the compass of a 'Jubilee' (49 + 1), and begin and end with actions proper for a 'Jubilee', and of the highest nature for which a 'Jubilee' can be kept: and that since 'the commandment to return and to build' Jerusalem, precedes the 'Messiah the Prince' 49 years; it may perhaps come forth not from the 'Jews' themselves, but from some other kingdom friendly to them, and precede their return from captivity, and give occasion to it; and lastly, that this rebuilding of 'Jerusalem' and the waste places of 'Judah' is predicted in 'Micah' vii. 11; 'Amos' 9:11, 14; 'Ezek'. 36:33, 35, 36, 38. 'Isa'. 54:3, 11, 12; 55:12; 61:4; 65:18, 21,22. and 'Tobit' 14:5 and that the return from captivity and coming of the 'Messiah' and his kingdom are described in 'Daniel' 7; 'Rev'. 19; 'Acts' 1; 'Mat'. 24; Joel' 3; 'Ezek'. 36; 37; 'Isa'. 60; 62; 63; 65; and 66; and many other places of scripture. The manner I know not. Let time be the Interpreter.

'Yet threescore and two (62) weeks shall it return, and the street be built and the wall, but in troublesome times: and after the threescore and two (62) weeks the Messiah shall be cut off, and it shall not be his; but the people of a Prince to come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary', &c. Having foretold both comings of 'Christ', and dated the last from their returning and building 'Jerusalem'; to prevent the applying that to the building 'Jerusalem' by 'Nehemiah', he distinguishes this from that, by saying that from this period to the 'Anointed' shall be, not seven (7) weeks, but threescore and two (62) weeks, and this not in prosperous but in troublesome times; and at the end of these Weeks the Messiah shall not be the Prince of the 'Jews', but be cut off; and 'Jerusalem' not be his, but the city and sanctuary be destroyed. Now 'Nehemiah' came to 'Jerusalem' in the 20th year of this same 'Artaxerxes', while 'Ezra' still continued there, 'Nehem'. 12:36, and found the city lying waste, and the houses and wall unbuilt, 'Nehem'. 2:17; 7:4; and finished the wall the 25th day of the month 'Elul, Nehem'. 6:15, in the 28th year of the King, that is, in 'September' in the year of the 'Julian Period' 4278. Count now from this year threescore and two (62) weeks of years, that is 434 years, and the reckoning will end in 'September' in the year of the 'Julian Period' 4712 which is the year in which 'Christ' was born, according to 'Clemens

Alexandrinus, Irenæus, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome, Orosius, Cassiodorus, and other antients; and this was the general opinion, till 'Dionysius Exiguus' invented the vulgar account, in which 'Christ's birth is placed two (2) years later. If with some you reckon that 'Christ' was born three (3) or four (4) years before the vulgar account, yet his birth will fall in the latter part of the last week, which is enough. How after these weeks 'Christ' was cut off and the city and sanctuary destroyed by the 'Romans', is well known.

'Yet shall he confirm the covenant with many for one week'. He kept it, notwithstanding his death, till the rejection of the 'Jews', and calling of 'Cornelius' and the 'Gentiles' in the seventh (7th) year after his passion.

'And in half a week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease'; that is, by the war of the 'Romans' upon the 'Jews': which war, after some commotions, began in the 13th year of 'Nero', A.D. 67, in the spring, when 'Vespasian' with an army invaded them; and ended in the second (2nd) year of 'Vespasian', A.D. 70, in autumn, 'Sept'. 7, when 'Titus' took the city, having burnt the Temple 27 days before: so that it lasted three (3) years and an half (1/2).

'And upon a wing of abominations he shall cause desolation, even until the consummation, and that which is determined be poured upon the desolate'. The Prophets, in representing kingdoms by Beasts and Birds, put their wings stretcht out over any country for their armies sent out to invade and rule over that country. Hence a wing of abominations is an army of false 'Gods': for an abomination is often put in scripture for a false 'God'; as where 'Chemosh' is called the abomination of 'Moab', and 'Molech' the abomination of 'Ammon'. The meaning therefore is, that the people of a Prince to come shall destroy the sanctuary, and abolish the daily worship of the true God, and overspread the land with an army of false 'gods'; and by setting up their dominion and worship, cause desolation to the 'Jews', until the times of the 'Gentiles' be fulfilled. For 'Christ' tells us, that the abomination of desolation spoken of by 'Daniel' was to be set up in the times of the 'Roman Empire', 'Matth'. 24:15.

Thus have we in this short Prophecy, a prediction of all the main periods relating to the coming of the 'Messiah'; the time of his birth, that of his death, that of the rejection of the 'Jews', the duration of the 'Jewish' war whereby he caused the city and sanctuary to be destroyed, and the time of his second coming: and so the interpretation here given is more full and complete and adequate to the design, than if we should restrain it to his first coming only, as Interpreters usually do. We avoid also the doing violence to the language of 'Daniel', by taking the 'seven (7) weeks and sixty two (62) weeks' for one (1) number. Had that been 'Daniel's meaning, he would have said 'sixty and nine weeks', and not 'seven (7) weeks and sixty two (62) weeks', a way of numbring used by no nation. In our way the years are 'Jewish Luni-solar years', as they ought to be; and the 'seventy (70) weeks of years' are 'Jewish weeks' ending with 'sabbatical years', which is very remarkable. For they end either with the year of the birth of 'Christ', two (2) years before the vulgar account, or with the year of his death, or with the seventh (7th) year after it: all which are 'sabbatical years'. Others either count by Lunar years, or by weeks not 'Judaic': and, which is worst, they ground their interpretations on erroneous Chronology, excepting the opinion of 'Funccius' about the 'seventy (70) weeks', which is the same with ours. For they place 'Ezra' and 'Nehemiah' in the reign of 'Artaxerxes Mnemon', and the building of the Temple in the reign of 'Darius Nothus', and date the weeks of 'Daniel' from those two reigns.

'The grounds of the Chronology here followed, I will now set down as briefly as I can'.

The 'Peloponnesian' war began in spring 'An'. 1 'Olymp'. 87, as 'Diodorus, Eusebius', and all other authors agree. It began two (2) months before 'Pythodorus' ceased to be 'Archon, Thucyd'. l. 2. that is, in 'April', two (2) months before the end of the 'Olympic' year. Now the years of this war are most certainly determined by the 50 years distance of its first year from the transit of 'Xerxes' inclusively, 'Thucyd'. I. 2. or 48 years exclusively, 'Eratosth. apud Clem. Alex'. by the 69 years distance of its end, or 27th year, from the beginning of 'Alexander's' reign in 'Greece'; by the acting of the 'Olympic' games in its 4th and 12th years, 'Thucyd'. I. 5; and by three (3) eclipses of the sun, and one of the moon, mentioned by 'Thucydides' and 'Xenophon'. Now 'Thucydides', an unquestionable witness, tells us, that the news of the death of 'Artaxerxes Longimanus' was brought to 'Ephesus', and from thence by some 'Athenians' to 'Athens', in the 7th year of this 'Peloponnesian' war, when the winter half (1/2) year was running; and therefore he died 'An'. 4 'Olymp'. 88, in the end of 'An. J.P.' 4289, suppose a (1) month or two (2) before midwinter; for so long the news would be in coming. Now 'Artaxerxes Longimanus' reigned 40 years, by the consent of 'Diodorus, Eusebius, Jerome, Sulpitius'; or 41, according to 'Ptol. in can. Clem. Alexand. I. 1. Strom. Chron. Alexandr. Abulpharagius, Nicephorus', including therein the reign of his successors 'Xerxes' and 'Sogdian', as 'Abulpharagius' informs us. After 'Artaxerxes' reigned his son 'Xerxes' two (2) months, and 'Sogdian' seven (7) months; but their reign is not reckoned apart in summing up the years of the Kings, but is included in the 40 or 41 years reign of 'Artaxerxes': omit these nine (9) months, and the precise reign of 'Artaxerxes' will be thirty nine (39) years and three (3) months. And therefore since his reign ended in the beginning of winter 'An. J.P.' 4289, it began between midsummer and autumn, 'An. J.P.' 4250.

The same thing I gather also thus. 'Cambyses' began his reign in spring 'An. J.P.' 4185, and reigned eight (8) years, including the five (5) months of 'Smerdes'; and then 'Darius Hystaspis' began in spring 'An. J.P.' 4193, and reigned thirty six (36) years, by the unanimous consent of all Chronologers. The reigns of these two (2) Kings are determined by three (3) eclipses of the moon observed at 'Babylon', and recorded by 'Ptolemy'; so that it cannot be disputed. One was in the seventh (7th) year of 'Cambyses, An. J.P.' 4191, 'Jul.' 16, at 11 at night; another in the 20th year of 'Darius, An. J.P.' 4212, 'Nov.' 19, at 11^h 45' at night; a third (3rd) in the 31st year of 'Darius, An. J.P.' 4223, 'Apr.' 25, at 11^h 30 at night. By these eclipses, and the Prophecies of 'Haggai' and 'Zechary' compared together, it is manifest that his years began after the 24th day of the 11th 'Jewish' month, and before the 25th day of 'April', and by consequence about 'March. Xerxes' therefore began in spring 'An. J.P.' 4229: for 'Darius' died in the fifth (5th) year after the battle at 'Marathon', as 'Herodotus, lib.' 7, and 'Plutarch' mention; and that battle was in 'October An. J.P.' 4224, ten years before the battle at 'Salamis. Xerxes' therefore began within less than a (1) year after 'October An. J.P.' 4228, suppose in the spring following: for he spent his first five (5) years, and something more, in preparations for his expedition against the 'Greeks'; and this expedition was in the time of the 'Olympic' games, 'An'. 1 'Olymp'. 75, 'Calliade Athenis Archonte', 28 years after the 'Regifuge', and Consulship of the first Consul 'Junius Brutus, Anno Urbis conditæ' 273, 'Fabio & Furio Coss'. The passage of 'Xerxes's' army over the 'Hellespont' began in the end of the fourth (4th) year of the 74th 'Olympiad', that is, in 'June An. J.P.' 4234, and took up one month: and in autumn, three months after, on the full moon, the 16th day of the month 'Munychion', was the battle at 'Salamis', and a little after that an eclipse of the sun, which by the calculation fell on 'Octob'. 2. His sixth (6th) year therefore began a little before 'June', suppose in spring 'An. J.P.' 4234, and his first year consequently in spring 'An. J.P.' 4229, as above. Now he reigned almost twenty one (21) years, by the consent of all writers. Add the 7 months of 'Artabanus', and the sum will be 21 years and about four (4) or five (5) months, which end between midsummer and autumn 'An. J.P.' 4250. At this time therefore began the reign of his successor 'Artaxerxes', as was to be proved.

The same thing is also confirmed by 'Julius Africanus', who informs us out of former writers, that the 20th year of this 'Artaxerxes' was the 115th year from the beginning of the reign of 'Cyrus' in 'Persia', and fell in with 'An. 4 Olymp.' 83. It began therefore with the 'Olympic' year, soon after the summer Solstice, 'An. J.P.' 4269. Subduct nineteen (19) years, and his first (1st) year will begin at the same time of the year 'An. J.P.' 4250, as above.

His 7th year therefore began after midsummer 'An. J.P.' 4256; and the Journey of 'Ezra' to 'Jerusalem' in the spring following fell on the beginning of 'An. J.P.' 4257, as above. (Notes to Chap. X. Chap. 9:24,25, 26,27. 'Cut upon'. A phrase in Hebrew, taken from the practise of numbring by cutting notches. Heb. to seal, i.e. to finish or consummate: a metaphor taken from sealing what is finished. So the Jews compute, ad obsignatum [signed, sealed, determined] Misna, ad obsignatum Talmud, that is, ad absolutum [absolutely, finally, authoritatively]. Heb. the Prophet, not the Prophecy. Heb. the Messiah, that is, in Greek, the Christ; in English, the Anointed. I use the English word, that the relation of this clause to the former may appear. Jerusalem. See Isa. 23:13. Iren. l. 5. Hær. c. 25. Apud Hieron. in h. l. 1st Kings 11:7. The antient solar years of the eastern nations consisted of 12 months, and every month of 30 days: and hence came the division of a circle into 360 degrees. This year seems to be used by Moses in his history of the Flood, and by John in the Apocalypse, where a time, times and half a time, 42 months and 1260 days, are put equipollent. But in reckoning by many of these years together, an account is to be kept of the odd days which were added to the end of these years. For the Egyptians added five (5) days to the end of this year; and so did the Chaldeans long before the times of Daniel, as appears by the Æra, of Nabonassar: and the Persian Magi used the same year of 365 days, till the Empire of the Arabians. The antient Greeks also used the same solar year of 12 equal months, or 360 days; but every other year added an intercalary month, consisting of 10 and 11 days alternately. The year of the Jews, even from their coming out of Egypt, was Luni-solar. It was solar, for the harvest always followed the Passover, and the fruits of the land were always gathered before the feast of Tabernacles, Levit. 23. But the months were lunar, for the people were commanded by Moses in the beginning of every month to blow with trumpets, and offer burnt offerings with their drink offerings, Num. 10:10; 28:11, 14, and this solemnity was kept on the new moons, Psal. 81:3,4,5. 1st Chron. 23:31. These months were called by Moses the first (1st), second (2nd), third (3rd), fourth (4th) month, &c. and the first (1st) month was also called Abib, the second (2nd) Zif, the seventh (7th) Ethanim, the eighth (8th) Bull, Exod. 13:4. 1st Kings 6:37,38; 8:2. But in the Babylonian captivity the Jews used the names of the Chaldean months, and by those names understood the months of their own year; so that the Jewish months then lost their old names, and are now called by those of the Chaldeans. The Jews began their civil year from the autumnal Equinox, and their sacred year from the vernal: and the first (1st) day of the first (1st) month was on the visible new moon, which was nearest the Equinox. Whether Daniel used the Chaldaick or Jewish year, is not very material; the difference being but six (6) hours in a year, and 4 months in 480 years. But I take his months to be Jewish: first (1st), because Daniel was a Jew, and the Jews even by the names of the Chaldean months understood the months of their own year: secondly, because this Prophecy is grounded on Jeremiah's concerning the 70 years captivity, and therefore must be understood of the same sort of years with the seventy (70); and those are Jewish, since that Prophecy was given in Judea before the captivity: and lastly, because Daniel reckons by weeks of years, which is a way of reckoning peculiar to the Jewish years. For as their days ran by sevens (7s), and the last day of every seven (7) was a sabbath; so their years ran by sevens (7), and the last year of every seven (7) was a sabbatical year, and seven (7) such weeks of years made a Jubilee (49th+1). }}

XI: Times of Birth & Passion of Christ.

{{ The times of the Birth and Passion of 'Christ', with such like niceties, being not material to religion, were little regarded by the 'Christians' of the first age. They who began first to celebrate them, placed them in the cardinal periods of the year; as the annunciation of the Virgin 'Mary', on the 25th of 'March', which when 'Julius Cæsar' corrected the Calendar was the vernal Equinox; the feast of 'John' Baptist on the 24th of 'June', which was the summer Solstice; the feast of St. 'Michael' on 'Sept'. 29, which was the autumnal Equinox; and the birth of Christ on the winter Solstice, Decemb. 25, with the feasts of St. Stephen, St. John and the 'Innocents', as near it as they could place them. And because the Solstice in time removed from the 25th of 'December' to the 24th, the 23d, the 22d, and so on backwards, hence some in the following centuries placed the birth of 'Christ' on 'Decemb.' 23, and at length on 'Decemb.' 20: and for the same reason they seem to have set the feast of St. 'Thomas' on 'Decemb.' 21, and that of St. 'Matthew' on 'Sept.' 21. So also at the entrance of the Sun into all the signs in the 'Julian' Calendar, they placed the days of other Saints; as the conversion of 'Paul' on 'Jan.' 25, when the Sun entred (♊); St. 'Matthias' on 'Feb.' 25, when he entred (♋); St. 'Mark' on 'Apr.' 25, when he entred (♌); 'Corpus Christ'i' on 'May' 26, when he entred (♍); St. 'James' on July 25, when he entred (♎); St. 'Bartholomew' on Aug. 24, when he entred (♏); 'Simon' and 'Jude' on 'Octob.' 28, when he entred (♐); and if there were any other remarkable days in the 'Julian' Calendar, they placed the Saints upon them, as St. 'Barnabas' on 'June' 11, where 'Ovid' seems to place the feast of 'Vesta' and 'Fortuna', and the 'goddess' 'Matuta'; and St. 'Philip' and 'James' on the first of 'May', a day dedicated both to the 'Bona Dea', or 'Magna Mater', and to the 'goddess' 'Flora', and still celebrated with her rites. All which shews that these days were fixed in the first 'Christian' Calendars by Mathematicians at pleasure, without any ground in tradition; and that the 'Christians' afterwards took up with what they found in the Calendars.

Neither was there any certain tradition about the years of 'Christ'. For the 'Christians' who first began to enquire into these things, as 'Clemens Alexandrinus, 'Origen, 'Tertullian, 'Julius Africanus, 'Lactantius, 'Jerome, St. 'Austin, 'Sulpicius Severus, 'Prosper', and as many as place the death of 'Christ' in the 15th or 16th year of 'Tiberius', make Christ to have preached but one year, or at most but two. At length 'Eusebius' discovered four successive Passovers in the Gospel of 'John', and thereupon set on foot an opinion that he preacht three (3) years and an half (1/2); and so died in the 19th year of 'Tiberius'. Others afterwards, finding the opinion that he died in the Equinox 'Mar.' 25, more consonant to the times of the 'Jewish' Passover, in the 17th and 20th years, have placed his death in one of those two (2) years. Neither is there any greater certainty in the opinions about the time of his birth. The first 'Christians' placed his baptism near the beginning of the 15th year of 'Tiberius'; and thence reckoning thirty (30) years backwards, placed his birth in the 43rd 'Julian' year, the 42nd of 'Augustus' and 28th of the 'Actiac' victory. This was the opinion which obtained in the first (1st) ages, till 'Dionysius Exiguus', placing the baptism of 'Christ' in the 16th year of 'Tiberius', and misinterpreting the text of 'Luke', 3:23 as if 'Jesus' was only beginning to be 30 years old when he was baptized, invented the vulgar account, in which his birth is placed two (2) years later than before. As therefore relating to these things there is no tradition worth considering; let us lay aside all and examine what prejudices can be gathered from records of good account.

The fifteenth (15th) year of 'Tiberius' began Aug. 28, An. J.P. 4727. So soon as the winter was over, and the weather became warm enough, we may reckon that 'John' began to baptize; and that before next winter his fame went abroad, and all the people came to his baptism, and 'Jesus' among the rest. Whence the first (1st) Passover after his baptism mentioned 'John' 2:13. was in the 16th year of 'Tiberius'. After this feast 'Jesus' came into the land of 'Judea', and staid there baptizing, whilst 'John' was baptizing in 'Ænon', John' 3:22,23. But when he heard that 'John' was cast into prison, he departed into 'Galilee', 'Mat.' 3:12. being afraid, because the Pharisees had heard that he baptized more disciples than 'John', 'John' 4:1. and in his journey he passed thro' 'Samaria' four (4) months before the harvest, 'John' 4:35 that is, about the time of the winter Solstice. For their harvest was between 'Easter' and 'Whitsunday', and began about a month after the vernal Equinox. 'Say not ye', saith he, 'there are yet four (4) months, and then cometh harvest? Behold I say unto you, lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, for they are white already to harvest'; meaning, that the people in the fields were ready for the Gospel, as his next words shew. 'John' therefore was imprisoned about 'November', in the 17th year of 'Tiberius'; and 'Christ' thereupon went from 'Judea' to 'Cana' of 'Galilee' in 'December', and was received there of the 'Galileans', who had seen all he did at 'Jerusalem' at the Passover: and when a Nobleman of 'Capernaum' heard he was returned into 'Galilee', and went to him and desired him to come and cure his son, he went not thither yet, but only said, 'Go thy way, thy son liveth; and the Nobleman returned and found it so, and believed, he and his house', John 4. This is the beginning of his miracles in 'Galilee'; and thus far 'John' is full and distinct in relating the actions of his first (1st) year, omitted by the other Evangelists. The rest of his history is from this time related more fully by the other Evangelists than by 'John'; for what they relate he omits.

From this time therefore 'Jesus' taught in the Synagogues of 'Galilee' on the sabbath-days, being glorified of all: and coming to his own city 'Nazareth', and preaching in their Synagogue, they were offended, and thrust him out of the city, and led him to the brow of the hill on which the city was built to cast him headlong; but he passing thro' the midst of them, went his way, and came and dwelt at 'Capernaum', 'Luke' 4. And by this time we may reckon the second (2nd) Passover was either past or at hand.

All this time 'Matthew' passeth over in few words, and here begins to relate the preaching and miracles of 'Christ'. 'When Jesus', saith he, 'had heard that John was cast into prison, he departed into Galilee; and leaving Nazareth, he came and dwelt at Capernaum, and from that time began to preach and say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand', 'Matth'. 4:12. Afterwards he called his disciples 'Peter, Andrew, James and John; and then went about all Galilee, teaching in the Synagogues,—and healing all manner of sickness:—and his fame went thro'out all Syria; and they brought unto him all sick people,—and there followed him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judea, and from beyond Jordan', 'Matth', 4:18, 25. All this was done before the sermon in the mount: and therefore we may certainly reckon that the second (2nd) Passover was past before the preaching of that sermon. The multitudes that followed him from 'Jerusalem' and 'Judea', shew that he had lately been there at the feast. The sermon in the mount was made when great multitudes came to him from all places, and followed him in the open fields; which is an argument of the summer-season: and in this sermon he pointed at the lilies of the field then in the flower before the eyes of his auditors. 'Consider', saith he, 'the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to day is and to morrow is cast into the oven', &c. 'Matth'. vi. 6:28. So therefore the grass of the field was now in the flower, and by consequence the month of 'March' with the Passover was past.

Let us see therefore how the rest of the feasts follow in order in 'Matthew's' Gospel: for he was an eye-witness of what he relates, and so tells all things in due order of time, which 'Mark' and 'Luke' do not.

Some time after the sermon in the mount, when the time came that he should be received, that is, when the time of a feast came that he should be received by the 'Jews', he set his face to go to 'Jerusalem': and as he went with his disciples in the way, when the 'Samaritans' in his passage thro' 'Samaria' had denied him lodgings, and a certain Scribe said unto him, 'Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest, Jesus said unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head', 'Matth'. 8:19. 'Luke' 9:51, 57. The Scribe told 'Christ' he would bear him company in his journey, and 'Christ' replied that he wanted a lodging. Now this feast I take to be the feast of Tabernacles, because soon after I find 'Christ' and his Apostles on the sea of 'Tiberias' in a storm so great, that the ship was covered with water and in danger of sinking, till 'Christ rebuked the winds and the sea', 'Matth'. 8:23. For this storm shews that winter was now come on.

After this 'Christ' did many miracles, and 'went about all the cities and villages of Galilee, teaching in their Synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing every sickness, and every disease among the people', 'Matth'. 9, he then sent forth the twelve (12) to do the like, 'Matth'. 10, and at length when he had received a message from 'John', and answered it, he said to the multitudes, 'From the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence'; and upbraided the cities, 'Chorazin, Bethsaida', and 'Capernaum', wherein most of his mighty works were done, because they repented not, 'Matth'. 11. Which several passages shew, that from the imprisonment of 'John' till now there had been a considerable length of time: the winter was now past, and the next Passover was at hand; for immediately after this, 'Matthew', in chap. 12 subjoins, that 'Jesus went on the sabbath-day thro' the corn, and his disciples were an hungred, and began to pluck the ears of corn and to eat,—rubbing them', saith 'Luke', 'in their hands': the corn therefore was not only in the ear, but ripe; and consequently the Passover, in which the first-fruits were always offered before the harvest, was now come or past. 'Luke' calls this sabbath (δευτεροπρωτον) (deuteroprōton), the second (2nd) prime (1st) sabbath, that is, the second (2nd) of the two (2) great feasts of the Passover. As we call 'Easter' day high 'Easter', and its 'octave' (8th) low 'Easter' or 'Lowsunday': so 'Luke' calls the feast on the seventh (7th) day of the unleavened bread, the second (2nd) of the two (2) prime (1st) sabbaths.

In one (1) of the sabbaths following he went into a Synagogue, and healed a man with a withered hand, 'Matth'. 12:9, 'Luke' 6:6. And when the Pharisees took counsel to destroy him, 'he withdrew himself from thence, and great multitudes followed him; and he healed them all, and charged them that they should not make him known', 'Matth'. 12:14. Afterwards being in a ship, and the multitude standing on the shore, he spake to them three (3) parables together, taken from the seeds-men sowing the fields, 'Matth'. 13 by which we may know that it was now seed-time, and by consequence that the feast of Tabernacles was past. After this he went 'into his own country, and taught them in their Synagogue, but did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief'. Then the twelve (12) having been abroad a (1) year, returned, and told 'Jesus' all that they had done: and at the same time 'Herod' beheaded 'John' in prison, and his disciples came and told 'Jesus'; and when 'Jesus' heard it, he took the twelve (12) and departed thence privately by ship into a desert place belonging to 'Bethsaida': and the people when they knew it, followed him on foot out of the cities, the winter being now past; and he healed their sick, and in the desert fed them to the number of five thousand (5,000) men, besides women and children, with only five (5) loaves and two (2) fishes, 'Matth'. 14, 'Luke' 9, at the doing of which miracle the Passover of the 'Jews' was nigh, 'John' 6:4. But 'Jesus' went not up to this feast; but 'after these things walked in Galilee, because the Jews' at the Passover before had taken counsel to destroy him, and still 'sought to kill him', 'John' 7:1. Henceforward therefore he is found first in the coast of 'Tyre' and 'Sidon', then by the sea of 'Galilee', afterwards in the coast of 'Cæsarea Philippi'; and lastly at 'Capernaum', 'Matth'. 15:21, 29; 16:13; 17:34.

Afterwards when the feast of Tabernacles was at hand, his brethren upbraided him for walking secretly, and urged him to go up to the feast. But he went not till they were gone, and then went up privately, 'John' 7:2. and when the 'Jews' sought to stone him, he escaped, 'John' 8:59. After this he was at the feast of the Dedication in winter, 'John' 10:22. and when they sought again to take him, he fled beyond 'Jordan', 'John' 10:39,40, 'Matth'. 19:1, where he stayed till the death of 'Lazarus', and then came to 'Bethany' near 'Jerusalem', and raised him, 'John' 11:7,18. whereupon the 'Jews' took counsel from that time to kill him: and 'therefore' he 'walked no more openly among the Jews, but went thence into a country near to the wilderness, into a city called Ephraim; and there continued with his disciples' till the last Passover, in which the 'Jews' put him to death, 'John' 11:53,54.

Thus have we, in the Gospels of 'Matthew' and 'John' compared together, the history of 'Christ's' actions in continual order during five (5) Passovers. 'John' is more distinct in the beginning and end; 'Matthew' in the middle: what either omits, the other supplies. The first (1st) Passover was between the baptism of 'Christ' and the imprisonment of 'John', 'John' 2:13; the second (2nd) within four (4) months after the imprisonment of 'John', and 'Christ's' beginning to preach in 'Galilee', 'John' 4:35; and therefore it was either that feast to which 'Jesus' went up, when the Scribe desired to follow him, 'Matth'. 8:19, 'Luke' 9:51, 57, or the feast before it. The third (3rd) was the next feast after it, when the corn was eared and ripe, 'Matth'. 12:1, 'Luke' 6:1. The fourth (4th) was that which was nigh at hand when 'Christ' wrought the miracle of the five (5) loaves, 'Matth'. 14:15, 'John' 6:4,5, and the fifth (5th) was that in which 'Christ' suffered, 'Matth'. 20:17, 'John' 12:1.

Between the first (1st) and second (2nd) Passover 'John' and 'Christ' baptized together, till the imprisonment of 'John', which was four months before the second. Then 'Christ' began to preach, and call his disciples; and after he had instructed them a year, lent them to preach in the cities of the 'Jews': at the same time 'John' hearing of the fame of 'Christ', sent to him to know who he was. At the third (3rd), the chief Priests began to consult about the death of 'Christ'. A little before the fourth (4th), the twelve (12) after they had preached a (1) year in all the cities, returned to 'Christ'; and at the same time 'Herod' beheaded 'John' in prison, after he had been in prison two (2) years and a quarter (1/4): and thereupon 'Christ' fled into the desert for fear of 'Herod'. The fourth 'Christ' went not up to 'Jerusalem' for fear of the 'Jews', who at the Passover before had consulted his death, and because his time was not yet come. Thenceforward therefore till the feast of Tabernacles he walked in 'Galilee', and that secretly for fear of 'Herod': and after the feast of Tabernacles he returned no more into 'Galilee', but sometimes was at 'Jerusalem', and sometimes retired beyond 'Jordan', or to the city 'Ephraim' by the wilderness, till the Passover in which he was betrayed, apprehended, and crucified.

'John' therefore baptized two (2) summers, and 'Christ' preached three (3). The first summer 'John' preached to make himself known, in order to give testimony to 'Christ'. Then, after 'Christ' came to his baptism and was made known to him, he baptized another summer, to make 'Christ' known by his testimony; and 'Christ' also baptized the same summer, to make himself the more known: and by reason of 'John's' testimony there came more to 'Christ's' baptism than to 'John's'. The winter following 'John' was imprisoned; and now his course being at an end, 'Christ' entered upon his proper office of preaching in the cities. In the beginning of his preaching he completed the number of the twelve (12) Apostles, and instructed them all the first (1st) year in order to send them abroad. Before the end of this year, his fame by his preaching and miracles was so far spread abroad, that the 'Jews' at the Passover following consulted how to kill him. In the second (2nd) year of his preaching, it being no longer safe for him to converse openly in 'Judea', he sent the twelve (12) to preach in all their cities: and in the end of the year they returned to him, and told him all they had done. All the last year the twelve (12) continued with him to be instructed more perfectly, in order to their preaching to all nations after his death. And upon the news of 'John's' death, being afraid of 'Herod' as well as of the 'Jews', he walked this year more secretly than before; frequenting deserts, and spending the last half (1/2) of the year in 'Judea', without the dominions of 'Herod'.

Thus have we in the Gospels of 'Matthew' and 'John' all things told in due order, from the beginning of 'John's' preaching to the death of 'Christ', and the years distinguished from one (1) another by such essential characters that they cannot be mistaken. The second (2nd) Passover is distinguished from the first (1st), by the interposition of 'John's' imprisonment. The third (3rd) is distinguished from the second (2nd), by a double (2nd) character: first, by the interposition of the feast to which 'Christ' went up, 'Mat'. 8:19, 'Luke' 9:57, and secondly (2nd), by the distance of time from the beginning of 'Christ's' preaching: for the second (2nd) was in the beginning of his preaching, and the third (3rd) so long after, that before it came 'Christ' said, 'from the days of John the Baptist until now', &c. and upbraided the cities of Galilee for their not repenting at his preaching, and mighty works done in all that time. The fourth (4th) is distinguished from the third (3rd), by the mission of the twelve (12) from 'Christ' to preach in the cities of Judea in all the interval. The fifth (5th) is distinguished from all the former by the twelve's (12) being returned from preaching, and continuing with 'Christ' during all the interval, between the fourth (4th) and fifth (5th), and by the passion and other infallible characters.

Now since the first summer of 'John's' baptizing fell in the fifteenth (15th) year of the Emperor 'Tiberius', and by consequence the first (1st) of these five (5) Passovers in his sixteenth (16th) year; the last of them, in which 'Jesus' suffered, will fall on the twentieth (20th) year of the same Emperor; and by consequence in the Consulship of 'Fabius' and 'Vitellius', in the 79th 'Julian' year, and year of 'Christ' 34, which was the sabbatical year of the 'Jews'. And that it did so, I further confirm by these arguments.

I take it for granted that the passion was on friday the 14th day of the month 'Nisan', the great feast of the Passover on saturday the 15th day of 'Nisan', and the resurrection on the day following. Now the 14th day of 'Nisan' always fell on the full moon next after the vernal Equinox; and the month began at the new moon before, not at the true conjunction, but at the first (1st) appearance of the new moon: for the 'Jews' referred all the time of the silent moon, as they phrased it, that is, of the moon's disappearing, to the old moon; and because the first (1st) appearance might usually be about 18 hours after the true conjunction, they therefore began their month from the sixth (6th) hour at evening, that is, at sun set, next after the eighteenth (18th) hour from the conjunction. And this rule they called (יה = יח) (yh=ych) Jah (yach=10+8) [Yod-He would not be used, being a Divine Name, thus prohibited to used as a common thing; and yod-he = 10+5=15 which is written as teth-zain = 9+7, substituted in its place], designing by the letters (י) (Yod) and (ה=ח) (He=Cheth) the number 18.

I know that 'Epiphanius' tells us, if some interpret his words rightly, that the 'Jews' used a vicious cycle, and thereby anticipated the legal new moons by two days. But this surely he spake not as a witness, for he neither understood 'Astronomy' nor 'Rabbinical' learning, but as arguing from his erroneous hypothesis about the time of the passion. For the 'Jews' did not anticipate, but postpone their months: they thought it lawful to begin their months a (1) day later than the first (1st) appearance of the new moon, because the new moon continued for more days than one (1); but not a (1) day sooner, lest they should celebrate the new moon before there was any. And the 'Jews' still keep a tradition in their books, that the 'Sanhedrim' used diligently to define the new moons by sight: sending witnesses into mountainous places, and examining them about the moon's appearing, and translating the new moon from the day they had agreed on to the day before, as often as witnesses came from distant regions, who had seen it a day sooner than it was seen at 'Jerusalem'. Accordingly 'Josephus', one of the 'Jewish' Priests who ministered in the temple, tells us that the Passover was kept 'on the 14th day of Nisan, (κατὰ σελήνην) (kata selēnēn) according to the moon, when the sun was in Aries'. This is confirmed also by two (2) instances, recorded by him, which totally overthrow the hypothesis of the 'Jews' using a vicious cycle. For that year in which 'Jerusalem' was taken and destroyed, he saith, the Passover was on the 14th day of the month 'Xanticus', which according to 'Josephus' is our 'April'; and that five (5) years before, it fell on the 8th day of the same month. Which two (2) instances agree with the course of the moon.

Computing therefore the new moons of the first (1st) month according to the course of the moon and the rule Jah (=Yach), and thence counting 14 days, I find that the 14th day of this month in the year of 'Christ' 31, fell on tuesday 'March' 27; in the year 32, on sunday 'Apr'. 13; in the year 33, on friday 'Apr'. 3; in the year 34, on wednesday 'March' 24, or rather, for avoiding the Equinox which fell on the same day, and for having a fitter time for harvest, on thursday 'Apr'. 22. also in the year 35, on tuesday 'Apr'. 12. and in the year 36, on saturday 'March' 31.

But because the 15th and 21st days of 'Nisan', and a (1) day or two (2) of 'Pentecost', and the 10th, 15th, and 22d of 'Tisri', were always sabbatical days or days of rest, and it was inconvenient on two (2) sabbaths together to be prohibited burying their dead and making ready fresh meat, for in that hot region their meat would be apt in two (2) days to corrupt: to avoid these and such like inconveniences, the 'Jews' postponed their months a (1) day, as often as the first (1st) day of the month 'Tisri', or, which is all one (1), the third (3rd) of the month 'Nisan', was sunday, wednesday or friday: and this rule they called (אדא) ('adu) Adu, by the letters (א , ד , ו) (aleph-daleth-yod) signifying the numbers 1, 4, 6; that is, the 1st, 4th, and 6th days of the week; which days we call sunday, wednesday and friday. Postponing therefore by this rule the months found above; the 14th day of the month 'Nisan' will fall in the year of 'Christ' 31, on wednesday 'March' 28; in the year 32, on monday 'Apr'. 14; in the year 33, on friday 'Apr'. 3; in the year 34, on friday 'Apr'. 23; in the year 35, on wednesday 'Apr'. 13, and in the year 36, on saturday 'March' 31.

By this computation therefore the year 32 is absolutely excluded, because the Passion cannot fall on friday without making it five days after the full moon, or two days before it; whereas it ought to be upon the day of the full moon, or the next day. For the same reason the years 31 and 35 are excluded, because in them the Passion cannot fall on friday, without making it three (3) days after the full moon, or four (4) days before it: errors so enormous, that they would be very conspicuous in the heavens to every vulgar eye. The year 36 is contended for by few or none, and both this and the year 35 may be thus excluded.

'Tiberius' in the beginning of his reign made 'Valerius Gratus' President of 'Judea'; and after 11 years, substituted 'Pontius Pilate', who governed 10 years. Then 'Vitellius', newly made President of 'Syria', deprived him of his honour, substituting 'Marcellus', and at length sent him to 'Rome': but, by reason of delays, 'Tiberius' died before 'Pilate' got thither. In the mean time 'Vitellius', after he had deposed 'Pilate', came to 'Jerusalem' in the time of the Passover, to visit that Province as well as others in the beginning of his office; and in the place of 'Caiaphas', then High Priest, created 'Jonathas' the son of 'Ananus', or 'Annas' as he is called in scripture. Afterwards, when 'Vitellius' was returned to 'Antioch', he received letters from 'Tiberius', to make peace with 'Artabanus' king of the 'Parthians'. At the same time the 'Alans', by the solicitation of 'Tiberius', invaded the kingdom of 'Artabanus'; and his subjects also, by the procurement of 'Vitellius', soon after rebelled: for 'Tiberius' thought that 'Artabanus', thus pressed with difficulties, would more readily accept the conditions of peace. 'Artabanus' therefore straightway gathering a greater army, oppressed the rebels; and then meeting 'Vitellius' at 'Euphrates', made a league with the 'Romans'. After this 'Tiberius' commanded 'Vitellius' to make war upon 'Aretas' King of 'Arabia'. He therefore leading his army against 'Aretas', went together with 'Herod' to 'Jerusalem', to sacrifice at the publick feast which was then to be celebrated. Where being received honourably, he stayed three (3) days, and in the mean while translated the high Priesthood from 'Jonathas' to his brother 'Theophilus': and the fourth (4th) day, receiving letters of the death of 'Tiberius', made the people swear allegiance to 'Caius' the new Emperor; and recalling his army, sent them into quarters. All this is related by 'Josephus Antiq. lib'. 18. c. 6, 7. Now 'Tiberius' reigned 22 years and 7 months, and died 'March' 16, in the beginning of the year of 'Christ' 37; and the feast of the Passover fell on 'April' 20 following, that is, 35 days after the death of 'Tiberius': so that there were about 36 or 38 days, for the news of his death to come from 'Rome' to 'Vitellius' at 'Jerusalem'; which being a convenient time for that message, confirms that the feast which 'Vitellius' and 'Herod' now went up to was the Passover. For had it been the Pentecost, as is usually supposed, 'Vitellius' would have continued three (3) months ignorant of the Emperor's death: which is not to be supposed. However, the things done between this feast and the Passover which 'Vitellius' was at before, namely, the stirring up a sedition in 'Parthia', the quieting that sedition, the making a league after that with the 'Parthians', the sending news of that league to 'Rome', the receiving new orders from thence to go against the 'Arabians', and the putting those orders in execution; required much more time than the fifty (50) days between the Passover and Pentecost of the same year: and therefore the Passover which 'Vitellius' first went up to, was in the year before. Therefore 'Pilate' was deposed before the Passover A.C. 36, and by consequence the passion of 'Christ' was before that Passover: for he suffered not under 'Vitellius', nor under 'Vitellius' and 'Pilate' together, but under 'Pilate' alone.

Now it is observable that the high Priesthood was at this time become an annual office, and the Passover was the time of making a new high Priest. For 'Gratus' the predecessor of 'Pilate', saith 'Josephus', made 'Ismael' high Priest after 'Ananus'; and a while after, suppose a (1) year, deposed him, and substituted 'Eleazar', and a (1) year after 'Simon', and after another year 'Caiaphas'; and then gave way to 'Pilate'. So 'Vitellius' at one Passover made 'Jonathas' successor to 'Caiaphas', and at the next 'Theophilus' to 'Jonathas'. Hence 'Luke' tells us, that in the 15th year of 'Tiberius', 'Annas' and 'Caiaphas' were high Priests, that is, 'Annas' till the Passover, and 'Caiaphas' afterwards. Accordingly 'John' speaks of the high Priesthood as an annual office: for he tells us again and again, in the last year of 'Christ's' preaching, that 'Caiaphas' was high Priest for that year, 'John' 11:49, 51; 18:13. And the next year 'Luke' tells you, that 'Annas' was high Priest, 'Acts' 4:6. 'Theophilus' was therefore made high Priest in the first year of 'Caius', 'Jonathas' in the 22d year of 'Tiberius', and 'Caiaphas' in the 21st year of the same Emperor: and therefore, allotting a year to each, the Passion, when 'Annas' succeeded 'Caiaphas', could not be later than the 20th year of 'Tiberius', A.C. 34.

Thus there remain only the years 33 and 34 to be considered; and the year 33 I exclude by this argument. In the Passover two (2) years before the Passion, when 'Christ' went thro' the corn, and his disciples pluckt the ears, and rubbed them with their hands to eat; this ripeness of the corn shews that the Passover then fell late: and so did the Passover A.C. 32, 'April' 14, but the Passover A.C. 31, 'March' 28th, fell very early. It was not therefore two (2) years after the year 31, but two years after 32 that 'Christ' suffered.

Thus all the characters of the Passion agree to the year 34; and that is the only year to which they all agree.

(Notes to Chap. XI. I observe, that 'Christ' and his forerunner 'John' in their parabolical discourses were wont to allude to things present. The old Prophets, when they would describe things emphatically, did not only draw parables from things which offered themselves, as from the rent of a garment, 1st 'Sam'. 15, from the sabbatic year, 'Isa'. 37, from the vessels of a (1) Potter, 'Jer'. 18, &c. but also when such fit objects were wanting, they supplied them by their own actions, as by rending a (1) garment, 1st 'Kings' 11, by shooting, 2nd 'Kings' 13, by making bare their body, 'Isa'. 20, by imposing significant names to their sons, 'Isa'. 8, 'Hos'. 1, by hiding a (1) girdle in the bank of 'Euphrates', 'Jer'. 13, by breaking a (1) potter's vessel, 'Jer'. 19, by putting on fetters and yokes, 'Jer'. 27, by binding a (1) book to a (1) stone, and casting them both into 'Euphrates', 'Jer'. 51, by besieging a (1) painted city, 'Ezek'. 4, by dividing hair into three (3) parts, 'Ezek'. 5, by making a (1) chain, 'Ezek'. 7, by carrying out household stuff like a (1) captive and trembling, 'Ezek'. 12, &c. By such kind of types the Prophets loved to speak. And 'Christ' being endued with a nobler prophetic spirit than the rest, excelled also in this kind of speaking, yet so as not to speak by his own actions, that was less grave and decent, but to turn into parables such things as offered themselves. On occasion of the harvest approaching, he admonishes his disciples once and again of the spiritual harvest, 'John' 4:35, 'Matth'. 9:37, Seeing the lilies of the field, he admonishes his disciples about gay clothing, 'Matth'. 6:28. In allusion to the present season of fruits, he admonishes his disciples about knowing men by their fruits, 'Matth'. 7:16. In the time of the Passover, when trees put forth leaves, he bids his disciples 'learn a (1) parable from the fig tree: when its branch is yet tender and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh', &c. 'Matth'. xxiv. 24:32, 'Luke' 21:29. The same day, alluding both to the season of the year and to his passion, which was to be two (2) days after, he formed a (1) parable of the time of fruits approaching, and the murdering of the heir, 'Matth'. 21:33. Alluding at the same time, both to the money-changers whom he had newly driven out of the Temple, and to his passion at hand; he made a parable of a (1) Noble-man going into a (1) far country to receive (1) a kingdom and return, and delivering his goods to his servants, and at his return condemning the slothful servant because he put not his money to the exchangers, 'Matth'. 25:14, 'Luke' 19: 12. Being near the Temple where sheep were kept in folds to be sold for the sacrifices, he spake many things parabolically of sheep, of the shepherd, and of the door of the sheepfold; and discovers that he alluded to the sheepfolds which were to be hired in the market-place, by speaking of such folds as a (1) thief could not enter by the door, nor the shepherd himself open, but a (1) porter opened to the shepherd, 'John' 10:1, 3. Being in the mount of 'Olives', 'Matth'. 26:30, 'John' 14:31, a (1) place so fertile that it could not want vines, he spake many things mystically of the Husbandman, and of the vine and its branches, 'John' 15. Meeting a blind man, he admonished of spiritual blindness, 'John' 9:39. At the sight of little children, he described once (1st) and again the innocence of the elect, 'Matth'. xviii. 18:2; 19:13. Knowing that 'Lazarus' was dead and should be raised again, he discoursed of the resurrection and life eternal, 'John' 11:25,26. Hearing of the slaughter of some whom 'Pilate' had slain, he admonished of eternal death, 'Luke' 13:1. To his fishermen he spake of fishers of men, 'Matth'. 4:10, and composed another parable about fishes, 'Matth'. 13:47. Being by the Temple, he spake of the Temple of his body, 'John' 2:19. At supper he spake a (1) parable about the mystical supper to come in the kingdom of heaven, 'Luke' 14. On occasion of temporal food, he admonished his disciples of spiritual food, and of eating his flesh and drinking his blood mystically, 'John' 6:27, 53. When his disciples wanted bread, he bad them beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, 'Matth'. 16:6. Being desired to eat, he answered that he had other meat, 'John' 6:31. In the great day of the feast of Tabernacles, when the 'Jews', as their custom was, brought a (1) great quantity of waters from the river 'Shiloah' into the Temple, 'Christ' stood and cried, saying, 'If any (1) man thirst let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth in me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water', 'John' 8:37. The next day, in allusion to the servants who by reason of the sabbatical year were newly set free, he said, 'If ye continue in my word, the truth shall make you free'. Which the 'Jews' understanding literally with respect to the present manumission of servants, answered, 'We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any (1) man: how sayeth thou, ye shall be made free'? 'John' 8. They assert their freedom by a (1) double argument: first (1st), because they were the seed of 'Abraham', and therefore newly made free, had they been ever in bondage; and then, because they never were in bondage. In the last Passover, when 'Herod' led his army thro' 'Judea' against 'Aretas' King of 'Arabia', because 'Aretas' was aggressor and the stronger in military forces, as appeared by the event; 'Christ' alluding to that state of things, composed the parable of a weaker King leading his army against a stronger who made war upon him, 'Luke' 14:31. And I doubt not but divers other parables were formed upon other occasions, the history of which we have not. Joseph. Antiq. lib. 3. c. 10." }}

XII: Prophecy of Scripture of Truth.

{{ The kingdoms represented by the second (2nd) and third (3rd) Beasts, or the Bear and Leopard, are again described by Daniel in his last Prophecy written in the third (3rd) year of 'Cyrus' over 'Babylon', the year in which he conquered 'Persia'. For this Prophecy is a commentary upon the Vision of the Ram and He-Goat.

'Behold', saith he, 'there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia, [Cyrus, Cambyses, and Darius Hystaspes] and the fourth [Xerxes] shall be far richer than they all: and by his strength thro' his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia. And a mighty king [Alexander the great] shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will. And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided towards the four winds of heaven; and not to his posterity [but after their death,] nor according to his dominion which he ruled: for his kingdom shall be pluckt up, even for others besides those'. 'Alexander' the great having conquered all the 'Persian' Empire, and some part of 'India', died at 'Babylon' a month before the summer Solstice, in the year of 'Nabonassar' 425: and his captains gave the monarchy to his bastard brother 'Philip Aridæus', a man disturbed in his understanding; and made 'Perdiccas' administrator of the kingdom. 'Perdiccas' with their consent made 'Meleager' commander of the army, 'Seleucus' master of the horse, 'Craterus' treasurer of the kingdom, 'Antipater' governor of 'Macedon' and 'Greece', 'Ptolemy' governor of 'Egypt'; 'Antigonus' governor of 'Pamphylia, Lycia, Lycaonia', and 'Phrygia major'; 'Lysimachus' governor of 'Thrace', and other captains governors of other Provinces; as many as had been so before in the days of 'Alexander' the great. The 'Babylonians' began now to count by a new 'Æra', which they called the 'Æra' of 'Philip', using the years of 'Nabonassar', and reckoning the 425th year of 'Nabonassar' to be the first (1st) year of 'Philip'. 'Roxana' the wife of 'Alexander' being left big with child, and about three (3) or four (4) months after brought to bed of a son, they called him 'Alexander', saluted him King, and joined him with 'Philip', whom they had before placed in the throne. 'Philip' reigned three (3) years under the administratorship of 'Perdiccas', two (2) years more under the administratorship of 'Antipater', and above a year more under that of 'Polyperchon'; in all six (6) years and four (4) months; and then was slain with his Queen 'Eurydice' in 'September' by the command of 'Olympias' the mother of 'Alexander' the great. The 'Greeks' being disgusted at the cruelties of 'Olympias', revolted to 'Cassander' the son and successor of 'Antipater'. 'Cassander' affecting the dominion of 'Greece', slew 'Olympias'; and soon after shut up the young king 'Alexander', with his mother 'Roxana', in the castle of 'Amphipolis', under the charge of 'Glaucias, An. Nabonass'. 432. The next year 'Ptolemy, Cassander' and 'Lysimachus', by means of 'Seleucus', form'd a league against 'Antigonus'; and after certain wars made peace with him, 'An. Nabonass'. 438, upon these conditions: that 'Cassander' should command the forces of 'Europe' till 'Alexander' the son of 'Roxana' came to age; and that 'Lysimachus' should govern 'Thrace, Ptolemy Egypt' and 'Lybia', and 'Antigonus' all 'Asia'. 'Seleucus' had possest himself of 'Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Sustana' and 'Media', the year before. About three (3) years after 'Alexander's' death he was made governor of 'Babylon' by 'Antipater'; then was expelled by 'Antigonus'; but now he recovered and enlarged his government over a great part of the 'East': which gave occasion to a new 'Æra', called 'Æra Seleucidarum'. Not long after the peace made with 'Antigonus, Diodorus' saith the same 'Olympic' year; 'Cassander', seeing that 'Alexander' the son of 'Roxana' grew up, and that it was discoursed thro'out 'Macedonia' that it was fit he should be set at liberty, and take upon him the government of his father's kingdom, commanded 'Glaucias' the governor of the castle to kill 'Roxana' and the young king 'Alexander' her son, and conceal their deaths. Then 'Polyperchon' set up 'Hercules', the son of 'Alexander' the great by 'Barsinè', to be king; and soon after, at the sollicitation of 'Cassander', caused him to be slain. Soon after that, upon a great victory at sea got by 'Demetrius' the son of 'Antigonus' over 'Ptolemy, Antigonus' took upon himself the title of king, and gave the same title to his son. This was 'An. Nabonass'. 441. After his example, 'Seleucus, Cassander, Lysimachus' and 'Ptolemy', took upon themselves the title and dignity of kings, having abstained from this honour while there remained any of 'Alexander's' race to inherit the crown. Thus the monarchy of the 'Greeks' for want of an heir was broken into several kingdoms; four (4) of which, seated to the four (4)winds of heaven, were very eminent. For 'Ptolemy' reigned over 'Egypt, Lybia' and 'Ethiopia; Antigonus' over 'Syria' and the lesser 'Asia; Lysimachus' over 'Thrace'; and 'Cassander' over 'Macedon, Greece' and 'Epirus', as above.

'Seleucus' at this time reigned over the nations which were beyond 'Euphrates', and belonged to the bodies of the two (2) first Beasts; but after six (6) years he conquered 'Antigonus', and thereby became possessor of one (1) of the four (4) kingdoms. For 'Cassander' being afraid of the power of 'Antigonus', combined with 'Lysimachus, Ptolemy' and 'Seleucus', against him: and while 'Lysimachus' invaded the parts of 'Asia' next the 'Hellespont, Ptolemy' subdued 'Phœnicia' and 'Cœlosyria', with the sea-coasts of 'Asia'.

'Seleucus' came down with a powerful army into 'Cappadocia', and joining the confederate forces, fought 'Antigonus' in 'Phrygia' and flew him, and seized his kingdom, 'An. Nabonass'. 447. After which 'Seleucus' built 'Antioch, Seleucia, Laodicea, Apamea, Berrhæa, Edessa', and other cities in 'Syria' and 'Asia'; and in them granted the 'Jews' equal privileges with the 'Greeks'.

'Demetrius' the son of 'Antigonus' retained but a small part of his father's dominions, and at length lost 'Cyprus' to 'Ptolemy'; but afterwards killing 'Alexander', the son and successor of 'Cassander' king of 'Macedon', he seized his kingdom, 'An. Nabonass'. 454. Sometime after, preparing a very great army to recover his father's dominions in 'Asia; Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus' and 'Pyrrhus' king of 'Epirus', combined against him; and 'Pyrrhus' invading 'Macedon', corrupted the army of 'Demetrius', put him to flight, seized his kingdom, and shared it with 'Lysimachus'. After seven (7) months, 'Lysimachus' beating 'Pyrrhus', took 'Macedon' from him, and held it five (5) years and a half (1/2), uniting the kingdoms of 'Macedon' and 'Thrace'. 'Lysimachus' in his wars with 'Antigonus' and 'Demetrius', had taken from them 'Caria, Lydia', and 'Phrygia'; and had a treasury in 'Pergamus', a castle on the top of a conical hill in 'Phrygia', by the river 'Caicus', the custody of which he had committed to one 'Philetærus', who was at first faithful to him, but in the last year of his reign revolted. For 'Lysimachus', having at the instigation of his wife 'Arsinoe', slain first his own son 'Agathocles', and then several that lamented him; the wife of 'Agathocles' fled with her children and brothers, and some others of their friends, and solicited 'Seleucus' to make war upon 'Lysimachus'; whereupon 'Philetærus' also, who grieved at the death of 'Agathocles', and was accused thereof by 'Arsinoe', took up arms, and sided with 'Seleucus'. On this occasion 'Seleucus' and 'Lysimachus' met and fought in 'Phrygia'; and 'Lysimachus' being slain in the battle, lost his kingdom to 'Seleucus', 'An. Nabonass'. 465. Thus the Empire of the 'Greeks', which at first brake into four (4) kingdoms, became now reduced into two (2) notable ones, henceforward called by 'Daniel' the kings of the 'South' and 'North'. For 'Ptolemy' now reigned over 'Egypt, Lybia, Ethiopia, Arabia, Phœnicia, Cœlosyria', and 'Cyprus'; and 'Seleucus', having united three (3) of the four (4) kingdoms, had a dominion scarce inferior to that of the 'Persian' Empire, conquered by 'Alexander' the great. All which is thus represented by 'Daniel': 'And the king of the South [Ptolemy] shall be strong, and one of his Princes [Seleucus, one of Alexander's Princes] shall be strong above him, and have dominion; his dominion shall be a great dominion'.

After 'Seleucus' had reigned seven months over 'Macedon, Greece, Thrace, Asia, Syria, Babylonia, Media', and all the 'East' as far as 'India; Ptolemy Ceraunus', the younger brother of 'Ptolemy Philadelphus' king of 'Egypt', slew him treacherously, and seized his dominions in 'Europe': while 'Antiochus Soter', the son of 'Seleucus', succeeded his father in 'Asia, Syria', and most of the 'East'; and after nineteen (19) or (20) twenty years was succeeded by his son 'Antiochus Theos'; who having a lasting war with 'Ptolemy Philadelphus', at length composed the same by marrying 'Berenice' the daughter of 'Philadelphus': but after a reign of fifteen (15) years, his first (1st) wife 'Laodice' poisoned him, and set her son 'Seleucus Callinicus' upon the throne. 'Callinicus' in the beginning of his reign, by the impulse of his mother 'Laodice', besieged 'Berenice' in 'Daphne' near 'Antioch', and slew her with her young son and many of her women. Whereupon 'Ptolemy Euergetes', the son and successor of 'Philadelphus', made war upon 'Callinicus'; took from him 'Phœnicia, Syria, Cilicia, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Sustana', and some other regions; and carried back into 'Egypt' 40,000 talents of silver, and 2500 images of the 'Gods', amongst which were the 'Gods of Egypt' carried away by 'Cambyses. Antiochus Hierax' at first assisted his brother 'Callinicus', but afterwards contended with him for 'Asia'. In the meantime 'Eumenes' governor of 'Pergamus' beat 'Antiochus', and took from them both all 'Asia' westward of mount 'Taurus'. This was in the fifth year of 'Callinicus', who after an inglorious reign of 20 years was succeeded by his son 'Seleucus Ceraunus'; and 'Euergetes' after four (4) years more, 'An. Nabonass'. 527, was succeeded by his son 'Ptolemy Philopator'. All which is thus signified by 'Daniel': 'And in the end of years they [the kings of the South and North] shall join themselves together: for the king's daughter of the South [Berenice] shall come to the king of the North to make an agreement, but she shall not retain the power of the arm; neither shall she stand, nor her seed, but she shall be delivered up, and he [Callinicus] that brought her, and he whom she brought forth, and they that strengthened her in [those] times, [or defended her in the siege of Daphne.] But out of a branch of her roots shall one stand up in his seat [her brother Euergetes] who shall come with an army, and shall enter into the fortress [or fenced cities] of the king of the North, and shall act against them and prevail: and shall carry captives into Egypt, their Gods with their Princes and precious vessels of silver and gold; and he shall continue some years after the king of the North'.

'Seleucus Ceraunus', inheriting the remains of his father's kingdom, and thinking to recover the rest, raised a great army against the governor of 'Pergamus', now King thereof, but died in the third (3rd) year of his reign. His brother and successor, 'Antiochus Magnus', carrying on the war, took from the King of 'Pergamus' almost all the lesser 'Asia', recovering also the Provinces of 'Media, Persia' and 'Babylonia', from the governors who had revolted: and in the fifth (5th) year of his reign invading 'Cœlosyria', he with little opposition possessed himself of a good part thereof; and the next year returning to invade the rest of 'Cœlosyria' and 'Phœnicia', beat the army of 'Ptolemy Philopator' near 'Berytus'; he then invaded 'Palestine' and the neighbouring parts of 'Arabia', and the third (3rd) year returned with an army of 78,000: but 'Ptolemy' coming out of 'Egypt' with an army of 75,000, fought and routed him at 'Raphia' near 'Gaza', between 'Palestine' and 'Egypt'; and recovered all 'Phœnicia' and 'Cœlosyria, Ann. Nabonass'. 532. Being puffed up with this victory, and living in all manner of luxury, the 'Egyptians' revolted, and had wars with him, but were overcome; and in the broils sixty thousand (60,000) 'Egyptian Jews' were slain. All which is thus described by 'Daniel': 'But his sons [Seleucus Ceraunus, and Antiochus Magnus, the sons of Callinicus] shall be stirred up, and shall gather a great army; and he [Antiochus Magnus] shall come effectually and overflow, and pass thro' and return, and [again the next year] be stirred up [marching even] to his fortress, [the frontier towns of Egypt;] and the King of the South shall be moved with choler, and come forth [the third (3rd) year] and fight with him, even with the King of the North; and he [the King of the North] shall lead forth a great multitude, but the multitude shall be given into his hand. And the multitude being taken away, his heart shall be lifted up, and he shall cast down many ten thousands (10,000s); but he shall not be strengthened by it: for the king of the North shall return', &c.

About twelve (12) years after the battle between 'Philopator' and 'Antiochus, Philopator' died; and left his kingdom to his young son 'Ptolemy Epiphanes', a child of five (5) years old. Thereupon 'Antiochus Magnus' confederated with 'Philip' king of 'Macedon', that they should each invade the dominions of 'Epiphanes' which lay next to them. Hence arose a various war between 'Antiochus' and 'Epiphanes', each of them seizing 'Phœnicia' and 'Cœlosyria' by turns; whereby those countries were much afflicted by both parties. First 'Antiochus' seized them; then one 'Scopas' being sent with the army of 'Egypt', recovered them from 'Antiochus': the next year, 'An. Nabonass' 550, 'Antiochus' fought and routed 'Scopas' near the fountains of 'Jordan', besieged him in 'Sidon', took the city, and recovered 'Syria' and 'Phoenicia' from 'Egypt', the 'Jews' coming over to him voluntarily. But about three (3) years after, preparing for a war against the 'Romans', he came to 'Raphia' on the borders of 'Egypt'; made peace with 'Epiphanes', and gave him his daughter 'Cleopatra': next autumn he passed the 'Hellespont' to invade the cities of 'Greece' under the 'Roman' protection, and took some of them; but was beaten by the 'Romans' the summer following, and forced to return back with his army into 'Asia'. Before the end of the year the fleet of 'Antiochus' was beaten by the fleet of the 'Romans' near 'Phocæa': and at the same time 'Epiphanes' and 'Cleopatra' sent an embassy to 'Rome' to congratulate the 'Romans' on their success against their father 'Antiochus', and to exhort them to prosecute the war against him into 'Asia'. The 'Romans' beat 'Antiochus' again at sea near 'Ephesus', past their army over the 'Hellespont', and obtain'd a great victory over him by land, took from him all 'Asia' westward of mount 'Taurus', gave it to the King of 'Pergamus' who assisted them in the war; and imposed a large tribute upon 'Antiochus'. Thus the King of 'Pergamus', by the power of the 'Romans', recovered what 'Antiochus' had taken from him; and 'Antiochus' retiring into the remainder of his kingdom, was slain two (2) years after by the 'Persians', as he was robbing the Temple of 'Jupiter Belus' in 'Elymais', to raise money for the 'Romans'. All which is thus described by 'Daniel'. 'For the King of the North [Antiochus] shall return, and shall set forth a multitude greater than the former; and shall certainly come, after certain years, with a great army and with much riches. And in those times there shall many stand up against the King of the South, [particularly the Macedonians;] also the robbers of thy people [the Samaritans, &c.] shall exalt themselves to establish the vision, but they shall fall. So the King of the North shall come, and cast up a mount, and take the most fenced cities; and the arms of the South shall not withstand, neither his chosen people, neither shall there be any strength to withstand. But he that cometh against him shall do according to his own will, and none shall stand before him: and he shall stand in the glorious land, which shall fail in his hand. He shall also set his face to go with the strength [or army] of all his kingdom, and make an agreement with him [at Raphia;] and he shall give him the daughter of women corrupting her; but she shall not stand his side, neither be for him. After this he shall turn his face unto the Isles, and shall take many: but a Prince for his own behalf [the Romans] shall cause the reproach offered by him to cease; without his own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him. Then he shall turn his face towards the fort of his own land: but he shall stumble and fall, and not be found'.

'Seleucus Philopator' succeeded his father 'Antiochus, Anno Nabonass'. 561, and reigned twelve (12) years, but did nothing memorable, being sluggish, and intent upon raising money for the 'Romans' to whom he was tributary. He was slain by 'Heliodorus', whom he had sent to rob the Temple of 'Jerusalem. Daniel' thus describes his reign. 'Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom, but within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle'.

A little before the death of 'Philopator', his son 'Demetrius' was sent hostage to 'Rome', in the place of 'Antiochus Epiphanes', the brother of 'Philopator'; and 'Antiochus' was at 'Athens' in his way home from 'Rome', when 'Philopator' died: whereupon 'Heliodorus' the treasurer of the kingdom, stepped into the throne. But 'Antiochus' so managed his affairs, that the 'Romans' kept 'Demetrius' at 'Rome'; and their ally the King of 'Pergamus' expelled 'Heliodorus', and placed 'Antiochus' in the throne, while 'Demetrius' the right heir remained a hostage at 'Rome'. 'Antiochus' being thus made King by the friendship of the King of 'Pergamus' reigned powerfully over 'Syria' and the neighbouring nations: but carried himself much below his dignity, stealing privately out of his palace, rambling up and down the city in disguise with one (1) or two (2) of his companions; conversing and drinking with people of the lowest rank, foreigners and strangers; frequenting the meetings of dissolute persons to feast and revel; clothing himself like the 'Roman' candidates and officers, acting their parts like a mimick, and in publick festivals jesting and dancing with servants and light people, exposing himself by all manner of ridiculous gestures. This conduct made some take him for a madman, and call him 'Antiochus' (Επιμενης) (Epimenēs). In first (1st) year of his reign he deposed 'Onias' the high-Priest, and sold the high-Priesthood to 'Jason' the younger brother of 'Onias': for 'Jason' had promised to give him 440 talents of silver for that office, and 15 more for a licence to erect a place of exercise for the training up of youth in the fashions of the heathen; which licence was granted by the King, and put in execution by 'Jason'. Then the King sending one 'Apollonius' into 'Egypt' to the coronation of 'Ptolemy Philometor', the young son of 'Philometor' and 'Cleopatra', and knowing 'Philometor' not to be well affected to his affairs in 'Phaenicia', provided for his own safety in those parts; and for that end came to 'Joppa' and 'Jerusalem', where he was honourably received; from thence he went in like manner with his little army to the cities of 'Phaenicia', to establish himself against 'Egypt', by courting the people, and distributing extraordinary favours amongst them. All which is thus represented by 'Daniel'. And in his [Philometor's] estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they [the Syrians who set up Heliodorus] shall not give the honour of the kingdom. Yet he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries [made principally to the King of Pergamus;] and the arms [which in favour of Heliodorus oppose him] shall be overflowed with a food from before him, and be broken; yea also [Onias the high-Priest] the Prince of the covenant. And after the league made with him, [the King of Egypt, by sending Apollonius to his coronation] he shall work deceitfully [against the King of Egypt,] for he shall come up and shall become strong [in Phaenicia] with a small people. And he shall enter into the quiet and plentiful cities of the Province [of Phaenicia;] and [to ingratiate himself with the Jews of Phaenicia and Egypt, and with their friends] he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers fathers: he shall scatter among them the prey and the spoil, and the riches [exacted from other places;] and shall forecast his devices against the strong holds [of Egypt] even for a time'.

These things were done in the first (1st) year of his reign, 'An. Nabonass'. 573. And thenceforward he forecast his devices against the strong holds of 'Egypt', until the sixth (6th) year. For three (3) years after, that is in the fourth (4th) year of his reign, 'Menelaus' bought the high-Priesthood from 'Jason', but not paying the price was sent for by the King; and the King, before he could hear the cause, went into 'Cilicia' to appease a sedition there, and left 'Andronicus' his deputy at 'Antioch'; in the mean time the brother of 'Menelaus', to make up the money, conveyed several vessels out of the Temple, selling some of them at 'Tyre', and sending others to 'Andronicus'. When 'Menelaus' was reproved for this by 'Onias', he caused 'Onias' to be slain by 'Andronicus': for which fact the King at his return from 'Cilicia' caused 'Andronicus' to be put to death. Then 'Antiochus' prepared his second expedition against 'Egypt', which he performed in the sixth (6th) year of his reign, 'An. Nabonass'. 578: for upon the death of 'Cleopatra', the governors of her son the young King of 'Egypt' claimed 'Phaenicia' and 'Caelosyria' from him as her dowry; and to recover those countries raised a great army. 'Antiochus' considering that his father had not quitted the possession of those countries, denied they were her dowry; and with another great army met and fought the 'Egyptians' on the borders of 'Egypt', between 'Pelusium' and the mountain 'Casius'. He there beat them, and might have destroyed their whole army, but that he rode up and down, commanding his soldiers not to kill them, but to take them alive: by which humanity he gained 'Pelusium', and soon after all 'Egypt'; entering it with a vast multitude of foot and chariots, elephants and horsemen, and a great navy. Then seizing the cities of 'Egypt' as a friend, he marched to 'Memphis', laid the whole blame of the war upon 'Eulæus' the King's governor, entered into outward friendship with the young King, and took upon him to order the affairs of the kingdom. While 'Antiochus' was thus employ'd, a report being spread in 'Phaenicia' that he was dead, 'Jason' to recover the high-Priesthood assaulted 'Jerusalem' with above a thousand (1,000) men, and took the city: hereupon the King thinking 'Judea' had revolted, came out of 'Egypt' in a furious manner, re-took the city, slew forty thousand (40,000) of the people, made as many prisoners, and sold them to raise money; went into the Temple, spoiled it of its treasures, ornaments, utensils, and vessels of gold and silver, amounting to 1800 talents; and carried all away to Antioch. This was done in the year of 'Nabonassar' 578, and is thus described by 'Daniel'. 'And he shall stir up his power, and his courage against the King of the South with a great army; and the King of the South shall be stirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army; but he shall not stand: for they, even Antiochus and his friends, shall forecast devices against him, (as is represented above;) yea, they that feed of the portion of his meat, shall betray and destroy him, and his army shall be overthrown, and many shall fall down slain. And both these Kings hearts shall be to do mischief; and they, being now made friends, shall speak lyes at one table, against the Jews and against the holy covenant; but it shall not prosper: for yet the end, (in which the setting up of the abomination of desolation is to prosper,) shall be at the time appointed. Then shall he return into his land with great riches, and his heart shall be against the holy covenant; and he shall act, against it (by spoiling the Temple), and return into his own land'.

The 'Egyptians' of 'Alexandria' seeing 'Philometor' first (1st) educated in luxury by the Eunuch 'Eulæus', and now in the hands of 'Antiochus', gave the kingdom to 'Euergetes', the younger brother of 'Philometor'. Whereupon 'Antiochus' pretending to restore 'Philometor', made war upon 'Euergetes'; beat him at sea, and besieged him and his sister 'Cleopatra' in 'Alexandria': while the besieged Princes sent to 'Rome' to implore the assistance of the Senate. 'Antiochus' finding himself unable to take the city that year, returned into 'Syria', leaving 'Philometor' at 'Memphis' to govern 'Egypt' in his absence. But 'Philometor' made friendship with his brother that winter; and 'Antiochus', returning the next spring 'An. Nabonass'. 580, to besiege both the brothers in 'Alexandria', was met in the way by the 'Roman' Ambassadors, 'Popilius Læna, C. Decimius', and 'C. Hostilius': he offered them his hand to kiss, but 'Popilius' delivering to him the tables wherein the message of the Senate was written, had him read those first. When he had read them, he replied he would consider with his friends what was fit to be done; but 'Popilius' drawing a circle about him, had him answer before he went out of it: 'Antiochus', astonished at this blunt and unusual imperiousness, made answer he would do what the 'Romans' demanded; and then 'Popilius' gave the King his hand to kiss, and he returned out of 'Egypt'. The same year, 'An. Nabonass'. 580, his captains by his order spoiled and slaughtered the 'Jews', profaned the Temple, set up the worship of the heathen 'Gods' in all 'Judea', and began to persecute and make war upon those who would not worship them: which actions are thus described by 'Daniel'. 'At the time appointed he shall come again towards the South, but the latter shall not be as the former. For the ships of Chittim shall come, with an embassy from Rome, against him. Therefore he shall be grieved, and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant. So shall he do; he shall even return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant'.

In the same year that 'Antiochus' by the command of the 'Romans' retired out of 'Egypt', and set up the worship of the 'Greeks' in 'Judea'; the 'Romans' conquered the kingdom of 'Macedon', the fundamental kingdom of the Empire of the 'Greeks', and reduced it into a 'Roman' Province; and thereby began to put an end to the reign of 'Daniel's' third (3rd) Beast. This is thus exprest by 'Daniel'. 'And after him Arms, that is the Romans, shall stand up'. As (ממלך) (mmlk) signifies 'after the King', Dan. 11:8; so (ממנו) (mmnw) may signify 'after him'. 'Arms' are every where in this Prophecy of 'Daniel' put for the military power of a kingdom: and they stand up when they conquer and grow powerful. Hitherto 'Daniel' described the actions of the Kings of the 'North' and 'South'; but upon the conquest of 'Macedon' by the 'Romans', he left off describing the actions of the 'Greeks', and began to describe those of the 'Romans' in 'Greece'. They conquered 'Macedon, Illyricum' and 'Epirus', in the year of 'Nabonassar' 580. 35 years after, by the last will and testament of 'Attalus' the last King of 'Pergamus', they inherited that rich and flourishing kingdom, that is, all 'Asia' westward of mount 'Taurus'; 69 years after they conquered the kingdom of 'Syria', and reduced it into a Province, and 34 years after they did the like to 'Egypt'. By all these steps the 'Roman' Arms stood up over the 'Greeks': and after 95 years more, by making war upon the 'Jews', they polluted the sanctuary of strength, and took away the daily sacrifice, and then placed the abomination of desolation'. For this abomination was placed after the days of 'Christ', 'Math'. 24:15. In the 16th year of the Emperor 'Adrian', A.C. 132, they placed this abomination by building a Temple to 'Jupiter Capitolinus', where the Temple of God in 'Jerusalem' had stood. Thereupon the 'Jews' under the conduct of 'Barchochab' rose up in arms against the 'Romans', and in the war had 50 cities demolished, 985 of their best towns destroyed, and 580,000 (1/2 million plus) men slain by the sword; and in the end of the war, A.C. 136, were banished 'Judea' upon pain of death, and thenceforward the land remained desolate of its old inhabitants.

In the beginning of the 'Jewish' war in 'Nero's' reign, the Apostles fled out of 'Judea' with their flocks; some beyond 'Jordan' to 'Pella' and other places, some into 'Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia, Asia minor', and elsewhere. 'Peter' and 'John' came into 'Asia', and 'Peter' went thence by 'Corinth' to 'Rome'; but 'John' staying in 'Asia', was banished by the 'Romans' into 'Patmos', as the head of a party of the 'Jews', whose nation was in war with the 'Romans'. By this dispersion of the 'Christian Jews', the 'Christian' religion, which was already propagated westward as far as 'Rome', spread fast into all the 'Roman' Empire, and suffered many persecutions under it till the days of 'Constantine' the great and his sons: all which is thus described by 'Daniel'. 'And such as do wickedly against the covenant, shall he, (who places the abomination), cause to dissemble, and worship the heathen 'Gods'; but the people among them who do know their God, shall be strong and act. And they that understand among the people, shall instruct many: yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, and by captivity, and by spoil many days. Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help, (viz. in the reign of Constantine the great;) and (at that time by reason of their prosperity), many shall come over (to them from among the heathen), and cleave to them with dissimulation. But of those of understanding there shall still fall to try (God's people) by them and to purge (them from the dissemblers), and to make them white even to the time of the end: because it is yet for a time appointed'.

Hitherto the 'Roman' Empire continued entire; and under this dominion, the little horn of the He-Goat continued 'mighty, but not by his own power'. But now, by the building of 'Constantinople', and endowing it with a Senate and other like privileges with 'Rome'; and by the division of the 'Roman' Empire into the two Empires of the 'Greeks' and 'Latins', headed by those two cities; a new scene of things commences, in which which 'a King, the Empire of the Greeks, doth according to his will, and, by setting his own laws above the laws of God, exalts and magnifies himself above every God, and speaks marvellous things against the God of 'Gods', and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished.— Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the lawful desire of women in matrimony, nor any God, but shall magnify himself above all. And in his seat he shall honour Mahuzzims, (that is, strong guardians, the souls of the dead); even with a God whom his fathers knew not shall he honour them, (in their Temples), with gold and silver, and with precious stones and valuable things'. All which relates to the overspreading of the 'Greek' Empire with Monks and Nuns, who placed holiness in abstinence from marriage; and to the invocation of saints and veneration of their reliques, and such like superstitions, which these men introduced in the fourth (4th) and fifth (5th) centuries. 'And at the time of the end the King of the South, (or the Empire of the Saracens), shall push at him; and the King of the North, (or Empire of the Turks), shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he shall enter into the countries of the Greeks, and shall overflow and pass over. He shall enter also into the glorious land, and many countries shall be overthrown; but these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom and Moab, and the chief of the children Ammon: (that is, those to whom his Caravans pay tribute). He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries, and the land of Egypt shall not escape; but he shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt; and the Lybians and Ethiopians shall be at his steps'. All these nations compose the Empire of the 'Turks', and therefore this Empire is here to be understood by the King of the 'North'. They compose also the body of the He-Goat; and therefore the Goat still reigns in his last horn, but not by his own power. (Notes to Chap. XII. Chap. 11:2,3,4. 11:5. 11:6,7,8. 11:10, &c. 11:13-19. 11:20. 11:21, &c. 2nd Maccab. 3:5, 8. & 4:4. 11:25, &c. 11:29, 30. 11:32, &c. 11:36, &c. 11:40, &c.)"

XIII. 'King who did according to his will, and magnified himself above every 'God', and honoured 'Mahuzzims', and regarded not the desire of women'.

{{ In the first ages of the Christian religion the Christians of every city were governed by a Council of Presbyters, and the President of the Council was the Bishop of the city. The Bishop and Presbyters of one city meddled not with the affairs of another city, except by admonitory letters or messages. Nor did the Bishops of several cities meet together in Council before the time of the Emperor 'Commodus': for they could not meet together without the leave of the 'Roman' governors of the Provinces. But in the days of that Emperor they began to meet in Provincial Councils, by the leave of the governors; first in 'Asia', in opposition to the 'Cataphrygian' (Montanism) Heresy, and soon after in other places and upon other occasions. The Bishop of the chief city, or Metropolis of the 'Roman' Province, was usually made President of the Council; and hence came the authority of Metropolitan Bishops above that of other Bishops within the same Province. Hence also it was that the Bishop of 'Rome' in 'Cyprian's' days called himself the Bishop of Bishops. As soon as the Empire became Christian, the 'Roman' Emperors began to call general Councils out of all the Provinces of the Empire; and by prescribing to them what points they should consider, and influencing them by their interest and power, they set up what party they pleased. Hereby the 'Greek' Empire, upon the division of the 'Roman' Empire into the 'Greek' and 'Latin' Empires, became 'the King who', in matters of religion, 'did according to his will; and, in legislature, exalted and magnified himself above every God': and at length, by the seventh general Council, established the worship of the images and souls of dead men, here called 'Mahuzzims' [i.e. idolatry, saint-worship].

The same King placed holiness in abstinence from marriage. 'Eusebius' in his Ecclesiastical history tells us, that 'Musanus' wrote a tract against those who fell away to the heresy of the 'Encratites', which was then newly risen, and had introduced pernicious errors; and that 'Tatian', the disciple of 'Justin', was the author thereof; and that 'Irenæus' in his first book against heresies teaches this, writing of 'Tatian' and his heresy in these words: 'A Saturnino & Marcione profecti qui vocantur Continentes, docuerunt non contrahendum esse matrimonium; reprobantes scilicet primitivum illud opificium Dei, & tacite accusantes Deum qui masculum & fæminam condidit ad procreationem generis humani. Induxerunt etiam abstinentioniam ab esu eorum quæ animalia appellant, ingratos se exhibentes ergo eum qui universa creavit Deum. Negant etiam primi hominis salutem. Atque hoc nuper apud illos excogitatum est, Tatiano quodam omnium primo hujus impietatis auctore: qui Justini auditor, quamdiu cum illo versatus est, nihil ejusmodi protulit. Post martyrium autem illius, ab Ecclesia se abrumpens, doctoris arrogantia elatus ac tumidus, tanquam præstantior cæteris, novam quandam formam doctrinæ conflavit: Æonas invisibiles commentus perinde ac Valentinus: asserens quoque cum Saturnino & Marcione, matrimonium nihil aliud esse quam corruptionem ac stuprum: nova præterea argumenta ad subvertendam Adami salutem excogitans. Hæc Irenæus de Hæresi quæ tunc viguit Encratitarum'. [Philip Schaff's Nicene & Post-Nicene Fathers: Eusebius of Caesarea: Ecclesiastical History - Book IV Chapter 29: The Heresy of Tatian: "He is the one whose words we quoted a little above in regard to that admirable man, Justin, and whom we stated to have been a disciple of the martyr. Irenaeus declares this in the first book of his work Against Heresies, where he writes as follows concerning both him and his heresy: "Those who are called Encratites, and who sprung from Saturninus and Marcion, preached celibacy, setting aside the original arrangement of God and tacitly censuring him who made male and female for the propagation of the human race. They introduced also abstinence from the things called by them animate, thus showing ingratitude to the God who made all things. And they deny the salvation of the first man? But this has been only recently discovered by them, a certain Tatian being the first to introduce this blasphemy. He was a hearer of Jus-tin, and expressed no such opinion while he was with him, but after the martyrdom of the latter he left the Church, and becoming exalted with the thought of being a teacher, and puffed up with the idea that he was superior to others, he established a peculiar type of doctrine of his own, inventing certain invisible aeons like the followers of Valentinus, while, like Marcion and Saturninus, he pronounced marriage to be corruption and fornication. His argument against the salvation of Adam, however, he devised for himself." Irenaeus at that time wrote thus. But a little later a certain man named Severus put new strength into the aforesaid heresy, and thus brought it about that those who took their origin from it were called, after him, Severians. They, indeed, use the Law and Prophets and Gospels, but interpret in their own way the utterances of the Sacred Scriptures. And they abuse Paul the apostle and reject his epistles, and do not accept even the Acts of the Apostles. But their original founder, Tatian, formed a certain combination and collection of the Gospels, I know not how, to which he gave the title Diatessaron, and which is still in the hands of some. But they say that he ventured to paraphrase certain words of the apostle, in order to improve their style. He has left a great many writings. Of these the one most in use among many persons is his celebrated Address to the Greeks, which also appears to be the best and most useful of all his works. In it he deals with the most ancient times, and shows that Moses and the Hebrew prophets were older than all the celebrated men among the Greeks. So much in regard to these men."] Thus far 'Eusebius'. But altho the followers of 'Tatian' were at first condemned as hereticks by the name of 'Encratites', or 'Continentes'; their principles could not be yet quite exploded: for 'Montanus' refined upon them, and made only second marriages unlawful; he also introduced frequent fastings, and annual, fasting days, the keeping of 'Lent', and feeding upon dried meats. The 'Apostolici', about the middle of the third (3rd) century, condemned marriage, and were a branch of the disciples of 'Tatian'. The 'Hierocitæ' in 'Egypt', in the latter end of the third (3rd) century, also condemned marriage. 'Paul' the 'Eremitæ' fled into the wilderness from the persecution of 'Decius', and lived there a solitary life till the reign of 'Constantine' the great, but made no disciples. 'Antony' did the like in the persecution of 'Dioclesian', or a little before, and made disciples; and many others soon followed his example.

Hitherto the principles of the 'Encratites' had been rejected by the Churches; but now being refined by the Monks, and imposed not upon all men, but only upon those who would voluntarily undertake a monastic life, they began to be admired, and to overflow first the 'Greek' Church, and then the 'Latin' also, like a torrent. 'Eusebius' tells us, that 'Constantine' the great had those men in the highest veneration, who dedicated themselves wholly to the divine philosophy; and that he almost venerated the most holy company of Virgins perpetually devoted to God; being certain that the God to whom he had consecrated himself did dwell in their minds. In his time and that of his sons, this profession of a single life was propagated in 'Egypt' by 'Antony', and in 'Syria' by 'Hilarion'; and spread so fast, that soon after the time of 'Julian' the Apostate a third (3rd) part of the 'Egyptians' were got into the deserts of 'Egypt'. They lived first (1st) singly in cells, then associated into 'cœnobia' or convents; and at length came into towns, and filled the Churches with Bishops, Presbyters and Deacons. 'Athanasius' in his younger days poured water upon the hands of his master 'Antony'; and finding the Monks faithful to him, made many of them Bishops and Presbyters in 'Egypt': and these Bishops erected new Monasteries, out of which they chose Presbyters of their own cities, and sent Bishops to others. The like was done in 'Syria', the superstition being quickly propagated thither out of 'Egypt' by 'Hilarion' a disciple of 'Antony. Spiridion' and 'Epiphanius' of 'Cyprus, James' of 'Nisibis, Cyril' of 'Jerusalem, Eustathius' of 'Sebastia' in 'Armenia, Eusebius of Emisa, Titus of Bostra, Basilius of Ancyra, Acacius of Cæsarea in Palestine, Elpidius of Laodicea, Melitius and Flavian of Antioch, Theodorus of Tyre, Protogenes of Carrhæ, Acacius of Berrhæa, Theodotus of Hierapolis, Eusebius of Chalcedon, Amphilocheus of Iconium, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory Nyssen', and 'John Chrysostom of Constantinople', were both Bishops and Monks in the fourth (4th) century. 'Eustathius, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory Nyssen, Basil', &c. had Monasteries of Clergymen in their cities, out of which Bishops were sent to other cities; who in like manner erected Monasteries there, till the Churches were supplied with Bishops out of these Monasteries. Hence 'Jerome', in a Letter written about the year 385, saith of the Clergy: 'Quasi & ipsi aliud sint quam Monachi, & non quicquid in Monachos dicitur redundet in Clericos qui patres sunt Monachorum. Detrimentum pecoris pastoris ignominia est'. [In Loeb's edition, letter 54.5 : "just as though they were not monks themselves, and as though every word said against monks did not tell also against their spiritual progenitors the clergy. Harm done to the flock brings discredit on the shepherd."] And in his book against 'Vigilantius: Quid facient Orientis Ecclesiæ? [...] Quæ aut Virgines Clericos accipiunt, aut Continentes, aut si uxores habuerint mariti esse desistunt' [What are the Churches of the East to do?...which accept for the ministry only men who are virgins, or those who practice continency, or, if married, abandon their conjugal rights. See Jer. against Vigil. 2.]. Not long after even the Emperors commanded the Churches to chuse Clergymen out of the Monasteries by this Law: Impp. (Emperors) Arcad & Honor. AA. Cæsario PF. P.: (CTh.16.2. Bishops, Churches, & Clergy of the Religious Life in the Catholic Faith. Also compare the New Canon Law Codes for Ecclesiastical Persons of Clergy & Hierarchy: Canon 87-214.) (16.2.32:) Si quos forte Episcopi deesse sibi Clericos arbitrantur, ex monachorum numero rectius ordinabunt: non obnoxios publicis privatisque rationibus cum invidia teneant, sed habeant jam probatos. [Select a Bishop from the Clergy of pre-approved Monks.] Dat. vii. Kal. Aug. Honorio A. iv. & Eutychiano Coss'.(398 [?] iul. 26). A.C. 598. The 'Greek' Empire being now in the hands of these 'Encratites', and having them in great admiration, 'Daniel' makes it a characteristic of the King who doth according to his will, that 'he should not regard the desire of Women'.

Thus the Sect of the 'Encratites', set on foot by the 'Gnosticks', and propagated by 'Tatian' and 'Montanus' near the end of the second (2nd) century; which was condemned by the Churches of that and the third (3rd) century, and refined upon by their followers; overspread the 'Eastern' Churches in the fourth (4th) century, and before the end of it began to overspread the 'Western'. Henceforward the Christian Churches 'having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof', came into the hands of the Encratites: and the Heathens, who in the fourth century came over in great numbers to the Christians, embraced more readily this sort of Christianity, as having a greater affinity with their old superstitions, than that of the sincere Christians; who by 'the lamps of the seven Churches of Asia', and not by the lamps of the Monasteries, had illuminated the Church Catholic during the three (3) first (1st) centuries.

The 'Cataphrygians' brought in also several other superstitions: such as were the doctrine of Ghosts, and of their punishment in Purgatory, with prayers and oblations for mitigating that punishment, as 'Tertullian' teaches in his books 'De Anima' and 'De Monogamia'. They used also the sign of the cross as a charm. So 'Tertullian' in his book 'de Corona militis: Ad omnem progressum atque promotum, ad omnem aditum & exitum, ad vestitum, ad calceatum, ad lavacra, ad mensas, ad lamina, ad cubilia, ad sedilia, quacunque nos conversatio exercet, frontem crucis signaculo terimus' ("At every forward step and movement, at every going in and out, when we put on our our clothes and shoes, when we bathe, when we sit at table, when we light the lamps, on couch, on seat, in all the ordinary actions of daily life, we trace upon the forehead the sign [of the cross]."-- in ANF, vol 3, part 1st). All these superstitions the Apostle refers to, where he saith: 'Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils', the Dæmons and Ghosts worshipped by the heathens, 'speaking lyes in hypocrisy', about their apparitions, the miracles done by them, their reliques, and the sign of the cross, 'having consciences seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats', &c. 1 Tim. iv. 1,2,3. From the 'Cataphrygians' these principles and practices were propagated down to posterity. 'For the mystery of iniquity' did 'already work' in the 'Apostles' days in the 'Gnosticks', continued to work very strongly in their offspring the 'Tatianists' and 'Cataphrygians', and was to work 'till that man of sin' should 'be revealed; whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs, and lying wonders, and all deceivableness of unrighteousness'; coloured over with a form of 'Christian' 'godliness, but without the power thereof', 2nd Thess. 2:7-10.

For tho some stop was put to the 'Cataphrygian' Christianity, by Provincial Councils, till the fourth (4th) century; yet the 'Roman' Emperors then turning 'Christians', and great multitudes of heathens coming over in outward profession, these found the Cataphrygian Christianity more suitable to their old principles, of placing religion in outward forms and ceremonies, holy-days, and doctrines of Ghosts, than the religion of the sincere 'Christians': wherefore they readily sided with the Cataphrygian Christians, and established that Christianity before the end of the fourth (4th) century. By this means those of understanding, after they had been persecuted by the heathen Emperors in the three (3) first (1st) centuries, and 'were holpen with a little help', by the conversion of 'Constantine' the great and his sons to the 'Christian' religion, fell under new persecutions, 'to purge them' from the dissemblers, 'and to make them white, even to the time of the end'. (Notes to Chap. XIII. Lib. 4. c. 28,29. In vita Constantini, l. 4. c. 28. Epist. 10. L. 32. de Episcopis.)" }}

XIV: 'Mahuzzims', honoured by the King who doth according to his will'.

{{ In scripture we are told of some 'trusting in God' and others 'trusting in idols', and that 'God is our refuge, our strength, our defense'. In this sense God is 'the rock of his people', and false 'Gods' are called 'the rock of those that trust in them', 'Deut'. 32:4, 15, 18, 30,31, 37. In the same sense the 'Gods' of 'the King who shall do according to his will' are called 'Mahuzzims', munitions, fortresses, protectors, guardians, or defenders. 'In his estate', saith 'Daniel, shall he honour Mahuzzims; even with a God whom his fathers knew not, shall he honour them with gold and silver, and with precious stones, and things of value. Thus shall he do in the most strong holds or temples; —and he shall cause them to rule over many, and divide the land among them for a possession'. Now this came to pass by degrees in the following manner.

'Gregory Nyssen' tells us, that after the persecution of the Emperor 'Decius, Gregory Bishop of Neocæsarea in Pontus, instituted among all people, as an addition or corollary of devotion towards God, that festival days and assemblies should be celebrated to them who had contended for the faith', that is, to the 'Martyrs'. And he adds this reason for the institution: 'When he observed', saith 'Nyssen, that the simple and unskilful multitude, by reason of corporeal delights, remained in the error of idols; that the principal thing might be corrected among them, namely, that instead of their vain worship they might turn their eyes upon God; he permitted that at the memories of the holy Martyrs they might make merry and delight themselves, and be dissolved into joy'. The heathens were delighted with the festivals of their 'Gods', and unwilling to part with those delights; and therefore 'Gregory', to facilitate their conversion, instituted annual festivals to the 'Saints' and 'Martyrs'. Hence it came to pass, that for exploding the festivals of the heathens, the principal festivals of the 'Christians' succeeded in their room:

as the keeping of 'Christmas' with ivy and feasting, and playing and sports, in the room of the 'Bacchanalia' and 'Saturnalia'; the celebrating of 'May-day' with flowers, in the room of the 'Floralia'; and the keeping of festivals to the Virgin 'Mary, John' the Baptist, and divers of the Apostles, in the room of the solemnities at the entrance of the Sun into the signs of the 'Zodiac' in the old 'Julian' Calendar. In the same persecution of 'Decius, Cyprian' ordered the passions of the Martyrs in 'Africa' to be registred, in order to celebrate their memories annually with oblations and sacrifices: and 'Felix' Bishop of 'Rome', a little after, as 'Platina' relates, 'Martyrum gloria consulens, constituit at quotannis sacrificia eorum nomine celebrarentur'; "consulting the glory of the Martyrs, ordained that sacrifices should be celebrated annually in their name." By the pleasures of these festivals the 'Christians' increased much in number, and decreased as much in virtue, until they were 'purged and made white' by the persecution of 'Dioclesian'. This was the first step made in the 'Christian' religion towards the veneration of the Martyrs: and tho it did not yet amount to an unlawful worship; yet it disposed the 'Christians' towards such a further veneration of the dead, as in a short time ended in the invocation of Saints.

The next step was the affecting to pray at the sepulchres of the Martyrs: which practice began in 'Dioclesian's persecution. The Council of 'Eliberis' in 'Spain', celebrated in the third (3rd) or fourth (4th) year of 'Dioclesian's persecution, A.C. 305, hath these Canons. Can. 34. 'Cereos per diem placuit in Cœmeterio non incendi: inquietandi enim spiritus sanctorum non sunt. Qui hæc non observârint, arceantur ab Ecclesiæ communione' (The 34th Canon is very obscure: It declares, That Wax Candles are not be lighted in the Coemiteries (Cemeteries): because we must not disturb the Spirits of the Saints. Some understand by the Spirit of the Saints the Souls of the Dead: I think that it is more natural to understand by it, the Repose of the Spirits of the Faithful that are alive and may be troubled with a great multitude of Lights in the daytime."--Du Pin.). Can. 35. 'Placuit prohiberi ne fœminæ in Cœmeterio pervigilent, eò quod sæpe sub obtentu orationis latentèr scelera committant' (The 35th redresses a dangerous Abuse; it is set down in these Words: "We have thought fit to hinder women from spending the Night in the Coemiteries (Cemeteries), because oftentimes under pretence of praying they commit in secret great Crimes."--Du Pin.). Presently after that persecution, suppose about the year 314, the Council of 'Laodicea' in 'Phrygia', which then met for restoring the lapsed discipline of the Church, has the following Canons. Can. 9. 'Those of the Church are not allowed to go into the Cœmeteries or Martyries, as they are called, of hereticks, for the sake of prayer or recovery of health: but such as go, if they be of the faithful, shall be excommunicated for a time'. Can. 34. 'A Christian must not leave the Martyrs of Christ, and go to false Martyrs, that is, to the Martyrs of the hereticks; for these are alien from God: and therefore let those be anathema who go to them'. Can. 51. 'The birth-days of the Martyrs shall not be celebrated in Lent, but their commemoration shall be made on the Sabbath-days and Lords days'. The Council of 'Paphlagonia', celebrated in the year 324, made this Canon: 'If any man being arrogant, abominates the congregations of the Martyrs, or the Liturgies performed therein, or the memories of the Martyrs, let him be anathema'. By all which it is manifest that the 'Christians' in the time of 'Dioclesian's persecution used to pray in the 'Cœmeteries' or burying-places of the dead; for avoiding the danger of the persecution, and for want of Churches, which were all thrown down: and after the persecution was over, continued that practice in honour of the Martyrs, till new Churches could be built: and by use affected it as advantageous to devotion, and for recovering the health of those that were sick. It also appears that in these burying-places they commemorated the Martyrs yearly upon days dedicated to them, and accounted all these practices pious and religious, and anathematized those men as arrogant who opposed them, or prayed in the 'Martyries' of the hereticks. They also lighted torches to the Martyrs in the day-time, as the heathens did to their 'Gods'; which custom, before the end of the fourth (4th) century, prevailed much in the 'West'. They sprinkled the worshipers of the Martyrs with holy-water, as the heathens did the worshipers of their 'Gods'; and went in pilgrimage to see 'Jerusalem' and other holy places, as if those places conferred sanctity on the visiters. From the custom of praying in the

'Cœmeteries' and 'Martyries', came the custom of translating the bodies of the Saints and Martyrs into such Churches as were new built: the Emperor 'Constantius' began this practice about the year 359, causing the bodies of 'Andrew' the Apostle, 'Luke' and 'Timothy', to be translated into a new Church at 'Constantinople': and before this act of 'Constantius', the 'Egyptians' kept the bodies of their Martyrs and Saints unburied upon beds in their private houses, and told stories of their souls appearing after death and ascending up to heaven, as 'Athanasius' relates in the life of 'Antony'. All which gave occasion to the Emperor 'Julian', as 'Cyril' relates, to accuse the 'Christians' in this manner: 'Your adding to that antient dead man, Jesus, many new dead men, who can sufficiently abominate? You have filled all places with sepulchres and monuments, altho you are no where bidden to prostrate yourselves to sepulchres, and to respect them officiously'. And a little after: 'Since Jesus said that sepulchres are full of filthiness, how do you invoke God upon them?' and in another place he saith, that if 'Christians' had adhered to the precepts of the 'Hebrews, they would have worshiped one God instead of many, and not a man, or rather not many unhappy men': And that they 'adored the wood of the cross, making its images on their foreheads, and before their houses'. [Compare Justianian Code: 3. The Emperors Honorius and Theodosius: "Let no one sell or purchase the relics of martyrs." Given at Constantinople, on the fourth of the Kalends of March, during the Consulate of the Prince Honorius, and Evodius, 386. 26. "The Emperor Leo to Julian, Praetorian Prefect: "We decree that, hereafter, no monk, nor anyone else, no matter what his station or rank, shall unlawfully attempt to carry the Holy Cross, or the relics of the martyrs into any public house or place of any description, which has been set apart for the pleasure of the people; or shall venture to take possession of any building which has been erected for public purposes, or popular amusement. For, as religious houses are not lacking, after the episcopal authorities have been consulted, as is necessary, the relics of the holy martyrs can be placed therein, not by the arbitrary action of anyone, but by the authority of the Most Reverend Bishops. Hence Our laws, public discipline, and the reputation of the monks themselves, demand the exercise of patience and moderation, and each monk, as well as every member of other orders, should zealously attempt always to practice these virtues."]

After the sepulchres of Saints and Martyrs were thus converted into places of worship like the heathen temples, and the Churches into sepulchres, and a certain sort of sanctity attributed to the dead bodies of the Saints and Martyrs buried in them, and annual festivals were kept to them, with sacrifices offered to God in their name; the next step towards the invocation of Saints, was the attributing to their dead bodies, bones and other reliques, a power of working miracles, by means of the separate souls, who were supposed to know what we do or say, and to be able to do us good or hurt, and to work those miracles. This was the very notion the heathens had of the separate souls of their antient Kings and Heroes, whom they worshiped under the names of 'Saturn, Rhea, Jupiter, Juno, Mars, Venus, Bacchus, Ceres, Osiris, Isis, Apollo, Diana', and the rest of their 'Gods'. For these 'Gods' being male and female, husband and wife, son and daughter, brother and sister, are thereby discovered to be antient men and women. Now as the first (1st) step towards the invocation of Saints was set on foot by the persecution of 'Decius', and the second (2nd) by the persecution of 'Dioclesian'; so this third (3rd) seems to have been owing to the proceedings of 'Constantius' and 'Julian' the Apostate. When 'Julian' began to restore the worship of the heathen 'Gods', and to vilify the Saints and Martyrs; the 'Christians' of 'Syria' and 'Egypt' seem to have made a great noise about the miracles done by the reliques of the 'Christian' Saints and Martyrs, in opposition to the powers attributed by 'Julian' and the heathens to their Idols. For 'Sozomen' and 'Ruffinus' tell us, that when he opened the heathen Temples, and consulted the Oracle of 'Apollo Daphnæus' in the suburbs of 'Antioch', and pressed by many sacrifices for an answer; the Oracle at length told him that the bones of the Martyr 'Babylas' which were buried there hinder'd him from speaking. By which answer we may understand, that some 'Christian' was got into the place where the heathen Priests used to speak thro' a pipe in delivering their Oracles: and before this, 'Hilary' in his book against 'Constantius', written in the last year of that Emperor, makes the following mention of what was then doing in the 'East' where he was. 'Sine martyrio persequeris. Plus crudelitati vestræ' Nero, Deci, Maximiane, 'debemus. Diabolum enim per vos vicimus. Sanctus ubique beatorum martyrum sanguis exceptus est, dum in his Dæmones mugiunt, dum ægritudines depelluntur, dum miraculorum opera cernuntur, elevari sine laqueis corpora, & dispensis pede fæminis vestes non defluere in faciem, uri sine ignibus spiritus, confiteri sine interrogantis incremento fidei'. And 'Gregory Nazianzen', in his first Oration against the Emperor 'Julian' then reigning, writes thus: 'Martyres non extimui quibus præclari honores & festa constituta, à quibus Dæmones propelluntur & morbi curantur; quorum sunt apparitiones & prædictiones; quorum vel sola corpora idem possunt quod animæ sanctæ, sive manibus contrectentur, sive honorentur: quorum vel solæ sanguinis guttæ atque exigua passionis signa idem possunt quod corpora. Hæc non colis sed contemnis & aspernaris'. These things made the heathens in the reign of the same Emperor demolish the sepulchre of 'John' the Baptist in 'Phœnicia', and burn his bones; when several 'Christians' mixing themselves with the heathens, gathered up some of his remains, which were sent to 'Athanasius', who hid them in the wall of a Church; foreseeing by a prophetic spirit, as 'Ruffinus' tells us, that they might be profitable to future generations.

The cry of these miracles being once set on foot, continued for many years, and encreased and grew more general. 'Chrysostom', in his second Oration on St. 'Babylas', twenty years after the silencing of the Oracle of 'Apollo Daphnæus' as above, viz. A.C. 382, saith of the miracles done by the Saints and their reliques: 'Nulla est nostri hujus Orbis seu regio, seu gens, seu urbs, ubi nova & inopinata miracula hæc non decantentur; quæ quidem si figmenta fuissent, prorsus in tantam hominum admirationem non venissent'. And a little after: 'Abunde orationi nostræ fidem faciunt quæ quotidiana à martyribus miracula eduntur, magna affatim ad illa hominum multitudine affluente'. And in his 66th Homily, describing how the Devils were tormented and cast out by the bones of the Martyrs, he adds: 'Ob eam causam multi plerumque Reges peregrè profecti sunt, ut hoc spectaculo fruerentur. Siquidem sanctorum martyrum templa futuri judicii vestigia & signa exhibent, dum nimirum Dæmones flagris cæduntur, hominesque torquentur & liberantur. Vide quæ sanctorum vitæ funtorum vis sit'? And 'Jerom' in his Epitaph on 'Paula', thus mentions the same things. 'Paula vidit Samariam: ibi siti sunt Elisæus & Abdias prophetæ, & Joannes Baptista, ubi multis intremuit consternata miraculis. Nam cernebat variis dæmones rugire cruciatibus, & ante sepulchra sanctorum ululare, homines more luporum vocibus latrare canum, fremere leonum, sibilare serpentum, mugire taurorum, alios rotare caput & post tergum terram vertice tangere, suspensisque pede fæminis vestes non defluere in faciem'. This was about the year 384: and 'Chrysostom' in his Oration on the 'Egyptian' Martyrs, seems to make 'Egypt' the ringleader in these matters, saying: 'Benedictus Deus quandoquidem ex Ægypto prodeunt martyres, ex Ægypto illa cum Deo pugnante ac insanissima, & unde impia ora, unde linguæ blasphemæ; ex Ægypto martyres habentur; non in Ægypto tantum, nec in finitima vicinaque regione, sed UBIQUE TERRARUM. Et quemadmodum in annonæ summa ubertate, cum viderunt urbium incolæ majorem quam usus habitatorum postulat esse proventum, ad peregrinas etiam urbes transmittunt: cum & suam comitatem & liberalitatem ostendant, tum ut præter horum abundantiam cum facilitate res quibus indigent rursus ab illis sibi comparent: sic & Ægyptii, quod attinet ad religionis athletas, fecerunt. Cum apud se multam eorum Dei benignitate copiam cernerent, nequaquam ingens Dei munus sua civitate concluserunt, sed in OMNES TERRÆ PARTES bonorum thesauros effuderunt: cum ut suum in fratres amorem ostenderent, tum ut communem omnium dominum honore afficerent, ac civitati suæ gloriam apud omnes compararent, totiusque terrarum ORBIS esse METROPOLIN declararent.—Sanctorum enim illorum corpora quovis adamantino & inexpugnabili muro tutius nobis urbem communiunt, & tanquam excelsi quidam scopuli undique prominentes, non horum qui sub sensus cadunt & oculis cernuntur hostium impetus propulsant tantum, sed etiam invisibilium dæmonum insidias, omnesque diaboli fraudes subvertunt ac dissipant.—Neque vero tantum adversus hominum insidias aut adversus fallacias dæmonum utilis nobis est hæc possessio, sed si nobis communis dominus ob peccatorum multitudinem irascatur, his objectis corporibus continuo poterimus eum propitium reddere civitati'. This Oration was written at 'Antioch', while 'Alexandria' was yet the Metropolis of the 'East', that is, before the year 381, in which 'Constantinople' became the Metropolis: and it was a work of some years for the 'Egyptians' to have distributed the miracle-working reliques of their Martyrs over all the world, as they had done before that year. 'Egypt' abounded most with the reliques of Saints and Martyrs, the 'Egyptians' keeping them embalmed upon beds even in their private houses; and 'Alexandria' was eminent above all other cities for dispersing them, so as on that account to acquire glory with all men, and manifest herself to be the 'Metropolis' of the world. 'Antioch' followed the example of 'Egypt', in dispersing the reliques of the forty (40) Martyrs: and the examples of 'Egypt' and 'Syria' were soon followed by the rest of the world. [Compare all this also with Calvin's Treatise on Relics in 1543, 1854. Also see Council of Trent, (1545-1563), Session 25; & Gibbon's Decline & Fall of the Roman Empire (1786, 1821), vol. 9, chap. 49; also compare Luther's Wittenberg (Sears' Luther's Mental & Spiritual History, 1857) as to its 5,000 Relics in 1508-1517. See also the 1983 Code of canon Law Bk4, pt2, tit4, Veneration of Saints, Sacred Images, & Relics.]

The reliques of the forty (40) Martyrs at 'Antioch' were distributed among the Churches before the year 373; for 'Athanasius' who died in that year, wrote an Oration upon them. This Oration is not yet published, but 'Gerard Vossius' saw it in MS. in the Library of Cardinal 'Ascanius' in 'Italy', as he says in his commentary upon the Oration of 'Ephræm Syrus' on the same forty (40) Martyrs. Now since the Monks of 'Alexandria' sent the reliques of the Martyrs of 'Egypt' into all parts of the earth, and thereby acquired glory to their city, and declared her in these matters the Metropolis of the whole world, as we have observed out of 'Chrysostom'; it may be concluded, that before 'Alexandria' received the forty (40) Martyrs from 'Antioch', she began to send out the reliques of her own Martyrs into all parts, setting the first (1st) example to other cities. This practice therefore began in 'Egypt' some years before the death of 'Athanasius'. It began when the miracle-working bones of 'John' the Baptist were carried into 'Egypt', and hid in the wall of a Church, that they might be profitable to future generations'. It was restrained in the reign of 'Julian' the Apostate: and then it spread from 'Egypt' into all the Empire, 'Alexandria' being the Metropolis of the whole world, according to 'Chrysostom', for propagating this sort of devotion, and 'Antioch' and other cities soon following her example.

In propagating these superstitions, the ring-leaders were the Monks, and 'Antony' was at the head of them: for in the end of the life of 'Antony', 'Athanasius' relates that these were his dying words to his disciples who then attended him. 'Do you take care', said 'Antony, to adhere to Christ in the first place, and then to the Saints, that after death they may receive you as friends and acquaintance into the everlasting tabernacles, Think upon these things, perceive these things; and if you have any regard to me, remember me as a father'. This being delivered in charge to the Monks by 'Antony' at his death, A.C. 356, could not but inflame their whole body with devotion towards the Saints, as the ready way to be received, by them into the eternal Tabernacles after death. Hence came that noise about the miracles, done by the reliques of the Saints in the time of 'Constantius': hence came the dispersion of the miracle-working reliques into all the Empire; 'Alexandria' setting the example, and being renowned, for it above all other cities. Hence it came to pass in the days of 'Julian', A.C. 362, that 'Athanasius' by a prophetic spirit, as 'Ruffinus' tells us, hid the bones of 'John' the Baptist from the Heathens, not in the ground to be forgotten, but in the hollow wall of a Church before proper witnesses, that they might 'be profitable to future generations'. Hence also came the invocation of the Saints for doing such miracles, and for assisting men in their devotions, and mediating with God. For 'Athanasius', even from his youth, looked upon the dead Saints and Martyrs as mediators of our prayers: in his Epistle to 'Marcellinus', written in the days of 'Constantine' the great, he saith that the words of the 'Psalms' are not to be transposed or any wise changed, but to be recited and sung without any artifice, as they are written, 'that the holy men who delivered them, knowing them to be their own words, may pray with us; or rather, that the Holy Ghost who spake in the holy men, seeing his own words with which he inspired them, may join with them in assisting us'.

Whilst 'Egypt' abounded with Monks above any other country, the veneration of the Saints began sooner, and spread faster there than in other places. 'Palladius' going into 'Egypt' in the year 388 to visit the Monasteries, and the sepulchres of 'Apollonius' and other Martyrs of 'Thebais' who had suffered under 'Maximinus', saith of them: 'Iis omnibus Christiani fecerunt ædem unam, ubi nunc multæ virtutes peraguntur. Tanta autem fuit viri gratia, ut de iis quæ esset precatus statim exaudiretur, eum sic honorante servatore: quem etiam nos in martyrio precati vidimus, cum iis qui cum ipso fuerunt martyrio affecti; & Deum adorantes, eorum corpora salutavimus'. 'Eunapius' also, a heathen, yet a competent witness of what was done in his own times, relating how the soldiers delivered the temples of 'Egypt' into the hands of the Monks, which was done in the year 389, rails thus in an impious manner at the Martyrs, as succeeding in the room of the old Gods of 'Egypt'. Illi ipsi, milites, Monachos Canobi quoque collocârunt, ut pro Diis qui animo cernuntur, servos & quidem flagitiosos divinis honoribus percolerent, hominum mentibus ad cultum ceremoniasque obligatis. Ii namque condita & salita eorum capita, qui ob scelerum multitudinem à iudicibus extremo iudicio fuerant affecti, pro Divis ostentabant; iis genua submittebant, eos in Deorum numerum receptabant, ad illorum sepulchra pulvere sordibusque conspurcati. Martyres igitur vocabantur, & ministri quidem & legati arbitrique precum apud Deos; cum fuerint servilia infida & flagris pessimè subacta, quæ cicatrices scelerum ac nequitiae vestigia corporibus circumferunt; ejusmodi tamen Deos fert tellus'. By these instances we may understand the invocation of Saints was now of some standing in 'Egypt', and that it was already generally received and practised there by the common people.

Thus 'Basil' a Monk, who was made Bishop of 'Cæsarea' in the year 369, and died in the year 378, in his Oration on the Martyr 'Mamas', saith: 'Be ye mindful of the Martyr; as many of you as have enjoyed him in your dreams, as many as in this place have been assisted by him in prayer, as many of you as upon invoking him by name have had him present in your works, as many as he has reduced into the way from wandering, as many as he has restored to health, as many as have had their dead children restored by him to life, as many as have had their lives prolonged by him'. and a little after, he thus expresses the universality of this superstition in the regions of 'Cappadocia' and 'Bithynia': 'At the memory of the Martyr', saith he, 'the whole region is moved; at his festival the whole city is transported with joy. Nor do the kindred of the rich turn aside to the sepulchres of their ancestors, but all go to the place of devotion'. Again, in the end of the Homily he prays, that 'God would preserve the Church, thus fortified with the great towers of the Martyrs'. and in his Oration on the forty (40) Martyrs; 'These are they', saith he, 'who obtaining our country, like certain towers afford us safety against our enemies. Neither are they shut up in one place only, but being distributed are sent into many regions, and adorn many countries.—You have often endeavoured, you have often laboured to find one who might pray for you: here are forty (40), emitting one (1) voice of prayer.—He that is in affliction flies to these, he that rejoices has recourse to these: the first (1st), that he may be freed from evil, the last that he may continue in happiness. Here a woman praying for her children is heard; she obtains a safe return for her husband from abroad, and health for him in his sickness.—O ye common keepers of mankind, the best companions of our cares, suffragans and coadjutors of our prayers, most powerful ambassadors to God', &c. By all which it is manifest, that before the year 378, the Orations and Sermons upon the Saints went much beyond the bounds of mere oratorical flourishes, and that the common people in the 'East' were already generally corrupted by the Monks with Saint-worship.

'Gregory Nazianzen' a Monk, in his sixth Oration written A.C. 373, when he was newly made Bishop of 'Sasima', saith: 'Let us purify ourselves to the Martyrs, or rather to the God of the Martyrs'. and a little after he calls the Martyrs 'mediators of obtaining an ascension or divinity'. The same year, in the end of his Oration upon 'Athanasius' then newly dead, he thus invokes him: 'Do thou look down upon us propitiously, and govern this people, as perfect adorers of the perfect Trinity, which in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is contemplated and worshiped: if there shall be peace, preserve me, and feed my flock with me; but if war, bring me home, place me by thyself, and by those that are like thee; however great my request'. And in the end of the funeral Oration upon 'Basil', written A.C. 378, he thus addresses him: 'But thou, O divine and sacred Head, look down upon us from heaven; and by thy prayers either take away that thorn of the flesh which is given us by God for exercise, or obtain that we may bear it with courage, and direct all our life to that which is most fitting for us. When we depart this life, receive us there in your Tabernacles, that living together and beholding the holy and blessed Trinity more purely and perfectly, whereof we have now but an imperfect view, we may there come to the end of our desires, and receive this reward of the wars which we have waged or suffered': and in his Oration upon 'Cyprian', not the Bishop of 'Carthage', but a 'Greek', he invokes him after the same manner; and tells us also how a pious Virgin named 'Justina', was protected by invoking the Virgin 'Mary', and how miracles were done by the ashes of 'Cyprian'.

'Gregory Nyssen', another eminent Monk and Bishop, in the life of 'Ephræm Syrus', tells how a certain man returning from a far country, was in great danger, by reason all the ways were intercepted by the armies of barbarous nations; but upon invoking 'Ephræm' by name, and saying, 'Holy' Ephræm 'assist me', he escaped the danger, neglected the fear of death, and beyond his hope got safe home. In the end of this Oration 'Gregory' calls upon 'Ephræm' after the following manner: 'But thou, O Ephræm, assisting now at the divine altar, and sacrificing to the Prince of life, and to the most holy Trinity, together with the Angels; remember us all, and obtain for us pardon of our sins, that we may enjoy the eternal happiness of the kingdom of heaven'. The same 'Gregory', in his Oration on the Martyr 'Theodorus' written A.C. 381, thus describes the power of that Martyr, and the practice of the people. 'This Martyr', saith he, 'the last year quieted the barbarous tempest, and put a stop to the horrid war of the fierce and cruel Scythians.—If anyone is permitted to carry away the dust with which the tomb is covered, wherein the body of the Martyr rests; the dust is accepted as a gift, and gathered to be laid up as a thing of great price. For to touch the reliques themselves, if any such prosperous fortune shall at any time happen; how great a favour that is, and not to be obtained without the most earnest prayers, they know well who have obtained it. For as a living and florid body, they who behold it embrace it, applying to it the eyes, mouth, ears, and all the organs of sense; and then with affection pouring tears upon the Martyr, as if he was whole and appeared to them: they offer prayers with supplication, that he would intercede for them as an advocate, praying to him as an Officer attending upon God, and invoking him as receiving gifts whenever he will'. At length 'Gregory' concludes the Oration with this prayer: 'O Theodorus, we want many blessings; intercede and beseech for thy country before the common King and Lord: for the country of the Martyr is the place of his passion, and they are his citizens, brethren and kindred, who have him, defend, adorn and honour him. We fear afflictions, we expect dangers: the wicked Scythians are not far off, ready to make war against us. As a soldier fight for us, as a Martyr use liberty of speech for thy fellow-servants. Pray for peace, that these publick meetings may not cease, that the furious and wicked barbarian may not rage against the temples and altars, that the profane and impious may not trample upon the holy things. We acknowledge it a benefit received from thee, that we are preserved safe and entire, we pray for freedom from danger in time to come: and if there shall be need of greater intercession and deprecation, call together the choir of thy brethren the Martyrs, and in conjunction with them all intercede for us. Let the prayers of many just ones atone for the sins of the multitudes and the people; exhort Peter, excite Paul, and also John the divine and beloved disciple, that they may be solicitous for the Churches which they have erected, for which they have been in chains, for which they have undergone dangers and deaths; that the worship of idols may not lift up its head against us, that heresies may not spring up like thorns in the vineyard, that tares grown up may not choak the wheat, that no rock void of the fatness of true dew may be against us, and render the fruitful power of the word void of a root; but by the power of the prayers of thyself and thy companions, O admirable man and eminent among the Martyrs, the commonwealth of Christians may become a field of corn. The same 'Gregory Nyssen', in his sermon upon the death of 'Meletius' Bishop of 'Antioch', preached at 'Constantinople' the same year, A.C. 381, before the Bishops of all the 'East' assembled in the second general Council, spake thus of 'Meletius. The Bridegroom', saith he, 'is not taken from us: he stands in the midst of us, tho we do not see him: he is a Priest in the most inward places, and face to face intercedes before God for us and the sins of the people'. This was no oratorical flourish, but 'Gregory's' real opinion, as may be understood by what we have cited out of him concerning 'Ephræm' and 'Theodorus': and as 'Gregory' preached this before the Council of 'Constantinople', you may thence know, saith 'Baronius', that he professed what the whole Council, and there with the whole Church of those parts believed, namely, that the Saints in heaven offer prayers for us before God.

'Ephræm Syrus', another eminent Monk, who was contemporary with 'Basil', and died the same year; in the end of his Encomium or Oration upon 'Basil' then newly dead, invokes him after this manner: 'Intercede for me, a very miserable man; and recal me by thy intercessions, O father; thou who art strong, pray for me who am weak; thou who art diligent, for me who am negligent; thou who art chearful, for me who am heavy; thou who art wise, for me who am foolish. Thou who hast treasured up a treasure of all virtues, be a guide to me who am empty of every good work'. In the beginning of his Encomium upon the forty (40) Martyrs, written at the same time, he thus invokes them: 'Help me therefore, O ye Saints, with your intercession; and O ye beloved, with your holy prayers, that Christ by his grace may direct my tongue to speak', &c. and afterwards mentioning the mother of one (1) of these forty (40) Martyrs, he concludes the Oration with this prayer: 'I entreat thee, O holy, faithful, and blessed woman, pray for me to the Saints, saying; Intercede ye that triumph in Christ, for the most little and miserable Ephræm, that he may find mercy, and by the grace of Christ may be saved'. Again, in his second Sermon or Oration on the praises of the holy Martyrs of 'Christ', he thus addresses them: 'We entreat you most holy Martyrs, to intercede with the Lord for us miserable sinners, beset with the filthiness of negligence, that he would infuse his divine grace into us': and afterwards, near the end of the same discourse; 'Now ye most holy men and glorious Martyrs of God, help me a miserable sinner with your prayers, that in that dreadful hour I may obtain mercy, when the secrets of all hearts shall be made manifest. I am today become to you, most holy Martyrs of Christ, as it were an unprofitable and unskilful cup-bearer: for I have delivered to the sons and brothers of your faith, a cup of the excellent wine of your warfare, with the excellent table of your victory, replenished with all sorts of dainties. I have endeavoured, with the whole affection and desire of my mind, to recreate your fathers and brothers, kindred and relations, who daily frequent the table. For behold they sing, and with exultation and jubilee glorify God, who has crown'd your virtues, by setting on your most sacred heads incorruptible and celestial crowns; they with excessive joy stand about the sacred reliques of your martyrdoms, wishing for a blessing, and desiring to bear away holy medicines both for the body and the mind. As good disciples and faithful ministers of our benign Lord and Saviour, bestow therefore a blessing on them all: and on me also, tho weak and feeble, who having received strength by your merits and intercessions, have with the whole devotion of my mind, sung a hymn to your praise and glory before your holy reliques. Wherefore I beseech you stand before the throne of the divine Majesty for me Ephræm, a vile and miserable sinner, that by your prayers I may deserve to obtain salvation, and with you enjoy eternal felicity by the grace and benignity and mercy of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom with the Father and Holy Ghost be praise, honour and glory for ever and ever'. Amen.

By what has been cited out of 'Basil', the two 'Gregories' and 'Ephræm', we may understand that Saint-worship was established among the Monks and their admirers in 'Egypt, Phœnicia, Syria and Cappadocia', before the year 378, this being the year in which 'Basil' and 'Ephræm' died. 'Chrysostom' was not much later; he preached at 'Antioch' almost all the time of 'Theodosius' the great, and in his Sermons are many exhortations to this sort of superstition, as may be seen in the end of his Orations on S. 'Julia', on St. 'Pelagia', on the Martyr 'Ignatius', on the 'Egyptian' Martyrs, on Fate and Providence, on the Martyrs in general, on St. 'Berenice' and St. 'Prosdice', on 'Juventinus' and 'Maximus', on the name of 'Cæmetery', &c. Thus in his Sermon on 'Berenice' and 'Prosdice': 'Perhaps', saith he, 'you are inflamed with no small love towards these Martyrs; therefore with this ardour let us fall down before their reliques, let us embrace their coffins. For the coffins of the Martyrs have great virtue, even as the bones of the Martyrs have great power. Nor let us only on the day of this festival, but also on other days apply to them, invoke them, and beseech them to be our patrons: for they have great power and efficacy, not only whilst alive, but also after death; and much more after death than before. For now they bear the marks or brands of Christ; and when they shew these marks, they can obtain all things of the King. Seeing therefore they abound with such efficacy, and have so much friendship with him; we also, when by continual attendance and perpetual visitation of them we have insinuated ourselves into their familiarity, may by their assistance obtain the mercy of God'.

'Constantinople' was free from these superstitions till 'Gregory Nazianzen' came thither A.D. 379; but in a few years it was also inflamed with it. 'Ruffinus' tells us, that when the Emperor 'Theodosius' was setting out against the tyrant 'Eugenius', which was in the year 394, he went about with the Priests and people to all the places of prayer; lay prostrate in haircloth before the shrines of the Martyrs and Apostles, and pray'd for assistance by the intercession of the Saints. 'Sozomen' adds, that when the Emperor was marched seven miles from 'Constantinople' against 'Eugenius', he went into a Church which he had built to 'John' the Baptist, 'and invoked the Baptist for his assistance. Chrysostom says: He that is clothed in purple, approaches to embrace these sepulchres; and laying aside his dignity, stands supplicating the Saints to intercede for him with God: and he who goes crowned with a diadem, offers his prayers to the tent-maker and the fisher-man as his Protestors'. And in another place: 'The cities run together to the sepulchres of the Martyrs, and the people are inflamed with the love of them'.

This practice of sending reliques from place to place for working miracles, and thereby inflaming the devotion of the nations towards the dead Saints and their reliques, and setting up the religion of invoking their souls, lasted only till the middle of the reign of the Emperor 'Theodosius' the great; for he then prohibited it by the following Edict. 'Humatum corpus, nemo ad alterum locum transferat; nemo Martyrem distrahat, nemo mercetur: Habeant verò in potestate, si quolibet in loco sanctorum est aliquis conditus, pro ejus veneratione, quod Martyrium vocandum sit, addant quod voluerint fabricarum. Dat. iv. Kal. Mart. Constantinopoli, Honorio nob. puero & Euodio Coss. A.C. 386 [CT 9.17.7. Theod Law on Relics: Violation of Sepulchres. "In 385/86, Bishop Ambrose of Milan was thus inspired to dig in front of the chancel screen of the Basilica of Sts. Felix and Nabor outside Milan, where he promptly discovered the intact bodies of the previously unknown martyrs Sts. Gervasius and Protasius.¹⁰ Despite long-standing prohibitions against disturbing the dead and the enactment, in February 386, of a law stipulating that "no person shall transfer a buried body to another place . . . sell the relics of a martyr . . . or traffickin them," (* C.Parr's tr.) Ambrose moved the remains of the martyrs to the Basilica of Fausta and on the following day transferred them to his new basilica, commonly known as the Basilica Ambrosiana, where he laid them to rest under the altar.(*Ambrose, Let. 22) It was not the last time that local martyrs would call Ambrose to action. Less than ten years later, in 395, Ambrose discovered the bodies of Sts. Nazarius and Celsus in a garden outside Milan and transferred them to the Basilica of the Holy Apostles. (*Paul. of Milan, Life of St. Ambrose)"]. After this they filled the fields and high-ways with altars erected to Martyrs, which they pretended to discover by dreams and revelations: and this occasioned the making the fourteenth (14th) Canon of the fifth (5th=3rd) Council of Carthage, A.C. 398. 'Item placuit, ut altaria, quæ passim per agros aut vias, tanquam memoriæ Martyrum constituuntur, in quibus nullum corpus aut reliquiæ Martyrum conditæ probantur, ab Episcopis, qui illis locis præsunt, si fieri potest, evertantur. Si autem hoc propter tumultus populares non sinitur, plebes tamen admoneantur, ne illa loca frequentent, ut qui rectè sapiunt, nullâ ibi superstitione devincti teneantur. Et omnino nulla memoria Martyrum probabiliter acceptetur, nisi aut ibi corpus aut aliquæ certæ reliquiæ sint, aut ubi origo alicujus habitationis, vel possessionis, vel passionis fidelissima origine traditur. Nam quæ per somnia, & per inanes quasi revelationes quorumlibet hominum ubique constituuntur altaria, omnimodè reprobentur'. These altars were for invoking the Saints or Martyrs buried or pretended to be buried under them. First they filled the Churches in all places with the reliques or pretended reliques of the Martyrs, for invoking them in the Churches; and then they filled the fields and high-ways with altars, for invoking them everywhere: and this new religion was set up by the Monks in all the 'Greek' Empire before the expedition of the Emperor 'Theodosius' against 'Eugenius', and I think before his above-mentioned Edict, A.C. 386.

The same religion of worshipping 'Mahuzzims' quickly spread into the 'Western Empire' also: but 'Daniel' in this Prophecy describes chiefly the things done among the nations comprehended in the body of his third (3rd) Beast. (Notes to Chap. XIV. Chap. 11:38,39. Orat. de vita Greg. Thaumaturg. T. 3. p. 574. Vide Hom. 47. in. S. Julian. Epist. 27. ad Eustochium. Edit. Frontonis Ducæi, Tom. 1. Ad. an. 381, Sect. 41. Hist. Eccl. l. 2. c. 23. L. 4. c. 24. Hom. 66. ad. populum, circa finem. & Hom. 8, 27. in Matth. Hom. 42, 43. in Gen. Hom. 1. in 1st Thess. Exposit. in Psal. 114. sub finem.) }}

(The end of the first Part.)

4. Lowth:

A Commentary upon the Larger & Lesser Prophets: being a Continuation Bishop Patrick. Isaiah -Malachi. Prophecy of Daniel & the Minor Prophets. William Lowth. 4th Edition. London. 1739. gs. (The original italics & archaic spellings have been retained as much as possible; the archaic 's' that looked like a 'f' has been changed whenever found. In the PDF or Word format the original italics are reproduced, but to indicate them in 'text format' I have added single quotes.)

{{ Dedication: To the Most Reverend Father in GOD, William, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; Primate of all England, & Metropolitan; & One of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council:"The Obscurity which is found in some Passages of these Prophecies, particularly in those of Daniel, hath exercised the Thoughts of inquisitive Men in the foregoing Ages of the Church. But we, 'upon whom the Ends of the World are come', seem to have an Advantage above those that went before us: Forasmuch as it may be reasonably supposed, that the nearer the Events foretold are to their Accomplishment, the greater Light several Providential Occurrences may afford to the Predictions themselves. The Prophecy of Daniel is an undeniable Proof of an Over-ruling Providence, that 'changes Times and Seasons', that 'removeth' one Government, and 'setteth up' another. For what Foresight was able so exactly to describe the orderly Succession of the Four Great Monarchies, but that of the 'Eternal Mind', whose 'Wisdom reacheth from one End to another mightily, and sweetly orders all Things? Who declares the End from the Beginning, and from ancient Times Things which are not yet come to pass; saying, My Counsel shall stand, and I will do all My Pleasure'. "'I am, May it please Your Grace , Your Grace's most Dutiful & Obedient Servant', W. Lowth. }}

{{ 'Concerning the Author and Subject of the ensuing Prophecy': "The Prophet Daniel was descended of the Royal Family of the Kings of Judah; so that in the Captivity of himself and his Companions, was fulfilled that Prophecy of Isaiah, that the King's Issue should be Eunuchs [or Officers] to the King of Babylon: Isa. 39:7. The later Jews do not reckon Daniel among the Prophets; but herein they contradict the Sense of the more antient ones, and particularly of Josephus, who calls him 'one of the Greatest of the Prophets', and saith, 'that he did not only foretel future Things, which was common to him with other Prophets, but also prefixed a Time for "their coming to pass"': Antiq. lib. x. cap. 12. Our Saviour's Authority is decisive in this Matter, who expresly calls Daniel a Prophet, Matt. 24:15 wherein he likewise spoke the Sense of the Jews of that Time. And if we consider the important Subject of some of his Prophecies, wherein he plainly points out the Time of Christ's Coming and Sufferings; and the large Extent of others of them, giving an Account of the Succession of the Four Monarchies unto the End of the World; he may justly be reckoned among the first of that Order. Daniel and St. John had both of them the Honour of being Persons greatly beloved by God and Christ, (comp. Dan. 10:11 with John 13:23) so the latter, in his Revelation, doth more distinctly unfold those Events which the former foretels in general Terms, as Mr. Mede has observed. See his Works, p. 787. This Prophecy is writ partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee: for which this Reason may be assigned; that those Parts of it, in which the Babylonian Empire was concerned, were writ in their Language, viz. from Chap. 1:4. to the End of the seventh Chapter: a great Part of which was probably enter'd into their publick Registers. See a like Instance Esther 2:23. St. Jerome tells us in the Preface to his Commentary upon Daniel, that Porphyry had the Boldness to affirm, that the Prophecies of Daniel relating to the Kings of Syria and Egypt, Chap. 11 were written after the Times of Antiochus Epiphanes: This was plainly granting the Truth of the Matters of Fact therein contained, as St. Jerome observes; and the Falsity of his Assertion clearly appears from hence, that this Prophecy was translated into Greek an hundred (100) Years before Antiochus's Time, and that Translation was in the Hands of the Egyptians, who had no Kindness either for the Jews or their Religion. Nay farther, the Prophecies of Daniel foretelling the great Succeses of Alexander, Chap. 8:5; 9:3, were shewed to Alexander himself by the Jews, who thereupon obtained several Privileges from him, as Josephus informs us, Antiq. Lib. xi. cap. 8. Daniel lived in great Favour under Nebuchadnezzar and his Successors in the Babylonian Monarchy; his extraordinary Merits continued him in the same Degree of Favour under Darius and Cyrus, the two (2) first (1st) Persian Monarchs: and as Josephus observes, (ubi supra) " he was the only Prophet that enjoyed a great Share of worldly Prosperity." He must needs have lived to a great Age, it being near seventy (70) Years from the Date of his first (1st) Prophecy, Chap. 2:1. to that of his last, Chap. 10:1. Our learned Chronologer, Bishop Lloyd, supposes him to have been carried into Captivity when he was about twenty (20) Years old: about ten (10) Years after, we find him famed for his Piety and Wisdom, as appears from Ezek. 14:14; 28:3. His last Vision was in the third (3rd) Year of Cyrus, Dan. 10:1, at which time he was about ninety-four (94) Years of Age, and it is not likely he lived much longer. There need not any Thing be said concerning the three Additions to Daniel, viz. The Son of the Three Children, the History of Susannah, and of Bel and the Dragon: since they manifestly appear to have been the Productions of Hellenists of later Times, and accordingly are rejected as Apocryphal, by St. Jerome in the Prefaces to his Translation, and to his Commentary on Daniel, and by other antient Writers. }}

{{ 1:1: 'In the third (3rd) Year of the Reign of Jehoiakim King of Judah, came Nebuchadnezzar

King of Babylon to Jerusalem'.] The Prophet Jeremiah makes the first Year of Nebuchadnezzar coincident with the fourth (4th) Year of Jehoiakim, and from thence begins the Date of the seventy (70) Years Captivity. See Jer. 25:1; 50:11. But here Daniel speaks of Nebuchadnezzar as King of Babylon in the third (3rd) Year of Jehoiakim. To this Objection Dr. Prideaux gives an easy Answer, (Script. Connect. Par.1.p.60. Edit.8vo.) That Daniel begins his Computation from the Time that Nebuchadnezzar was sent by his Father on the Expedition against Pharaoh Necho, King of Egypt, which was toward the latter End of the third (3rd) Year of Jehoiakim. In the Beginning of the following Year he conquered the Egyptians, which was the fourth (4th) Year of Jehoiakim, See Jerem. 46:2. And in the latter End of the same Year he came and besieged Jerusalem in the ninth (9th) Month, according to the Jews Account, who to this Day keep a Fast on the 18th Day of that Month, in Memory of this Taking of Jerusalem. At which Time Jehoiakim became tributary to the King of Babylon, and consequently the seventy (70) Years of Captivity and Vassalage to Babylon began. It has been observed in the Notes upon Jer. 25:1. that the Scripture Account of the Beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's Reign anticipates the Computation of Ptolemy's Canon two (2) Years, which two (2) Years Nebuchadnezzar reigned with his Father, as Josephus informs us from Berosus, Antiq. lib.x.c. 11. }}

{{ 2:40: "And the Fourth (4th) Kingdom shall be strong as Iron' So it is represented as having great Iron Teeth, Chap. 7:7, 19. This Fourth (4th) Kingdom can be no other than the Roman Empire. Some Commentators indeed have reckoned the Empire continued in Alexander's Successors, as a distinct Kingdom from that which was set up by himself. But no Writer of the History of those Times speaks of it as such: And this Notion plainly contradicts the Description which Daniel gives of that Kingdom, Chap. 8. There the Prophet represents the Third (3rd) Kingdom as it were set up by Alexander, and continued under his Successors, under the Figure of a Goat having one (1) great Horn, and afterward, Four (4) others which stood up in its Stead, ver. 8, and afterwards expressly calls Alexander the first (1st) King, ver. 21, and farther tells us, Chap. 11:4, that his Kingdom shall be broken and divided toward the Four (4) Winds of Heaven. They that want farther Satisfaction, may see more Proofs of this Point, in Mr. Mede's Dissertation upon this Subject, p. 712 of his Works. The Reason why the Spirit of God takes Notice of these Monarchies rather than any others, is because God's People were Subjects to these Monarchies as they succeeded one another: and in their Succession, a Line of Time is carried on to the Coming of Christ, who was to appear in the Times of the Fourth (4th) Monarchy, and the Countries belonging to it were to be the chief Seat of Christ's Kingdom: as Mr. Mede observes in the same Dissertation upon this Subject, p. 712. of his Works. }}

{{ 5:1: 'Belshazzar the King'.] This was the last King of the Babylonish Race, and therefore must be the same who is called Nabonnedus by Berosus, and Naboandelus by Josephus, Antiq. lib. x. c. 11. See this clearly proved by Dr. Prideaux, Script. Connect. par.1.p. 114." 5:2: "Belshazzar commanded to bring the Gold and Silver Vessels which his Father Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the Temple which was in Jerusalem'.] These Vessels were carried by Nebuchadnezzar into the Temple of his own 'God', Chap. 1:2, and set apart, as it seems, for Religious Uses. So this farther Profanation of them was contrary to the Rules of their own Religion, and may be supposed to have been done out of a drunken Frolick by Belshazzar. Without question the Vessels and other Furniture, with which Solomon adorned the Temple, were extraordinary magnificent: Since Nebuchadnezzar thought them worth carrying to Babylon, to furnish the Temple he had built there for his 'God' Belus, a Structure that might be esteemed one of the Wonders of the World: see Dr. Prideaux ubi supra, p. 98. Some of these Vessels were afterwards carried in Triumph to Rome by Titus, after he had conquered Jerusalem, as Josephus an Eye-witness asserts, Bell. Jud. lib. 7. p. 1306. Edit. Oxon. Afterward, when Gisericus sacked Rome, he carried these away with the rest of his Booty; but when Justinian conquered Africk, he recovered them again, and sent them for a Present to the Church of Jerusalem. See Evagrius, lib. 4. c. 17. 5:2: Ibid. 'Which his Father Nebuchadnezzar had taken'.] Nebuchadnezzar was in truth his Grandfather; for he was the Son of Evil-Merodach by Nitocris his Queen: So he was Grandson to Nebuchadnezzar: And thus the Prophecy of Jeremy was fulfilled, 'That all Nations should serve Nebuchadnezzar and his Son, and his Son's Son', Jer. 27:7. It is usual in Scripture to call the Grandfather by the Name of Father; see 2nd Sam. 9:7; 2nd Kings 8:26 compared with ver. 18; 2nd Chron. 15:16 compared with Chap. 11:20; Zech. 1:1 with Ezra 6:14.

5:30: 'In that night was Belshazzar, King of the Chaldeans slain'.] He and all his Nobles were slain together in the midst of their Feasting and Revelling, as Herodotus, lib.1. and Xenophon inform us: The latter relates the Story thus, Cyripad. lib.7. "That two (2) Deserters, Gadata and Gobryas, having assisted some of the Persian Army to kill the Guards, and seize upon the Palace, they entered into the Room where the King was, whom they found standing up in a Posture of Defence; but they soon dispatched him, and those that were with him." Thus the Prophecy of Jeremy was accomplished, that Babylon should be taken at the Time of a Publick Feast, while her Princes and Great Men, her Captains, her Rulers, and mighty Men should be drunken, and should sleep a perpetual Sleep, and not awaken: Chap. 51.

5:31. 'And Darius the Median took the Kingdom.'] This Darius is said to be of the Seed of the Medes: Chap. 9:1. and is supposed by the most judicious Chronologers to be the same with Cyaxares, the Son of Astyages: Him Cyrus made King of the Chaldeans, as being his Uncle by the Mother's Side, and his Partner in carrying on the War against the Babylonians, and left him the Palace of the King of Babylon to live there whenever he pleased, as Xenophon relates, Cyripad. lib.8. Darius succeeding in the Empire, being Cyrus's Gift, Ptolemy's Canon supposes Cyrus to be the immediate Successor of Nabonnedus, or Belshazzar, and allots nine (9) Years to his Reign: whereas Xenophon reckons two (2) of these Years to Darius, and seven (7) to Cyrus: ubi supra. The Chaldee Phrase rendered here, 'Took the Kingdom', is translated Possessed the Kingdom, Chap. 7:18. and means the same with succeeding in the Kingdom. }}

{{ 7:5: 'And behold another Beast, a second like to a Bear, and it raised up itself on one side'.] This Beast denotes the Persian Empire, and its first beginning to advance itself, and arrive at Dominion. The Margin reads, 'And it raised up one Dominion'; i.e. it made up one Empire out of the joint Powers of Media and Persia."

7:5: Ibid. 'And it had three Ribs in the Mouth of it'.] The Learned Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, in the Vindication of his Defence of Chrisiianity, Vol. 1. Chap. 2. Sect. 3. explains these three (3) Ribs, to be Babylon, Lydia, and Egypt. It is certain that Lydia was conquered by Cyrus, from the famous Story of Craefus the King thereof, whom he condemned to the Fire: and as Egypt had been conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, see Ezek. 29:19 so it still continued tributary to Cyrus under the Government of Amasis. See the Additional Notes upon Ezekiel 29:13. and Xenophon. Cyripæd. lib. 7, and 8."

7:7: Ibid. 'And it was diverse from all the Beasts that were before it, and it had ten Horns'.] In this it was different from all the Beasts or Empires before it; that its Dominion was to be divided into ten (10) Kingdoms or Principalities, signified here by ten (10) Horns, and by the ten (10) Toes of the Image, Chap. 2:41. See ver. 23,24 of this Chapter, and the Notes there."

7:12: 'As concerning the rest of the Beasts, they had their Dominion taken away, yet their Lives were prolonged for a Season and Time'.] As to the three (3) first (1st) Monarchies, tho' the succeeding Monarchy took away the Dominion of that which went before, yet it was not done all at once, but by degrees: and the Nations where those Monarchies were seated, still had a Being, though they changed their Masters. Whereas the Destruction of the last Monarchy implied the putting an End to that Empire, and to all other earthly Governments: the Kingdom of Christ being then immediately to take Place. See ver. 13,14. Chap. 2:34." 7:24: 'And the ten (10) Horns out of this Kingdom are ten Kings that shall arise'.] A Horn is an Emblem of Strength, so it comes to signify Power and Authority: See Deut. 33:17; Psal. 89:17 and from thence it is applied to denote Sovereignty or Dominion. See Chap: 8:21, 22; Rev. 17:12. These ten (10) Horns or Kingdoms arise out of the Dissolution of the Roman Empire, which came to pass about the Year of Christ 476. And it was divided into the following Principalities or Kingdoms, according to Mr. Mede. See his Works, p.661. 1.

Britons. 2. Saxons. 3. Franks. 4. Burgundians. 5. Wifigoths. 6. Suevians and Alans. 7. Vandals. 8. Almons. 9. Ostrogoths; succeeded by the Longobards, first (1st) in Pannonia, and then in Italy. 10. Greeks.

The late learned Bishop Lloyd hath given the following List of the ten (10) Kingdoms which arose out of the Dissolution of the Roman Empire, and the Time of their Rise.

I. Hunns, erected their Kingdom in that part of Pannonia and Dacia, which from them was called Hungary, about A.D. 356.

II. Ostrogoths settled themselves in the Countries that reach from Rhetia to Mafia, even to Thrace, about 377, and afterward came into Italy under Alaricus in 410.

III. Visigoths settled in the South Parts of France, and in Catalonia, about 378.

IV. Franks seized upon Part of Germany and Gaul, A. D. 410.

V. Vandals settled in Spain, afterward set up their Kingdom in Africa, A. D. 407. Their King Gensericus sacked Rome, 455.

VI. Suevians and Alans seized the Western Parts of Spain A. D. 407. and invaded Italy 457.

VII. Burgundians came out of Germany into that Part of Gaul, called from them Burgundy, 407.

VIII. Herules, Rugians, and Thoringians settled in Italy under Doacer, about A. D. 476.

IX. Saxons made themselves Masters of Great Britain about the same time, 476.

X. Longobards, called likewise Gopidæ, settled in Germany about Magd. burg. A. D. 383. and afterward succeeded the Heruli and Thuriigi in Hungary, about the Year 826.

7:24: Ibid. 'And another shall arise after them'.] The Papacy took its Rise from the same Cause, but did not arrive at direct Supremacy, till the Year 606, when Pope Boniface usurped the Title of Universal Bishop. Mr. Mede translates the Words, 'Another shall arise behind them'; i.e. in an unperceived Manner, so as the other Kings were not aware of his growing Greatness, till he overtopped them. 7:24: Ibid. 'And he shall be diverse from the rest'.] His Authority will be Ecclesiastical, yet so as to lay claim to Temporal Power too, and to assert a Right of disposing of secular Affairs. 7:24: Ibid. 'And he shall subdue three (3) Kings'.] Or, Kingdoms, see ver. 17. Mr. Mede, p. 778, 779, explains these three (3) Kingdoms to be, 1. The Exarchate of Ravenna, which Charles the Great recovered from the Lombards, and gave to the Pope. 2. The Kingdoms of the Greeks in Italy, of which the Emperor Leo Isaurus was deprived by the Popes Gregory the 2d and the 3rd: And, 3rdly, The Kingdom of the Franks, or German Emperors: From whom the Popes wrested the Election and Investiture of themselves and other Bishops, and by degrees took from them all the Jurisdiction they had in Italy; which was the Occasion of grievous Wars for several Ages, between the Popes and the Emperor Henry IV and his Successors. See a brief Account of those Encroachments of the Popes, and the Disturbances which followed upon them, in Bishop Stillingfleet's Disc. of the Idolatry of the Church of Rome, &c. Chap. v.: 7:25: Ibid. 'And they were given into his Hand (or Power, see Revel. 13:7.) until a Time, and Times, and the dividing of Time'.] Or, 'Half a Time', as the Hebrew expresseth it, Chap. 12:7, from whence the Expressions are taken by Saint John, Revel. 12:14. i.e. for three (3) Years and a half (1/2) of Prophetical Time. See the Note upon Chap. 4:16. The same Space of Time is expressed in other Places of the Revelation by two and forty (42) Months, and by twelve hundred and threescore (1260) Days, Chap. xi. 11:2,3. These Times of Antichrist some Learned Men think to be typically represented in the Persecution which Antiochus Epiphanes raised against the Jewish Church, and his Interdict of the publick Worship in the Temple, which Josephus reckons to have lasted three years and a half (3 1/2 yrs): Bell. Jud. lib. I. c. 1. n. 3. Altho' computing from the Time that the Idol-Altar was set up, that Desolation continued but three (3) Years precisely: As appears from 1st Maccab. 1:54. compared with Chap. 4:52. See Archbishop Usher's Annals, Part 2. p. 23. and Dr. Prideaux Script. Connect. Part 2. ad ann. Christ. 168. & 165." }}

{{ 8:3: "Ibid. 'But one (1) was higher than the other, and the higher came up last'.] To denote that the Persian Kingdom, tho' it was of a later Date, should over-top that of the Medes, and make a greater Figure in the World, as it did from the Times of Cyrus. See the Note upon Jer. 51:11. 8:4: "I saw the Ram pusting Westward".] Persia lay Eastward of Babylon: so all the Conquests of Cyrus over Syria and the adjacent Countries enlarged his Dominions Westward. But we may probably include under this Head Cyrus's Conquests in the Lesser Asia, particularly over Crasus, whereby he carried his Victories as far as the Ægean Sea. And his Successors were for some time Masters of a great Part of Greece, called the West in the following Verse. 8:4: "Ibid. 'And Northward'.] In the Conquests over the Iberians, Albanians, those of Colchos and Armenia, and the adjacent Countries. 8:4: "Ibid. 'And Southward'.] This chiefly relates to Cambyes's Conquests over Egypt and Ethiopia, together with those of Darius Hystaspes over India, whence Ahasuerus King of Persia is said to have reigned from India to Ethiopia, Esth. 1:1. 8:5: 'And as I was considering, beheld a He-Goat came from the West on the Face of the whole Earth.'] An He-Goat was antiently the Emblem of Princes or great Commanders: See Prov. 30:31; Zech. 10:3; Isai. 10:9. where the Word translated 'Chief ones', signifies in the Hebrew, 'Great Goats'. The Goat is described here as coming from the West, that is, from Greece, on the Face of the whole Earth, i.e. carrying all before him as he went : denoting thereby the uninterrupted Success of Alexander the Great. A Goat was the Emblem, or Arms of Macedon, as we now a-days express it, ever since their King Caranus : See Justin's Hist. lib. 8:8:7. 'And I saw him come close unto the Ram, and he was moved with Choler against him, and smote the Ram, and brake his two Horns'.] He made a quick and furious Onset upon the Medo-Persian Empire, and utterly broke it in two (2) Engagements, the first (1st) at Issus, the second (2nd) at Arbela. 8:7: "Ibid. 'He cast him down to the Ground, and stamped upon him'.] See Chap. 7:7. This Prophecy of Alexander's Success, Jaddus the High-Priest shewed to him when he came to Jerusalem, and thereby encouraged him to go on in his Expedition. See Josephus Antiq. lib. xi. c. 8. 8:8: 'Therefore the He-Goat waxed very great; and when he was strong the great Horn was broken'.] Alexander died in the Height of his Triumphs and Prosperity: See ver. 21,22. 8:8: "Ibid. 'And for it came up four (4) notable ones toward the four (4) Winds of Heaven.'] This the Angel explains by four (4) Kingdoms standing up instead of it, ver. 22. See likewise Chap. 11:4. Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra, p. 557 shews, that this Prophecy had its exact Completion upon the Partition of the Grecian Empire after the Battle of Ipsus, where Antigonus was killed. There were indeed Partitions of it into Provinces under the Brother and Son of Alexander; but this was a Partition of it into Kingdoms, among so many Kings or independent Governors, represented here by Horns, and by Heads, Chap. 7:6. And these four (4) Kings were, 1. Ptolemy King of Egypt, Libya, Palestin, Arabia, and Celo-Syria, which may be called the Southern Part of the Empire. 2. Cassinder of Macedonia and Greece, which was the Western Part of it. 3. Lysimachus of Thrace and Asia, which was the Northern Part; and, 4. Seleucus of Syria and the Eastern Countries. From the Description here given of the Empire of Alexander, and his four (4) Successors, it is plain that the Prophet represents it as one (1) and the same Empire; and as the Third (3rd) in order of Four (4) great Monarchies. For it is represented under the Emblem of one (1) and the same He-goat, having first (1st) one (1) notable Horn in its Forehead, which is expressly called the First (1st) King, ver. 21. and afterwards four (4) growing up in the room of it. This is a Confirmation of what is observed before upon Chap. 2:40 that the Fourth (4th) Kingdom must be the Roman Empire. Ver. 8:9: 'And out of one (1) of them came forth a little Horn'.] From one (1) of these four (4) Successors of Alexander came forth Antiochus, afterwards called Epiphanes, or Illustrious, by his Flatterers, but was indeed a vile Person, to whom the Honour of the Kingdom did not belong, as the Angel gives his Character, Chap. 11:21. Demetrius his elder Brother's Son being the rightful Heir. This little Horn belonging to the Third (3rd) Head, or Monarchy, must not be confounded with the little Horn belonging to the Fourth (4th), mentioned Chap. 7:8, 20. altho' this here spoken of may be allowed to be a Type or Figure of the latter. 8:9: "Ibid. 'Which waxed exceeding great towards the South'.] He took Advantage of the Youth of Ptolemy Philometor: See 1st Maccab. 1:16, 19. and made himself Master of Egypt, called the South in several Places of the eleventh (11th) Chapter of this Prophecy. 8:9: "Ibid. 'And towards the East'.] Towards Armenia and Persia: See the Note upon Chap. 11:44. 8:9: "Ibid. 'And toward the pleasant Land']. Judea is so called by the Holy Writers, as being made choice of by God to place His People there, and to make it the Seat of His peculiar Residence. See Ezek. 20:6; Psal. 48:2, and Comp. Chap. 11:16, 41, 45. It is often described as a Land flowing with Milk and Honey. The Cruelties which Antiochus Epiphanes exercised in Judea are the Subject of the following , Verses: Comp. Chap. 11:31, &c. }}

 }}

{{ Chapter 9: The Argument: Daniel having thoroughly considered the Prophecies of Jeremy relating to the LXX (70) Years Captivity, and being satisfied that that Term of Years was near expiring, humbles himself in Prayer for the Sins of his People, and earnestly begs of God the Restoration of Jerusalem. In answer to his Prayers, the Angel Gabriel informs him, that the City should be rebuilt, and peopled as in former Times, and should so continue for LXX Weeks of Years, i.e. for 490 Years; and then should be utterly destroyed for putting the MESSIAS to Death. 9:1: 'In the first Year of Darius, the Son of Ahasuerus, of the Seed of the Medes'.] See Chap. 5:31. This is the same Person who is called Cyaxares, the Son of Astyages, by the Heathen Historians, with whom Josephus agrees. His Father Astyages had the Name of Ahasuerus among the Jews, as appears by a Passage in Tobit, Chap. 14:15 where the taking of Nineveh is ascribed to Nebuchodonosor and Assuerus, who were the same with Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar's Father, and Astyages: Nebuchadnezzar being a Name common to all the Babylonian Kings, as Pharaoh was to the Kings of Egypt. See Dr. Prideaux Script. Connect. ad A.C. 612. We need not wonder to find the same Persons called by such different Names, especially in different Countries: The Scripture affords several Instances of this Kind: So Daniel was called Belteshazzar by Nebuchadnezzar, who changed the Names of his three (3) Companions, Dan. 1:7, Zerubbabel was called Shezbazzar, Ezr. 1:8. Esther, Hadassa, Esth. 2:7. 9:2: 'I Daniel understood by Books'.] The several Prophecies of Jeremiah are called so many Books: See Jer. 25:13; 29:1. We may observe from hence, that the Prophets studied the Writings of those Prophets who were before them, for the more perfect understanding of the Times when their Prophecies were to be fulfilled. The same they did by several of their own Prophecies. See 1st Pet. 1:11,12. 9:2: Ibid. 'That he would accomplish Seventy (70) Years in the Desolations of Jerusalem'.] See Jer. 25:11,12; 29:10. The Seventy (70) Years mentioned both here and in Jeremy are to be dated from the End of the Third (3rd), or Beginning of the Fourth (4th) Year of Jehoiakim: Comp. Jer. 25:1 with Dan. 1:1. from which Time to the first (1st) Year of Cyrus, according to the Scripture-Account, are just Seventy Years. These Desolations began from the fourth (4th) Year of Jehoiakim, when the City was taken by Nebuchadnezzar. See Chap. 1:1. at which Time the King of Judah became tributary to the King of Babylon: and they were from time to time increasing, till the eleventh (11th) Year of Zedekiah, when they were fully accomplished in the burning of the City and Temple; after which Time it continued desolate till the End of the Captivity, 2nd Chron. XXXVI. 36:21. 9:21: Ibid. 'Touched me [See Chap. viii. 8:18; 10:10.] about the time of the Evening Oblation'.] There were three (3) Hours of Prayer: See Chap. 6:10. but the two (2) most solemn Seasons of it were at the Time of the Morning and Evening Oblation, that solemn Service which was offered daily in the Temple in the Name of the whole Nation: See Chap. 8:11. This Service was performed at the Third (3rd) and Ninth (9th) Hours of the Day, answering to our Nine (9) of the Clock in the Morning and Three (3) in the Afternoon. Devout Persons that could not attend the Temple Service, set apart those Hours for their private Devotions: and we find Elijah made that solemn Prayer and Sacrifice recorded 1st Kings 8:36. at the time of the offering of the Evening Sacrifice. But upon their solemn Days of Fasting and Humiliation, they continued their Devotions from the Time of the Morning Sacrifice till that of the Evening was finished. Such was this of Daniel, and that of Cornelius, mentioned Acts 10:30. This Custom was continued among the Primitive Christians, who did not conclude their Prayers or Fasts on their Stationary Days, till three (3) in the Afternoon. See Mr. Bingham, Ecceſ. Antiq. Book 21. Chap. 3. 9:24: 'Seventy (70) Weeks are determined upon thy People and upon thy Holy City']. To recite all the different Methods Chronologers have taken of computing these IXX (70) Weeks, would be too large a Work for a Commentary. I shall only take Notice of three (3) Opinions, which seem most agreeable to the Text. The first (1st) is, that of Petavius Rationar. Tem. par. 2. p. 154. and Archbishop Usher, Annal. V.T. ad. An. P. J. 4260. These two (2) learned Authors date the Beginning of this Prophecy from the 20th Year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, when he gave his Commission to Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem, Nehem. 2:1. –from which Time they reckon half (1/2) of the Week here specified, ver. 27. to be completed at the Death of Christ. But then these Authors suppose Artaxerxes to have begun his Reign nine (9) Years sooner than the Historians commonly date it. The second Opinion is that of Dr. Prideaux, Connect. of Scrip, par. 1. ad an. ante C. 458. who fixes the Date of this Prophecy to the seventh (7th) Year of Artaxerxes, when he gave a Commission to Ezra, to settle the State of the Jews at Jerusalem, to which Sense he understands the Commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem: from which Time he computes 490 Years to the Death of Christ. The Third (3rd) Opinion is that of the late Right Reverend and Learned Bishop Lloyd, which may be seen in the Chronological Tables published by his Direction Numb. 3d and 4th. He supposes the Years here specified to consist of 360 Days: Such Years he affirms the Scripture always makes use of in the Computation of Time: as appears in the History of Noah's Flood, Gen. 7:11 compared with ver. 24 and Chap. 8:4 and from Rev. 12:6. compared with ver. 14 and Chap. 13:5. where 1260 Days are reckoned equivalent to three (3) Years and an half (1/2), and to Forty (40) and two (2) Months. The same Computation of Years was generally made use of in antient Times by all Nations, particularly by the Chaldeans, where Daniel now lived. The Reasons of this Opinion are at large set forth by Mr. Marshall, in his Treatise upon the IXX (70) Weeks, Part 2d, Chap. 4. The Bishop proceeding upon this Hypothesis, computes the Date of this Prophecy from the 20th Year of Artaxerxes, and reckons 69 Weeks of Years, or 483 Chaldean Years, from thence to the Year before Christ's Death. But then the last or single Week that remains to make up the Number of Seventy (70), he separates from the rest, and begins it from the Year of Christ 63, in the latter Half of which the Sacrifice and Oblation were to cease, and the City and Sanctuary to be destroyed by the Romans: all which was fulfilled in the IXXth (70th) Year after Christ. The Difference of these Three (3) Opinions, as to the main Point, the Completion of this Prophecy, is not very great; for as the learned Bishop Chandler hath judiciously observed, (Answer to Grounds and Reasons, p. 139.) "The Commencement of the Weeks must be either from the seventh (7th) of Artaxerxes, which falls upon the 457th Year before An. Domini, or from the 20th of Artaxerxes. Add to 457 Years before Christ, 26 Years after Christ, (which is the Number that 483 Years, or sixty nine (69) Weeks exceeds 457 Years) and you are brought to the Beginning of John the Baptist's preaching up the advent of Messias: add seven (7) Years, or one (1) Week to the former, and you come to the 33d Year of An. Domini, which was the Year of Jesus Christ's Death. Or else compute 490 Years, the whole IXX (70) Weeks, from the seventh (7th) of Artaxerxes; by subtracting 457 Years (the Space of Time between that Year and the Beginning of An. Domini,) from 490, and there remains 33, the Year of our Lord's Death. Let the 20th of Artaxerxes be the Date of the IXX (70) Weeks, which is the 445 Year before A. D. and reckon 69 Weeks of Chaldean Years; to Chaldee Years being equal to 69 Julian; and so 478 Julian Years making 483 Chaldee Years, and the end in the 33rd Year after Christ, or the Passover following. Any of these Reckonings, adds this learned Author, are sufficient for our Purpose. It is rather to be wondred, how, at this Distance of Time, learned Men have been able to come "to any Exactness in these Matters. 9:24 Ibid. 'Seventy (70) Weeks are determined'.] By Seventy (70) Weeks are to be understood Seventy (70) Weeks of Years, or Seventy (70) times seven (7) Years, i.e. 490 Years: each Day being accounted for a Year, according to the Prophetical way of reckoning: See Numb. 14:34, Ezek. 4:6. Daniel distinguished between these Weeks and the Weeks after the common reckoning, by calling the latter Weeks of Days, Chap. 10:2. according to the Sense of the Hebrew, expressed in the Margin. And Isaiah distinguished a Natural Year from a Prophetical One, by calling it 'the Year of a hireling', Isa. 16:14; 21:16. The Jews numbered their Time by sevens (7s) of Years: every seventh (7th) Year was a Year of Release, and after seven (7) times seven (7) Years, i.e. 49 Years, came the Year of Jubilee. So the Computation of Time here made use of alludes to Levit. 25:8. 'Thou shalt number seven Sabbaths [or rather Weeks] of Years, seven (7) times seven (7) Years'. The Hebrew Word Sabbath signifying the Number Seven (7), as it is rendered ('Ebdomas), by the LXX (70), in the latter Part of the Verse: and so the Greek Word (Sabbalon) is used Luke 8:12; 24:1. Daniel, by examining the Prophecy of Jeremiah, had discovered how the Seventy (70) Years of the Captivity were near expiring: and here the Angel discovers to him another Line of Time, importing, that after the Restoration of Jerusalem it should continue for a Period of Time consisting of seventy (70) times seven (7) Years, which being expired, it should be finally destroyed. Seventy (70) Weeks contain ten (10) Jubilees, and Ten (10) being the Number of Perfection, these seventy (70) Weeks denote the bringing in the most complete Jubilee, or Remission, as the LXX (70) render that Word: when all former Trespasses should be cancelled, and Men should be restored to that Heavenly Inheritance they had forfeited, by the Death of the Messias. 9:24: Ibid. 'Upon thy People and thy holy City'.] Daniel in his Prayer to God, speaking of the Jews and Jerusalem, had used these Expressions, Thy People, and thy holy City, ver. 18,19. as if their Title to God's Favour were indefeasible. To correct this Mistake, the Angel directing his Discourse to Daniel, returns him his own Expressions, as if the People and the City were rather His than God's. In the same Phrase God speaks to Moses, after the Sin of the Israelites in making the Golden Calf: Exod. 32:7. At the 26th Verse of this Prophecy, the Angel tells Daniel how they ceased to be God's People. 9:24: Ibid. 'To finish the Transgression, and to make an End of Sin, and to make Reconciliation for Iniquity, and to bring in everlasting Righteousness'.] This the Messiah did by making an Atonement for Sin, and absolving Men from the Guilt of it: by giving Men the best Rules and Assistances for the promoting true and inward Righteousness: called here everlasting Righteousnes, in Opposition to the Righteousness of the Law, a great Part of which consisted in external Ordinances, imposed on them for a Season, till the Time of Reformation: Heb. 9:10. Where the English Text reads, 'to make an End of Sin', the Margin translates it, 'to seal up Sin', following a various Reading in the Hebrew : but the Sense comes all to one (1), for the Verb which signifies to seal up, denotes likewise the accomplishing of anything, and is applied to Sin, or the Punishment of it, Lament. 4:22. See likewise the following Note. 9:24: Ibid. 'To seal up the Vision and Prophecy'.] To fulfil the Prophecies of foregoing Ages concerning the Messias, and to confirm them, by making the Event to answer the Prediction, as the setting of a Seal confirms the Authenticalness of any Writing. Thus the Rabbins upon the Text interpret the Words, All the Prophecies, say they, shall be fulfilled at the Coming of the Messias. Bishop Lloyd explains the Sentence of the finishing and completing the Prophetical Writings of the Old Testament, which he supposes to have been done 49 Years after the Commencement of this Prophecy. See the Note upon the following Verse. 9:24: Ibid. 'And to anoint the most Holy'.] The Word Anoint plainly alludes to the Name of Messiah, expressed in the following Verse, which signifies in Hebrew the Anointed, and is translated Christ in Greek : See John 1:41. To anoint is the same here as to consecrate the Messiah to be a Priest, Prophet, and King, all which Offices were conveyed by the Ceremony of Anointing. The Messiah is styled here the most Holy, upon the Account of his unspotted Original, as well as his unblameable Life. See Luke 1:35; Acts 3:14; Heb. 7:26; Rev. 3:7. The Words may be literally translated, 'to anoint the Holy of Holies': an Expression which usually signifies the inner Sanctuary, called 'the Holiest of all', Heb. 9:3, and it is very properly applied to the Messias, who was greater than the Temple, Matth. 12:6. because 'in him dwelt the Fulness of the Godhead', Coloss. 2:9. whereupon he calls his Body the Temple, John 2:21. 9:25: 'Know therefore and understand'.] See ver. 23. 9:25: Ibid. 'From the going forth of the Commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem'.] Or, 'to build again Jerusalem', as the Margin reads; and so the Verb 'Shub' is translated in the latter Part of the Verse, and see Chap. 11:10. Daniel had besought God to behold their Desolations, and the Ruins of the City which is called by his Name, ver:18. In answer to this his Supplication, the Angel acquaints him, that the City, both the Streets and the Wall thereof, should be rebuilt. These Expressions do very much confirm their Interpretation, who date this Prophecy from the 20th Year of Artaxerxes, when he gave a Commission to Nehemiah to rebuild the City and its Walls, Nehem. 2:11. —Whereas Dr. Prideaux, who dates this Prophecy from the seventh (7th) Year of Artaxerxes, is forced to understand these Expressions in a metaphorical Sense, for restoring and establishing the Church and State of the Jews. Now it is a received Rule, that a literal Sense is always to be preferred, if it be consistent with the main Scope of the Text. 9:25: Ibid. 'Unto Messiah the Prince'.] Anointing being the ancient Ceremony of investing Persons in the highest Offices and Dignities, the Name of Messias, or Anointed, was in an eminent Manner appropriated to him that was sanctified, or set apart, and sent into the World under the highest Character of being the Redeemer of it. By that Name he was commonly known unto the Jews, John 1:41; 4:25, and that Title was chiefly given to him from the Authority of this Prophecy. He is called here the Prince or Ruler, a Title often given to David: See 1st Sam. 9:16; 2nd Sam. 5:2; 8:8, and applied to the Messiah himself, spoken of under the Name of David, Isa. 55:4. The Author of the first (1st) Book of Chronicles probably alludes to this Place of Daniel, Chap. 5:2 Judah prevailed over his Brethren, and of him was the Chief Ruler (the Nagid here in the Text) to come: as the Words may best be translated. The Messiah was commonly known under the Title of King of Israel, or King of the Jews: See Matt. 2:2; Luke 23:2,3; John 1:49; 19:19. 9:25: Ibid. 'Shall be seven (7) Weeks, and threescore (60) and two (2) Weeks'.] A Colon should be placed at the end of this Sentence, which is wrong placed in the Middle of it in our English Bibles. 'Seven (7) Weeks and threescore (60) and two (2) Weeks' put together make sixty nine (69) Weeks of Years, or 583 Years. As the cutting off the Messiah is appropriated to the Period of threescore (60) and two (2) Weeks in the following Verse, so the seven (7) Weeks or 49 Years here mentioned must in all Probability be assigned to the Building of the Street and the Wall, whether we understand it literally, or metaphorically with Dr. Prideaux, for the restoring and settling the Jewish Church and State. See Dr. Prideaux ubi supra, & ad Ann. ante C. 409. Bishop Lloyd, who reckons the Date of this Prophecy from the twentieth (20th) of Artaxerxes, concludes the seven (7) Weeks, or 49 Years, in the eighth (8th) Year of Artaxerxes Mnemon, at which Time he supposes Malachi to have writ his Prophecy, and thereby finished the Old Testament Canon, or 'sealed up the Vision and Prophecy', after whom the Jews were to look for no other Prophet till John Baptist: See Malach. 4:4,5. compared with Matt. 11:13,14. 9:25: Ibid. 'The Street shall be built again, and the Wall, even in troublous Times'.] When the Jews were sorely assaulted by their Adversaries, who did all they could to hinder them from rebuilding the City, and fortifying it with a new Wall. See Nehem. 4:7, &c. 6:15. These Words, taken in their obvious Sense, plainly fix the Date of this Prophecy to the 20th Year of Artaxerxes, who then gave Nehemiah a Commission to repair the City, and raise up the Walls and Ramparts of it: See Nehem. 2,3,4 compared with Ecclus. 49:13. Before which Time the Jews that returned from Captivity lived in the Cities where their Inheritance lay: See Ezra 2:70, Nehem. 8:4. "The Word 'Haruts', translated 'Wall', properly signifies the Circuit bounding out the Limits of the City, where on the Wall was built, and antiently used to be marked out with a Plough making a Furrow round about," as Mr. Mede observes, Works, p. 700. And by 'Rechob', the 'Street', or broad Place, he understands the Area, or Plat of Ground, whereon the City was to be built. Or else we may suppose the Singular put for the Plural, an Enallage very common in Scripture. 9:26: 'And after threescore (60) and two (2) Weeks shall Messiah be cut off'.] Or, 'after those threescore (60) and two (2) Weeks'—for the 'He' prefixed to the Word 'Shebunim' is Emphatical, as the Grammarians express it. The common Interpretation of the Word is, that in the seventieth (70th) or last Week the Messiah should be put to Death. The Hebrew Verb here translated cut off, is by the Jewish Rabbins interpreted of a Death inflicted by the Sentence of a Judge, which Sense they confirm by the use of it in a parallel Place, Levit. 17:14 to which we may add 1st Sam. 27:9. Our Saviour plainly refers to this Text, among others, Luke 24:26, 46. Bishop Lloyd, who makes a Break between the sixty-nine (69) Weeks and the seventieth (70th), supposes the sixty-nine (69) to expire in May, A.D. 32, which was the Year before our Saviour's Passion. In Correspondency with this Prophecy, our Lord could not survive a whole Year after the sixty-nine (69) Weeks were expired: nor did he: but since he was to be CUT OFF at the Passover, himself being the true Paschal Lamb, he died in the following Year in the Month Nisan, answering to our April, the very same Day and Hour that the Paschal

Lamb was wont to be killed. See the Chronological Tables above mentioned. 9:26: Ibid. 'But not for himself'.] The Just suffering for the Unjust, 1st Pet. 3:18. The Vulgar Latin renders the Words to this Sense, 'And the People that deny him shall be no longer his'. The Hebrew Phrase is used in the same Sense, Chap. 11:17; Job 39:16. To confirm this Interpretation, we are to suppose the Word People, which follows, to be understood here, and may with Bishop Lloyd translate this and the following Sentence thus: 'And the People that deny him shall be no longer his', but the Prince's (i.e. the Messiah's, ver. 25.) 'future People shall destroy', &c. And then the Jews will properly be called 'Lo-ammi, not my People', Hos. 1:9. 9:26: Ibid. 'But the People of the Prince that shall come'.] The Romans, under the Conduct of Vespasian and his Son Titus, who were the Generals in that War, and both of them dignified with the Title of Prince or Cæsar. Bishop Lloyd corrects the common Translation thus, 'The Prince's (i.e. the Messiah's) future People': The Hebrew Word 'Haba', as the Greek (erchomenos), which answers it, often signifying the future, or that which is to come: See Isa. 27:6, 44:7, Mark 10:30, Rev. 1:4. This People that learned Prelate understands to be the Romans and their Empire, which was the Seat of the Christian Church. So when our Saviour tells us, that before the End of the Jewish Nation come, the Gospel shall be preached in all the World, Matt. 24:14 and St. Paul speaks to the same Purpose, Rom. 10:16, Coloss. 1:6, 23, we are there to understand the World of the Extent of the Roman Empire. And our Lord speaking of the final Destruction of the Jewish Nation by the Romans, expresseth it by sending forth 'HIS ARMIES to destroy those Murderers, and burn up their City', Mat. 22:7 which exactly agrees with the Words here following. 9:26: Ibid. 'Shall destroy the City and the Sanctuary'.] After that the Romans had burnt both City and Sanctuary, they so entirely destroyed them, that it could scarce be perceived the Place had ever been inhabited, as Josephus relates, de Bello, lib. vii. c. 1. Edit. Hudson. And the Jews relate, that a Plough was drawn over the Ground where they both stood: See Dr. Lightfoot upon Matt. 24:2 which were evident Accomplishments of our Saviour's Prediction, that one (1) Stone should not stand upon another, with respect either to the City, Luk. 19:44, or to the Sanctuary, Matt. 24:2 and Chap. 33:38. 9:26: Ibid. 'And the End thereof shall be with a Flood'.] The Desolations made by an Army are often compared to the Inundations of a Flood, whose Violence nothing is able to withstand. Comp. Chap. 11:10, Isa. 8:7,8. 9:26: Ibid. 'And unto the End of the War Desolations are determined'.] Or, Decreed. That War shall make an utter Destruction both of the City and the Nation. 9:27: 'And he shall confirm the Covenant with many for one Week'.] The former Part of the Verse may be literally translated thus: 'One Week shall confirm the Covenant with many; and the midst of, or the half part of the Week, shall cause the Sacrifice and Oblation to cease'. Most Interpreters suppose the seventy (70) Weeks to be completed at the Death of Christ, or at least one half of the seventieth (70th) and last of them: accordingly they understand the Confirming the Covenant of the new Covenant, and the Terms of Salvation therein proposed, first by John Baptist, as the Forerunner of Christ, and then by Christ himself. Comp. Isa. 42:6; 45:3, Jer. 31:31, Ezek. xvi. 16:60, 61,62. They that confine the Promulgation of the new Covenant to the first (1st) half (1/2) of the IXXth (70th) Week, understand it of Christ's Preaching for three (3) Years and a half (1/2), and then suffering in the midst of that Week. They that understand the Confirming the Covenant to be of the same Extent with the Seventieth (70th) Week, suppose John Baptist's Preaching to have taken up three (3) Years and a half (1/2), before Christ entered on his Prophetical Office, and translate the following Words, 'In the half (1/2) Part of the Week'. See the next Note but one (1). 9:27: Ibid. 'With many'.] The same Expression is elsewhere used of the universal Redemption, or general Promulgation of Pardon by the Gospel Covenant: See Isai. 53:11, Matt. 20:28, Rom. 5:15, 19, Heb. 9:28. 9:27: Ibid. 'And in the Midst of the Week'.] Our Translation of the Words follows their Opinion, who place the Death of Christ in the middle of the last Week: See Archbishop Usher's Annals, Par. 2. p. 569. whereas they that suppose the whole seventy (70) Weeks completed at our Saviour's Passion, translate the Sentence thus, 'In the half (1/2) part of the Week he shall cause the Sacrifice and Oblation to cease'; understanding it of the latter half (1/2). See Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra.

The Hebrew Word (Chatsi) signifies properly the half (1/2) Part, and is commonly translated by (Emisu) in the Septuagint (70). [In this Sense it is to be understood by our Translation, Chap. 12:7 of this Prophecy.] 9:27: Ibid. 'He shall cause the Sacrifice and Oblation to cease'.] Christ, by his 'one Oblation of himself once offered', shall put an End to all the Sacrifices and Oblations made in the Jewish Temple, Comp. Heb. 10:5,6, &c. Thus the Words are expounded by those that suppose the Seventy (70) Weeks to have been finished at our Saviour's Death. To confirm this Exposition, we may observe, that the putting an End to the Temple Service by Violence, such as was that threatened under Antiochus Epiphanes, is expressed in a different Manner, viz. 'By taking away the daily Sacrifice', Chap. 8:11,12; 11:31. Others understand these Words of the final Destruction of the Jewish Temple and Worship by the Romans; and it may be observed, that the Word (Mincha), Oblation, is sometimes used for the daily Sacrifice: See 1st Kings 18:29, 36. Bishop Lloyd explains the Words to this Sense: he separates this single (1), or odd Week, (so he translates (Sbabua Echad), one Week) from the other sixty-nine (69): and makes it commence in the 63rd Year after Christ, and to end in the final Destruction of the City and Temple of Jerusalem, which came to pass A.C. 70. It must be granted, that this Interpretation agrees better with the Letter of the Text than the former: and the Abomination of Desolation immediately following it, they may both be reasonably thought the express Characters of one (1) and the same Week, viz. the Seventieth (70th), determined upon Daniel's People and City. The same learned Prelate understands the Words, 'He shall confirm the Covenant with many of the Prince's future People', mentioned in the foregoing Verse, viz. the Romans: who by their General Corbulo made a Peace with the Parthians, Medes, and Armenians, that they might be better at Leisure to make an entire Conquest of Judea; of which Tacitus speaking, saith, 'There never was so firm a Peace as now': Annal. lib. xv. There is one Difficulty which attends this Explication: viz. That instead of setting forth one (1) continued Line of Time, from the 'Going forth of the Commandment to rebuild Jerusalem', to the Conclusion of the Events here foretold, it makes a considerable Break, or Interval of Time, between the fulfilling one (1) Part of the Prophecy and the other. Whereas the other Interpretations suppose the Destruction of the City and Temple to run beyond the Computation of the Seventy (70) Weeks, and to be immediately subjoined to the Death of Christ, as we see they are, ver. 26. to shew what shall be the Catastrophe, or final Punishment which shall attend so great a Wickedness. Ibid. 'And for the overspreading of Abominations, he shall make it desolate'.] Mr. Mede translates the Words thus, And being a Desolator, he shall command over a Wing of Abominations: Works, p. 407. Bishop Lloyd, with some little Variation, renders them, 'And upon the Battlements shall be the Idols of the Desolator'. They both understand by the Phrase the Roman Army, which is the Interpretation Christ himself gives of it, Luke 21:20 compared with Matt. 24:15. The Word (Kenapb), translated in the English Overspreading, properly signifies a Wing, and may either signify an Army, as it is used Isaiah 8:8. or else stand for the Battlements of the Temple, as the Greek (Pterugion), which answers to it, plainly does, Matt. 4:5. Here the Romans, after they had set the Temple on fire, placed the idolatrous Ensigns of their Army over-against the Eastern Gate of the Temple, and offered Sacrifice to them, as Josephus expressly tells us, Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 6. Edit. Hudson. The Word (Shikutsim), Abominations, is commonly used for Idols: See 1st Kings 11:5, 7, 2nd Kings 23:13. And the Abomination of Desolation set upon the Altar by Antiochus, 1st Maccab. 1:54 is explained by the Idol-Altar, ibid. ver. 59. So the Abominations here spoken of do very properly signify the Ensigns, or Standards of the Roman Legions; each Standard having stamp't upon it the Image of the Tutelar 'God' of that Legion, to whom they offered Sacrifice. Tacitus calls the Eagle and the other Ensigns, 'Propria Legionum Numina', The 'Deities which were peculiar to their Legions': Annal. lib. 2. Tertullian's Words are to the same purpose: 'Religio tota castrensis signa veneratur, signa jurat, & Diis omnibus præponit : All the Religion of the Army consists in paying divine Worship to their Standards, in swearing by them, and preferring them before all other Deities'. Apol. c.16 9:27: Ibid. 'Even until the Consummation'.] Till God's Indignation be accomplished, as the same Sense is expressed, Chap. 11:36. 9:27: Ibid. 'And that determined [or which is decreed] shall be poured upon the Desolate'.] Comp. ver.

11 of this Chapter. Mr. Mede translates it, 'shall continue upon the Desolate': p. 709. The Words briefly declare those terrible Calamities which made an entire Destruction of that City and People, and were executed upon them in the most dreadful Manner that any Nation ever suffered, and with the most evident Tokens of a divine Vengeance upon them, according to the Relation of their own Historian Josephus, who was an Eye-witness of these Desolations. And ever since their Posterity have been dispersed all the World over, living only upon Sufferance in their several Dispersions, and very often exposed to grievous Oppressions and Persecutions, enough to have extinguished their Race, unless they had been preserved by Providence, on purpose to verify the Truth of those Prophecies which foretold these Calamities: and particularly those Words of Christ, which have a plain Aspect upon the Text before us, Luke 21:22, 23, 24. 'These be the Days of Vengeance: that all Things that are written may be fulfilled for there shall be great distress in the Land, and Wrath upon this People: And they shall fall by the Edge of the Sword, and be led away captive unto all Nations, and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, untill the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled'! i.e. till the Times of the Fourth (4th) Monarchy, spoken of Chap. 2, and 7 are expired. See the Note upon Chap. 12:7. Bishop Lloyd renders the last Word (Shomem), 'Desolate', in an active Sense, The Desolator, or him that makes Desolate: in which Sense the Word is plainly taken, Chap. 8:13; 12:11. The Sense he gives of the Sentence is much the same with the former: viz. that the divine Vengeance shall continue upon the Jews, till it be returned upon under the Seventh (7th) Head: See Rev. xvii. 1. Having given a particular Account of the Author of their Desolations, which he interprets of the Roman Government, as it was exercised the most probable Expositions of this famous Prophecy, I need not take any Notice of Sir John Marsham's Explication of it in his Chronicus Canon, p. 568. since a learned Writer, Mr. Marshal, in his Treatise upon the IXX (70) Weeks, lately published, hath shewed it to be inconsistent with itself, as well as with the undoubted Monuments both of Sacred and Prophane History. The late Author of Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, hath thought fit to mention Sir J. M.'s Hypothesis with Aprobation: but it is to be presumed that this took it upon Trust, without ever examining it, and was glad to find an Opinion prejudicial to Christianity countenanced by so great a Name. }}

{{ Chapter 10: 'The Argument: The three (3) following Chapters contain the last Vision of Daniel's Prophecy, wherein the several Successions, both of the Persian and, Grecian Monarchies are represented, together with the Wars that should be raised between the Kings of Syria and Egypt under the latter Monarchy, as far as the Times of Antiochus Epiphanes: who being the Type and Forerunner of Antichrist, (as hath been observed upon Chap. 8) the latter Part of the Vision from Chap. 11:36. seems chiefly to relate to the Persecutions of the Church in the Times of Antichrist, till it's being finally cleansed from all those Profanations, as the Temple of Jerusalem was purified from the Pollutions of Antiochus: after which will follow that Kingdom of the Saints mentioned Chap, 7:18, 27 of this Prophecy'. 10:1: 'In the Third (3rd) Year of Cyrus King of Persia'.] Daniel must now have been above 90 Years of Age; he could not be less than twenty (20) when he was carried Captive: (See the Preface to this Commentary) and that was seventy-three (73) Years before the Date of this Vision; which was the last Daniel saw, and it is likely he himself survived it long. }}

{{ Chapter 11: (See Chapter 10 Argument): 11:2. 'And now I will shew thee the Truth'.] What is contained in the Scripture, or Writing of Truth, Chapter 10:21. Or I will shew thee the Succession of the Persian and Grecian Empire in plain and naked Truth, not in symbolical or figurative Representations, as it was shewed before, Chap. 8. 11:2: Ibid. 'There shall stand up yet three (3) Kings in Persia'.] After Cyrus shall succeed Cambyses, Smerdis, and Darius Hystaspes. So Ezra mentions two (2) Kings, whom he calls Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes (Names which were common to most of the Persian Kings in the Jewish History) who reigned between Cyrus and Darius Hystaspes, Ezra 4:6, 7. 11:2: Ibid. 'And the fourth (4th) shall be far richer than they all', &c.] This plainly means Xerxes, who brought together an Army of above four (4) Millions, according to Herodotus's Account: of eight (8) Millions, as others say, to over-run the whole Country of Greece. These Wars, carried on by Xerxes's Successors, ended at last in the Conquest of the Persian Monarchy by Alexander the Great. Upon this account the Angel passes over the rest of the Persian Kings, and proceeds immediately to relate the Successes of Alexander: it being the chief Design of the former Part of this Vision to foretel the Translation of the Empire from the Persians to the Greeks: See Chap. 10:20. St. Jerome rightly observes upon the 5th Verse of this Chapter, "That it was not the Design of the Scripture to give us an Historical Narrative of the Actions of Heathen Princes, any farther than the Affairs of the Jewish Nation were concerned in them." In like manner at the 36th Verse, the Angel breaks off the Succession of the Syrian Kings after Antiochus to describe Antichrift, of whom the former was the Type and Fore-runner. [So Chap. 8:9. The Prophet passes over all the Successors of Alexander to Antiochus Epiphanes, whose Reign had a particular Influence upon the Jewish Affairs.] 11:3. 'And a mighty King shall stand up, and do according to his Will'.] Compare ver. 16. This denotes Alexander the Great, whose Success was so uninterrupted, that nobody was able to put a Stop to the Progress of his Victories: See Chap. 8:5. 11:4. 'And when he shall stand up'.] When he shall be in the Height of his Prosperity. 11:4: Ibid. 'His Kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four (4) Winds of Heaven'.] See the Notes upon Chap. 8:8. 11:4: Ibid. 'And not to his Posterity'.] Alexander had a Brother, Aridaeus, and two Sons, Alexander and Hercules: these were all cut off in a few Years after his Death, to make way for his Generals, who divided his Empire among themselves. 11:4: Ibid. 'Nor according to his Dominion which he ruled'.] They did not immediately take upon them the Title of Kings: See Dr. Prideaux, ad ann. A. C. 301, and his Dominion being divided, lost much of that Strength and Power which the Empire had when it was united in the Person of Alexander: See Chap. 8:22. 11:4: Ibid. 'For his Kingdom shall be plucked up for others beside those'.] Alexander's four (4) Great Successors were Ptolemy, Cassander, Lysimachus, and Seleucus: See the Note upon Chap. 8:8, but others beside them came in for a Share of his Dominions, such as Eumenes, Philotas, and others. The Word translated 'plucked up' is the same as 'rooted up', or destroyed, and is opposed to 'planting', or making to thrive, Jer. 1:10; 24:6; 31:28, or the Phrase may allude to the Feathers of a Bird being plucked and scattered abroad. Compare Chap. 7:4. 11:5: 'And the King of the South shall be strong'.] By the 'King of the South', in this and the following Verses, is meant the King of Egypt: and by the 'King of the North', the King of Syria. These two Kings came at length to have the principal Share of Alexander's Dominions, and make the greatest Figure among his Successors. But the Reason why they only are mentioned here, is, because they only were concerned in the Affairs of the Jews: Judea bordering upon each of their Dominions, and sometimes belonging to one, and sometimes to the other of those Princes. The King of the South mentioned in this Verse, denotes Ptolemy the first (1st), the Son of Lagus, called by way of Distinction, Ptolemy Soter. The Text saith of him, that he should be 'strong': for he had all Egypt and the adjacent Parts of Libya under his Dominion, besides Palestine, Cæle-Syria, and most of the Maritime Provinces of the Lesser Asia. 11:5: Ibid. 'And one of his Princes, and [or even] be shall be strong above him, and have dominion'.] Another of the Successors of Alexander, who took upon them the Style of Kings or Princes: (See the Note on ver. 4.) This was Seleucus Nicator, the first King of the North, or of Syria: who by the Conquest of Lysimachus King of Thrace, and Demetrius King of Macedon, obtained the Name of Nicator, i.e. Conqueror. 11:5: Ibid. 'His dominion shall be a great dominion'.] He had under his Dominion all the Countries of the East, from Mount Taurus, to the River Indus: and from thence Westward to the Egean-Sea: whereupon Appianus the Historian reckons him the most Potent of all Alexander's Successors. 11:6: 'And in the end of Years, they shall join themselves together'.] In process of Time the Successors of these two Kings, viz. Ptolemy Philadelphus, the Son of the former Ptolemy, and Antiochus Theus, the Grandson of Seleucus Nicator, shall enter into a League or Confederacy with each other. 11:6: Ibid. 'For the King's Daughter of the South /ball come to the King of the North to make an agreement'.] This League shall be concluded by the Marriage of Berenice, Daughter to Ptolemy Philadelphus, with Antiochus Theus

King of Syria, altho' he had another Wife Laodice, and two Children by her, Seleucus Callinicus, and Antiochus. 11:6: Ibid. 'But he shall not retain the power of the arm'.] She shall not be able to keep her Power or Interest with Antiochus: for as soon as her Father Ptolemy was dead, Antiochus divorced her, and recalled his former Wife Laodice and her Children. 11:6: Ibid. 'Neither shall he stand, nor his arm'.]

Nor shall Antiochus himself long survive, for Laodice being jealous of his fickle Temper, procured him to be poisoned, and concealed his Death till her Son Seleucus had secured the Succession.

11:6: Ibid. 'But he shall be given up, and they that brought her'.] Berenice, after she had shut herself up in the Asylum, or Place of Sanctuary at Daphne, was betrayed into her Enemies Hands, and basely murdered with all those that attended her out of Egypt. 11:6: Ibid. 'And he that begat her'.] If we follow this Translation, see the Explication of it in the next Note: But the Marginal Reading gives the better Sense, 'He whom she brought forth'; her Son who was slain with her: The Hebrew, (Yoled), is in the Form of the Participle Active: but the same Form is sometimes used in a Passive Sense: of which we may produce an Instance from Chap. 9:27 of this Prophecy, where the Word (Shomem) is rendered in a Passive Sense, 'Desolate', by most Interpreters. 11:6: Ibid. 'And he that strengthened her in thesetimes'.] Her Father who should have supported her with his Interest under these Difficulties, but died himself a little before. All these Particulars, and what are mentioned in the following Notes, are fully related in the Historical Accounts of those Times, as may be seen by those who will consult the Authors referred to by St. Jerom, in his Commentaries upon Daniel, and Dr. Prideaux in the second Part of his Script. Connection. 11:7: 'But out of a Branch of her Root shall stand up one in his Estate, and shall enter into the Fortress of the King of the North'.]

One of the same Stock or Original with Berenice, viz. her Brother Ptolemy Euergetes, shall succeed his Father in the Government of Egypt, and shall revenge his Sister's Quarrel, by invading the Frontiers or Territories (see ver. 10.) of Seleucus, and prevail against him. 11:8: 'And he shall also carry Captives into Egypt their Gods, with their Princes', &c.]

St. Jerom tells us out of Writers extant in his Time, that Ptolemy made himself Master of all Syria and Cilicia, and passing the Euphrates, conquered as far as Babylon: and carried back into Egypt vast Plunder from all the conquered Provinces, together with two thousand five hundred (2500) Egyptian Idols, which Cambyfes upon his Conquering Egypt had carried into Persia. This Action of his so highly obliged the Egyptians, that they gave him the Title of Euergetes, or, the Benefactor. 11:8: Ibid. 'And he shall continue more Years than the King of the North'.]

Ptolemy out-lived Seleucus the Space of four (4) Years. 11:9: 'So the King of the South shall come into his Kingdom', &c.] Ptolemy shall return home without Molestation, and quietly enjoy what he had gotten by his Victories. 11:10: 'But his Sons shall be stirred up, and assemble a multitude of great Forces'.]

The Sons of Seleucus, Seleucus Ceraunus, and Antiochus, called afterwards the Great, shall assemble a mighty Army, in order to recover all that their Father had lost. 11:10: Ibid. 'And one shall certainly come, and overflow and pass over'.]

Antiochus shall certainly overrun Judea and Cæle-Syria, with other Provinces belonging to the King of Egypt; taking the Advantage of Ptolemy Euergetes's Death, and the Succession of his Son Ptolemy Philopator, a weak and profligate Prince: under whose Reign he attempted the Recovery of Syria. We may observe the Text here speaks only of a single Person, viz. Antiochus, for his Brother Seleucus died in the Beginning of this Enterprise, having scarce reigned three (3) Years. The Devastations of an Army are fitly compared to Innundations: See ver. 22, 40 and Chap. 9:26. 11:10: Ibid. 'Then shall he return, and be stirred up even to his Fortress'.]

Or, 'He shall again be stirred up', &c. See the Note upon Chap. 9:25. At the Spring of the next Year he shall take the Field again, and encamp at Raphia, a Frontier Town upon the Borders of Egypt. See the History of this Engagement in Polybius, lib. 5. p. 573. Edit. 8vo.

11:11: 'And the King of the South shall be moved with Choler, and shall come forth and fight with him, even with the King of the North'.] Ptolemy Philopator, the young King of Egypt, being enraged at the Attempts of Antiochus, shall come with a great Army to encounter him. 11:11: Ibid. 'And he shall set forth a great Multitude'.]

If we understand the Words of Ptolemy's Army, that consisted of seventy thousand (70,000) Foot, five thousand (5,000) Horse, and seventy three (73) Elephants. Antiochus's was little inferior to his, for he had sixty-two thousand (62,000) Foot, six thousand (6,000) Horse, and sixty-two (62) Elephants. 11:11: Ibid. 'But the Multitude shall be delivered into his Hand'.]

The Army of Antiochus was discomfited by Ptolemy, ten thousand (10,000) being slain, and four thousand (4,000) taken Prisoners. The Author of the third (3rd) Book of Maccabees ascribes this Victory to the passionate Importunity of Arsinoe, Ptolemy's Sister, who ran about the Army with her Hair about her Shoulders, and by Promises and Entreaties engaged the Soldiers to fight with more than ordinary Resolution.

11:12: 'His Heart shall be lifted up'.] So far as to offer to force his Passage into the Holiest Part of the Jewish Temple, when he came to Jerusalem to offer Sacrifices there, after his Victory: the Story is related at large in the fore mentioned third (3rd) Book of the Maccabees, Chap. 1. 11:12: Ibid. 'And he shall cast down many ten thousands (10,000s), but he shall not be strengthened by it'.] Or, 'Tho' he shall cast down he shall not be strengthened by it. He shall content himself with recovering the Provinces of Cæle-Syria and Palestine, and make no farther Advantages of his Victory; being willing to agree to a Peace, that he might securely follow his Pleasures. See Dr. Prideaux, par. 2. ad ann. A.C. 217.

11:13: 'For the King of the North shall return, and shall set forth a Multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come (after certain Years) with a great Army', &c.] Fourteen (14) Years after the ending of the former War, upon the Death of Philopator, and the succeeding of his Infant Son Ptolemy Epiphanes, Antiochus the King of the North shall return into Cæle-Syria and Palestine, for the Recovery of those Provinces, and shall bring with him a greater Army than he had in the former War, the same which he brought out of the East, at his late Return from thence. 11:13: Ibid. 'After certain

Years'.] The Hebrew reads, 'At the end of Times, even Years': which Expression confirms the Interpretation given before of the Word Times in this Prophecy: See the Note upon Chap. 4:16. 11:13:

Ibid. 'And with much Riches'.] With abundant Supply of all necessary Provisions for an Army: and especially with Beasts of Burden for removing their Baggage: for that is the proper Sense of the Word 'Recush'.

11:14: 'And in those times many shall stand up against the King of the South'.] Antiochus King of Syria and Philip King of Macedon entered into a League, to divide the Dominions of Ptolemy Epiphanes King of Egypt, being then an Infant of six (6) Years of Age. Agathoclea his Father's Concubine, and her Brother Agaibocles, who managed everything under Ptolemy Philopator, were framing Projects to keep the Regency in their own Hands during the Minority of this Prince. And Scopas, one of his Generals, sometime afterwards formed a Design of usurping the Sovereignty over Egypt.

11:14: Ibid. 'Also the Robbers of thy People shall exalt themselves to establish the Vision, but they shall fall'.] The Apostates from the Jewish Law shall exalt themselves under the Favour of the King of Egypt and his Ministers, to accomplish what is said in the Writings of the Prophets concerning the Persecutions that should befall God's People, and the Punishments that should at length overtake those that forsake the Truth. These Apostates accordingly did fall, and were cut off by Antiochus; for in the ninth (9th) Year of Epiphanes's Reign, Antiochus made himself Master of Jerusalem, and cut off or drove from thence all those Jews that were of Ptolemy's Party, and bestowed particular Favours upon those that persevered in the Observance of the Law. Josephus Antiq lib. xii. cap. 3. gives us a Copy of Antiochus's Decree in favour of their Temple, and the Service therein performed, and to secure it from being profaned. 11:15:

'So the King of the North shall come, and take the most fenced Cities'.] Antiochus having vanquished the King of Egypt's Army under Scopas; at Paneas, near the Fountainhead of the River Jordan, he besieged and took first Sidon and Gaza, then all the other Cities of that District, viz. Abila, Samaria, and Gadara: and afterwards became Master of the whole Country. The Word (Sollelab) translated a 'Mount', does likewise signify Battering Engines for the throwing Stones, and such like offensive Artillery. See 2nd Kings 19:32, Jer. 32:24; 33:4. 11:15: Ibid. 'And the Arms of the South shall not withstand, neither his chosen People'.] Neither the King of Egypt's best Generals, such as Scopas, and others that came to relieve him, nor his choicest Troops, shall prevail or be able this own Will', &c.] No body being able to oppose him in Cæle-Syria or Palestine: Comp. Chap. 8:4, 7 and ver. 36. of this Chapter. 11:16:

Ibid. 'And he shall stand in the glorious Land, which by his Hand shall be consumed'.] He shall make himself Master of Judea: See the Note upon Chap. 8:9, which shall be consumed by the foraging and plundering of his Soldiers. Jerusalem itself receiving great Damages during the Siege of the Garrison which Scopas left there; as appears by Antiochus's Decree for repairing the Ruins of the City, in Josephus, ubi supra. In the Contests between the Kings of Syria and Egypt, Judea lying in the middle between o withstand Antiochus. 11:16: 'But he that cometh against him shall do according to them, whoever were Conquerors, that Country was sure to suffer: Josephus compares its Condition to that of a Ship in a Storm, which is beaten by the Waves on both Sides: Antiq. lib. xii. c. 3. init. The Greek Interpreter renders the former Part of the Sentence, 'And he shall stand in the Land of Sabi': which Dr. More in his Notes upon the Place, supposes to be a Name of the God of Israel: and I have offered some Arguments to support that Conjecture, in the Notes upon Jer. 3:19. 11:17: 'He shall also set his Face to enter with the Strength of his whole Kingdom'.] Antiochus will likewise design to invade Egypt with all his Forces, and make an entire Conquest of it. 11:17: Ibid. 'And upright ones with him'.] Or rather, 'And he shall make Agreements with him': 'Yesharim' here probably signifying the same as 'Mesharim' does ver. 6th: i.e. he shall make Proposals of concluding a Marriage between his own Daughter Cleopatra and King Ptolemy, to be consummated when they come of Age: which Offer made by Eucles of Rhodes was accepted, and a Contract fully agreed between them. 11:17: Ibid. 'Thus shall be do'.] Or, 'He shall succeed', as the Word is taken, ver. 28, 32. He shall succeed in this his Proposal. 11:17: Ibid. 'Giving him the Daughter of Women, corrupting her'.] In making this Proposal of Marriage, his Intent was that she should betray her Husband to him, and by that means become Master of Egypt. She is called the 'Daughter of Women', (kai exochën), by way of Excellence, either upon the Account of her Quality, or else because of her great Beauty. 11:17: Ibid. 'But she shall not stand on his Ride, neither be for him'.] When she was married to Ptolemy, she forsook the Interest of her Father, and embraced that of her Husband: and we find her joining with him in an Embassy to the Romans, to congratulate the Victory they had obtained over her own Father, as Dr. Prideaux observes out of Livy, lib. 37. See Script. Connect. part. 2. ad ann. C. 187. 11:18: 'After this he shall turn is Face unto the Isles, and shall take many'.] Antiochus shall set out a great Fleet for reducing the lesser Asia, which failing along the Coasts of Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, and Caria, took a great many of the Maritime Cities of those Provinces, and the Islands adjoining All Countries lying upon the Sea-Coasts are called Islands, in the Hebrew Dialect, as has been observed in the Notes upon Isa. 11:1.

11:18: Ibid. 'But a Prince for his own Behalf shall cause the Reproach offered by him to cease: without his own Reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him'.] Or, 'But a Prince shall cause to cease his [i. e. Antiochus's] Reproach against him: moreover he shall cause his Reproach to return upon him'. Compare Hos. 12:14. The particle 'Bilti', translated without, signifies likewise moreover: See Noldius, p. 202. Lucius Scipio the Roman Consul made the Reproach, which Antiochus had offered to the Romans by that Invasion, to return upon his own Head, by overthrowing him in Battle at Mount Sipylos, and forcing him to quit all the Conquests he had made in the Lesser Asia. From this great Victory, whereby Asia was delivered out of the Hands of Antiochus, this Scipio had the Sir-name of Asiaticus: This Action is at large related by Livy, in the 37th Book of his History. 11:19: 'Then he shall turn his Face toward the Fort of his own Land, but he shall stumble and fall'.] After this great Defeat, Antiochus returned back to Antioch, the chief Seat and Fortress of his Kingdom. From whence going into the Eastern Provinces, to raise the Money he was by Agreement to pay to the Romans, and attempting to rob the Temple at Elymais, for that Purpose, he was slain there, and never returned again into Syria. 11:19: Ibid. 'And not be found'.] An Expression, denoting utter Destruction: See Job 20:8, Psal. 37:36, Ezek. 26:21. 11:20: 'Then shall stand up in his Estate, a raiser of Taxes, in the Glory of the Kingdom'.] Seleucus Philopator, the Son of Antiochus, shall succeed in the Kingdom of Syria: Comp. ver. 7. His Father by the Treaty of Peace was obliged to pay a thousand (1,000) Talents for twelve (12) Years together to the Romans: and it was the main Business of his Son's Reign to raise this Money upon his Subjects. His Necessities put him upon offering to seize the Treasures which were laid up in the Temple at Jerusalem; for which attempt his Treasurer Heliodorus was miraculously punished, as the Story is told at large, 2nd Macc. 3:4, &c. 11:20: Ibid. 'But within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in Anger nor in Battle'.] Dr. Prideaux, Part. 2d of Script. Connect. at the End of the 2nd Book, translates this Sentence, 'Within few Years he shall be destroyed': The Word 'Yamim, Days', often signifying Years: which Sense suits better with the Event here foretold. For Seleucus reigned but eleven (11) Years, which may properly be called a few, in comparison of the thirty-seven (37) Years of his Father's Reign: and he came to his End neither by War abroad, nor by a Sedition at home, but was poisoned by Heliodorus his Treasurer, who designed to usurp the Kingdom to himself, as Appian relates it. 11:21: 'And in his Estate [or place] shall stand up a vile Person'.] This is a Description of Antiochus Epiphanes, the great Persecutor of the Jewish Nation and Religion: He is called here a vile Person, not for any want of Wit or Parts, but for the Extravagance of his Life and Actions, which made many doubt whether he had more of the Fool or the Mad-man in him: so instead of Epiphanes, the Illustrious, they called him Epimanes, the Mad-man. See the Fragments of the 26th Book of Polybius, p. 1492 of the Leyden Edition.

11:21: Ibid. 'To whom they shall not give the Honour of the Kingdom, but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the Kingdom, by Flatteries'.] The Right of Succession did belong to Demetrius, the Son of Seleucus Philopator, and Nephew to Antiochus: but he being sent an Hostage to Rome by his Father, Antiochus took advantage of his Absence, and by courting Eumenes King of Pergamus, and Attalus his Brother, with flattering Speeches and great Promises of Friendship and Assistance against the Romans, prevailed with them to stand by him against the Usurper Heliodorus, and so came peaceably into the Possession of the Kingdom. 11:22: 'And with the Arms of a Flood shall they be overflown from before him, and shall be broken'.] Compare ver. 19. Antiochus by the Assistance of Eumenes and Attalus, shall vanquish all the Forces that opposed his Pretensions, both those raised by the Usurper Heliodorus, and those which Cleopatra, Mother to Ptolemy Philometor, had got together to assist her Son's Right, as being Nephew to the deceased King Seleucus. 11:22: Ibid. 'Yea also the Prince of the Covenant'.] Onias the High-Priest, as several interpret it, whom they supposed to be meant by the Prince of the Host, Chap. 8:11, where the Prophet speaks of the Persecution of the Jews, of which the same Antiochus was the Author. This Onias was deposed and banished by him, and afterwards murdered by one of his Lieutenants, 2nd Macc. 4:10, 34. But the following Verse inclines me to think that Ptolemy Philometor is meant here, for he it is with whom the League there mentioned is made; and he was the principal Person that opposed Antiochus chiefly in his Pretension to Coele Syria and Palestine: in whose Name a War was carried on against Antiochus, the Success of which is foretold in the following Verses. 11:23: 'And after the League made with him, he shall work deceitfully', &c.] This League was made between Ptolemy Philometor and Antiochus in the Life-time of Cleopatra his Sister, and Mother of Ptolemy. But when the King of Egypt's Ministers demanded the Restitution of Cale-Syria, and Palestine, as belonging to the King of Egypt by Virtue of the Marriage-Articles between Ptolemy Epiphanes and Cleopatra, Antiochus, without any regard to the League he had made with Philometor his Nephew, marched his Army toward the Frontiers of Egypt, and having obtained a Victory over the Egyptian Army in a Battle fought between Mount Casius and Pelusium, he the next Year made himself Master of the greatest Part of Egypt, Philometor himself falling into his Hands: whom he pretended to take care of as his Nephew, and to manage his Affairs as his Tutor and Guardian. But this belongs to his second Expedition mentioned ver. 25. 11:23: Ibid. 'And shall become strong with a small People'.] His Forces then were but small, as St. Jerom observes out of Sutorius, an Historian extant in his Time: at least in comparison of those he brought with him in his second Expedition: See the Note upon ver. 25. 11:24: 'He shall enter peaceably into the fattest places of the province, and be shall do that which his Fathers have not done, nor his Fathers Fathers; he shall scatter among them the Prey, and Spoil, and Riches'.] 'By his Clemency toward the Egyptians, and civil Treatment of Philometor, he shall succeed in his Attempts upon Egypt, beyond all his Predecessors, the former Kings of Syria : viz. Antiochus Theus, Seleucus and the Attempts upon it, as Epiphanes: who miserably plundered the whole Country, and divided the Riches of it among his Followers: See 1st Macc. 1:19 St. Jerom in his Notes upon the place, and Athenæus, Deipnosophist. lib. v. and x. Epiphanes was in himself of a profuse and prodigal Temper, as the Author of the first Book of Maccabees, Chap. 3:30, and several other Historians agree in giving his Character, from whence he gained the Name of Munificent and Liberal, as Josephus informs us, Antiq. lib. xii. c. 11. 11:24: Ibid. 'And be shall forecast his Devices against the strongholds'.] He shall not only seize upon the richest Parts of Egypt, but shall likewise make himself Master of the chief Places of Strength in that Country, keeping Pelusium in his Hands, which was the Key of Egypt, and laying Siege unto Alexandria. 11:24: Ibid. 'Even for a time'.] . See ver. 27.

11:26: 'And be shall stir up his Power and his Courage against the King of the South with a great Army, &c.] The Preparations here described belong to Antiochus's second Expedition into Egypt, as the Author of the second (2nd) Book of Maccabees rightly calls it, Chap. 5:1 when he invaded that Country with great Forces both by Sea and Land, as that Expedition is described, 1st Mac. 1:17,18. where the Historian adds, that Ptolemy fled from him, and many of his Army were wounded to Death: thus they got the strong Cities in the Land of Egypt, and he took the Spoils thereof. After which Victory Ptolemy Philometor surrendred himself, into Antiochus's Hands; as was observed before: whereupon the Alexandrians set up his Brother upon the Throne, whom they sirnamed Euergetes. 11:26:

Ibid. and Ver. 26 [25]. 'But be shall not stand, for they shall forecast Devices against him: yea they that feed of the Portion of his Meat, shall destroy him'.] The ill success of Philometor's Expedition was chiefly owing to the Male-administration of Lenæus, Eulaeus, and other Ministers and Officers employed under him, and to the Treachery of Ptolemy Macron, who fosook Philometor's Interest, and went over to Antiochus. 11:26: Ibid. 'And his Army shall overflow'.] The Arms of Antiochus shall overrun the whole Kingdom of Egypt, like a sudden Inundation: See ver. 10, 22. 11:27: 'And both these (2) Kings Hearts shall be to do mischief: and they shall speak Lies at one (1) Table, but it shall not prosper'.] These two (2) Kings shall meet at Memphis, and frequently eat at the same Table as Friends. Antiochus pretending to take Care of the Interests, of his Nephew Philometor, especially after the Alexandrians had proclaimed his Brother Euergetes King: and Philometor seemingly confiding in his Uncle's Protection. But herein they both design'd to impose upon each other; Antiochus's Design being to seize the Kingdom of Egypt to himself, and Philometor's, to disappoint those Designs of his, by coming to an Agreement with Euergetes and the Alexandrians. So this pretended Friendship broke out into open War, wherein Antiochus subdued all the Country as far as Memphis, and march'd to Alexandria to besiege that City. 11:27: Ibid. 'For yet the End shall be at the time appointed'.] These Wars and Calamities are not yet come to an End, but shall be determin'd at the Time of God's Appointment. See ver. 29, 35, 36. Chap. 8:19. 11:28: 'Then shall he return into his Land with great Riches'.]

Having taken the Spoils of Egypt, 1st Mac. 1:19. See the Note upon ver. 24. This Return of Antiochus into his own Dominions, is the same which is again mentioned at the End of the Verse: So the Sense might be more clearly expressed thus: Then shall he return into his Land with great Riches, having had his Heart stirred up against the Holy Covenant, and having finished his Designs, he shall even return into his own Land. 11: 28: Ibid. 'And his Heart shall be against the Holy Covenant'.] While Antiochus was in Egypt, a false Report was spread over Judea that he was dead, where upon Jason with his Party made himself Master of Jerusalem, in order to regain the Office of High-Priest, from which he had been turned out by the Fraud of his Brother Menelaus. Upon this, Antiochus supposing the whole Nation had revolted from him, marched with all haste out of Egypt into Judea, to quell this Rebellion: and taking Jerusalem by force of Arms, he slew forty thousand (40,000) of the Inhabitants in three (3) Days time, profaned the Temple, and took away all its Ornaments and Treasures. See 1st Mac. 1:20, —28, 2nd Macc. 4:23, 24, 5:11–20. 11:28: Ibid. 'And he shall do Exploits, and return into his own Land'.] Or, 'having finished his Designs, he shall return', &c. See the last Note but one (1), and Comp. ver. 30, 32. Chap. 8:12. After having satisfied his Revenge upon the Jews, he shall return to Antioch, the chief Seat of his Empire, with the Spoils of the Temple at Jerusalem; (beside those of Egypt) amounting to eighteen hundred (1800) Talents: 2nd Mac. 5:21. 11:29. 'At the time appointed he shall return, and come toward the South, but it shall not be as the former, or as the latter'.] Antiochus shall make a third (3rd) Expedition into Egypt, in order to reduce Alexandria: but this Attempt shall not be attended with the same Success as the two former, for the Reason mentioned in the next Verse. 11:30: 'For Ships of Chittim shall come against him, therefore he shall be grieved and return'.] The Ambassadors Popillius Lænas and his Companions coming in Ships from the Coasts of Macedonia and Greece, shall come to him, bringing peremptory Demands from the Romans, that he should desist from making War against Egypt, otherwise they would denounce War against him. This Message will make him, to his great Grief, return out of Egypt, and quit his Designs upon that Country. The Isles of Chittim, Jer. 2:10, Ezek. 27:6. signify the Coasts of the Mediterranean Sea, so as to comprehend both Italy and Greece. 11:30: Ibid. 'And have Indignation against the Holy Covenant'.] Being enraged at this Disappointment, he shall vent his Fury and Indignation against the Jewish Church and Nation: and send Apollonius with an Army of seventy-two thousand (72,000) Men to lay Jerusalem waste, and cause the Temple-Worship to cease there: this happened two (2) Years after the first taking of Jerusalem by Antiochus. Comp. 1st Maccab. 1:29-40 with 2nd Maccab. 5:24, 25, 26. 11:30: Ibid. 'So shall he do, [or, he shall prosper in his Undertakings: See ver. 28.] and shall return and have Intelligence with them that forsake the Holy Covenant'.]. At his Return from Egypt, he shall practise with the Deserters of the Jewish Religion, such as Menelaus and the like Apostates, and make use of them as Instruments in making Converts to Heathenism. See 1st Macc. 1:43, 52, 2nd Macc. 5:15. 11:31: 'And Arms shall stand on his part, and they shall prophane the Sanctuary of Strength, and shall take away the daily Sacrifice'.] His Arms shall so prevail, as to make an entire Conquest over the Jews, to prophane the Temple, and cause the Service daily performed there to cease: Comp. Chap. 8:11. and 1st Maccab. 1:39, &c. 2nd Maccab. 5:2-5. The Temple is called the Sanctuary of Strength, because it was a Token of the divine Protection, being the Place of God's especial Residence. See Psal. 88:61; 96:6, Ezek. 24:21, 25. 11:31: Ibid. 'And they shall place the Abomination that maketh Desolate'.] Idols are commonly called Abominations in Scripture, as hath been observed upon Chap. 9:27. In agreement with that Usage of the Word, The Abomination of Desolation must signify the Idol which was placed upon the Altar of Burnt-Offerings: See 1st Maccab. 1:54, 59. As the Temple itself was dedicated by the Heathen to Jupiter Olympius, 2nd Maccab. 6:2. so the Idol was probably the Image of Jupiter. This Idol is said to make Desolate, because it banished the true Worship of God, and his Worshippers from the Place: See 1st Macc. 4:38. 11:32: 'And such as do wickedly against the Covenant, shall be corrupt by Flatteries'.] Such as Jason and Menelaus, who had bought the High-Priesthood of him, and became his Instruments in spoiling and prophaning the Temple. See 2nd Macc. 4:13,14; 5:15 and such other Apostates whom the King by fair Words and Promises brought over to comply with his Designs. See 1st Macc. 1:52, 2nd Macc. 6:21. 11:32: Ibid. 'But the People that do know their God, shall be strong, and do Exploits'.] Or, 'shall prosper': See ver. 28, 30. They that have a Sense of their Duty shall courageously resist these Attempts, and behave themselves valiantly. See 1st Maccab. 1:62; 2:41, 42,43; 3:43, 44, &c. 2nd Maccab. 5:27. 11:33: 'They that understand among the People, shall instruct many'.] They that know their Duty, and are zealous in doing it, will arm others against the Temptations whereby the Wicked would persuade them to forsake the true Religion. Such were Mattathias and his Family, 1st Macc. 2:1, &c. Eleazar, 2nd Maccab. 6:18,19 and the Mother and her seven (7) Children, 2nd Macc. 7. 11:33: Ibid. 'Yet they shall fall by the Sword'.] It was Death for any Person to observe the Law, and disobey the King's Command: and accordingly many suffer'd for their constancy in adhering to their Religion. See 1st Macc. 1:50, 63, 2nd Macc. 6:6, 9,10,11, 19, 30; 7:1, &c. Ibid. 'And by Flame'.] This was remarkably verified in the Torments inflicted upon the seven Brethren, recorded 2nd Macc. 7:3, 5. Burning alive was a Punishment usual in those Countries: See Chap. 3:6. 11:33: Ibid. 'By Captivity and by Spoil'.] By Banishment and Loss of Goods." 11:33: Ibid. 'Many Days'.] For three (3) Years and a half (1/2), as the time is computed by Josephus, reckoning from the first Beginning of the Persecution till the Sanctuary was cleansed: See the Note upon Chap. 7:25. The Persecution may be enlarged to a longer time, if we date it from the Beginning of this Apostacy. See the Note upon Chap. 8:14. 11:34: 'Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help'.] That of Judas Maccabeus and his Followers : See 1st Macc. 3:10, &c. 4:14, 2nd Macc. 8:1. 11:34: Ibid. 'But many shall cleave to them with Flatteries'.] Not sincerely: Such were Joseph and Azarias, who engaged in the common Cause out of Ambition, and a desire of Fame: 1st Macc. 5:56, 62. Such were they who after their Death were found with Idols consecrated under their Cloaths, 2nd Macc. 12:40. Such was Rhodocus, who disclosed their Secrets to the Enemy, ibid. Chap. 13:21. 11:35: 'And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge them, and to make them white'.] Some of the principal Men for Piety and Knowledge, shall fall under this Persecution: See ver. 33 for the Trial of their Faith and Patience, and to purge them from lesser Corruptions, which are the usual Effects of Prosperity. Comp. 1st Pet. 1:7. The Persecutions which shall befall the Church under Antichrist, are designed for the same Purpose, as appears by comparing Chap. 12:10 with the Words here: Antiochus's Persecution being a Type and Figure of that under Antichrist. See the Note upon Chap. 8:14, 23,24 and the 31st Verse here, with Chap. 12:11: 11:35: Ibid. 'Even to the time of the End, for it is yet for a time appointed'.] Till the Time appointed by God for an End of those Calamities shall come. Comp. ver. 27. Chap. 8:19. Mr. Mede refers the latter Part of the Sentence to the following Verse, and so connects the following Prophecy with what went before, to this Sense: "This Persecution shall last to the time of the End: for as yet for a time appointed a King shall do according to his Will." See his Works, p. 903. [To the same Sense the vulgar Latin translate it, 'Quia adhuc aliud tempus erit' ['because it's still for another time'].] 11:36: 'And the King shall do according to his Will'.] Antiochus was a Type and Forerunner of Antichrist, as hath been observed: So the Angel makes a sudden Transition from the Type of Antichrist himself: the Words in the four (4) following Verses being not at all applicable to Antiochus. And several Passages in the twelfth (12th) Chapter shew that some Parts of this Prophecy belong to the latter times, or Ages of the World. See Dr. Prideaux, Part 2d, B. 3d toward the End. We may observe such a sudden Transition in our Saviour's Discourse, Mat. 24 from a Prediction of the Destruction of Jerusalem, to a Description of the General Judgment. 11:36: Ibid. 'The [or, a] Kings shall do according to his Will, [see ver. 16.] and he shall exalt himself and magnify himself above every God, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods'.] Comp. Chap. 7:25; 8:11, 25. St. Paul describes Antichrist almost in the same Words, 2nd Thess. 2:4 'who exalteth himself above all that is called God'. Comp. Rev. 13:5, 6. 11:36: Ibid. 'And shall prosper till the Indignation be accomplished', &c.] He shall succeed in his Attempts of aggrandizing himself, and asserting his own Supremacy, till the Time of God's Indignation be accomplished, Comp. ver. 27, 35. i.e. for a Time, Times, and a Half, as it is expressed, Chap. 7:25; 12:7.

11:37: 'Neither shall he regard the God of his Fathers'.] Antichrist is described as the Seventh (7th) Head of the Roman Empire, Rev. 17:11 and as the Sixth (6th) Head revived, ibid. & Chap. 13:3, 14. But before he arrived at his Dominion, the Worship of the Heathen 'Gods', which had prevailed under the sixth (6th) Head, was destroyed by the Christian Emperors. 11:37: Ibid. 'Nor the Desire of Women'.] Mr. Mede hath observed in his Works, p. 668., that the Expression properly signifies a Desire of Hives, i.e. of a married State, which should be discountenanced by the King here described. In like Manner Forbidding to marry is a Character of some Anti-Christian Teachers, 1st Tim. 4:3. The Word Desire signifies that Affection which married Persons have for each other. See Gen. 3:16, Cant. 7:10, Ezek. 24:16. 11:37: Ibid. 'Nor regard any God, for he shall magnify himself above all'.] He will dispense with the Laws of God, and make Religion subservient to his own Greatness and Interest.

11:38: 'But in his Estate shall he honour the 'God' of Forces'.] I prefer Mr. Mede's Translation of this and the following Verse, as giving a clearer Sense and more agreeable to the Original: This Verse he thus interprets: 'But, (or for) together with God in his Seat shall he honour Mauzzims'. This last Word, both the Greek, the Vulgar Latin, and several other Translations retain without interpreting it. The Word imports Protection, or a Protector, the Abstract being often used for the Concrete: See Psal. 27:1; 28:8;

31:3, 5 and is often render'd ('hyperaspistēs [lit.= over-shield, shield covering, protection, champion, etc.]) [compare Erasmus' Hyperaspistes (1526): Luther's Anti-Traditional Elements], by the LXX (70). The same learned Person supposes the Word here to denote Saints and Angels, in whom the Votaries of the Church of Rome place a great Trust and Confidence, and fly to their Protection in their Distress, and assign to some of them the Patronage of whole Countries, as is more fully expressed in the following Verse. To these, saith this Interpretation of the Text, shall the King here described give Honour and Worship in the Places dedicated to the Service of that 'God' whom his Fathers knew not; as it follows, Ibid. 'And a 'God' whom his Fathers knew not shall he honour with Gold and Silver', &c.] Mr. Mede translates the Sentence thus: 'Even together with the God whom his Fathers knew not (see ver. 37.) shall he honour [them] with Gold and Silver', &c. i.e. with the most costly Ornaments. 11:38: Ibid. 'And pleasant Things'.] The Hebrew Word 'Hamudoth', is used by the Prophet Isaiah, Chap 44:9 to signify the costly Ornaments wherewith the Heathens decked their Images. Grotius and some others explain this Verse of Antiochus's setting up the Statue of Jupiter Olympius within the Precincts of the Temple, 1st Macc. 1:54, 2nd Macc. 6:1. But I do not apprehend how he can be called a 'God' whom Antiochus's Father knew not, since he was worshipped under the Name of Baal by the Phœnicians many Ages before. 11:39: 'Thus shall he do in the most strongholds with a strange 'God''.] According to Mr. Mede, the Words should be thus translated: 'And he shall make the strongholds [or For tresses] of the Mauzzims jointly with [or to] the strange [or foreign] 'God'': i.e. He shall consecrate his Temples and religious Places jointly to the Honour of God and of his Saints. Temples may fitly be called 'strong Holds', or Places of Defence, as being in the Opinion of those that pay their Devotions there, the Earnests of that Protection which they expect in answer to their Prayers. So the Jewish Temple is called the Sanctuary of Strength, ver. 31. of this Chapter, the Word 'Mauz' being used in both Places, Comp. Psal. 27:5. A strange 'God' in the Old Testament, usually signifies a false God: but the Phrase being here used in opposition to the 'Gods' who were worshipped by the Gentile Ancestors of the Romans, it may properly denote the true God, whom the Athenians called by the Name of a strange 'God', Acts 17:23. For the entire Inscription of that Altar St. Paul takes Notice of here, is supposed to be, 'To the unknown and strange 'God'': whom St. Paul tells them, they ignorantly worshipped, as not knowing him to be the one supreme God. 11:39: Ibid. 'And he shall cause them to rule over many, and shall divide the Land for Gain'.] Or, 'distribute the Earth for a Reward': i.e. he shall assign whole Provinces and Kingdoms to the Protection of several Saints and Angels, to whom they may have Recourse as their Patrons: and shall give them suitable Titles and Honours, as a Reward of their Care and Protection. 11:40: 'And at the Time of the End'.] At God's appointed Time: See ver. 35. or, in the latter Days: See Chap. 12:8. 11:40: Ibid. 'Shall the King of the South push at him, and the King of the North shall come against him'.] They that understand this and the following Verses of Antiochus Epiphanes and Ptolomy Philometor, suppose that the Angel recapitulates what he said before at large, from ver. 23. 'Tis certain these and the following Words can't be explained of any farther Wars between the Kings of Egypt and Syria: for Antiochus never made any farther Attempt upon Egypt, after that peremptory Demand of the Roman Ambassador, requiring him to desist from that Enterprize, mentioned ver. 30. Whereupon venting all his Indignation against the Jews upon that Disappointment, he afterwards took a Journey into Persia, where he died: 1st Macc. 6:1–6. 2nd Macc. 9:1–28. These Difficulties attending the common Interpretation, Mr. Mede, p. 674, and 816, by the 'King of the South' understands the Saracens, and by the 'King of the North', the Turks, who should both at different Times afflict the Western Parts of the World, where he supposes the Seat of Antichrist to be: the being denoted by the Locusts, Rev. 9:3 and the latter by the Euphratean Horsemen described in the same Chapter, ver. 15,16, &c. as two (2) Woes or Plagues sent to chastise the corrupt Part of Christendom, ver. 12. The Saracen is called the 'King of the South', because that People were Inhabitants of Arabia Felix, which lay Southward of Palestine, whereas the Turks were originally Tartars or Scythians. 11:40: Ibid. 'Shall come against him as a Whirlwind'.] Comp. Isa. 21:1, Zech. 9:14. 11:40: Ibid. 'With Chariots and

Horsemen']. This answers the Description given of them in the fore-mentioned Place, Rev. 9:16. And the Army of Gog and Magog, which may probably mean the Turks, is described as consisting principally of Horsemen: Ezek. 38:4, 15. The Strength of the Turkish Armies consists chiefly in the Number of their Cavalry: which makes them carry an Horse-Tail before their chief Officers, as an Ensign of Honour. 11:40: Ibid. 'And shall overflow and past over'.] See Ver. 10, 22. 11:41: 'He shall also enter into the glorious Land'.] The Land of Judea: See ver. 16. and Chap. 8:9. If we understand this of Antiochus Epiphanes, his Invasion of Judea hath been described at large, ver. 31, &c. If we expound it of the Turk, with Mr. Mede, he hath had Possession of the Holy Land for several Ages. 11:41: Ibid. 'But these shall escape out of his Hand, even Edom and Moab, and the chief of the Children of Ammon'.] Grotius expounds the Words to this Sense: that Antiochus did not make War upon these People, because they readily complied with his Commands, and joined with him against the Jews: for which Cause Judas Maccabeus made War upon them, 1st Mac. v. 3,4. Mr. Mede understands the Words of Arabia Petraca, whose Inhabitants were never subdued by the Turks. 11: 42, 43: 'And the Land of Egypt shall not escape, but he shall have Power over the Treasures of Gold and Silver, and over all the precious Things of Egypt'.] If we understand this of Antiochus, the Notes upon ver. 24. shew how it has been compleated. Mr. Mede expounds the Words of the final Conquest of Egypt by the Turks, A.C. 1517 after it had held out against them for a great while under the Mamulukes. 11:43: 'And the Libyans and Ethiopians shall be at his Steps'.] Shall readily obey him, and follow his Commands, Comp. Exod. 11:8, Judg. 4:10, 1st Kings 20:10. Cushim is here rightly translated Ethiopians, being joined with Libyans or Africans, as they are in some other Places: See 2nd Chron. 12:3; 16:8 and the Note upon Jer. 13:23. St. Jerom observes upon the Place, that it is not recorded of Antiochus Epiphanes, that he ever marched so far as into these Countries, or had any footing there. So Mr. Mede more probably expounds the Place of the Turks, who have extended their Dominions into these Parts of the World. 11:44: 'But tidings out of the East, and out of the North shall trouble him'.] This Dr. Prideaux explains of Antiochus thus: That in the East, i.e. in Persia, his Taxes were not duly paid, which engaged him to take a Journey into Persia, to gather up the Arrears due to him there. And in the North, Artaxias King of Armenia, had revolted from him. They that understand the Words of later Times, suppose them not yet fulfilled, and so not capable of a certain Interpretation. 11:45: 'And he shall plant the Tabernacles of his Palace between the Seas, in the glorious holy Mountain'.] If we apply the Words to Antiochus, the Sense will be, that he shall place the Ensigns of his Sovereignty as a Conqueror at Jerusalem: (Com. ver. 41, Psal. 48:2.) which City was placed upon a Mountainous Situation, between the Mediterranean Sea, and the Sea of Sodom, near the middle of Judea, which had those two Seas for its Boundaries: See Joel 2:20, Zech. 14:8. To plant the Tabernacle of his Palace or Pavilion at Jerusalem, is an Expression denoting an entire Conquest, and is applied to Nebuchadnezzar in that Sense, Jer. 43:10, where the Hebrew Word 'Shaphrir', translated 'Pavilion', is expounded in the Chaldee Paraphrase by 'Apadan', the Word used in the Text here. The 'holy Mountain' oftentimes denotes the 'Christian Church' in the prophetical Writings: See the Note upon Isa. 2:2 and if we apply this Text to Antichrist, we may compare it with the Boasts of that proud Prince, who is supposed to be the Figure of Antichrist, Isa. 14:13 where he saith, 'I will sit in the midst of the Congregation, in the Sides of the North': and we may explain both these Texts by those Words of St. Paul, who describes 'Antichrist as sitting in the Temple of God', 2nd Thess. 2:4 meaning the Christian Church, as that Phrase commonly signifies in St. Paul's Writings: See 1st Cor. 3:16, 2nd Cor. 6:16, Eph. 2:20. 1st Tim. 3:15. 11:45: Ibid. 'Yet he shall come to his End, and none shall help him'.] He shall be broken without Hand, i.e. by a Judgment immediately inflicted by God, as is said of Antiochus, Chap. 8:25. The like Judgment is denounced against Antichrist. 2nd Thess. 2:8. }}

{{ Chapter 12: (See Chapter 10 Argument): 12:4. 'But thou, O Daniel, shut up the Words, and seal the Book, even to the time of the End'.] To shut up a Book, and to seal it, is the fame with concealing the Sense of it, and hiding its Meaning from common Understandings; as hath been observed upon Chap. 8:26. And the same Reason is assigned in both Places for this Command, viz. because there would be a long Interval of Time between the Date of the Prophecy, and the final Accomplishment of it. Comp. Chap. 10:1. with both these Texts. But the nearer that Time approached, the more Light should Men have for understanding the Prophecy itself; as is implied in the following Words: 12:4: Ibid. 'Many shall run to and fro, and Knowledge shall be increased.] Many shall be inquisitive after Truth, and keep correspondence with others for their better Information: and the gradual Completion of this, and other Prophecies, shall direct observing Readers to form a Judgment concerning those Particulars which are yet to be fulfilled. From hence we may learn the Reason of the Obscurity of several Prophecies in Scripture: and it may be observed, that generally those Prophecies are most obscure, the Time of whose Completion is furthest off. For the same Reason, in interpreting the Prophecies relating to the latter Times of the World, the Judgment of the latter Writers is to be preferr'd before that of the Antients; because the Moderns living nearer the Times when the Events were to be fulfilled, had surer Marks to guide them in their Expositions. Bishop Andrews hath a remarkable Passage to this purpose, in his Tortura Torti, p. 186. in the following Words: 'Neque vero mirum, fi ista quædixi, [de Roma fede Antichristi] tam vel claram, vel certam interpretationem in scriptis Patrum non habeant. Signatus adhuc erat liher Prophetiae: verisimum autem verbum est, anigma esse Prophetiam omnem cum nondum completa est: ut quamvis Prisci illi omni genere charismatum, vitæ vero sansimonia longonos intervallo superarint, mirari tamen non de beat quis, si non illis tum adeo explicita omnia suerint, quam nobis per Dei gratiam jam sunt, qui consummatam jam Prophetiam illam quctidie oculis usurpamus'. "It is no wonder, that what I have said concerning Rome's being the Seat of Antichrist described by St. John, is not clearly asserted in the Commentaries of the antient Fathers upon the Revelation; that Book of Prophecy was then sealed: and it is a certain Rule, that every Prophecy is a Riddle before its Completion: so that tho' we grant those ancient Worthies to have far exceeded us, both in Gifts, and in Holiness; yet it is not to be wondred, if they had not such clear Apprehensions concerning this Matter, as we of later Times have, by the Grace of God, attained, who see this Prophecy every Day "fulfilled in our Sight."'

12:11: 'And from the time that the daily Sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate shall be set up'.] The same Expressions made use of to describe Antiochus's Persecution, Chap. 11:31 are here applied to the Desolations made by Antichrist, of which the former was a Figure. See the Note upon Chap. 8:14, 23,24 and Chap. 11:26. 12:11: Ibid. and Ver. 12. 'There shall be a thousand, two hundred and ninety (1290) Days : Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty five (1335) Days.'] Here the Time allotted for the Persecutions of Antichrist, till the Church be entirely cleansed and purified, is enlarged from 1260 Days, denoted by time, times, and a half, ver. 7 to 1290 Days; and then to 1335 Days. Mr. Mede wisely forbears giving an Interpretation of these Particulars, telling us, that Time would make them manifest: See his Works, p. 674. However, we may venture to say in general, that there may be a considerable Space of Time between the Fall of Antichrist, and the last Judgments which shall be inflicted upon him. Some learned Men, who have compared the Prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation together, suppose the Interval of Time between the 1260 Days, and the 1335 Days, to be included within the Times of the seventh Trumpet, during which, the seven last Plagues will be fulfilled. See Rev. 11:15, 18 and Chap. 15:1, 7,8. }}

5. Stuart.

CommentaryBookDaniel.MosesStuart.Bost.CB.1850.gs

Commentary on the Book of Daniel. by Moses Stuart. Boston. Crocker & Brewster. 1850.gs

{{ Preface: While engaged In writing my Commentary on the Apocalypse, I found myself so often remitted to the book of Daniel, for the sake of illustration, that I of necessity was obliged to study that book with more than ordinary care and diligence. It was natural for me, in the course of an often repeated study of the book, to contract a fondness for it, or at least to take a deep interest in it. When I had completed my apocalyptic labors, and acquitted myself of some engagements which followed them, I began the study of Daniel anew, and with a view to the writing of a Commentary on it.....As to the book of Daniel itself, I believe that no other of the scriptural books, the Apocalypse excepted, has called forth such a variety of discrepant opinions and interpretations. How can I agree with all of them ? And yet the great mass of readers are ready to say, each one for himself, that I ought to agree with him.....What happened then, may and probably will happen now. I have not come to the conclusion, that Daniel has said, or knew, anything about the Pope and his Cardinals. This will be enough to pass sentence of condemnation. Do manus. I can have no dispute with criticism like this. Of all the books in the Bible, except perhaps the Apocalypse, Daniel has been least understood, and most perverted and abused. I will bide my time, and wait with patience to see, whether this will be conceded and myself justified in the attempt to vindicate its true meaning.....M. Stuart. Andover, May 24, 1850.

Contents of Subjects Specially Discussed: Commentary. Excursus. (Chapters, Verses).

Chronological Errors.

Alleged Error in Respect to Dates.

Chaldees.

Nebuchadnezzar's Golden Image.

Names of Musical Instruments.

Demeanor of Three Martyrs in Furnace.

Nebuchadnezzar's Proclamation.

Watchers & Holy Ones.

Great Babylon Built by Nebuchadnezzar.

Various Alleged Incongruities in Chap. 4.

Alleged Incongruities in Chap. 5.

Alleged Incongruities in Chap. 6.

Four Great Empires in Chap. 8. seq.

Fourth Beast.

Punishment of Fourth Beast.

Time, & Times, & Dividing of Time.

2300 Evening-Mornings.

Various Modes in which Four Dynasties are Described.

Fasting of Daniel, & Nature of Seventy Weeks.

Seven Weeks & Sixty-Two Weeks of 9:25.

Winged-Fowl of Abominations in 9:27.

Various Modes of Interpreting 9:24-27.

Conspectus of Hebrew in 9:24-27, & Five Translations.

Guardian Angels of Nations..324

General Resurrection as Developed in 12:2.

Critical History & Defense:

- § 1. Personal History of Daniel.
- § 2. Nature & Design of Book.
- § 3. Style & Aesthetical Character.
- § 4. Language & Idiom.
- § 5. Unity of Book or Sameness of Authorship.
- § 6. Genuineness & Authenticity.
- § 7. Objections against Genuineness, etc.
- § 8. Ancient Versions of Book of Daniel.
- § 9. Apocryphal Additions to Daniel.
- § 10. Leading Commentaries & Critical Disquisitions.

[Chap. 1. Early history of Daniel. Siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, capture of Jehoiakim, and deportation of a part of the vessels of the temple to Babylon; vs. 1,2. Daniel with some of his companions is selected by the king's overseer to be trained up in the Chaldee manner, for the personal service of the king; Babylonish names are given to the young Hebrews, and they are supported from the king's table, vs. 3-7; Daniel makes earnest request that he and his companions may have liberty to adopt a simple vegetable diet, so that they may not defile themselves with the royal viands; he obtains liberty, and thrives remarkably well under his new regimen; vs. 8 -16. All four of the Hebrew children make unusual progress in knowledge; but Daniel is endowed by God with uncommon sagacity and knowledge, and becomes able to interpret visions and dreams: v. 17. At the end of three years, Daniel and his companions are brought before the king, and they are found to be far more intelligent and sagacious than any of the Chaldean astrologers; vs. 18-20. The 21st verse contains an indication of Daniel's long continuance at court, even until the restoration of the Hebrews to Palestine, during the first year of Cyrus's reign. In other words, Daniel, in person, was a witness to the beginning and end of the Jewish exile.]

Chap. I. 1. In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah, came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon to Jerusalem, and besieged it.

(bishnath shalosh), lit. 'in the year of three'. This is the usual method of expressing time in this book; see 1:21; 2:1; 7:1 (Chald.); 8:1; 9:1. So frequently elsewhere, e.g. 2nd K. 12:2; 13:1; 15:1; al. The Hebrew usually employs 'cardinal' numbers (1-10) for 'ordinals', when 'years' or 'days' are reckoned, Roed. Heb. Gramm. § 118, 4 e.g. the construct form of the noun designating 'year', etc. (as in the case before us), is often employed, comp. Gramm. § 118, 4. —(lemalkuth), 'of the reign', the Gen. in such a case being ordinarily marked by prefixing (le), when it is preceded by numerals; Roed. Gramm. § 113. 2. c. —(yehudah), first the name of Jacob's oldest son, and (after the exile) employed also for the name of the Jewish country as it is here. —(bo') came. Hengstenberg (Authent. Dan. p. 61) translates it 'zog', i.e. 'proceeded', or 'set out', viz. upon an expedition. But the sequel (and besieged it) shows, that the usual sense of (bo') (= erchomai) must here be attached to the word; and so I have rendered it in the version above —The name (nebukadnetzar) is probably composed of (nebo) = 'Mercury', who was worshipped by the Babylonians, (Aramaic)(chodan) = 'deus', and (sar) = 'prince', i.e. the name means 'prince of the god Nebo', or Mercury, i.e. belonging to him, and so of high rank. —(waiyatzar) (either Imperf. Hiph. of the root (tzarar), or the Imperf. Kal of (tzur), the 'Pattah' of the final syllable being adopted because of the final (r), Roed. Gr. § 22. 2.a and 5. Moreover, a shortened Imperf. and a retracted accent are normal here, Gramm. § 48. b., 2.b. The ('al) (with Suff. it becomes ('aley)) lit. means 'against'; but here it qualifies the preceding verb, and the construction resembles Isa. 7:1, (hillathem). ('al) is usually found after this verb in the sense of 'besieging', Lex. (tzur) No. 2. (the more probable stem.)

1:2. And the Lord gave into his hand Jehoiakim king of Judah and a part of the vessels of the house of God, and he brought them to the land of Shinar, to the house of his 'god', and the vessels he carried to the treasure house of his 'god'.

(beyado), 'into' or 'in his hand', very frequently employed by the Hebrews to designate the idea of 'putting in one's power' or 'at his disposal'. As to the fact of the invasion itself, comp. 2nd K. 24:1. — (miqtzath), 'a part of', (qetzath) is an abridged form of (qetza'th) = (qtzeeth), from (qatzah). It is disputed whether (mi) is a prefix-formative here or a preposition. I regard it as being the latter, i.e. as derived from (min), the Daghes which we should expect in the (q) being omitted, because it would make the Sheva vocal under this letter in case of its insertion; Gr. § 20. 3. b. This usage of omitting Daghes in such cases, is not unfrequent. Comp. the same word, although with a sense somewhat diverse, in Dan. 1:15, 18. Here the 'form' is the same, and (mi) is unquestionably a 'preposition' in both these cases. So in Neh. 7:70, comp. Ps. 135:7. In 2nd Chron. 36:7, the same idea as here is expressed simply by (mikeley), 'a part of the vessels', instead of (miqtzath keley) as in our text. But the passage in 2nd Chron., I cannot well doubt, describes the 'second' invasion of Palestine by Nebuchadnezzar, at the close of Jehoiakim's reign, when this king was put in chains to be carried to Babylon, and probably died in this condition, Jer. 22:18,19; 36:30. Still the occasion and the transaction are of the like nature with those which pertain to the first invasion. At the first invasion, Nebuchadnezzar, who made Jehoiakim the Jewish king tributary to him, rifled the temple of only a 'part' of its treasures; at the second, he took away another portion of them, 2nd Chron. 36:7. At the third, he repeated the same thing on a more extensive scale, 2nd K. 24:13. At the fourth and final invasion under Zedekiah, when the temple was destroyed, all its treasures were carried away, together with king Zedekiah, his family, and his court, 2nd K. 25: 6—20. A part of these treasures were brought back under Cyrus, Ezra 1:7; and the rest under Darius, Ezra 6:5. (yaibiam) 'and he brought them' —who? where? The vessels and Jehoiakim, (for the verb of itself with its suffix might easily have this meaning), or only the vessels? The latter only, as the sequel shows; for surely he did not bring Jehoiakim and 'put him in the treasure-house of his 'god'. As the actual coming of Jehoiakim to Babylon is not here mentioned, it is probable that he died on the way, after he was taken captive and bound in fetters, 2nd Chron. 36:6; see and comp. Jer. 22:18,19; 36:30. — 'Land of Shinar' is the old name for the province of Babylon; see in Gen. 10:10; 11:2; Isa. 11:11; Zech. 5: 11, the last two cases seem to be a kind of poetic use. The origin of the name has not yet been developed. — 'And the same vessels did he bring to the house of his 'god', is a literal rendering of the last part of the verse. As to the version above, we may render the second (hebi') by 'deposited', (Sept. (apëreisato), 'safely conveyed' or 'carried'), which will preserve the sense, and avoid a seeming tautology in case we here render it 'brought'. In fact, (waiyitnem) often means 'introduced', (eispherein) (Sept.), and corresponds to (waiyitnem), and 'he put' or 'deposited them', in 2nd Chron. 36:7. The writer first designates, generally, the deportation of a part of the vessels to Babylon, and then he names the particular locality where they were there deposited. He had special reasons for so doing, in reference to a part of his subsequent history; see Dan. 5:3,4, 23. Besides, the clause in question leads us to see, that the vessels were in safe keeping, and that Nebuchadnezzar's motive was probably to make acceptable presents (anathēmata), as the Greeks called them in such cases), to his 'god' Belus —a thank-offering for the victories he had won, and at the same time an evidence of his glorying that Belus was more powerful than the God of the Hebrews. The famous temple of Belus, at Babylon, is known to all. That the vessels were put into the 'treasure-house' shows, moreover, both the precaution taken for their safe-keeping and the value attached to them. All the temples of antiquity had treasure-houses, from which the priests were supported; see Num. 31:48-54, Josh. 6:19. Comp. Mal. 3:10, Neh. 13:5, 12, 18.....

Excursus I: Alleged Errors in Dates: —On the alleged discrepancy between Daniel 1: 1 and Jer. 25: 1, and some other passages.

The charge of 'historical incorrectness' against the writer of the book of Daniel, rests partly upon some 'dates of time', and partly upon some 'historical occurrences'. I shall first examine the allegation of error in respect to the designation of 'Time'. In Dan. 1:1 it is said that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, came up against Jerusalem, besieged it, took Jehoiakim captive, and rifled the temple of a part of its furniture, 'in the third year of Jehoiakim'. In Jer. 25:1 it is explicitly said, that the 'first' year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign was the 'fourth' year of Jehoiakim's. Moreover, in Jer. 46:2 it is said that king Nebuchadnezzar smote Carchemish on the Euphrates, then in possession of Pharaoh-Necho king of Egypt, in the same 'fourth' year of Jehoiakim. Taking all these passages into view, it is alleged that the writer of the book of Daniel could not have lived in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, when the true date of the invasion of Palestine by that king must necessarily have been well known; but at a subsequent period, when the chronology of these events was more obscure, and when he might be misled by erring tradition. That period is placed, by most of the recent critics belonging to the so called 'liberal' School, near to the close of the Maccabaeen times, with the history of which, as they aver, the book of Daniel concludes.

As this has been, of late, an almost uniform assertion among critics of the new School, and has been placed in the front rank of objections against the genuineness of the book of Daniel, it becomes necessary to give it an attentive examination. Lengerke says of it, in his recent Commentary on this book, that "all attempts to remove this objection have to the present hour been frustrated. . . . Not only is the 'date' wrong, but the 'deportation' [of captives] under Jehoiakim remains at least unproved ;" p. 2 seq.

The documents which must guide our inquiries, are a fragment of Berosus (preserved by Josephus), and several brief passages in the Hebrew Scriptures. These are all the historical data on which we can place any reliance. All subsequent testimony is either a mere repetition of these, or a constructive exegesis of them, or if not, it is mere conjecture. In respect to the original documents, we have evidently the same right of interpretation as Abydenus, Megasthenes, Josephus, Eusebius, and others had. The native Greek historians, whose works are now extant, make no mention at all of Nebuchadnezzar; consequently, Josephus's quotations from the oriental writers, and the historical notices comprised in the Hebrew Scriptures, are all on which we can place any dependence as legitimate sources of testimony. These consist of the following particulars.....I would merely observe, at the close of this difficult and perhaps too long protracted investigation, that no one who has experience in these matters will think of arguing against the actual occurrence of certain particular events, merely because they are not stated in this book of Scripture or in that, since nearly all of the Jewish history in later times is given to us in professed and acknowledged 'summaries' only. One writer sometimes sees fit to insert some special particular, which the rest have passed by. E. g. Jer. 51:59 seq. mentions a journey of Zedekiah, with some of his courtiers, to Babylon, in the fourth year of his reign. In 2nd Chron. 33:11 seq., we have an account of Manasseh as having been carried to Babylon, and of his penitence, and his return to Jerusalem. Nowhere else is either of these events even alluded to, so far as I can find. Yet after the recent investigations respecting the books of Chronicles by Movers, Keil, and others, I think no sober critic will be disposed to call in question the position, that neither of these accounts is improbable, and that neither can, on any grounds worthy of credit, be fairly controverted. And I would again suggest, that when leading events as to time and place are certain, an assumption of particular circumstances and events attending them, which is built upon the common course of things and supported by probability, is surely neither uncritical nor unsafe. When we suppose, for example, that Daniel and his associates were sent to Babylon as 'hostages', at the time when Jehoiakim first became a vassal to Nebuchadnezzar, and combine this supposition with the declaration in Dan. 1:1 seq., we suppose what seems to be altogether probable, although we cannot establish this particular by any direct testimony, but merely by implication.

It may not be useless to add, that as the Jews evidently called Nebuchadnezzar 'king', from the time that he invaded Palestine, so by a comparison of Dan. 1:1 seq. Jer. 25:1, 2nd K. 25:27, we make out forty-five (45) years (inclusively) as the period of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, according to the Hebrew method of reckoning. At the same time, Berosus and others make out only forty-three (43) years. Still, there is no real disagreement in the case. The Jews began to reckon two years earlier than Berosus, who counts only upon the 'sole' reign of Nebuchadnezzar after the death of his father.....

Excursus on Chap. VI. Thus ends the 'historical' part of the book of Daniel. It is easy to see that the object of the writer has not been, to give a regular and complete history, either of the Babylonish kings, of their successor, or of Daniel himself. Those, and only those, events are noticed, which make for the purpose of the writer; and this is, to exhibit a God working wonders among those who held the Hebrews in bondage, in order to fill them with respect for this people, and to prepare the way for their final liberation. Most plainly, moreover, is it a part of the design of the writer, to commend a steadfast adherence to the principles and practice of piety and virtue amidst the trials and temptations to which this people was subjected. The religious and ethical design of the narrations presented in the book before us, lies upon the very face of it, and no one should hesitate to avow this. But to prove that all this was calculated and designed merely for the times of the Maccabees, is quite another matter, and seems to me to have very little probability in its favor.....

Chapter VII: Introduction: In the remarks made upon the symbol of the colossal statue seen in the dream of Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 2), no particular discussion was entered upon respecting the 'four great empires'. Mere hints were thrown out, and it was assumed, that in all probability the Babylonish and the Medo-Persian empires were symbolized by the head and breast of the image; that the abdomen and loins represented the dominion of Alexander the Great; and finally that the legs and feet were symbols of that intermingled and confused empire, which sprung up under the Grecian chiefs who finally succeeded him. To this conclusion I have been forced to come, after an attentive consideration of the various schemes of interpretation that have been proposed and urged. As this must have an important influence on my views respecting the prophecies that follow, I feel bound to lay before the reader, the reasons which have led me to adopt such a conclusion. This I shall do as briefly as the nature of such a controverted case admits. And in order to do it briefly, I feel compelled to depend on reasons drawn almost wholly from the book itself. 'A priori' reasoning, in this case, the basis of which is an assumption of what we 'ought' to expect from the pen of Daniel; or reasoning borrowed merely from the Christian fathers, who assumed as a part of their basis, that the 'Romish Antichrist' was before the mind of the prophet; we cannot assume without examination, if we would keep our exegetical conscience quiet. There is no expositor of an author, so legitimate and authoritative as himself. And it is by an appeal to Daniel himself, that I hope, and I shall endeavor to explain Daniel. If this may be done, it is not worthwhile to occupy our time with either relating or refuting the almost numberless schemes of interpretation which have been applied to the book before us. Long ago was it said, (and with sound common sense), that 'The best way to refute error, is to teach the truth'. If a subject can be made plain, and withal be so presented as to convince and satisfy the mind, it becomes unnecessary to dwell upon all the discrepant views that have been taken of it, or to describe the causes which operated to produce them, or to refute one by one in detail the errors that have been committed. It would occupy a volume by itself to do this, on the present occasion.

In order to throw upon the subject now before us the light which the book of Daniel itself affords, it becomes necessary to compare with each other the various representations which are made of the same things or persons. What is obscure to us in one passage, may thus perhaps be fully illustrated by another; what in one case is expressed only in a generic way, may be found sufficiently specific in another to remove all uncertainty. It is in this way, that we proceed, or at least should proceed, with difficult passages in any book whatever, either sacred or profane; and in like manner, and for a like purpose, do we compare the different Evangelists with each other. Before I engage in this process of comparison, I would premise a few general remarks, to which I would hope a general assent will not be denied. (1) The book of Daniel is not to be regarded either in the light of a general 'syllabus' of civil history, nor even in that of a particular history of the four empires named. The Assyrian empire is not touched upon at all in it, nor that of India, or China, or Tartary; not to speak of European and African kingdoms in general. And with regard to Babylon, Persia, Greece (in the personal conquests of Alexander), and the mixed dominion, which is fourth in order, nothing more than mere out-line sketches are given, which may suffice to identify the empires in view. To this there is but one exception, which is the Syrian part of the fourth dominion. The sketch of this is more particular; but that which occupies more room here than all the rest, is the description of Antiochus Epiphanes and his deeds. Such being the state of 'facts', the reason or ground of such a course in the writer of the book, becomes quite apparent. It is 'the people of God, the Hebrew nation', which is everywhere the highest and ultimate object of the writer. Those dynasties only which have, or will have, a special concern with the Hebrews, are touched upon; and these are brought successively into view, down to the time when deliverance from disasters, little short of those occasioned by the Babylonish exile, shall have been completed. Subsequent and temporary invasions of Palestine, which wrought no essential and permanent change in the state or affairs of the Jews, are not in any degree noticed. The writer's plan or design evidently does not, in any degree, resemble a regular chronological history, or annals that both preserve the order of time and record all particular events which are worthy of notice. Daniel gives mere outlines, rapid, striking, brief, generic. It is evident that his design is mainly a 'religious' one. The people of God; the 'foreign' sway to which they are, and are to be, subjected; the period in which a second Nebuchadnezzar shall lay waste Jerusalem and profane the sanctuary the leading trials through which the Hebrews must pass before the Messianic period commence? —these are the topics concerned with the prophetic part of the book of Daniel. Above all, the second great catastrophe to the Jewish nation, under Antiochus Epiphanes, which in some respects was more grievous than that of the Babylonish exile, is that which is most particularly and graphically set forth; and with this the writer concludes his development of Jewish history, excepting that the introduction of the subsequent Messianic period is here and there set forth, and placed in a very striking light. In a word, ch. 7-12 might be justly characterized by giving them the title: 'Sketches of the Leading Events Preparatory to the Messianic Period'. The 'nucleus' lies in Nebuchadnezzar's dream (ch. 2); the development in ch. 7-12. Great errors in the exegesis of this book may be committed, by either ascribing 'too much' to its design, (which is the common error), or else 'too little'.

(2) The reader must not look here for the common traits of regular annals, which are found in a book merely historical. Here (in 7-11) all is 'prophetical'. It has the costume of prophecy, and is replete with figurative language and with symbol. It gives leading characteristics of an empire by a single sentence, without minute specification; sets up no chronological boundaries to the respective kingdoms; presents simply changes and transitions of empire without any detail of the means by which they are brought about; and introduces those empires, and only those, which are concerned with the Jewish people. As a whole, these productions are merely generic and prophetic pictures of the mutable and perishable empires that have concern with the Hebrews, until the Messianic period, so as materially to affect them for good or for ill. The Persian dominion affects them mostly for good, (see Ezra and Nehemiah); that of Alexander indeed scarcely touches them, but it prepares the way for an empire (the Syrian), which most of all persecuted and injured them. The prophetic part of Daniel, I readily concede, is not regular Hebrew 'poetry' as to its form; but it is poetic in its spirit and imagery, like Ezekiel, and Zechariah, and the Apocalypse, and demands the application of poetical exegesis in order to interpret it. A part of the 11th chapter is the only exception to be made to these remarks; where the representation is so historically graphic, that Porphyry and others, specially many of the recent critics, have even brought against it the charge of being written 'post eventum'. The particularity of the description here fully shows, how prominent in the writer's mind were the cruelty and persecutions of the (nibzach), i.e. Antiochus Epiphanes.

(3) The reader, who wishes to discover with certainty the real empires that are the subject of prediction in the book before us, should carefully investigate 'the particular period, when they will individually and severally have all passed away'. The Messiah's empire, as is clearly and repeatedly asserted, is to be 'built on their ruins'. It 'succeeds' them all, in order of time and of events. So chap. 2; 7; 12 plainly represent the matter. And if so, this will be one decisive test, as to the empires brought into view by the prophet. That they are 'Asiatic' empires, although some of them are swayed by men of Grecian origin, seems to lie upon the face of the book, and accords with the nature of the case. In the time of Daniel, Rome was a petty State of Italy, and was scarcely known, still less feared, in Palestine or in Babylon. It is not the manner of the Hebrew prophets, to concern themselves with the history of nations or empires sustaining no relation to the Hebrews. It is true, indeed, that some sixty years before the birth of Christ, Palestine was overrun by Pompey; and in the sequel it was made an allied province. But it was not until 'after' the Christian era had begun, that it was deprived of its kings, and subjected to a Romish governor. Nor did the Romans undertake to crush it, until about A. D. 67. The book of Daniel "prepares the way of the Lord." The coming of the Messiah is its main design; and the state and circumstances of the Jews, until that period, are passed in brief and rapid review. With the considerations in view that have now been suggested, we may next proceed with the development of 'The Four Great Empires'.....

Chap. VII. 1. [After the introductory remarks already made, the contents of ch. 7 may be sketched in a few words. The prophetic vision of Daniel was by night, and in a dream, v. 1. After great commotion of the sea by stormy winds, four great beasts come up from it, strong and ravenous, yet diverse in kind, vs. 2,3. The first is a 'lion', furnished with wings, to which, after severe castigation, a more gentle and humane spirit is given, 4. The second is a 'bear', whose position, and grasp of prey, as well as the language addressed to it, indicate a watchful rapacity for conquest, v. 5. The third is a 'panther', with four wings and four heads, bearing extensive sway, v. 6. The fourth is a monster without a name, strong and terrible, with teeth of iron and ten horns; out of which comes up a little horn, which roots out three of the others, and becomes insolent and blasphemous, vs. 7, 8. When the destruction occasioned by it reaches its height, the Ancient of Days prepares his tribunal, and ascends it surrounded by flaming fire and myriads of ministering servants. The trial proceeds, the charges are made, and the beast is condemned to excision, which sentence is executed, vs. 9-11. The like had been already done to the other three beasts, v. 12. The Son of Man now makes his appearance before the Ancient of Days, and dominion universal and permanent is given to him, vs. 13,14. Daniel, overpowered by the vision, is troubled in his mind, v. 15. He approaches an angel-interpreter, and seeks to know more particularly the meaning of the vision. He is told, in a few words, the sum of its meaning: There are and will be four dynasties; to be followed by a fifth which belongs to the saints, and is to be perpetual, vs. 16-18. But his curiosity is not satisfied, in regard to the 'fourth' beast, the characteristics of which he recapitulates, vs. 19, 22. The interpreter informs him, that the fourth kingdom will be diverse from the other three, and very destructive; that the ten horns signify ten kings; that another (the little horn) shall arise, who will humble three of the ten, utter boasting and blasphemy, and undertake to change times and abrogate the law; that these latter transactions of the little horn are limited to three and a half years, vs. 23-25; and finally that the destroyer shall himself be condemned and destroyed, v. 26. After this, "the people of the most high God" shall receive a dominion that shall never end, v. 27. Here ends the vision ; but Daniel was filled with agitation and concern respecting the things predicted, although he kept the whole matter to himself, v. 28.]

Chapter VII.1.....This chapter begins the second and peculiarly 'prophetic' part of the book of Daniel, in which the writer forsakes the 'chronology' of the preceding historical part that he had brought down to the Median dominion, and goes back some seventeen (17) years to the first year of Belshazzar.

The date of the time, when a prophecy was received, is commonly affixed by the Hebrew prophets to the oracle itself. It is not unusual for prophets to receive a special command, to 'commit to writing' their disclosures; comp. Isa. 30:8; 8:1, 16; Hab. 2:2; Apoc. 1:19; 21:5; 14:13. Daniel does not inform us, whether he in this case received a special command to write down his vision, nor of the time when he did write it; but the importance of the subject-matter of the vision, and the trouble that it gave to his mind, would be very likely to lead him to a speedy record of what he had seen.....

Chap. VII. 8. 'Excursus on the Fourth Beast'. To facilitate our future progress, it may be well to satisfy ourselves of the position, which, as interpreters, we ought to take; for much is dependent on it. Having already discussed this subject at large, in the introduction to this chapter, I shall give here only brief and summary views of points already illustrated, touching occasionally on other points necessary to complete a view. To me it seems a philological impossibility, provided we first make a thorough comparison of the third and fourth dynasties, (as presented in chaps. ii. vii. viii. xi., and fully spread before the eye of the reader in the preceding pages), to maintain that the third dynasty is not that of Alexander, or that the fourth is not that of his successors, the Grecian chiefs. But for the sake of obtaining still further satisfaction, let us for a moment reverse the method of considering the subject, and begin with the 'fourth' dynasty. What are the discriminating features, the true and satisfactory diagnostics of this dynasty? I shall mention only such as I deem to be decisive and satisfactory.

(1) The 'ten horns' belong to the 'fourth' beast (7:7, 19, 20, 24), and the 'little horn' springs up 'among them' (7:8, 20, 24). The ten horns are ten kings (7:24), and the 'little horn' is the eleventh (7:24). Now it is quite plain, from a comparison of 7:7, 8, 23-25, with 8:8-12, 22-25, and 11:21-45, that the same individual is characterized in all these passages. His gradual growth, his cunning, his destructive aggressions, his persecutions, his pride, his boasting, his blasphemies, his profanation of sacred things, and his sudden and violent death, are all depicted in colors so nearly alike, and in outlines so exactly alike, (excepting that in some of the cases, e.g. in chap. 11, the sketch is much more amply filled out), that I cannot perceive any reasonable ground of doubt that they respect the same personage. But if this be a correct position, then is the fourth dynasty plainly designated beyond a reasonable question. "The little horn" did not spring from a 'Roman', but from the 'Syrian' dynasty. It came up amidst ten horns, and rooted out 'three of them' (7:8, 20, 24); and if the 'little horn' be Antiochus Epiphanes, then is it certain that the 'ten horns', i.e. the ten kings (7:24), are 'Syrian' and not Roman. It is no objection to this argument, that the imagery employed in chap. 8 'varies' from that of chap. 7. What is a 'bear' in 7:5, is a 'ram' in 8:3 seq. What is a 'panther' with four wings and heads in 7:6, is a "he-goat that touched not the ground," with a notable horn, in 8:5 seq. In chap. 7, the destruction of the beasts is not described severally, but collectively, (7:11, 12); while in chap. 8, the destruction of each preceding dynasty is 'severally' related (vs. 7, 8), before a new one is announced. The 'diversity' of the fourth beast from all the others, is specifically declared by direct assertion in 7:7, 19, 23, while in chap. 8 it is described by symbolic imagery, viz. "the great horn [Alexander] is broken, and in its room came up four notable ones, toward the four winds of heaven," (8:8). Now these four horns have no direct concern with the 'ten horns' of 7:7, 20, 24. The latter are 'kings' (7, 24); the former are 'kingdoms' (8:8, 22); not kingdoms in the sense that they make what the writer, for his particular purpose, regards as 'separate' dynasties, but minor kingdoms under one comprehensive view, viz. that of 'Grecian sway', or sway by Alexander's successors. So 8:8, 22, and 11:4, clearly show. The last or fourth is the 'divided' kingdom; for it has no symbol among beasts that can be named (7:7); it consists of iron and clay (2:40-43); it is divided to the four winds of heaven (8:8; 11:4). Of course there is no incongruity between the 'four horns' in 8:8, 22, and the 'ten horns' in 7:7, 20, 24. The former merely symbolize the four great divisions of Alexander's empire (8:21, 22; 11:4); the latter signify ten kings (7:24), which will precede "the little horn" (ib.), and 'among which' this horn springs up (7:8). The ten horns, moreover, all belong to 'one' of the four great divisions; for out of 'one of these four', the little horn springs up (8:9), which shoots forth in the midst of the ten (7:8). Here then is no 'incongruity'. It is merely a diversity in the mode of representation, grateful to the reader, and meeting the reasonable demand of aesthetics in regard to variety, in the modes of description. On the other hand, the 'parallels' in the descriptions of the fourth beast, and above all in those of the 'little horn', 2; 7; 8; 9, are so striking, that 'identity' of person or object in all of them seems to be a thing so evident, that fair denial is out of question. Hengstenberg, who strenuously contends for the 'Roman' dynasty as the fourth, acknowledges that the resemblances between the 'little horn' in chap. 2, and the descriptions in 8:9 seq. 11:21 seq. are such as to constitute the most weighty argument in favor of 'identity' of person in all, (Authentic des Daniel, s. 213). How then is this argument to be answered? In his view very easily, viz. 'Antiochus is the 'prototype'. Antichrist the 'antitype'; what had a partial fulfilment in the former, will have a complete one in the latter.' In other words, a ('huponoia') is here to be supposed, i.e. a double sense must be given to the words. And why? "Because 'Typik'" grounded in the very essence of the O. Test," (s. 213). I deny not at all the typical nature of much that was Mosaic and Levitical, as to rites and ordinances. I fully assent to all which the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews has said on this subject. But all the 'types' relate to 'Christ', his offices, his sufferings, his atonement, and in a word to his whole work of redemption. Where are the types of Satan, and of his coadjutors, the 'Antichrists' of the Christian period, to be found in the Jewish ritual? Hengstenberg appeals to 2nd Thess. 2:3, and avers that this is built upon Daniel. I accede; but only so far as to recognize a 'similarity of description' in a case where there is 'similarity of character and of action'. What does one need now to satisfy himself of such a usage among the N. Test. writers, than to turn to Matt. 2:15, 18, 23, and compare these passages with the original Hebrew? The (plērōsis); of the N. Test. is far enough from being always a fulfilment of what is strictly prediction. From its very nature, a ('hupnoia') must always be merely a matter of 'guessing'; for what language does not of itself speak, can only be 'guessed' at. But how can we accede to a principle of interpretation so hazardous as this, and specially so indefinite and in fact undefinable?

(2) The four dynasties, whatever they are, 'perish before the Messianic kingdom is introduced'. Thus is it represented in 2:44,45; 7:11,12, 22, 26,27; 8:20-25; 11:45. This is of itself so plain, and so conclusive, that it would alone be sufficient to decide that the fourth kingdom cannot be 'Roman'.

(3) It lies upon the face of all the prophecies in this book, that the Messianic kingdom is their 'ultimatum'. What will befall the Hebrews 'before' this is introduced, is evidently the object which the prophet has in view to declare. But here, however, let it be remembered, that it is not at all his object, to give a minute civil history of all the Jewish affairs, but only to touch summarily on the most distressing of their trials. Under Antiochus they were to suffer even worse things, in some respects, than they had done under Nebuchadnezzar. Thus much disclosed, he passes over the interim, and touches upon the introduction of the 'new kingdom'. Summarily does he describe even this, but he strongly asserts its 'perpetuity'. To suppose Daniel to supply the place which John has filled in the Apocalypse, and to go beyond the simple generic views that I have suggested, would be to appropriate to an O. Test. writer all the views and feelings and knowledge of a Christian writer. The same spirit Daniel doubtless had. But he did not move in the same circle of action, nor did he address the same classes of readers.

(4) The difficulties that lie in the way of acknowledging the fourth dynasty to be 'Roman', not only appear great, but to me they seem insuperable. Applied to the 'Roman dynasty', what mean the four kingdoms in 8:22; 8. What mean the 'ten horns' in 7:7, 20, 24? And the ten toes in 2:42? And more than all, what means it, that Antiochus comes 'from the midst of the ten horns'? Hävernicks confesses (Comm. s. 570), that "as yet the Roman history gives us no diagnostics by which we can ascertain the 'ten' horns." What then is to be done?" We must wait," says he," with a believing confidence, that we shall yet see a time, when faith will be turned into vision, and thus will take the veil from our eyes, and make plain the secrets of the Lord." 'Secrets' they are truly, and must remain so, on the ground which he takes. All hope of any intelligible meaning is out of question. But for myself, I must always doubt the soundness of a position, which forces us to conclusions like this, in regard to any matter of prediction. But the advocates of that exegesis which assigns the 'Roman dynasty' to the fourth beast turn the tables upon us, and object to the application of this symbol to the dynasty of Alexander's successors, on the ground that in this way no satisfactory account can be given, either of the 'ten kings', or of the 'three' who were rooted out by the little horn, 7:7, 8, 20, 24. Candor requires us to say, that this may be reasonably demanded of those who reject the application of what is said concerning the fourth dynasty to Rome, because they explain the prediction as applicable to a dynasty which existed and came to an end before the birth of Christ. Now as such a dynasty belongs to the history of the 'past', some probable application of the prophecy to it should be pointed out by those who decline the interpretation of Hengstenberg, if they expect to make good their position. This, as I apprehend the matter, is what may be done. I must, first of all, ask the particular attention of the reader to what has already been intimated and explained, viz. that Daniel does not undertake to write universal history, nor even the particular history of the empire which he actually brings into view, but only describes such occurrences or personages as come in contact and conflict with the Jews, mostly to their harm and danger. The rapid outline in 7: 4-8 is proof of this; and like to this are the passages in chap. 2; 8; and also 11, with the exception of the Syrian kingdom, (the king of the north), and particularly that of Antiochus Epiphanes, 11:21 seq. The 'ten kings' belong to the 'fourth beast', as all the passages in chap. 7 show, and the little horn comes from the midst of the ten, vs. 8, 20, 24. But in 8:8,9, the 'little horn' is expressly said to come 'out of one of the four great divisions' of Alexander's kingdom. This then shows that the generality of the dynasty as a whole is dismissed by the writer after merely touching upon it, and that he turns his attention only to that part of it which is annoying and terrible to the Jews. That the little horn means Antiochus may, after all that has been said, be taken for granted; and as he was a 'Syrian', so were the ten kings 'Syrians', whom he succeeded, inasmuch as he came from the midst of them. We have then simply to inquire, whether there were ten kings who actually preceded him in this dynasty. This inquiry seems not to be difficult.

1. Seleucus I. Nicator. 2. Antiochus I. Soter. 3. Antiochus II. Theos. 4. Seleucus II. Callinicus. 5. Seleucus III. Ceraunus. 6. Antiochus III. the Great. 7. Seleucus IV. Philopator. 8. Heliodorus. 9 Ptolemy IV. Philometor. 10. Demetrius I. 11 . Antiochus Epiphanes.

All of these are unquestionable, excepting 8, 9, and 10. 'These,' says Hengstenberg (s. 208), 'were mere 'pretenders' to the throne, and nothing more; whereas the text requires that they should be actual kings, and be dethroned.' I doubt whether his demand is not somewhat too strenuous here; at least a comparison with Rev. 17:12 would not favor a construction so rigid. But be it so; we will not decline to answer even the rigid demand which he makes. Appian testifies (De Reb. Syr. c. 45), that Seleucus Philopator, when king, was destroyed by the conspiracy of Heliodorus. In the same passage he says, that Eumenes and Attalus, kings of Pergamus, in conjunction with Antiochus, and at his solicitation, deposed Heliodorus, (es tēn archēn biazomenon), 'who had seized by violence upon the government'. The simple history is this: Antiochus Epiphanes, son of Antiochus the Great, and brother of king Seleucus Philopator (who was destroyed by Heliodorus), had, for some years, been sent as a hostage by his father to Rome, and on his return, (being recalled by Seleucus his brother, who sent his own son Demetrius to supply his place), while at Athens, he heard of all that Heliodorus had done, and then visiting Attalus and Eumenes, on his way home, he persuaded them to assist him. Such was their interposition, that all other claims to the throne were silenced, and the parties awed into submission, without any bloodshed in the way of contest. In respect to Heliodorus, he was doubtless punished as a rebel. But still he had occupied the throne; he was "rooted out" from it by Antiochus, or (to use the language of 7:20) "he fell before him."

The second of the three kings, "who were humbled" (7:24), appears to be Ptolemy IV. king of Egypt. His mother, named Cleopatra, being guardian of this young child who was heir to the throne of Egypt, on the death of Seleucus Philopator, claimed the throne of Syria in behalf of her son. She was the sister of Philopator, as also of Antiochus Epiphanes, all three being children of Antiochus the Great. She claimed Palestine and Phenicia as the dower pledged to her by her father, when she was married to Ptolemy Epiphanes the king of Egypt. When her brother Seleucus was assassinated by Heliodorus, she, as already intimated, ambitious of her son's promotion, laid claim to the throne of Syria for him. We have no history of what was done to carry through her designs; for, unhappily, all the particular histories of that period which are now extant, are only a few fragments. But that she succeeded in forming a party in favor of her young son, Ptolemy IV, Philometor, seems to be a matter of fact; and also, that he had an actual investiture of the kingly office over Syria. Thus in 1st Macc. 11:13, it is said of the prince in question: "And Ptolemy entered into Antioch, and put two crowns upon his head, that of Asia and of Egypt." The 'Asia' named here undoubtedly means 'the Syrian empire', inasmuch as Ptolemy was now in its capital (Antioch). In Polybius' Reliquiae, XL. 12, this same prince is named "Ptolemy, ('ho tēs Surias [kai Aigupiou] basileus), i.e. king of Syria" [and Egypt], the latter words included in brackets being of somewhat doubtful authority. There is no good ground of doubt, however, that the Ptolemy in question is the one here named. It would seem, then, since it is certain that Antiochus got the better of all his antagonists, that Ptolemy was "humbled" as to his claim upon the throne of Syria.

But who is the 'third' king, that Antiochus 'rooted out'? I cannot hesitate to say, that, so far as I can see, reference is made to Demetrius I, Soter, as he was afterwards named. He was the son of Seleucus Philopator, and of course the nephew of Antiochus Epiphanes. By right, i.e. by the established custom of regal succession in the monarchies of the East in general, the 'inheritance' of the throne belonged to Demetrius, as soon as his father was dead. He was its rightful occupant. But Antiochus did not recall him from Rome, whither he had gone as a hostage, in order to redeem Antiochus himself from that condition. The Roman Senate could have no inducement to send him back. They kept him as a security of Antiochus' good behaviour; for in case the latter gave umbrage to the Roman power, they could set up Demetrius and urge his lawful claims against Antiochus; which would be very likely to defeat and overthrow him. Thus, by the collusion of Antiochus on the one hand, and the crafty policy of the Romans on the other, Demetrius was obliged to forego his rights as a prince, until after the death of Antiochus and his son. In this way did Antiochus defeat the claims of 'three' kings, and "humble them," 7:24. The two former of them he actually 'dethroned', the latter he excluded from the rightful occupation of the throne, at least so long as he and his son lived. He did indeed not actually dethrone Demetrius, but 'he kept him out' of his throne. All this agrees well with 7:8, 20, 24, and is sufficient to answer the demands of interpretation. He who has a 'right' to a throne, and is kept from it either by the craft or violence of another, is 'humbled' as to his pretensions, and 'fallen' as to his purpose. All three were 'rooted out' (7: 8), as to their 'kingly office', and Antiochus remained the sole and triumphant king of Syria. That all this should be done by craft, and flattery, and dexterous management, without any open war or contention, is indeed somewhat strange, but by no means impossible. See how graphically Antiochus is characterized in 8:23,24, but specially in 11:21, 23,24,25, 27, 30, 32. "He shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries," says Daniel, 11:21. One can hardly wonder that Porphyry was so struck with this and other like passages, as to affirm that it must have been written 'post eventum'. But when Porphyry, and others since his time, suggest that Ptolemy VI and Ptolemy VII kings of Egypt, and Artaxias king of Armenia, are the three kings that were humbled, it seems to be a mistake. It is true that Antiochus gained victories over them in contest; but this was after some years, when he had become established in power. I understand 7:8, 20, 24, as relating to what Antiochus did, in order to secure the throne to himself; for this is the natural implication of the passage.

What now can be done with these 'ten kings', and the 'three kings' humbled by Antiochus, if the whole be referred to the 'Roman' dynasty, no one can tell us. Hengstenberg and Havernick give up the attempt, and resolve the whole into a prediction of an Antichrist yet future, and of ten future Roman kings or kingdoms, three of which are to be humbled by Antichrist; and they bid us to wait with patience, in expectation that 'dies indicabit', i.e. future events will make plain what is now dark and unintelligible. But I cannot think that a prophetic 'revelation' is constructed of such material. A 'prophecy' addressed to any class of men, must needs have at least some respect to the information of those for whom it is uttered, and to whom it is addressed. But for what valuable purpose a prediction altogether unintelligible can be uttered or written, it would be difficult to form any satisfactory conception.

Finally, whatever may be the difference of opinion about the 'fourth beast', and the dynasty symbolized by it, all must concede, that the facts respecting the 'ten kings' and the 'three kings', as related above, are at least very singular and striking. Could there be such a coincidence between them and Daniel's prediction, unless they in reality are connected together? We may indeed concede the 'possibility' of it; but can anyone well defend the 'probability' of it? After all that can be said on this subject, the simple but conspicuous truth, that the Messiah's kingdom follows the ruin of the four dynasties, renders the application of the symbol of the fourth beast to the 'Roman' dynasty altogether improbable, nay exegetically impossible.

Let those who are deeply versed in the prophecies of the O. Test., ask the question: Do any O. Test. predictions, in any other case whatever, describe the apostasies and the heresies that will spring up in the bosom of the 'Christian church'? Unless the prediction in Dan. 7 is of this nature, no example, so far as I know, can be found. It is not impossible, I concede, that Dan. 7 may be 'unique' in its kind; but unless some very good reason for a prophecy of such a character can be given, and some important object to be accomplished by it pointed out, I must regard it as altogether improbable.

On the ground that the views above given are reasonable and well supported by the laws of interpretation, our future progress in the exposition of the book before us, will be greatly facilitated. As these views appear to me just and well grounded, I must of course avail myself of them, and I shall often recur to them as matters no longer in need of a new defense, or to be regarded as mere conjectures.

In reviewing this whole subject, it seems plain to my mind, that Jerome, and others of later times, who refer the 'little horn' in chap. 7 to Antichrist, were led to do so by the language of the N. Test., which in several instances is borrowed from Daniel, and applied to objects belonging to the period of the Christian dispensation. That like events, and like characters of this period, should be described in language borrowed as it were from ancient prototypes, is very natural, and is indeed what is often done in all parts of the New Testament. But it requires great care not to confound 'prediction' with mere cases of 'resemblance'; and it is a work not yet fully done, to separate the one from the other, and satisfy the intelligent inquirer where the metes and bounds actually are between the two things. This is a work, moreover, which, if well done, would dispense with any further necessity of resort to (hupnoia), in order to elicit the true meaning of the Old Testament. Those (and they are not a few) who find the 'Pope' in the little horn, go still further than Jerome, who, although the Roman bishop in his day began sensibly to elevate himself, appears never to have thought of such an application.

7:25:The nature of the case shows that 'two times' is the probable sense here. The 'singular' noun most naturally means a 'year', which is a 'defined' period of time. So in 4: 13, 'seven times' = seven years. The 'half' of this period is designated by the phrase 'time, times and dividing of time', which last expression means 'half year'. The like in Hebrew, in Dan. 12:7 and in 9:27, we find 'half of a week' or 'heptade' [viz. of years]. See also the same in the Apoc. 12:14, comp. 13:5; 11:2,3; 12:6. A comparison of all these passages seems to settle the matter conclusively, that the prophetic year consists of 360 days = 12 months at 30 days each. It is of importance to note this; for accuracy of calculation must depend on it.

Is this expression of time poetical merely and figurative, consisting of round numbers (as they say), and comprising just half of the mystical number 'seven', which is so often employed in a kind of tropical way? 'Historical facts' seem to speak for the 'literal' interpretation, in the book before us. Yet, considering the nature of the case and of the number usually concerned with such reckonings, (i.e. the number 'seven'), we surely need not be solicitous about a day, a week, or even a month, more or less. The convenience of the reckoning, when it is near enough to exactness for all the purposes of prophecy, is very obvious, and will account for adopting it. In exhibiting the historical facts, we will begin with an era which is certain, viz. the time when Judas Macc. expurgated the temple, and began the service of God anew. This was on the 25th of Dec. 148 ann. Sel. = 165 B.C., see 1st Macc. 4:52. Counting back three and a half years, we come to June in 145 A.S. = 168 B.C. Livy has described the retreat of Antiochus from Egypt, in the 'early spring' (primo vere, Liv. xlv. 11.) of that year. While on that retreat, Antiochus detached Apollonius, one of his military chieftains, to lay waste Jerusalem, (comp. 2nd Macc. 5:11, which makes the time clear), for he had heard that the Jews exulted at his misfortune, in being obliged by the Romans to retreat from Egypt, and he was determined to wreak his vengeance on them. He did so effectually, as 1st Macc. 1:29 seq. fully shows; and vs. 29, 20, of the same chapter, compared together, show that the year was 145, A.S. as above stated. From June, when Jerusalem was probably taken, to December, is six months; and from December in 168 to December, 165, is three years. In the same way, as to time, does Josephus reckon, Proem, ad Bell. Jud. § 7. But to avoid perplexity, it should be noted that a different mode of reckoning, viz. 'three years', is sometimes employed. E.g. in 1st Macc. 4:54, and 2nd Macc. 10:5, such a method appears to be implied; and so in Jos. Ant. Jud. XII. 7. 6. An examination of the context in these cases shows, however, that this period designates only the time that intervened between the profanation of the temple by heathen sacrifices, 1st Macc. 1:54, and the consecration of it by Judas Maccabaeus, 1st Macc. 4:54. Some six months after capture of the city, during which all manner of cruelties and excesses were committed, appear to have elapsed before Antiochus began his 'swinish' offerings in the temple. The consecration of the temple by Judas introduced regular Hebrew worship there; and the death of Antiochus happening shortly afterward, the period of his oppression was of course at its end. Thus did events correspond very exactly with the time designated in our text. We cannot indeed specify the exact 'day' because history has not done this; but it is enough, that we come so near to the time designated, as to remove all serious difficulty respecting it.

Other passages corresponding, as to time, with the verse before us, may be found in Dan. 9:27; 12:7, and, with some modifications, the period marked in 12:11,12, harmonize with these. The discussion respecting them, however, may be deferred until we come in course to consider them.

Chapter 8: Introduction: [In the third year of Belshazzar's reign, Daniel saw another vision, subsequent to that related in ch. 7. In this vision he was transferred to Shushan on the river Ulai, in the province of Elam, (the capital of the future Persian empire), vs. 1,2. Here he saw a ram, with two elevated horns, the one being higher however than the other, but more recent as to its origin. In various directions did the ram push, and nothing could stand before him, vs. 3,4. Upon this, a he-goat made his appearance, bounding over the earth without seeming to touch it; and this goat had a notable horn between his eyes, v. 5. He came to the ram with fury, smote him, broke his horns, and trode him down, while there was none to rescue, vs. 6,7. The he-goat now became very great, and at the height of his power, his great horn was broken in pieces, and there came up four other notable horns in its room, v. 8. From one of these sprang up a little horn, which waxed great toward the south, and east, and the goodly land of the Hebrews, v. 9. It waxed so great that it assailed the host of heaven [the sacred officiators in the temple], and some of these it cast down and trode upon, v. 10. Even the prince of that host [the God of the temple] was deprived by him of his daily sacrifice, and laws and ordinances were prostrated, and success attended the undertakings of the tyrannical oppressor, v. 12. While contemplating this scene of desolation, the prophet hears one of the holy angels asking another, how long this state of things is to continue, v. 13. The answer is 2300 days, at the close of which the sanctuary will be vindicated, v. 14. Daniel makes for himself still further inquiry respecting the meaning of the vision; an angel, on the river's bank, requires Gabriel (the angel-interpreter, to make the requisite explanation, vs.15,16. This angel approaches Daniel, who swoons, and is lifted up and revived by his kind interpreter, vs. 17,18. Gabriel informs him, that he shall make particular disclosures respecting what is to happen at the last part of the season of affliction, v. 19. He says that the ram symbolizes the kings of Media and Persia; the he-goat, the king of Grecia; the great horn is its first king, and the breaking of it is the ruin of his empire; out of this ruin shall arise four dynasties, with inferior power, vs. 20-22. In after-times shall arise from one of them a king, cruel, cunning, a fearful destroyer, specially of the holy people, vs. 23,24. By his craft and sagacity, he will destroy many without waging war; on account of his success, he will become haughty and set himself against the Prince of princes; by whom he shall be dashed in pieces, v. 25. Daniel is assured, that the vision is true, and he is directed to seal it up, because it pertains to a distant future, v. 26. Daniel again swoons, and is afterwards sick for some days. He after this returns to his ordinary official business, v.27.]

It is plain, at first view, that the Babylonish monarchy is here omitted. Twice (ch. 2; 7) had it already been described, and it was now near its close, and nothing specially worthy of particular note, in respect to the Jews, was to take place before that close. To Daniel, therefore, a further disclosure is made, in regard to those empires which would be particularly concerned, in future, either with favoring his countrymen or with annoying them. These were mainly the second and fourth dynasties, (so named in reference to ch. 7.) The third seems to be here introduced mainly because it stands between the Medo-Persian dominion and that of the fourth beast.

As might naturally be expected, Daniel, as he approaches nearer to the events predicted, becomes more specific in his statements respecting them. For example, in ch. 7 no account is given of the manner in which the second or Medo-Persian empire is overthrown; but here, in vs.5-7, we have a graphic account of its fall. In ch. 7, no account is given of the manner in which the third beast perishes, and the fourth beast arises; but in v.8 here we have one specifically given. In ch. 7, the little horn is merely said to arise among the other ten horns of the fourth beast; here it is stated, that it arose out of one of the four dominions of the last empire. In ch. 7, the blasphemous, boasting, persecuting character of the little horn is merely glanced at, (vs. 8, 24,25); but here we have a full detail, as it were, of cruelties and abominations, vs. 9-12, 23-25. In ch. 7, we have a designation of the time, during which the desolations of Jerusalem and the temple shall take place beyond all former example (v. 25); while in ch. 8, we have a different designation of time, in respect to matters which are of wider extent. Finally, the whole circle of beasts in ch. 7, are different from those introduced in ch. 8. The beasts here are not chosen so much with reference to their rabid and destructive nature, as with reference to their active and rapid movements.

If any reader should be tempted to think it strange, that the same subjects should be repeated, even with additional specifications, (as is particularly the case with the fourth dynasty in this book, in chaps, 2; 7; 8; 11, and above all with the description of the little horn or Antiochus Epiphanes), he needs only to turn to Isaiah, and ask how often the Assyrian invasion is there depicted; or to the prophets in general and ask: How many are the prophecies respecting the destruction of Babylon, Egypt, Moab, Tyre, Philistia, etc. The answer to these questions will remove any difficulty which the book before us seems to present, in regard to repetition.

In fact, how can we be competent to decide, how often peculiar circumstances among the Hebrews demanded a renewal of the same subject? But in the present case, the later predictions are seldom, if ever, mere repetitions of the preceding ones. New circumstances are developed; or the subject is placed in a new attitude; or it is connected with some promise or threatening. In a word, there is always something in the later prediction, to adapt it to the time when it was uttered.

In the case before us, the time drew near when the Medo-Persian dynasty would commence. Before that period, the Jews were to change their outward circumstances in no important respect. The writer, therefore, now begins with the dynasty which would make a change. And in order to obtain an appropriate place of vision, he is transferred in his ecstasy to the capital of the Medo-Persian empire, and from its tower or citadel he looks out over the ground of empires yet future. And inasmuch as, from the nature of the case, the later vision is more specific than the earlier ones, it affords us very important aid in the explanation of what might otherwise be dubious from its brevity or generality, in the preceding oracles.

8:1: The reader will note that the Hebrew language is now employed [in contrast to the Syriac-Aramaic of the earlier chapters], and so through the remainder of the book.....

[Conclusion remark to chapter 8:] In several particulars the prophetic vision in this chapter differs from those in chap. 2 and 7. First of all, no notice is taken of the Babylonish monarchy, such as we find in 2:37,38 and 7:4. Then, secondly, there is a somewhat extended view of the second or Medo-Persian dynasty and its fall, vs. 3-7. Very brief and summary is the account of this dynasty in 2:39 and 7:5; and its fall in consequence of being invaded by the head of the third dynasty, is not at all noticed, as it is in 8:5-7. So likewise, in the third place, with respect to the third dynasty. It is summarily touched upon in 2:39 and 7:6; but a somewhat dilated account is given in 8:5-8. Fourthly, the manner in which the fourth dynasty arises, is given neither in 2:40, nor in 7:7 seq. But in 8:8, the manner of its rise is given. Fifthly, while the fourth dynasty is characterized in 2:40-43, merely in a general way, no particular notice is taken of Antiochus Epiphanes. But in 7:7,8, 19-21, 23-26, this tyrant and persecutor is particularly described, and his end foretold. In 8:8-14, 22-25, there is still greater particularity in the description of Antiochus, and a new limitation of the whole period, during which he will carry on his persecutions and vexations. In fact, with the exception of the Medo-Persian dynasty and the rise of Alexander's, it is evident that almost the exclusive subject of the prophecy before us is Antiochus.

It appears, then, that this third vision differs from the others in the 'amplitude' of its descriptions of the Syrian tyrant, and in making him altogether the prominent figure in the picture.

Lastly, it is a striking circumstance, that the visions in chap. 2; 7. both close with an extended view of the 'Messianic' kingdom, which follows the downfall of all the others, while in chap. 8 it is wholly omitted. This is the more worthy of note because the circumstantial history of Antiochus, in chap. 11, is also followed by a development of a Messianic character. Such a departure from analogy, in the vision before us, would seem to have been occasioned by some circumstances of which we are ignorant. The character of Antiochus as exhibited in chap. 2; 7; (and probably in 9), is remarkably congruous; so much so, indeed, as to leave no good room for doubt, that the same individual is meant in all. If anyone is disposed to object against the interpretation which admits the 'repetition' of predictions respecting Antiochus, and ask: 'Of what use could so many repetitions of the same thing be? The answer is easy. Of what use is the repetition of predictions, in Isaiah, respecting Assyria, Babylon, Tyre, and the like? Of what use is the frequent repetition of 'Messianic' predictions? And the same questions may be put respecting the representations of other prophets. The general answer I should give would be, that different exigencies of the times demanded new and repeated developments. The same things are never simply repeated. The subject is placed in new attitudes, and new light is cast upon it. Events of deep interest to the civil and social, or to the religious community, will sometimes bear repetition to serious advantage. We must confide something, moreover, to the judgment of the prophets in regard to the importance of this, in cases where we have, and can now have, no knowledge of minute circumstances.

Chapter 9: Introduction: [Some fifteen years after the preceding vision, subsequent to the dethronement of Belshazzar and the fall of the Babylonish dynasty, and during the 'first' year of the reign of Darius the Mede, into whose hands the fallen Babylonish empire came, Daniel, in hope that the time of the exile of his countrymen was near its end, betook himself after long continued prayer and fasting, to the diligent perusal of the prophecies of Jeremiah respecting the continuance of the captivity. There, in 25:11,12, and specially in 29:10, he found seventy years definitely named as the period, during which the exile should continue, and at the end of which a return to their native land would be allowed to the Hebrews; Dan. 9:1-3. Most fervently did he pour forth his supplications for the fulfilment of these predictions. But even this he ventured not to do, until he had first made most ample and humble and hearty confession of his own sins, and of the sins of the kings, the princes, and the people of the Jews who had disobeyed the prophets, and transgressed the laws of Moses, and rebelled against the Lord; vs. 4-15. The sequel, vs. 16-19, exhibits in a most striking manner, the fervency with which he wrestled with God in prayer, for his people, the holy city, and the temple.

Such prayers as this holy man uttered, are always heard before the throne of God. Forthwith Gabriel, one of the presence-angels, is sent to communicate with Daniel, and to make further disclosures to him respecting the Jewish nation. With such haste did the angel come, that before Daniel had done speaking, he drew near and addressed him, and told him the object of his mission; vs. 20-22. Even at the beginning of Daniel's supplication a message went forth, and the angel declares that he had come to communicate it, because Daniel is greatly beloved. He exhorts the prophet, therefore, to give attention to his message, and to consider well the import of the prophetic vision; v. 23.

'Seventy weeks' [of years] are distinguished or absconded from the general course of time, as a peculiar period which must be passed through, before the new and glorious dispensation of the Messiah will introduce the expiation of sin, and reconciliation for iniquity ; bring in everlasting righteousness, and confirm what the prophets have foretold ; and consecrate a Holy of Holies belonging to the new and better dispensation ; v. 24. These 'seventy weeks' are divided into three different periods, each distinctly marked by specific events at the commencement or close, or else by what takes place during their continuance. 'Seven weeks' [of years] begin with a mandate to restore and build up Jerusalem, and end with the appearance of an Anointed One who is a Prince. During three score and two (62) weeks [of years], the city of Jerusalem shall be rebuilt and prosper, although in troublous times; v. 25. After this period, 'an Anointed One' shall be cut off; in consequence of which the Jewish nation shall be destitute of a lawful and proper officer of this class. Moreover the people of a [foreign] prince shall come, and lay waste the city and the sanctuary; but he shall come to his end with overwhelming destruction. The invasion of the city and sanctuary will occasion resistance on the part of the Jews, and war will ensue ; but unto the end of that war the desolations which it will occasion, are limited by Heaven's decree, and cannot exceed the appointed measure; v. 26. The invading foreign prince will form close alliances with many Jews, for 'one week' [of years] ; during half of that week he will cause sacrifice and oblation at Jerusalem to cease, an idol worthy of destruction shall be erected over an abominable bird [Jupiter's eagle], and unto consummation, even that which is decreed shall then be poured upon him who is doomed to destruction]

The first thing that strikes the attentive reader of this chapter as an object of inquiry is, 'how the predictive, or prophetic part of it compares with the other prophecies of Daniel'. Those who find in it 'simply and only a Messianic prediction', give it an interpretation which makes it entirely discrepant from all the other prophecies of this book. In all other cases where the fifth or Messianic kingdom is foretold, there are preceding dynasties and events also predicted. Only one vision (that in chap. 8) is destitute of a Messianic part; and only one (in chap. ii.) is destitute of a more or less specific description of the Syrian tyrant and persecutor. As this last oppression of the people of God, whose influences and whose relentless fury threatened far worse consequences to the Jews and to their religion, than did the Babylonish exile, is made so conspicuous in all the proper visions of Daniel himself, it would be at least singular, if the prophecy in Dan. 9 should pass him by in entire silence. Indeed the very outset of this vision (v. 24) seems explicitly to declare, that its design is to describe events which will happen 'before' the introduction of that peaceful kingdom, which is to reconcile man to God, propitiate their sins, fulfil the most important part of all prophecy, and consecrate a perpetual holy of holies. That 'seventy weeks are appointed' or 'limited' to pass away 'before' this will take place, seems to be the necessary implication of v. 24. These weeks are then distributed into three different periods, and have a relation to things somewhat diverse and distinct from each other. How can we suppose, now, that what will take place during these respective periods, is passed by in silence? Yet the exegesis which makes the whole paragraph exclusively 'Messianic', makes a part of these periods to 'precede' and a part to 'follow' the commencement of the Messianic kingdom. This seems to be evidently against the tenor of the prediction before us, and certainly against the tenor of the book in general. A mixture of sorrow and joy, of trouble and deliverance, is everywhere else to be found; why should they be excluded here? To me it seems very clear that they are not, but that the prediction before us follows the analogy of the others, in regard to the matter in question.

The circumstance, that in the present case the Messianic part of the prophecy 'precedes', makes no important difference as to the nature of the case. The usual order in the prophets is, that the Messianic part of a prophecy comes at the 'close'. But this is not always the case. Isa. 2 is a notable example of a contrary usage. So in the present case. The angel announces, that the expected era of spiritual deliverance will surely come; or, in other words, that what Daniel had already predicted more than once, would not fail of accomplishment. But these 'glad tidings of great joy' are mingled with information that fills the prophet with deep solicitude.

One very important inquiry, which has not always been made, presents itself at the outset. What was the object of Daniel's fasting and prayer? Was it to obtain information, whether the seventy years predicted by Jeremiah were now at an end? There is nothing to prove this. He tells us (v. 2), that he 'understood' by the writings of Jeremiah, that seventy years, and only so many, were to be accomplished or completed, in order to fill out the measure of Babylonish exile. He was in no doubt, then, concerning this point. He surely could be in none as to the 'terminus a quo' of the exile; for he was himself one of its first victims. Now as Babylon was taken by the Medo-Persian army in 538 B.C. the first year of Darius the king would be either the latter part of that year, or the former part of 537, or it might comprise both; and of course this would be the sixty-ninth year of the exile. Probably the vision was near the close of this year; for Daniel appears to believe that deliverance is near at hand, and therefore prays the more earnestly for it. Vs. 16-19 fully develop his wishes and designs. The angel is not sent then to solve his 'doubts' as to what Jeremiah meant, or to show when the seventy weeks would end. He comes to comfort and enlighten the solicitous worshipper of God, and to inform him what further troubles await the Hebrew nation, before their great and final deliverer will come. Wieseler (Die 70 Wochen, s. 13), lays it down as certain, that 'every explanation of vs. 24-27 is erroneous, which does not assign to them a disclosure of deliverance from the then present misery of the Jewish nation.' But whoever will carefully peruse vs. 16-19 must see that Daniel has more solicitude about the worship of God and the desolations of Zion and the sanctuary, than in respect to the mere outward civil and social condition of the captive Jews. The probability surely is, that under such men as Daniel and his compeers, who bore an active part in the government of Babylonia, they had been treated with more than ordinary lenity. At any rate, no persecuting fury had increased the miseries of their condition, and their bondage seems to have been quite tolerable in respect to their outward condition. It is the honor of God and the promotion of true piety and religion, for which Daniel is most anxious; and v. 24 contains an assurance, that in due time these will be amply provided for. The remark of Wieseler is too broad and indefinite, unless, like him, we limit v. 24 to a mere promise of return from exile and renewal of religious rites, services, and privileges, after seventy weeks of days, i.e. literal weeks, from the time of Daniel's vision. For many reasons I cannot accede to this view. The leading ones are, first, that on such a ground v. 24 would be entirely at variance with vs. 25-27 in the mode of reckoning time since the triplex division of time in the latter evidently appears to amount to the seventy weeks of v. 24. Secondly, the language of v. 24 is too general and too significant to be applied to the mere literal return from exile. Well has Hoffman (Weissag. und Krfüllung, s. 298) said : 'One can interpret the contents [of this verse] only in an arbitrary way, who applies it merely to the liberty of returning which Cyrus gave to the Jews, which liberty was so sparingly used, and so little satisfied anticipations.' Unquestionably there is a sense, an elevated one too, in which the angel's communication allayed the burdensome part of Daniel's solicitude about the honor of God and the interests of religion. But I find no specific limitation of the end of Jeremiah's seventy years. None surely was needed for Daniel. The 'terminus a quo' was fully within his knowledge; the 'terminus ad quem' of course could not be a matter of doubt to him.

This leads me to say, that the mode of interpreting the seventy years of Jeremiah adopted by some, who tell us that "the angel was sent to inform him, that so many 'literal years' were not meant, but only a period of seventy mystic year-weeks," agrees very ill with the tenor of the book throughout. How anyone can be brought to believe, that the 'seventy weeks' of Daniel are merely a new exegesis of Jeremiah's seventy years, and not the designation of a new period comprising new events, I am not able to see. Not a word about the Babylonish exile is contained in vs. 24-27. How could this be, if the new designation of the seventy weeks comprised in part that exile, and merely extended the period beyond the limits which Daniel had attached to it? It would seem that the angel must, in such a case, have been as uncertain about the distance of the 'terminus ad quem', as those interpreters suppose Daniel to have been.

That Daniel should feel solicitude about the posture of affairs, at the time of the vision now under consideration, was quite natural. The time for the exile to come to an end was very near. The Babylonish monarchy, which held the Hebrews in bondage, had been destroyed. A new dynasty had arisen, viz. that of Darius the Mede. Although not disposed to persecute and oppress the Jews, he appeared at least to be indifferent to their sufferings and wrongs. No movement was made to relieve them. They were doubtless, in view of Jeremiah's prophecy, expecting relief. What could be more natural, than for Daniel to ask with earnest importunity that this relief might come, for the honor of God and of religion? This was a strong plea; and in the mouth of such a man we might expect it would be regarded (as it was) with great favor.

The predictions in vs. 24-27 cannot be considered, in any sense, as an exegesis of Jeremiah. Nor is the communication made entirely a 'new' disclosure. That the Messianic kingdom was to commence, after the four great empires had ceased, was not new. Chap. 2; 7 fully exhibit this. That Antiochus would oppress and persecute, was not new. That he would cause the sacrifices and oblation to cease for three and a half years, was not new, for 7:25 discloses this. That his course of oppression in respect to the Jews, should continue about 'one week' (of years), was not new; for 8:14 substantially discloses this. That the tyrant should at last suddenly and fearfully perish was not new; for 8:25 fully reveals this. But that the peculiarly oppressive trials and troubles of the Jews, before the coming of the Messiah, should be ended after a period of seventy weeks of years from the beginning or end of the Babylonish exile, was a fact not before revealed. That the existence and prosperity of the new Jewish Commonwealth, and the rebuilding of its metropolis, should be all along attended with "troubulous times," and yet go forward —was a fact not before disclosed. That the Lord's 'anointed' —the lawful high priest— should be cut off by violence, and have no proper successor, was a new fact. All this was deeply interesting to Daniel and to the Jews. Forewarned, forearmed. Return from the exile was speedy and certain; but the hopes of continued peace and prosperity immediately after this must not be indulged. The Lord had many trials other than the present in store for his people before the great Deliverer would come. But it is not 'all' of them, that the prophet is now commissioned to disclose and to dwell upon. Only such times as might be compared with past events, the laying waste of the temple and holy city, the destruction of large numbers of the people, cessation of religious rites and civil privileges, the profanation of the sanctuary by heathen rites, —such events, and such only, are prophetically disclosed. The communication of the angel to Daniel' apparently amounts to the following declarations: 'Thy people have suffered one exile and all its mournful consequences. Other like events, differing indeed as to manner and time, but even more trying, more dangerous to the good, and more disgraceful and fatal to the wicked, are still before the Jews. A portion of the 'seventy weeks' will bring them through this fiery ordeal; and after this, until the great Deliverer shall come, they shall only experience the ordinary trials of a nation in circumstances like to theirs.'

It is on some such ground, I apprehend, that we are to account for the fact, that all the prophecies of Daniel, developing what is to 'precede' the Messianic kingdom, end with the life and actions of Antiochus Epiphanes. Other subsequent enemies did indeed maltreat the Jews; but none of them attained to that consummation of wickedness and cruelty which were exhibited by him. They are not, therefore, made conspicuous in prophecy.

Should any one feel disposed to object, here, that there is somewhat of the 'arbitrary' in these suggestions, I would appeal at once to the books of other prophets, yea to the whole body of Hebrew prophecy, and ask: Whether they have not respect to particular events of interest and importance, or, in other words, whether they are merely a regular series of 'historic annals'? If not, then events, such as I have just mentioned, are the appropriate subjects of prophecy. What more can be said of the book of Daniel, or what more need we say, in order to vindicate the view just taken?

To those who know the course which a portion of recent criticism has taken, in order to show that the book of Daniel was written after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, no apology need be made for these remarks. It is a common allegation among critics of the so-called liberal class, that the book of Daniel was written 'post eventum'; and that the writer was not confident enough in his own 'prophetic' powers, to venture anything beyond what history already gave him, excepting that, in common with all the Jews, he was full of ardent expectations in regard to the Messianic kingdom. Hence, as they conclude, he stops short with Antiochus, and expresses his confident belief, that immediately after his death the Messianic kingdom would be established.

On the full discussion of this topic I shall not now enter, but, leaving it for another occasion, merely remark at present, that the writer must have been a man of great peculiarities, to declare himself so confidently about the Messianic reign as 'immediately' following the death of Antiochus, if he himself lived at that very period, and saw no certain tokens that such a reign had commenced, or was indeed about to commence. He appeals to no such tokens; he gives no hint respecting them. What moreover was to become of the credit of his book, in case of a failure? Then as to all his prophecies ending with Antiochus, (the Messianic kingdom only excepted), I would hope that the remarks already made above, suggest some other more satisfactory reason for the prophet's course, than that of his ignorance of the future. Revelation of events is made for 'special' purposes, and to answer 'specific' ends. It is not 'annals'; it consists not of year-books and historical registers. The most hazardous period of the Jewish nation, down to its ruin by Titus, was that of Antiochus. It was the most trying to the good, and seemingly the most auspicious to the bad. It was the only period in which the sanctuary of God was daily polluted, for some years, by heathen rites and sacrifices. Should not such a period be designated, and the people of God forewarned? Daniel and the angel-interpreter seem to have so thought and decided. Might not prediction respecting the outward condition of the Jews before the coming of the Messiah, stop with events belonging to such a period, and omit the ordinary events that followed? So have other prophets done, in respect to other countries than that of Judea; and so, respecting the Hebrews; why should Daniel only be excepted from ordinary usage?.....

(9:24:) "Seventy weeks are decided respecting thy people and thy holy city, to restrain transgression, and to seal up sin, and to expiate iniquity ; and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal vision and prophecy, and to anoint a holy of holies."

(shabu'im), from (shabu'a), and of an irregular masc. plur. form, retaining (a) under the first radical, (normally it would read (shebu'im)). The 'masc.' plur. occurs only in the paragraph before us, and in Dan. 10:2,3. The fem. form (shabu'oth) also retains the (a) of the first radical. Why? none of the lexicons or grammars tell us. Fuerst (Concord.) says: "retento Qamets 'sibili'" in respect to the plural forms; by which I suppose him to mean, that sibilant letters have a propensity to a 'Qamets' vowel-sound. If this be his assertion, it needs illustration and confirmation. It is disputed whether the masc. singular occurs; but as the Masoretic text of Gen. 29:27,28 stands (malle' shebu'a zo'th), there is a clear instance of a masc. form in a 'const'. state, from (shabu`a), showing that the Qamets in the sing. is mutable. Wieseler however, (Die 70 Wochen, s. 14), says that "the Masorites have certainly erred," and that we should read (shaba`), i.e. 'these seven' (years), lit. this heptade (of years). As the form of the numeral is sing. and 'fem'. (§ 96. 1), it may be united with (zo`th); and (shanim) seems to be fairly implied, as anyone may see by comparing Gen. 29:18, 20, 27 together. If this criticism be just, (it seems to me plainly to be so), then we have no instance of a 'masc'. form of the word in question, out of the book of Daniel. This however will prove nothing against the existence of one since it is altogether a feasible form. The simple truth is, that both (shabu`im) and (shabu`oth) are 'participial' forms, meaning 'besevened', (sit venia!), i.e. computed by sevens. Lit. then we might translate thus: 'Heptades seventy are decided upon', etc. This leaves the question entirely open, whether the meaning is heptades of days, or of ordinary years, or of sabbatical years; and this question must be decided of course by the context. The Jews had three kinds of 'Heptades' in respect to 'time'; first, that of 'days', seven of which make a 'week'; secondly, that of 'years', seven of which make a 'sabbatical year', Lev. 25:1-7; thirdly, that of the seven periods of years before the 'jubilee-year', for this last comprises seven times seven years = forty-nine years, after which comes the jubilee-year, Lev. 25:8. Which of these three is meant in the present case? for the clause before us may be interpreted in either way. Not the first, for this would make but about a year and a half for the fulfilment of all that is predicted in the sequel, and would fill the passage with contradictions. Wieseler, indeed, in his work quoted above, has labored to show, that the first mentioned 'seventy weeks' are merely literal and common weeks; for he holds that the sequel in v. 24 refers merely to the return from the Babylonish exile, and a restoration to all the rites and privileges of worship as prescribed by Moses, with an accompanying reformation of moral demeanor. But the subsequent 'weeks' he counts as 'year-weeks', i.e. periods of seven years each. Ingenious and acute as this writer surely is, I cannot accord with this view of the case; for, (1) It makes a violent disruption in the meaning of (shabu`im), to translate it 'weeks of days' in v. 24, and then 'weeks of years' in the following verses of the same paragraph. (2) Nothing seems plainer, than that the tripartite, 7, 62, 1, are designed to make up the number seventy stated in v. 24; and of course, the seventy at the outset must have the same relation to (shabu`im), that the subsequent numbers (the component parts of it) have; and Wieseler himself concedes, that in vs. 25-27 (shabu`im) means week-years, i.e. heptades (heptads, 7s) of years. (3) The application of the magnificent promises, in v. 24, merely to a partial return from exile, and to the broken and troubled state ((betzoq cha`ittim), v. 25) of the Jews for a long period (62 weeks), is something that savors too much of 'deducere aliquid ex aliquo', to commend itself to the simple interpreter. There is too much of what the Germans name a 'hinein-exegesis' [eisegesis], to meet with cordial reception. Hoffman ("Weiss. und Erfüll. s. 298) rightly says respecting it: "The universality with which the consummation of all the hopes of Israel is here spoken of, renders it impossible for anyone to interpret it, except in an 'arbitrary way', as merely applying to the scanty return from the Babylonish exile by permission of Cyrus — a return which hardly satisfied the anticipations respecting it." — We may therefore abide by uniform 'consistency' through the whole paragraph, in the use of (shabu`im). Then, of course, we must regard the meaning as $7 \times 70 = 490$ years.

So long a time, or thus much ground, is comprised in the prediction; not because this, (reckoned in any feasible way), reaches down to the Messianic period, but because so much of the time intervening, before the Messiah would appear, is for the most part 'troublesome time,' and resembles in this respect, that of the seventy years' Babylonish exile. The speaker means to say: 'The Messiah will surely come, and Jerusalem will be restored in a high and spiritual sense; but before all this takes place, there must be, not seventy 'years' of literal exile again, but seventy 'times' seven 'years' of trouble and of trial. How soon after this is over, the king of the new and last dominion will make his appearance, the speaker does not say, nor does the context inform us. Enough that the days of peculiar trial and trouble like those of the Babylonian exile, will pass away within the period named; for that period (nachtak), i.e. is 'definitely limited' or 'decided'.

As to the masc. form (shabu'im) being employed here, in all probability the speaker meant to attract special attention to the word so important in the sequel, and therefore he has put it first, as well as given to it a peculiar form. He may also have been influenced in his choice of the form, by the (shib'im) which follows ; or it may have been the prevailing dialect of the day. That he designs to designate 'heptades of years' by it, would seem quite probable, if we merely compare 10:2,3, where (yamim) is added after it in order to explain it, and to tell the reader that he does not mean (shabu'a) of the same length or of the same kind as before. No explanation is needed, however, in the present case, except what the context gives. Daniel's meditation had been upon the seventy 'simple years' predicted by Jeremiah. The angel tells him, that a 'new-seventy', i.e. seventy week-years or seven times seventy years, await his people, before their final deliverer will come. The reader almost spontaneously adopts this view of the meaning, who is familiar with the 'week-years' of the Hebrews. As to the 'third' way in which the Hebrews used the word (shabu'a), it designated the jubilee-year = forty-nine years or seven times seven. If now we choose this last period as the meaning of (shabu'im) then we should have $49 \times 70 = 3430$ years —a period incredible, on every ground, in respect to the events which follow. In other words, the first and last of the heptades lead to inconsistency or absurdity; neither of them, therefore, is meant by the text. 'In medio tutissimus,' one may safely say, in the present case. Nor is Daniel alone in such a mode of expression. Gellius (Noct. Att. III. 10) makes M. Varro say, that he had written 'septuaginta hebdomadas librorum'. The like in Aristotle, Pol. VII. 16; and in Censorinus. De Die natali, c. 16.

(nechtak) is found only here, in the Hebrew Scriptures, but is more common in Chaldee and Rabbinic. The literal meaning is 'to cut', but it does not necessarily involve the adjunct idea 'to cut off'. The Vulgate, however, has rendered it 'abbreviatae sunt', probably in reference to the idea that 'lunar' months are here to be counted for the years, rather than 'solar' ones. Wieseler (s. 95 seq.) defends the translation 'abbreviated' or 'abridged', and represents the angel as designing to say, that the period of seventy years' exile, as foretold by Jeremiah, is, through divine mercy, and in answer to the prayer of Daniel, 'abridged'. As he makes the exile to begin with 599 B.C., (led, as he says, by Matt. 1:12, who seems to assign its beginning to the deportation of Jechoniah), so, at the time when Daniel fasted and prayed, only sixty-three years of it had passed away, and seven years were therefore to be abridged. But I cannot admit the probability of such an explanation. The idea of 'abbreviation' would have assumed quite another form. Nor is it easy to see, how Daniel, in case he began the exile with the year 599 B.C. when Jehoiakim was carried into exile, could have supposed that seventy years had already come very near to the close, when seven years were yet lacking; for the three first verses of our chapter evidently present him as supposing this. The conclusion is inevitable, if chap. 1:1 be compared, that Daniel dates the exile in the third year of Jehoiakim's reign, or at least the attack of Nebuchadnezzar upon Jerusalem; and such being the case, there is no room for 'abridging' the seventy years. They are already on the point of expiring, when Daniel betakes himself to prayer and fasting. We must admit, then, the figurative sense of (nechtak), viz. 'decided, defined, determined, decreed'; for so the Latin 'decido' means in its figurative sense, while lit. it means 'cut off'; and so the Heb. (gazar) and (charatz), and the Greek (temnō). I would not aver, that simply 'decreed' or 'determined' would adequately translate the word, for it evidently means a 'definitive separation' of the weeks in question from the mass of time, in order, that what is included in this separated and thus defined part, may present the extent of the ground which the predictions that follow are to occupy. In other words: 'Seventy weeks are 'definitely selected and decided upon',' as a period in which various things are to happen, before the final consummation of the hopes of the Jewish nation, viz. the appearance of the Messiah. As to the sing. number of the verb, I see no need of so much difficulty as has been made. The seventy weeks are a definite period here 'generically' presented; and as such they are 'one'. The 'sing.' number of the verb, therefore, is a mere case of 'constructio ad sensum'. We need not resort (with Hitzig) to the passive form impersonal, as retaining the Acc., nor suppose (with Hengstenberg) ('eth) to be implied. Comp. the like in Gen. 46: 22, as to a plur. subject and sing, verb, although in other respects the case will not afford an exact parallel with the present one.

('al`ammka we`al-`ir qodsheka), 'upon thy people and upon thy holy city'. Here I have rendered ('al) 'upon', (in the version above, 'respecting'), in order to approach nearer to the true idea of the Hebrew; for ('al) often designates the idea of 'on' or 'upon' in the sense of what is burdensome, or it is used in what the lexicons style a 'hostile sense'; Ges. Lex. ('al) , 4. a. Plainly it is so here. The seventy weeks comprise the special burden, the trials, the troubles, through which Israel must pass, before the Great Deliverer will make his appearance, or, in the language of the remainder of the verse, before sin will be thoroughly subdued and expiated, and righteousness introduced in the full measure often predicted. —'Thy people . . . thy holy city', Wieseler (p. 16) says, 'indicate two things; (1) That the blessings promised pertain only to the Jews. (2) That they should share in them merely on 'Daniel's' account, and not on their own.' I can find neither of these intimations in those expressions. Daniel was a native of Jerusalem, and probably of royal origin (1:3); and so we have 'thy city'. 'Thy people' means simply the people to which he belonged, and 'thy city' is merely the city of his birth where his affections centered. There is doubtless, however, an emphasis beyond this in the word 'thy'. Daniel had just been most earnestly and anxiously pleading in behalf of the city and people to which he belonged ; and 'thy', applied to both of them, conveys the idea of a people and city for which he was most anxiously concerned, and for which he had just made such fervent intercession. The sequel of the verse does not indeed 'preach the gospel to the Gentiles;' but neither does it confine the promised good to any one nation. It simply assures Daniel that his people are to participate in it. The idea that 'the Jews are to be blessed merely on Daniel's account,' I am unable to find in the passage.

(lekale' happesha`), 'to restrain transgression'; which version, however, takes for granted that the Kethibh, (kale') is a Piel form of (kala'). Most of the ancient versions, and the mass of recent critics, have preferred to derive the verb from (kala'); and they aver, that here is merely an exchange of form in the (loch) verb, for a form of (lo'), which, as all concede, is a frequent occurrence; § 74. Note VI. and Note 22. c. ib. Hence they translate thus: 'to consummate transgression or to fill up the measure of rebellion'; meaning, that during the seventy weeks, rebellion will reach its acme, and will not go beyond. Expressions similar to this there are, here and there in the Scriptures, e.g. in Gen. 15:16, "The iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full," (lo' shalem). In the like way 1st Thess. 2:16, (anaplērōsai tas`hamartias); and so in Dan. 8:23, (kechathem). But objections not easily met, may be made against this view. (1) It comes not within the common usages of grammar, or of the book before us, to make such an exchange of (kalleh) for (kalle') here. The verb (kalah) elsewhere retains its (n) throughout, e. g. Dan. 9:27; 11:36, and in Dan. 12:7 we have the Inf. Piel (kalloth). This is of course the true Inf. of the Piel of (kalah); and where Gesenius and others find a ribs Inf. form, (for which they say (kalleh) is substituted), I know not. It is an 'Unding' [absurdity] in grammar or in the Heb. 'usus loquendi'. (2) The whole sentiment which is thus assigned to the passage, has an erroneous basis. They understand the speaker as now describing what will take place 'during' the seventy weeks, i.e. rebellion will then be consummated, etc.; whereas it seems to lie on the very face of the remainder of this verse, that 'blessings' which are to 'follow' the seventy weeks are foretold. I would not deny, that there may be a point of view, from which one may regard a consummation of iniquity as desirable, all things considered, (for then comes of course the hope of better times); but nowhere in the Bible, as I believe, can it be found, that the perfecting of rebellion is represented as a 'blessing', either present or in promise. If this view is correct, it is decisive of the whole question, and lays entirely aside the word (kalleh), unless it be taken in another and very different sense, viz. that of 'completing' in the sense of 'bringing to an end, destroying'. But to change the text for the sake of this meaning, when (kalle') comes virtually to the same point, and indicates an effectual check or restraint upon sin, is both unnecessary and uncritical. However, against retaining (kalle') as a regular form from (kala') it is objected, that the word has no 'Piel'. All that this can properly mean is, that Piel is not elsewhere found. But how many verbs are there in the Hebrew, in the same predicament, i.e. where only one example of this conjugation, or of that, can be found? (kala') has a transitive as well as intransitive sense (Num. 11:28, Ecc. 8:8, al.); and it may have a Piel of 'intensity' or of 'habitual action'; which is the very meaning appropriate to the passage before us. Then what objection can be made to the idea of 'restraining', or rather of 'habitually and powerfully restraining' (pesha')? This last word is the most intense designation of wickedness, as it combines the idea of 'apostasy' and 'rebellion'. Both of these the prophet had confessed, in his prayer (vs. 5-11), to be chargeable upon Israel. These had taken the lead in bringing down divine judgments upon the nation. Hence the (happesha') (the transgression) as it is named in our text; viz. the apostasy and rebellion already described. When the Great Deliverer shall come, he will effectually restrain such transgressions as bring down divine judgments upon the nation and send it into exile. The allegation of Lengerke and some others, that (kala'), which means to 'shut up, enclose', as well as to 'restrain', should have the first of these meanings assigned to it here, because to shut up transgression means to hide it or conceal it, and so to forgive it, has no foundation in the 'usus loquendi' of the word. When a Hebrew spoke of 'covering' sin in such a sense, he employed (kissah) or (kaphar). The text of the Kethibh may stand therefore untouched; and the meaning of it as it is, seems to be altogether apposite to the purpose of the speaker.

([*ulachatom] ulhathem chatta'oth [chatto'th]*), 'and to seal up sins', where the vowel-points of the verb belong to the marginal Qeri, (ulhathem), Hiph. Inf. of (tamam). The text should be pointed and read (welachtom), as in the sequel [7 words later]. The imagery of the language is evidently progressive. First we have the 'restraining', lit. 'shutting up'; then this work is completed by putting a 'seal' upon it; comp. Matt. 27:66. Where we use 'bars' and 'bolts' only, in many cases the ancients also employed 'seals', in order to make sure the object thus enclosed and guarded. See Lex. The 'literal' meaning would be plain; the prisoner is 'first shut up', then the 'seal' is put upon his prison door. Thus Job 9:7, God 'seals up' the stars, i.e. prevents them from shining; Job 37:7, he 'seals up' the hand of all men, i.e. hinders them from any development of activity. So here; to 'seal up' sins, is to render them inert, inefficient, powerless. They are not only 'restrained', but rendered unable to break out, and bring men into danger of punishment. The other reading in the Qeri, viz. (ulhathem) arose, in all probability, from a comparison with 8:23, where we have (behathem chapposh'im) 'when the transgressors have come to the full' [measure of their sin]. But this meaning does not fit in 9:24. It is what 'follows' the 70 weeks, which is predicted; and after their expiration, there is no time for the consummating of wickedness; the time has come to 'seal it up', as God does the stars and the hand of all men, i.e. to render it inefficient, incapable of acting at liberty. With Wieseler, then, we may justly prefer the text as it stands, to any of the changes proposed. The objection of Ewald, that in such a case we must suppose a repetition of the same word too speedily, amounts to but little; for in the next three verses, (charatz) and (shommem) are thrice repeated. Besides, the second case of (chatham) differs in the shade of its meaning from the first case.

(ulkapper`aon), lit. 'to cover sin'; but this would not answer well here, in as much as sin is already 'shut up' and 'sealed upon'. It must then have one of the two tropical meanings which the word bears, viz. either that of 'forgiving sin', or that of 'expiating' it. Either meaning would suit the tenor of the passage, the amount of which is, that sin is either to be put under entire restraint, as in the case of obstinate offenders; or to be 'forgiven' or 'atoned for', as in the case of the penitent. In one way or another the power of sin to do mischief, or to occasion condemnation, is to be crippled. How well the idea of 'atonement' accords with the epistle to the Hebrews, as the prominent feature in the development of the Messianic period, none need to be informed. Why not admit it here, where the angel is dwelling upon the distinguished blessings which will follow the 70 weeks of troublous times? Its 'appropriateness' can hardly be doubted.

(ulhabi' tzedek olamim), 'to introduce everlasting righteousness', i. e. the (dikaio sunē Theou) of Paul, in his epistles to the Romans and Galatians. It is 'everlasting', because the Messiah's kingdom is so, Dan. 1:44; 7:14, 27. It is 'introduced', because it is of God's giving, and is procured by the Messiah. The people are to be transgressors no more, so as to need punishment and exile. The first three (stichoi) disclose the 'negative' portion of what is to be effected. Sin is to be checked, and removed. Now comes the 'positive' part; righteousness, viz. that of the heart and life which God bestows, (not (tzedeq) in the sense of 'prosperity'), that righteousness, which is the opposite of a sinful state, is to be the characteristic of the new kingdom.

(welachtom chazon wenabi'), lit. 'to seal vision and prophet', where 'seal' has the sense of 'confirming, authenticating'. A seal was put at the end of a writing, to show that it was completed and was authentic. Prophecy is 'open' so long as it remains unfulfilled. When it is fulfilled, it is 'completed', which is one of the tropical meanings of the verb (chatham). The old dispensation was one of "types and shadows of good things to come," and in its very nature 'prophetic'. Under it many predictions concerning the Messianic period were uttered; when that comes, these are 'sealed, completed, authenticated'. Of course the 'good' which those prophecies foretold is here in the speaker's mind. — (nabi'), prophet, has reference to the person who foretells, and (chazon) is his prophetic vision. Both are included here, because not only the vision is completed or fulfilled, but the character and claims of the prophet are authenticated. If this view be correct, then (lachtom), in this last case, has plainly a different shade of meaning from that in which it is first employed. Surely no one critically conversant with the Scriptures needs to be told, that cases of this nature are by no means of unfrequent occurrence. The idea of 'sealing up vision and prophet' by the death of Christ, or by his coming and repealing the old dispensation, is quite foreign from the passage before us. Besides, were there no 'visions' and no 'prophets' under the new dispensation? So Peter did not view the matter, Acts 2: 17: 21. To maintain, as Wieseler does (s. 17), that the vision to be sealed or confirmed is only that of Jeremiah (25: 11), is palpably aside from the scope of the passage, which is of an extent much wider. Besides, this view of the matter would involve a (husteron proteron). All here related is to 'follow' the 70 weeks; but the return from the captivity did not follow them. It occurred while they were 'in transitu', and during the early part of them. Wieseler escapes from this, only by making the 70 weeks, in the verse before us, to mean merely 70 weeks of days, which passed away before the proclamation of Cyrus in Ezra 1; a new exegesis, I admit, but hardly a true one.

(welimshoach qodesh qadashim), 'and to anoint a Holy of Holies'. Is it the Jewish sanctuary which is to be 'rebuilt' and 'anointed', i.e. consecrated to the service of God again? Or is it a 'new sanctuary', such as becomes the new spiritual dispensation? Not the former; for then the article could not fail before (qadashim). Never is it omitted in any case, where 'holy of holies' means 'the most holy place' in the temple. The insertion of the article here would have misled the reader, and naturally obliged him to interpret the passage as designating the sanctuary of the temple of Jerusalem when rebuilt. In the present case, 'a sanctuary', i.e. such an one as is appropriate to the new state of things, is designated. Of such an one the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews speaks: "Christ, the high-priest of good things to come, when he presented himself through a greater and more perfect tabernacle . . . not with the blood of bulls and goats, but by his own blood, once for all entered (eis ta `hagia), 'into the sanctuary', procuring eternal redemption." Heb. 9:11,12. (Ta `hagia, and ta `hagia tön `hagiön) are N. Test. names for (qodesh haqqodashim). This is the 'sanctuary' belonging to that temple, under whose altar the Apocalypticist saw the supplicating souls of the martyrs, Rev. 6:9, comp. also 8:3. 9:13. 14:18. Rev. 11:19 speaks of "the temple of God ... in heaven, where was seen, in his temple, the ark of his testament or covenant." And although in the New Jerusalem there will be no temple (Rev. 21:22), yet before the final consummation of all things, the spiritual temple in heaven, the archetype of the earthly one (Heb. 8:5), is always spoken of by the Hebrew sacred writers, in the New Test. and in the Old, as having an existence. It is that into which Christ as high priest enters, and presents his own propitiatory blood, Heb. 9: 11-14. To 'anoint the sanctuary' there, of course means to prepare it for this new offering; just as the tabernacle and all its furniture was anointed, in order to prepare it for sacrifices and oblations, Ex. 40:9. Indeed the phrase (qodesh qadashim) might be regarded as meaning 'temple' instead of 'sanctuary' merely ; for in Num. 18:10 it is so employed, with the article before the second noun, and in Ezek. 45:3 without the article. Yet I feel no need of resorting to this, as Hoffman does, (Die siebenzig Jahre, s. 65). The expression is more vivid if we take the thing as presented in Heb. 9:11-14. If Paul "knew nothing else among the Corinthians but Jesus Christ and him 'crucified'," and "gloried in nothing save the 'cross' of Christ," then the presentation of atoning blood in the eternal sanctuary, is the cause and consummation of all the blessings promised under the new dispensation. To 'anoint that sanctuary' stands connected with this service in the temple above. Not that we are to suppose a material literal sense should be given to any of these descriptions, but that they are significant as symbolical or figurative. As God is a 'spirit', his sanctuary, and the heaven which he has prepared, are 'spiritual'. Very significant surely must the language of our text have been, to a Hebrew under the ancient dispensation. Wieseler (s. 18) applies the passage under discussion to the altar mentioned in Ezra 3:2, and remarks, (which is true), that the altar is sometimes designated (qodesh qadashim), as in Ex. 29: 37, 30: 29. I have no objections to 'altar' as the meaning; but that any altar built by Jeshua or Zerubbabel corresponded to the one mentioned here, (if the passage indeed is to be so interpreted), I cannot admit. Well has Hoffman said, (I repeat it), that 'an interpretation which assigns to v. 24 only a description of the literal return from Babylon and its immediate consequences, is 'arbitrary'.' In fact, such an exegesis would at once show, that the language of the speaker on the present occasion is extravagant and bombastic.

The interpretation which assigns to 'holy of holies' a 'concrete' sense, and makes it apply to Christ himself, (C. B. Michaelis, Hāv.), or which makes it mean the 'church' (Hengst.) is inadmissible. The phrase never designates 'persons'. Besides, to apply it to the Messiah, would represent him as performing his whole work before he is 'consecrated' to it; whereas the offering which he presents in the eternal sanctuary is the consummation of his mediatorial work.

(9:25:) The preceding verse in a generic way announces seventy weeks, which must pass away before a new and glorious period is ushered in, the characteristics of which are, the restraining and forgiving of sin, and the introduction of holiness and righteousness under a new dispensation. This is indeed the consummation, to which the whole passage in vs. 24-27 has relation. But vs. 25-27 are designed to answer the question that would naturally arise in the mind of Daniel: 'What then is to take place during this long interval of waiting for the accomplishment of our highest hope?' The angel informs him that the so-named 'seventy week' may be subdivided into three portions, viz. into seven, sixty-two, and one. Each of these portions has peculiarities of its own, which mark and distinguish it. The period of 'seven weeks' has a definitive beginning and end, by which it is distinguished, viz. "from the going forth of a command to rebuild Jerusalem unto an anointed one, a prince," thus making the 'terminus a quo' and 'ad quem'. The second has no 'expressed terminus a quo', but from the nature of the case it has apparently an 'implied' one, viz. the end of the first period, or the appearance of an "anointed one, a prince." This takes for granted, that the periods named here are 'successive', and not parallel or contemporaneous. Such, it seems to me, is the first and spontaneous impression of every unbiassed reader ; for how else can the period of seventy weeks be made out ? The 'end' of the second period is of course the end of the sixty-two weeks, i. e. sixty-two weeks from the appearance of the anointed one, the prince. But the end seems also to be marked by another circumstance, viz. 'the cutting off of an anointed one'. So v. 26: "'After' ('achare') sixty-two weeks, an anointed one shall be cut off." Naturally this does not mean some indefinite time afterwards, but a time in near proximity with the end of the second period. The 'third' period (one week) of course begins with the same excision of an anointed one, and continues seven years, during which a foreign prince shall come, and lay waste the city and sanctuary of Jerusalem, and cause the offerings to cease for three and a half years, after which utter destruction shall come upon him, vs. 26, 27.

Thus much for the definite beginning and end of the respective periods, considered as 'successive'. We have further to say, respecting them, that each has its own appropriate occurrences. The 'first' period (seven weeks) has indeed no specific and express description of events, which are to take place, attached to it. But the command 'to restore and rebuild' seems to imply that the work was to be entered upon and advanced. The 'second' period is characterized by the 'continued rebuilding', but in a stinted or scanty measure, because of "troubulous times." Nothing of this kind is said of the first period. The 'third' period is characterized by the occurrence of events, which have been stated in the preceding paragraph. Thus each is distinguished from the other, not merely by limitation of time, but by the events which were to take place respectively in each.

After taking this brief survey of the three component parts of the seventy weeks, and having seen how they are separated and distinguished from each other, let us now return to the seventy weeks, i.e. the generic period, and inquire where we are to begin in counting them.

Daniel regards the period assigned by Jeremiah as very near its close, 9:2. He prays earnestly for the restoration of his people. The angel appears, and tells him, not that the seventy years are near their end (which Daniel already well knew), but that in the councils of Heaven another and larger period is assigned, viz. seven times seventy years, for till further trials of his people, before the great consummation of their highest hopes will be realized. 'When' then does this new period of 490 years commence? The most obvious answer 'a priori' would seem to be: From the time when Daniel is addressed. But the 'events' assigned to the second and third portions of the general period forbid this answer. Daniel saw this vision in B.C. 538. If 7 times 70 years = 490 be subtracted from this, it would bring the 'terminus ad quem' of the whole seventy weeks (counting them successively and continuously), down to B.C. 48, a year in which nothing special took place to distinguish it from the time that followed after it, or went before it. All correspondence of prediction with event, must in such a case, be given up, of course, if such a 'terminus a quo' be adopted.

Let us go back then to B.C. 606, the time from which Daniel plainly dates "the desolations of Jerusalem" (v. 2), and assume this as the 'terminus a quo'; in this case the seventy weeks would end, (counted as before), with B. C. 116; a period, again, which offers nothing in history to distinguish it, and therefore it cannot be the subject of the following prophecy. On either of the preceding grounds, then, we find ourselves at a complete stand.

If we go on now, for the sake of trial, and endeavor to ascertain the 'terminus a quo' of the first part of the seventy weeks, viz. the 7 weeks = 49 years, and begin the count from B.C. 606, i.e. the commencement of the desolations, then we must end the first period with B.C. 557, a period when there was as yet no 'command to rebuild'. Nor was there any 'anointed one and prince' to mark the end of the seven weeks at that time. To make another trial, let us suppose the seven weeks to be counted from the exile of Jehoiachim, 599 B. C, then we must end them with B.C. 550, another period of the like description as that of B.C. 557. If we begin these weeks with the captivity of Zedekiah and the actual and final destruction of Jerusalem B.C. 588, then we obtain 539 B.C. as the 'end' of the period. At this time no command had been given to rebuild Jerusalem, and Darius the Mede was, or was about to be, possessed of the Babylonish throne, who surely cannot be reckoned a (mashiach nagid [Messiah Prince]) on any tolerable ground. At all events, any of these modes of counting would be utterly at variance with the first clause in the verse before us; for the command to rebuild 'precedes' the forty-nine years, and the anointed prince marks the 'close', while, in case Darius be made the 'terminus ad quem', no such command had been given seven weeks (i.e. forty-nine years) 'before' he was king.

The same difficulty lies in the way if we substitute 'Cyrus' instead of Darius. According to Is. 45:1, we might apply (mashiach) to him, for Jehovah speaks of him as his 'anointed one'; and a (nagid) i.e. 'preeminent civil ruler', he certainly was. But history represents Cyrus as himself issuing a decree to rebuild (2nd Chron. 36:23, Ezra 1:1 seq.); and Cyrus could not have been at the beginning and at the end of the forty-nine years, either at one and the same time or at any time, for he reigned only seven years after his appearance in sacred history. If we take, now, the 'terminus a quo' of the forty-nine years which commence with the command to rebuild, and count from the proclamation of Cyrus, (which in itself would agree well with the command in question), then who is the anointed one and prince at the 'end' of those forty-nine years? Xerxes was then on the throne, whose expedition into Greece does not favor his right to the magnificent title in question; and whose intended treatment of the Jews, at the instigation of Haman, as related in the book of Esther, favors it still less. Where then shall we look for the 'command to rebuild', and for an 'anointed one, a prince', forty-nine years afterwards? We have had no success thus far, and history down to the time of Cyrus, as it now lies before us, presents us with no 'data' from which we can make out a period of forty-nine years so defined by events at the beginning and the end of them, as the first clause in v. 25 seems plainly to import or demand.

If we go lower down than Cyrus, we find under Darius Hystaspis the decree of Cyrus for rebuilding the temple renewed, in B.C. 519, (Ezra 6); but forty-nine years after this would bring us again into the reign of Xerxes (B.C. 470), who, as has already been remarked, was no (mashiach nagid). If we descend still lower, down to Artaxerxes Longimanus (B.C. 445), who gave unto Nehemiah full liberty to rebuild (Neh. 2), then the seventy weeks would reach forty-five years beyond the birth of Christ, which of course renders null this calculation. Besides, we can find no appropriate 'anointed one and prince', forty-nine years after the decree of Artaxerxes. We must abandon the hope then of satisfying ourselves in this way, as to the limits of the first period, i.e. the seven weeks. Nor is this all of the difficulty. The 'seven weeks', (and these only), are destitute of any express intimation of what was accomplished or happened, during their continuance. What then, it is natural to inquire, can be the object in view in designating them? Not events, as it would seem, 'during' the forty-nine years, but events mentioned as the 'terminus a quo' and 'ad quem' of those years. Of course these must have their importance. But here again we are met with difficulties. The 'command to rebuild Jerusalem' —when? By whom? After what destruction of it? for this command imports of course an antecedent destruction. Was this by Nebuchadnezzar? Or was it the more partial destruction by Antiochus Epiphanes? These are all the considerable destructions of which history gives us any account before the final wasting by Titus. But this last is out of question; for the whole period of seventy weeks, (of which seven are a part), 'precedes' the Messianic period. As to the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, we have already put that to the test. There remains, as history now stands, only that by Antiochus. If Judas Maccabaeus gave command to rebuild what had been destroyed, when his victories were consummated, (as he probably did), then who is the (mashiach nagid) that makes his appearance forty-nine years after this? Judas reinstated the temple worship B.C. 165, so that forty-nine years would bring us to B.C. 116. There was indeed on the throne of Judea, at that time, the most eminent prince that ever sat upon it after the return from the Babylonish exile, viz. John Hyrcanus, in whose praise Josephus is uncommonly lavish. However, he did not commence his reign then, but in B. C. 135, i.e. nineteen years earlier. Nor is there anything in the occurrences of B.C. 116, which distinguishes that year from any other of the thirty years of his reign. A 'terminus ad quem', therefore, of the seven weeks seems to be looked for here in vain. If we admit that the seven weeks must 'precede' the sixty-two weeks, (and any other order seems to be unnatural, and apparently against the tenor of the whole passage), then we cannot go down to a period so late as that of Judas Maccabaeus and Antiochus, for the commencement of the seven weeks, or the issuing of the command to rebuild.

What can we do then, or where shall we go, to find the appropriate limits of the forty-nine years? Perplexed by questions like these, Vitranga, Hengstenberg, and many others, have adopted a peculiar course, in order to find an issue from these straits. First they have united the seven weeks into one mass with the sixty-two weeks, thus making in effect but two subdivisions of the seventy weeks, viz. one of sixty-nine, and the other of one. This is built on the assumption, that the command to rebuild, spoken of in v. 25, is that which was given by Artaxerxes in the twentieth year of his reign, as recorded in Neh. 2. They then count sixty-nine weeks (62+7) forward, i.e. 483 years. But as the twentieth year of Artaxerxes is usually reckoned at B.C. 445, their reckoning makes thirty-eight years too much on this ground. To avoid this, they reckon some thirty years of it to the private life of Jesus, and make his public ministry (not his birth) the 'terminus ad quem'. Still there remain some eight or nine years too much. This excess is disposed of, by adding some eight or nine years more to the reign of Artaxerxes than chronology usually reckons, (which would make his decree so much earlier), and thus making the time to adjust itself to the events. In the usual chronology, (vouched for by Ctesias and Ptolemy in his Canon), Artaxerxes is represented as reigning forty or forty-one years, and Xerxes as twenty or twenty-one. Hengstenberg insists upon fifty-one for Artaxerxes, and eleven for Xerxes. In this way the twentieth year of Artaxerxes falls back some ten years, just about enough to save the excess above mentioned, made by carrying forward the sixty-nine weeks = 483 years. The 'terminus a quo', then, of the sixty-nine weeks, is the decree of Artaxerxes to rebuild, Neh. 2; the 'terminus ad quem' is the (mashiach nagid) in the emphatic sense, i.e. the 'Lord's Anointed', the 'King of Israel', when he enters upon his public office.

Certainly, this is ingenious; and the result is rather striking, at first view. But further examination throws in our way insuperable obstacles; at which, however, I can but merely hint. (1) The main assumption, that Artaxerxes was the first who issued a 'decree to rebuild Jerusalem', (the terminus a quo), contradicts fact and Scripture both. 'Fact' —inasmuch as Haggai. (in the second year of Darius = B.C. 520), more than seventy years before the twentieth of Artaxerxes, speaks of the people as "dwelling at Jerusalem in ceiled houses," while the house of the Lord lies waste, Hagg. 1:2-4; 'Scripture' —inasmuch as God says expressly of Cyrus, that he shall rebuild the city, Isa. 45:1, 13 and 44:28, comp. 2nd Chron. 36:23, Ezra 1:1-3. In these two last cases, indeed, the temple only is specified, which, being the central and union-point of the whole enterprise of the returning immigrants, is very natural. But the implication of city-building at the same time, is unavoidable and plain. The history of the restored Israelites in Ezra shows beyond a question, that so early as the reign of Darius Hystaspis, (about 519 B.C), there was a very considerable population in Jerusalem —not, I trust, without 'houses' to live in. (2) There is no authority, and no good reason for amalgamating the seven weeks and the sixty-two weeks. The writer has separated them, or at any rate the Masorites have separated them, by putting an Athnach on (shib`ah). I say not that this is decisive authority; but I may say that departure from the accents is generally undesirable, and mostly hazardous. A really good reason for it must be one which is of an imperious nature. (3) The nature of the case separates the two periods in question. In making the simple sum of sixty-nine, (for simple it is, as made out by Hengstenberg), who would ever think of dividing this period into two parts, one of which has no special significance, and has nothing assigned to it which can be a reason for its being reckoned by itself? According to this method of interpretation, the 'terminus a quo' and 'ad quem' of the first period both belong to the period of sixty-nine weeks, and not to that of the seven weeks. But where else, in all the Scriptures, is there such a method of making out a simple number by dividing it into arbitrary parts, and adding these together? (4) V. 26 disproves the assertion, that the speaker meant to reckon in the manner of Hengstenberg. What says he concerning the close of the great period in question? "After sixty-two weeks an anointed one shall be cut off," etc. But why does he not say: "After sixty-nine weeks?" If all is to be thrown into one period, this would be inevitable, in case he meant to be rightly understood. That he does not say sixty-nine, shows that he reckons the second period of sixty-two weeks as one in and by itself. Besides, if Hengstenberg reckons rightly as to the sixty-nine weeks, even they do not reach, by his own concession, to the 'cutting off of the Messiah'. This was three and a half years after the close of that period. (5) I add, in order to complete the view of objections to his interpretation, that having reached the middle of the third period, (viz. the one week = seven years), the other remaining three and a half years are wholly unmanageable. With him, "the people of a prince that will come," and who will destroy the city and sanctuary, are the Romans under Titus. Did these invaders then come against the Jews, within three and a half years after the death of Christ? No; they did not come within a third of a century. Moreover, the tyrant or desolator who comes, is himself 'to be wasted', (be a (shomem), v. 27). The implication is, that this will take place at the end of the latter half of the seven years. But Titus did not die within that period, nor until A. D. 81. If Vespasian be selected as the prince in question, the difference will be only about three years. Neither of them died a violent death. The "outpouring of what is decreed upon the son of perdition" (v. 27), may be looked for in vain, after the death of Christ, and within the limits assigned by the angel.

We must add to all this, that the first period has of itself neither a definite beginning nor end, according to Hengtenberg's interpretation. The 'third' is also destitute (as to its latter half) of a 'terminus ad quem'. He also assigns to the first period, what belongs to the second, viz. the slow and interrupted rebuilding of the city, (which can be done only by offering violence to the grammatical structure of the language), and consequently he leaves the second long period of 62 weeks, without cognizing anything that is accomplished during that period which would definitely mark it. Finally, to ground all this theory of interpretation, as the advocates of it do, on a disputed point of chronology, (the ten years to be added to Artaxerxes and taken from Xerxes), and one in respect to which, after the remarks by Hoffman (Die 70 Jahre, s. 90 seq.), we may venture to say the probability is strongly against them, can hardly meet the just demands of criticism in a case of such a nature, or satisfy the inquirer who has no favorite scheme to defend.

After all this, then, we are compelled again to ask, with still more emphasis : " When do the 7 weeks (and of course the 70) begin? And when do they end?

Wieseler has dropped the 7 weeks, by virtue of his views concerning (nechtak), which he makes to mean 'abbreviated, abridged'. First the original 70 years of Jeremiah are abridged 7 years, in the execution of the threatening. Then, to correspond with this, the seven weeks of years are abridged or omitted from the new period of 70 year-weeks. "Why? is a question that is hardly answered. The mere 'exegete' might feel himself greatly relieved if he could dispose of this difficulty so easily. But for myself, I am more inclined to confess my ignorance than to get rid of the matter in this way. Hoffman (Weissag. und Erfüll. s. 301 seq.), in his latest view of this subject, says, that the seven weeks can be applied to no period preceding the vision of Daniel, and to none during the 62 weeks, or during the one week. He thinks that the seven weeks, in which Jerusalem is to be splendidly rebuilt, and the (mashiach nagid) to make his appearance, must come 'after' both these periods. But when? How? He does not answer these questions, but cautiously abstains from giving any express opinion. I consider this, in both Wieseler and himself, as only a kind of ingenious way of confessing that they do not understand the matter. And if 'they' do not, it is somewhat discouraging; for writers of more acuteness in philology do not often make their appearance; and these respective discussions of theirs, moreover, are the latest, and therefore are carried on under peculiar advantages.

Only one case more occurs, which calls for examination, viz. such a one as Hoffman supposes: Can we reverse the 'order' of the periods, and find the 7 weeks in the period immediately 'preceding' the advent of Christ? They would then close by the appearance of a 'Messiah a Prince'; and so far all is well as to the 'end' of the period. But where is the 'terminus a quo'? The 49th year before Christ, or any year proximate to it, is distinguished by no 'command to rebuild Jerusalem'; nor indeed was there occasion for any, since the city had not of late been laid waste.

I do not see, then, but that we must suspend our investigations here, as connected with 'history'; because we seem to have exhausted all the probable materials which history presents. We must betake ourselves at last, then, to simple 'philology'. Can anything, and if anything, then how much can be gathered from it? Possibly a strict and thorough investigation of the words may throw some light on these dark sentences.

At the beginning of v. 25, (wetheda' wethaskel) denotes that something specially worthy of attention, is about to be said. I have rendered (wetheda' by 'mark well'), lit. it may be translated: 'and thou must know'; but the Kal Imperf. here is used in a kind of Imper. sense, § 125. 3. c. (wethaskel) might well be rendered: 'Pay particular attention'. It also means 'to understand', as connected with such an act of the mind. The sense of both verbs might be thus expressed: 'Be thou well assured', or 'know thou for certainty'. Why is such an intimation here given? Plainly because there is a transition from a preceding generic to a specific statement; and not merely this, but the general declaration of Messianic blessings that had just been made, is now to be followed by the prediction of troublous times which are to 'precede' those blessings. The change is so great, the things about to be said are of a tenor so different from those which had been said, that the speaker, in order to guard against surprise, or to fortify against doubt, calls the earnest and particular attention of Daniel to what he is going to disclose.

(min motza' dabar), as to the form of expression, reminds us of (yatza' dabar) in v. 23. But in vain do critics seek to identify the first with the second, as to meaning. 'The (dabar) in v. 23, plainly refers to the communication in vs. 24-27. That in the verse before us as plainly means a 'command' or 'message' to rebuild Jerusalem. The fact that the (dabar) now before us has 'no article', shows conclusively, that it does not renew the mention of (dabar) in v. 23; for in v. 23 itself, when (dabar) is there repeated, it has the article (baddabar), because this last refers to the previous (dabar). So it would have the article here, in case a like reference were here intended. For the same reason, (dabar) in v. 25 cannot refer to the (debar Yehowah) of v. 2; whither so many critics refer it. That it has no article, is a proof that it has no antecedent to which it refers. It is a 'new message'; and of course the article would give a wrong direction to the mind of the reader. The allegation made by several critics, that the negligence of the later Hebrew in respect to the article stands in the way here of any argument drawn from the presence or absence of it, may be credited by those who have some favorite views to be supported by such a position, or by those who are not conversant with the later Hebrew writings. Those who are in neither of these predicaments, will be slow to believe such allegations until they are proved, and especially in a case so plain as the present.

But 'from whom' is the 'command' or 'message' to proceed? No one is designated in the context. From a 'superior' a 'command' (for plainly (dabar) of such a nature here) must proceed. Is it some 'king'? If so, we should be at a loss to say 'what king' is meant. He is not the (Mashiach Nagid) for certainty, because the latter comes into view only at the 'close' of the seven weeks. In such a case, then, we naturally turn to 'God' as the author of the command; and in this we are amply confirmed by Isa. 44:26, 28, (le'mor lirushalaim tibbaneh tiwua'hsed), 'saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built up, and to the temple, Thou shalt be founded'. —In simply designating 'the going forth of a command', the speaker has left unexplained what the nature of that command is. The sequel is designed to explain its object. It is 'to rebuild Jerusalem'. The (dabar) or 'command' then is, that something should be done. By whom? Of course by those who have an interest in Jerusalem, i.e. by the Jews; certainly by the Jews, provided the rebuilding is to precede the Christian era.

(lehashib welibnoth), to 'rebuild', or 'to restore and to build', which amounts here to the same thing. The verb (shub), followed by another verb either with or without a (we) before it, may everywhere be found marking simply the idea of 'repetition, again'. Commonly a 'definite' mood and tense is employed; but I can see no reason why 'Infinitives' (as in the present case) may not be employed in the same manner. The obvious idea, at all events, is that of 'rebuilding'. Whether, however, we so translate, or render the phrase 'to restore and build up', the idea is for substance the same. To attach to (hashib) an intensive idea, viz. that of 'completely restoring', belongs neither to the verb, the Conj. in which it is, or the nature of the case. To 'rebuild' a city, does not of course mean to build it as largely or as well as it was before built. These are accidental circumstances, not essential ones. The implication in either way of translating is, that, previous to the command in question, Jerusalem has been laid waste. Whether utterly or partially, is not necessarily implied. This is left undetermined.

('ad mashiach nagid), 'to an anointed one, a prince' [Messianic Prince]; not to 'an anointed prince', for then (mashiach) must take its place behind (nagid), according to the laws of the language. In its present position, moreover, standing after ('ad), it cannot be a 'predicate', for this it could be only in case ('ad) were omitted, and then the assertion might be: 'Anointed [is] a prince'. We must therefore put the word in 'apposition' with (nagid) . But what 'Messiah' is it? If it be the expected and predicted Messiah, the great Deliverer, then, of course, 'mashiach' being an appellative must have the article [i.e. ha-mashiach, the Messiah]. Hengstenberg says, the article is omitted because the word is used as a proper name here. But if it be a proper name, then of course (nagid) would be an appellative, and must have the article; just as in the case of (dawid hammelek). Besides, although so common as a proper name with us, and also in the N. Test., where is the proof from the O. Test. that it was 'anciently' employed in this way? The word is used to designate the 'high priest', Lev. 4:3, 5, 16; often for a lawfully anointed king, 1st Sam. 2:10; 12:3, 5; 16:6, al. saepe; it is used to designate Cyrus as a specially chosen and consecrated instrument of liberating the Jews, Isa. 45:1; and sometimes (in the plural) to designate patriarchs or nobles, Ps. 105:15, 1st Chron. 16:22. Only once in all the Heb. Scriptures is it applied to the Lord Jesus Christ, viz. in Ps. 2: 2, if we except the present case. This surely does not look like a 'proper name' in ancient times ; and most plainly it was not commonly so employed. The license then which is alleged, respecting the 'omission' of the article, cannot be explained, or vindicated on this ground. If the 'Messiah' had been meant in the case before us, the article would seem to be natural, and one might almost say, absolutely indispensable. —Can it mean, then, a 'heathen' prince? It might, because it is applied to Cyrus in Isa. 45:1. Yet evidently it is so applied there, only because he was a chosen instrument of the Lord, to accomplish his designs in respect to the Hebrews. The probability, in the present case, is strong against the idea of a 'heathen' king, since there is nothing in the context which would explain the application of (mashiach) to such an one, while such an explanation is palpable in the case of Cyrus. Naturally, it would of itself be understood as implying some lawful priest or prince of the Jews anointed to priestly or to regal office, or to both.

(nagid) means one who is 'prominent, preeminent, conspicuous'. Hence it becomes an appellative for 'prince'. The office implied is a 'civil' one. This I suppose to be the reason why it is added to the preceding word. (mashiach) might of itself mean either king or priest. To remove all doubt, (nagid) is added to the preceding word, and put in application as explanatory, —an idiom by no means uncommon. Of course the article should not be employed, since it is omitted in the principal or leading word. The true idea then seems to be: 'an anointed one who is a prince' or 'civil ruler'. That some distinguished personage is meant, can hardly be questioned. Who it is, or when he was to appear, are questions, as we have seen, which cannot easily be solved by any history known to us.

As to (shbu'im shibah), enough has already been said. The Athnach on the last word seems to be rightly placed there. If the following sixty-two weeks are to be combined in one period with these seven, then v. 26 could not say: 'After those sixty-two weeks', etc., but must say: 'After those sixty-nine weeks' etc. Besides, there is no example in the Scriptures, as has already been remarked, of such a way of announcing or making up numbers. Moreover, the (toshub) that follows must have a (we) before it, in case the building of the city is to be referred back to the seven weeks, as some maintain, or even in case they are to be included in the sum of the building-period as announced in the second clause. It seems quite clear, moreover, that the seven weeks, which commence with a command to 'rebuild' and end with a 'distinguished and lawful king', imply of course a 'prosperous' rebuilding, which is consummated by the coming of a distinguished lawful sovereign. In contrast with this, the building of the city during the sixty-two weeks is to be scanty, and the declaration is made that it will be carried on 'in troublous times'. Whether the seven weeks are to be arranged before or after the sixty-two, alters not the nature of the present case. A contrast between the two periods is, as it seems to me, plainly designed to be made. The seven weeks are 'fausti temporis [fortunate time]', the sixty-two are 'infausti temporis [unfortunate time]'. The seven weeks are to be followed by the reign of a (mashiach nagid); the sixty-two weeks are to be followed by the cutting off of a (mashiach), and by the wasting of the temple and city during the week that follows. Presented in this light, the contrast between the seven and the sixty-two weeks becomes quite striking and palpable.

What then do we gather, at last, from our 'philological' inquiries? We gather at least some things, with a good degree of conviction; (1) That the periods of seven and sixty-two are not only diverse and separate from each other, but are actually in 'contrast' with each other, in regard to events respectively belonging to them. (2) That the period of seven weeks will follow some waste and desolate state of Jerusalem, which Heaven will, at the beginning of those weeks, give commandment to repair; and this reparation will be followed by the reign of a lawful and distinguished sovereign, i.e. this period will end in prosperity, under an anointed one, a prince. (3) The 'terminus a quo' of this period is specified not by the designation of 'time' but 'event', and this event (a command 'to rebuild') is different from anything that happened before the return from exile, and different from anything predicted by Jeremiah respecting the end of the exile. Consequently the seven-weeks period does not commence, at the same time with the desolations of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. (4) Of course, I do not see how the conclusion can be well avoided, that the seven weeks are to be regarded as a part of the seventy weeks which 'precede' the Messianic times. I cannot accede therefore to the remark, that seven is here merely a mystical number, as often in the Apocalypse, and that it may, when thus understood, be regarded as designating a 'completion' or 'fulness' of time, unlimited by specific bounds; moreover, that we are of course at liberty to place it wherever and whenever events will correspond, without being restrained by the number of 'years'. Why should this be the case with only one of the three periods before us? The other two are clearly specific and definite; and so are the numbers of this book in general. What authorizes us, then, to make the present case an exception to all the rest?

"But we can find nothing in history that accords with the period of seven weeks; certainly not in the history of the Jews before the Christian era."

This may be true. Hoffman (s. 301) thinks so much to be clear, viz. that 'the seven weeks come 'after' the sixty-two weeks ; and that the terminus a quo of the seven is not the same with that of the sixty-two, and that it cannot be found in any period antecedent to the time of Daniel's vision,' (s. 299). It is the 'history' of the times, as he thinks, which forces us to such a conclusion. Unless such an appeal to history can be made with much force and propriety, it must certainly be natural to regard the three periods both as 'successive' and 'continuous'. But if now we appeal to actual history, as it lies before us, this seems to favor the view of Hoffman; for the proclamation of Cyrus, as we have seen, if taken as the beginning of the seven weeks, leads to no (mashiach nagid) at the end, except either to Darius the Persian king, in the last part of his reign, or to Xerxes in the beginning of his. Neither of these corresponds to such an appellation. 'Messiah Prince' cannot be Ezra, for he went up to Jerusalem some seventy-nine years after Cyrus' proclamation, instead of forty-nine years; it cannot be Nehemiah, for he went up ninety-one years after the same. Before Cyrus' time, no 'command' or 'liberty' to rebuild was given. Must we not then consider ourselves as forced, with Hoffman, to the conclusion that the seven weeks must come after the other periods? But if so, then we must ask: 'How'? 'When'? These are questions, however, that we seem not to have the means of answering satisfactorily. The most promising period disclosed by history, seems to be that between the time when Judas began to repair the desolations made by Antiochus Epiphanes, and the reign of that powerful and popular king, 'John Hyrcanus', the nephew of Judas. The forty-nine years, if begun with the repairs by Judas, would fall about the middle of Hyrcanus' reign ; and under him, the Jews were an independent and respected nation. He too was both 'high-priest' and 'king', a (machiach nagid). But, as has been already said, the year B.C. 116, (the middle of his reign), has nothing particular in itself to distinguish it; and this seems to make the application of the seven weeks to this period somewhat doubtful, or wholly so. Still perhaps it is not absolutely decisive against it, because there is nothing in the prediction, which obliges us to 'commence' the reign of the Anointed one and Prince with the very last year of the seven weeks. Would it not be sufficient, if such a prince were already on the throne when they end?

If I have not given satisfaction to the reader, as to the resolution of the difficulty in question, (and doubtless I have not), I have at least shown him why I have not done it. I do not despair, after all, of a solution, at some future period, on the part of someone, who has better vantage ground than we now have. But I confess myself unable to answer all the questions that may be here raised. This, however, only proves my want of adequate knowledge, and not that the subject is necessarily inexplicable. But of this matter something more will be said in the sequel.

('And sixty and two weeks (tashub wenibnetha), shall it be rebuilt'). The subject is 'the city'. The idiomatic (tashub) with the verb that follows, is the same as in (lehashib welibnoth) of the first clause. The 'terminus a quo' of the sixty-two weeks, (since it is not specifically named), has been supposed by some to be the same with that of the seventy years of Jeremiah. The angel tells Daniel, that, instead of seventy years simply, 70 'weeks of years' are 'determined on' or 'decided' (nechtak). As nothing definite is expressly said of the time when this last period of seventy 'weeks' commences, it might seem to be, as some have maintained, the same time as that with which the seventy 'years' of Jeremiah began. The Ace. of time here (sixty-two weeks) is the usual Ace. of when or how long, § 116. 2. It does not strictly imply, perhaps, that during all this period the city was in the regular process of building. It may be sufficient, that during the period named the building in question took place. Naturally, however, it must be understood as designating a protracted season of building up. But if we begin to reckon with B.C. 606, (according to the assumption above), there must be a considerable period (seventy years) during which the city was still in a state of entire desolation, viz., down to the time of Cyrus, B.C. 536. From the time of Cyrus, however, down to Antiochus Epiphanes, it was in a state of gradual although sometimes interrupted, advance. It was built in 'troubulous times'. Can we then, in view of all this, and after the preceding discussions, go back to B.C. 606 for the beginning of the second period, i.e. the sixty-two weeks?

(rechob wecharutz), 'with broad spaces and narrow limits'. I take these much contested words as the 'Acc. adverbial', designating the manner in which the city will be built in the times of trouble. (rechob) 'with breadth', i.e. 'with wide spaces, LXX, (eis platos). 'Street' the word often means because street is 'a wide space'. Also it designates larger openings in cities, like our technical word 'place', and the Latin 'forum'. To reverse the order of the words, and to make (rechob) the Nom. to the verbs would be a degradation of the sense. Besides, where in the Scriptures do we find the expression 'build' applied to streets? It seems quite probable, if not altogether certain, that (rechob) and (charutz) are opposites, and make a contrast; yet one which is very descriptive. The first shows that 'large spaces' are left within the city, which are not built upon. Then, on the other hand, (charutz) designates that which is 'limited, narrowed, clipped, narrowly defined'. Such were the houses to be at least, if this does not pertain to the form of the houses themselves, (as probably it does not), it at least applies to the narrow and defined limits within which they are built. In a city full of inhabitants, small spaces are left, and ample expansion is given to the mass of buildings. But here, because of the "troubulous times," the reverse takes place. When the angel wishes to tell Zechariah that Jerusalem shall yet be 'overflowing' with inhabitants, he says: "Because of the abounding of man and beast, Jerusalem shall be inhabited (perazoth) with [sub-urban] villages". The opposite to such an idea is implied by (charutz). To translate this word 'ditch, water-sluice, conduit', or else 'judgment, decision', makes no tolerable sense, and indeed such a version is incapable of philological defence. To render (wecharutz) 'it is decided' (Häv., Hengst., Wies.) presents two difficulties; first it makes a divulsion from the preceding word, with which the accents connect it; and secondly such an idea would demand (charutz hu') or (charutzah) instead of (wecharutz). It is evident, on the whole, that the word is one part of an antithetic couplet, of which (rechob) is the other. Of the translation: 'it is decided', Hoffman justly says: "It is opposed to all sound advance of expression or description." It certainly is an unlooked-for declaration in case we interpret it in the manner now in question, i.e. such as to break the thread of the description. A signal good, or a signal evil, might readily be spoken of as 'decreed'; but to affirm this of a mere subordinate circumstance in the building of the city, and interrupt the discourse in order to affirm it, seems at least not to be very probable.

(ubtzoq ha'ittim), lit. 'and in straitness of the times', in our English version, 'even in troublous times'. The (u) prefix, however, need not be rendered intensive by translating it 'even'. The idea is somewhat more generic than this last version would make it, inasmuch as the latter clause means, that the times in general of the rebuilding will be times of hardship and suffering. That they were so, is fully evident from the records of Nehemiah and Ezra, and from the history of the Maccabees; not to speak of Josephus, who depends almost wholly on these records. That the city made progress slowly, and with not a few interruptions, from the proclamation of Cyrus until the reign of Antiochus, is sufficiently apparent from the history of the Jews during that interval of time. The language of prophecy rarely dwells on minute particulars of history. It is enough, in the present case, that we can make a generic application of it.

(9:26:) Two things are made very plain by the first part of this verse, vis. first, that the period of sixty-two weeks stands by itself, separated, in the view of the writer, from the preceding period of seven weeks. Otherwise it would be unavoidable that he should either say: 'After sixty-nine weeks', or else: 'After seven weeks and sixty-two weeks'. This circumstance seems to be too decisive to allow us to amalgamate, as many have done, the first and second periods into one, as to the 'terminus a quo' and 'ad quem'. Secondly, the destruction of the city and temple by the people of a prince that would come, i.e. invade the holy land, shows that the issue of "troublous times" is into those far more troublous, and which are the consummation of all that is threatened against the Jews. In 8: 28 we have the like representation; (1) It is (be'acharith), 'in the latter part' of the fourth dominion, (= the latter part of the sixty-two weeks), and (kehathem happoshe'im), 'when transgressors have come to the full', i.e. filled up the measure of their sins, that the destroyer and revenger comes in. (2) There, as here, the destroyer, when he has finished his work of desolation in the holy land, comes to a fearful and sudden end. In 8: 25, this is expressed by (be'ephem yad yishaber), here by (basheteph). The contrast between this and the end of the seven weeks, can hardly fail to strike the mind of an impartial interpreter. The seven weeks end in an 'anointed one' who is also a 'Prince', i.e. a legitimate high priest and king, uniting in himself a double office, and reigning over a city rebuilt or repaired by the command of heaven, and made prosperous; the sixty-two weeks end in the destruction of a city and sanctuary, which had been but scantily built, and in seasons of pressure and calamity. A seven years of wasting and persecution is their immediate sequel. Whoever looks on the representation in this light, must of necessity concede, that the periods of seven and sixty-two are set in real contrast to each other, as has been intimated, and are by no means to be amalgamated, or either of them virtually moved out of sight. Both periods are equally real, at least they are so in the view of the writer; and we cannot properly dispose of either without making it significant.

(yikareth mashiach), 'an anointed one shall be cut off'. Not 'the Messiah' or 'the anointed one', for there is no article here, as there must be if such were the meaning. As we have seen, (mashiach) was not a proper name in ancient times; and as an appellative, it should of course take the article. But this being omitted, we are admonished to look in another direction for the meaning of the word (mashiach). 'Priest' or 'king' we have seen that it may mean, (see on v. 25, (mashiach nagid)), because both of these, when duly appointed, were 'anointed' with oil in the name of the Lord. 'An anointed one', therefore, is the appellation of all who are thus consecrated to high office. Nor can the term be applied to any mere king solely because he is king; and specially is it inapplicable to any 'heathen' king, unless indeed, like Cyrus, such an one be chosen on the part of heaven for specific and important purposes. But as the Scriptures apply it to an anointed 'priest' or 'king' under the Jewish dispensation, so we may here apply it to either, just as the context demands. It is not the same personage as the (mashiach nagid) of v. 25, for if it were, the article would be demanded. Besides the omission of this, it is quite evident that the condition and circumstances of the two, are very diverse; the (mashiach nagid) apparently reigns in prosperity, while the (mashiach) of our text is to be cut off and destroyed. Not that the word (yikareth `ebed) always and necessarily designates a violent death, or the death of a criminal, as some allege; for sometimes the word means to fail or lack, e.g. Josh. 9:23, (lo' yikareth), 'a servant shall never fail' or 'be lacking'. But in the passage before us it seems most probable, that the usual sense of the word is retained. We shall see, in the historical illustration, that such is the case. The (mashiach) I must therefore regard as the Lord's 'anointed' high-priest, Onias III, conspicuous for his piety and his steadfastness, who was displaced from office by Antiochus, and his heathenish brother put in possession of his place. Soon after Onias was obliged to flee to Daphnae, near Antioch, for a refuge from the malice of his Jewish enemies; thence he was drawn by false promises, and murdered by the governor of Antioch, vicegerent of Antiochus. His son, instead of succeeding his father Onias, was obliged to fly to foreign lands, and finally built up Leontopolis in Egypt. But during the rest of Antiochus' reign, no lawful high priest had possession of the appropriate office. The people were forced to accept of heathenish Jews as their high priests; so that what is said in the sequel, although dark at first, and not a little embarrassed with the glosses put upon it both in ancient and in modern times, becomes intelligible when rightly interpreted.

(we'an lo), our Eng. version renders 'but not for himself', evidently building on the assumption, that the 'Messiah' here means 'Jesus Christ', and so expressing the idea that he died for the sins of the people, and not upon his own account, i.e. not because of anything which he had done. So also Vitringa, Hävernicks, Rosenmüller. But the Heb. idiom forbids this interpretation. Were the idea conveyed by the passage that which our version gives, it must run thus: (welo' lo). The word ('en') is by no means a simple particle, expressing merely 'negation' like (lo'), but a verb meaning 'is not'. Like all verbs it demands a 'subject', expressed or implied. When expressed, it takes the subject, if a 'pronoun', as a suffix, and adapts its form; accordingly, if other words are subjects, they are put in the Gen. after the 'negative verb', which then assumes, as in our text, the 'construct' form, ('en') then must have a subject. Its very form (const.) is designed to show that one is implied. What then is it? Whence are we to supply it? From the context, all must concede. If this be admitted, then those interpretations, which take ('en') in the same sense as if it were (lo'), of course will not abide the test. So C. B. Michaelis: 'And not to be will be his lot'; Sept. in Cod. Chis., (kai ouk estai). But this in Hebrew would be ('enenu'). Others again translate thus: And nothing will belong to him. But ('en') does not mean 'nothing', but it means 'is not', i.e. something either expressed or implied 'is not'. Others again thus: 'And no one remained to him', (Sack, Hitzig); which has to meet the same difficulty, for ('en') is not 'no one', but simply 'is not'. Rosch (Stud. und Krit. 1834) gives the phrase this turn: 'And no one was present for him'. In this way he applies it to designate the death of Seleucus IV Philopator, at a time when neither his son Demetrius, nor his brother Antiochus, was near him. But ('en') does not mean 'is not present', but 'is not'. Besides, if it did, it does not follow that the 'one not present' is limited to son or brother, but 'one' extends to any or all that belong in any way to the (mashiach). Beyond all this, a mere 'heathen' king, like Seleucus, would not be called by such a name as 'Messiah'. —More improbable still is the turn given by the Vulgate, Jahn, and Scholl: 'Non erit ejus populus', sc. 'qui eum negatarus est'. But whence comes 'people' in this case? And if we might supply ('en' ammo) cannot well mean, that the Jewish nation 'should be cut off'; it merely denies their existence. —Hengstenberg, who has finely illustrated ('en') (Christol. II. s. 474-478), and shown the necessity of an 'implied' subject, has not succeeded equally well in making out that subject. He says, the denial in ('en') must refer to what belonged to the (mashiach); and this he thinks appropriately to be 'Herrschaft', i.e. dominion. Of course he regards the (mashiach) here as the suffering Saviour. But how was his 'dominion' lost, by his being cut off? 'Temporal dominion' he never sought or claimed; but 'spiritual' he 'acquired' by the very set of enduring readily his sufferings, Phil. 2: 8,9.

Passing by, then, all these various methods of interpretation, let us still further urge the question: What is to be supplied as a subject for the verb, from the context? I know of no other answer that can be made to this, on a ground strictly grammatical, but that (mashiach) must be regarded as the proper word. Altogether of a tenor like to the passage before us, is Ex. 22: 2, (shallem yeshallem 'im 'en lo wenimkar bignebatho), i.e. 'he shall surely replace it; if he has not, then he shall be sold on account of his theft'. Here (shallem), or its kindred noun (shillum), is plainly to be supplied after ('en). The same as to (mashiach), in the case before us. It is forced upon us by the grammar of the language. But if this be admitted, (and I see no way to avoid it), then of course we must give to (lo) a different meaning from that commonly given, and refer it to the ('am) of v. 24. For to say that an 'anointed one' shall be cut off, and then to say that 'there is no anointed one to him' after such an event, would be unmeaning if not frivolous. To say, that when Onias the anointed high priest shall be cut off, there will be no authorized and proper (mashiach) to the 'people' of the Jews, is pregnant with meaning, and accords with historical fact. If anyone takes exception to the distance of the antecedent from (lo), it would be easy to point him to similar and even stronger cases of such a nature; e.g. Isa. 8:21, (boh); and the same in Ps. 68:11, 15. So (yesudatho) in Ps. 87:1, and not a few other cases of a like nature. I concede that we are not to refer a pronoun very far either backwards or forwards, except when necessity calls. But here seems to be such a necessity; for no consistent grammatical sense can be made out in any other way, and this makes one quite apposite and facile. Steudel (Pfingst-programm. 1833, s. 36 seq.) was the first, so far as I know, who advanced the position that (lo) refers to ('ammeka) in v. 24. Hoffman (in his 'Die' 70 'Jahre', s. 72) pronounces against it, but after all he virtually adopts it, in his later work, Weissag. und Erfüll. s. 303. Nothing can be plainer, than that the difficulties of the passage are greatly diminished by this interpretation. I must add, in order to prevent misunderstanding, that I regard (mashiach) as more indicative of the high priest's official dignity and circle of duty, than merely of his person. When he is cut off, the people fail of having one lawfully to fill his place. But that the passage cannot well apply to Jesus the Messiah, seems plain from the fact, that his death 'introduced' him to an eternal high priesthood, instead of cutting him off from such an office.

'And the city and the sanctuary will the people of the prince who is to come destroy'. — (yashchith) does not necessarily mean a 'total destruction', but such a wasting as mars the object concerned, and renders it comparatively useless or worthless. The article before 'city' and 'sanctuary', points to these words in v. 24. (am nagid) omits the article before the second noun, because this (nagid) is different from that in v. 25, and the article would give a wrong sense; or at least the insertion of it would make it dubious to the reader, inasmuch as it would naturally refer him to the (nagid) in v. 25. The (nagid) here is merely a heathen prince acting in a civil capacity, in distinction from a (mashiach) who belongs to the people of God. —(habba') is not a verb but a participle. The article makes it distinctive, lit. 'of the comer', or 'of him who cometh' or 'will come'; or the word may be understood of coming in a hostile sense, i.e. invading, as in Dan. 1:2, Jer. 36:29. It seems to point to a well-known personage, who is to be the leader of the destroyers, viz. of the ('am) before mentioned. In 8:25 the same personage is fully and plainly described, and in a way much like to that in vs. 26,27, of the present passage. (habba'), then, virtually appeals to the knowledge of the reader, who has perused the prophecy in chap. 8.

(weqitzo), 'and his end'; whose? The obvious grammatical answer is the end of the (nagid habba'). One need but compare 8:25, respecting Antiochus: 'He shall be broken in pieces without [human] hand', and to join with this 11:45, 'And he shall come to his end (mp is), and none shall kelp him (we'en `ozar lo)', in order to see how exactly all three of the passages agree. In all, the 'end' in question follows the injuries done to the holy city and temple. Manifestly the same personage is concerned. We cannot, therefore, refer (qitzo) to 'city' and 'sanctuary' (Häv.), for the suff. should then be plural; nor to (yashechith), i.e. the action of destroying which ends in an overwhelming, (Hengst.). Indeed such an application would probably never have been thought of, had not that interpretation needed its aid, which makes Titus the Roman chief to be the (nagid) in this case, who is to destroy city and sanctuary (basheteph). But such a construction is incompatible with grammar, and equally so with the parallel passages to which reference has been made above.

(basheteph), lit. 'with an inundation or overwhelming flood'. But the literal sense is here out of question; and the figurative one of course is, that of being swept away by a resistless torrent of evils or calamities. The simple image of merely a vast or numerous army of men cannot be vindicated as an appropriate significance of this word, which in its tropical meaning must indicate 'overwhelming evil'. One needs but to compare 8: 25 and 11: 45, in order to see how entirely in accordance with each other these three passages are, respecting the sudden death of the tyrant and persecutor. The article in (basheteph) may be explained in two ways; first as standing before a noun used here in an abstract sense, § 107- 3. Note 1. c; or secondly, on the ground of a destruction already predicted, and regarded as known or understood, comp. 7: 26 and 8: 25. In brief thus : 'The city and sanctuary shall be marred by the subjects of a prince whose coming you know, and of whose fearful end you are also cognizant.'

(we`ad qetz milchamah wgw), 'and unto the end shall be war, a decreed measure of desolation'. A much contested passage, about which a great variety of opinions exist. Hoffman (Weissag. etc. s. 305) thinks, that (qetz milchamah) here means the end of a war, viz. of a war that will arise against Antiochus in consequence of his persecution and oppression. But against this lies the objection, that the idea of another war, different from that which is implied in the preceding context that speaks of the marring of the city and sanctuary, can hardly be supposed to be distinctly in the mind of the reader here. In fact, if the idea was designed to be so specific as that which the context would naturally suggest, the article would be necessary before (milchamah). The fact that this word has no article, shows that it is not intended merely to reproduce the idea that lies concealed in the preceding clause, viz. that of a state of mutual hostility and contest. War in its more general sense, viz. a continued state of contest and desolation, following on after the marring of city and sanctuary, is plainly the idea conveyed by the text. Had the author written (hattilchamah), the reader would spontaneously refer it to what is implied in the preceding clause. To prevent this, as well as to give the idea a more generic shape, the article is omitted. — As to (qetz), is it in the const. state before (milchamah) (as the conjunctive accent [] would seem to imply), or is there a pause here that would naturally require a lesser distinctive accent ?

The translation above is founded on the latter assumption, which, of late, is the more general one. The train of accents which ends in 'Takeph Qaton' (as here), has a great variety of changes, dependent on the fact whether the clause consists of two, three, or four words, and more dependent on this than on the sense or real connection of the words as any one may see in Nordheimer's Heb. Gramm. II. p. 337. In fact, it is palpably before him in the present case; for (qetz) has a 'Munahh', while the particle before it (`ad) has a distinctive accent (named 'a prince'), viz. a 'Pashta'. Will it be pretended that (qetz) has a nearer relation to (milchamah), than (`ad) has to (qetz)? I grant that the consecution of accents shows that the Accentuators probably regarded (qetz) as being in the const. state. But 'an end of a war' is too loose an expression, in this connection, to admit of any good defence. If, however, we translate 'unto the end' or 'an end shall be war', and thus separate (qetz) from a const. state, then why has it not the article? We should perhaps expect (haqetz), 'the end', viz. one which the reader had already been taught to anticipate, see 8:17. But if the writer had inserted the article here, he would have cast the mind of the reader back upon the preceding (qetzo) as the antecedent. The fact that he has omitted both article and pronoun suff. in (qetz), makes it plain that he means another (qetz), viz. one of 'time', and not merely of calamity or catastrophe. There is another ground, also, of the omission in this case, one founded in the peculiar usage of the author, which I have not seen noticed. This is, that he elsewhere speaks of the same period in the same way, viz. by 'omitting' the article. So in 8:19, where it is said: 'An end (qetz) will be at an appointed time (lemono`ed)'. Observe that the writer does not say (lammo`ed), 'at the appointed time', which would presuppose a knowledge of this period on the part of the reader, but 'an appointed time', viz. a time which Heaven has fixed. Nor does he say (qappetz) in 8:19, because he does not take it for granted that the reader has a limitation of the period in his mind. So in 8:17, where (le`eth-qetz); has plainly the generic idea of 'a period which has its limits', i.e. which is fixed by an overruling Providence. Exactly so in 11:35, (`ad `eth qetz), where it is again said, that this 'end' will be (lammor`ed). Here observe the article in the latter word, in reference to 8:19. Again in 12:4, (`ad `eth qetz), as much as to say: 'a period of consummation'. The same in 12:9. Now in some of these cases, (indeed in all excepting the first mention of (qetz)), we might expect to find the article; but plainly it is the writer's design to communicate, by this phraseology, only the generic idea of 'a period of consummation'. For this the article would be inappropriate, in any of the cases here presented. The sum of all is, that the idea here intended to be communicated is this, viz. that unto 'an appointed time' or 'limited period', (limited by heaven), 'there will be war', viz. between the tyrant and the Jews. The next clause makes this general idea more specific, viz. that the desolations which this will occasion have their 'fixed' boundaries beyond which they cannot pass.

(necheretzeth shomemoth), 'a decreed limit of desolations'. The part. (necheretzeth) is of the fem. and usual const. form, Niph. of (charatz). It is here used substantively, the fem. making as usual the abstract noun. In this way it parallelizes in some measure with (qetz), which means 'limit' in respect to time, while (necheretzeth) designates an 'abridged' or 'strictly limited measure' as to 'quantity' or 'degree'. In other words, the evils of the contest have an 'appointed end' and a 'decreed' or 'limited measure'. The ideas stand so closely connected together here, that a (we) between the clauses would injure the strength of the expression. (shomemoth) is itself a fem. part, noun, taken in the abstract sense. The sense is not a desolating decree, for (shomemoth) has a 'passive' sense, but a 'determined measure of desolations' to be suffered; or, to render literally, 'a determined thing is desolations'.

The next verse is neither more nor less than the more explicit unfolding of the character and doings of the 'desolator', i.e. of the (nagid habba') and of his (qetz). He will form a close alliance with many Jews; he will make sacrifice and oblation to cease; he will plant the ensigns of heathen abominations in the temple, and render it desolate in respect to its appropriate rites employed in the worship of the true God; and unto his extinction shall an overwhelming flood be poured upon him who deserves to be destroyed. In other words, the 'waster' shall himself be a (shomem), i.e. 'something wasted' or 'a waste'.

(9:27:) (wehigebir), 'he shall firmly covenant', or lit. 'he shall make firm' or 'strong a covenant'. The phrase can fairly mean nothing but this. The Nom. to the verb is the son (nagid habba') or desolating invader. The context supplies no other; and the sense fairly admits of no other. The explanation is found in 1st Macc. 1:11 seq., "In those days there went forth from Israel transgressors [huioi paranomoi, hapshe`im 8:23], and persuaded many [Jews], saying: 'Let us go and make a covenant with the Gentiles round about us'... And their speech was pleasing in their eyes, and certain persons from the people 'went unto the king, and he gave them power to carry into execution the ordinances of the Gentiles', etc." The sequel shows how the Gentile customs were introduced by them into Jerusalem. In 1st Macc. 1:41 seq. is a full account of the abominations practised by Antiochus in Jerusalem. Further explanation is unnecessary. —(larabbim); has the article, because it designates a whole class here; just as we have, in 8:23, (hapshe`im) in the same way, and to designate the same class. The additional idea here communicated is, that 'many' took such a course. The (la) in this case, resembles the usual construction of (parath perith), which puts (le) after it and before the persons with whom the covenant is made, when they are the inferior party; e.g. 2nd K. 11:4, 2nd Sam. 5:3, 2nd Chron. 21:7, Isa. 55:3; 61: 8, Jer. 32:40, al. When 'equals' make a covenant (`im) 'with' or (eth) 'with' is employed. In the present case, Antiochus 'dictated' the firm league between himself and the Jewish apostates ; so we have (larabbim). The Hebrew, by the way, here exhibits a nicety of meaning and construction which our language cannot reach.

(shabua` `echad) 'one week', i.e. seven years, is the Acc. of time, during which this matter is to continue. Antiochus began to meddle with the affairs of the Jews, in B.C. 171, and during that year deposed Onias, and covenanted with his heathenized and apostate brother, Jesus or Jason, to make him high priest, with the condition that he should introduce heathen usages into Jerusalem. In the latter end of B.C. 165, or at the commencement of B.C. 164, Antiochus died. The persecution and oppression went on, in some form or other, during all that period of seven years, i.e. from 171 to 164. Hengst., Häv., and some others, make (shabua`) the Nom. to (higebir), viz. one week shall confirm a covenant, etc. But why seven years? They admit that the ministry of Christ lasted only some three or three and a half years; what then constitutes the limits of the seven? Besides, the violence done to the language in this case is forbidding. Not to 'time', but to 'events' that occurred during it, is the strengthening or nullifying of a covenant to be attributed. Comp. 8:14, for a period nearly the same as the seven years, and designed to be somewhat more specific.

(wachatzi hashbua`), 'and during half of the week', Acc. of time how long, again. (chatzi) does not mean, as many have interpreted it, a 'precise point' of time, just where half of the length of the whole would reach, but 'one half' or 'one division' of the whole duration. So is it clearly to be taken in 12:7; and so here, because it can never be made to mean the same as (kachatzi) or (lachatzi), which would designate merely the half-way point of time. Then again, the hashbua`), with its article, points to the preceding 'week' or 'seven years', and shows us, that as this marks length of time, so the 'half' or 'division' of it must also mark the same. Lastly, 'facts' correspond. Antiochus, as is well known, suspended all the temple rites for three and a half years, during three of which he offered up his abominable heathen sacrifices (hashiqqutz) to Jupiter Olympius in the temple. Surely it is the same personage 'who lays waste city and sanctuary' (v. 26), that suspends the temple offerings in the present case. Ch. 8:11 settles this question. To suppose, with Hengst. and Häv., that the death of the Messiah (v. 26) suspends the temple-rites, and that this is done merely in theory and by way of anticipation, and does not take place as a fact during the half of the seven years in question, is quite contrary to the tenor of the book before us. If then it be 'fact' (the desolations of city and sanctuary surely are 'facts'), that the sacrifices and oblations did not cease until more than thirty years after the death of Christ, how can all this be assigned here to the limits of three and a half years? Besides, the person who makes the covenant with many, is the same who causes the sacrifice and oblation to cease; and this covenant continues through the whole 'seven years'. Of course Antiochus, or whoever makes it, does not quit the stage of action before the whole seven years are passed. It is during the 'latter' half of the 'seven', then, beyond all reasonable question, that the sacrifice and oblations are suspended; and at the end of this, (as the remainder of v. 27 shows), the person who suspends them is cut off. Now this disagrees entirely with the Messianic chronology. According to the usual computation, our Saviour's ministry lasted but three and a half years, and this of course comes in the 'first' part of the seven years, i.e. his death followed the 'first half' of these. According to our text, the death of him, who made the covenant with many for seven years and suspended the temple-rites during the 'last' half, took place after this suspension had continued three and a half years. It is impossible to reconcile the theory of Hengstenberg and Hävernicks here, with the plain and obvious meaning of the writer.

'He will make sacrifice and oblation to cease' evidently means, in its connection, remove them by violence, forcibly suspend them. 'He who destroys city and sanctuary' (v. 26); 'he who treads down the sanctuary and its sacred retinue' (8:13), is the person of whom this is said, and who actually did what is here described.

Nor is this all. He will carry his impiety to the daring length of introducing the symbols of the 'god' whom he worships, into the holy temple; so that while they are worshipped by their appropriate rites, the sanctuary becomes desolate in regard to true worshippers and all their offerings. None will repair thither, because of the shocking abominations of idol-offerings and idol-images. So, or something like to this, does the following difficult clause seem to testify: (we`al kenaph shiqqutzim memshomem), 'and over the winged-fowl of abominations shall be a waster'. I need not repeat the almost numberless conjectures about the meaning of this passage. (`anath) seems to me to mean neither 'summit', 'roof', nor 'pinnacle' of the temple. The word is often used for 'borders' of a garment, a country, of the earth, etc. But to designate 'height upward', instead of 'extension' or 'breadth', requires a very different word from (kanaph). The 'border' of a thing or object is not the 'height' or 'summit' of it. To compare it with (pterugion ton `hierou) (Matt. 4:5), seems not to be much to the purpose, until we better understand the meaning of this phrase, which as yet remains somewhat uncertain. The 'summit' of the temple was, we are told, filled with sharp pyramidal prominences to prevent the birds from lighting upon it. This would be no place, then, for (shiqqutzim), i.e. 'idol-statues'. Gesenius thinks, that the statue of Jupiter Olympius, (possibly of Antiochus), was placed conspicuously on the temple 'roof'. The sense in itself is not an uninviting one; but we have to make two changes in order to bring it about. First we must read (`al kanaph), 'on the roof [are] idols'; and secondly, we must convert 'summit' or 'extremity', into roof or covering. Figuratively this last would answer tolerably well for wing, (kanaph). But besides all this, we are here met with still another difficulty, viz. that (meshomem) which follows is in the 'singular'. Cases of a 'plural' with a part. or adj. 'singular' there are, but only when the plural form designates a single agent or object, e.g. (adonim qasheh). When persons are designated in the plural, and each individual is emphatically meant, the predicate may be in the sing. as in Prov. 3:18; 27:16; 28:1, Gen. 27:29, Ex. 31:14. But neither of these cases is homogeneous with the one now before us. (shiqqutzim) is not a 'pluralis majestaticus', nor, so far as we can discover, is 'individuality' designed particularly to be included in it, or expressed by it. We cannot accept, therefore, of such a solution of the difficulty; certainly not if we can find a better one.

The proposal of Hengstenberg, Hävernicks, Lengerke, and others to apply (shiqqutzim) to the 'temple', which had been polluted by the Jews, is without parallel and contrary to all Heb. usage elsewhere. The prophets speak indeed of hypocritical offerings and incense as an 'abomination' (to`ebah), Isa. 1:13; they intimate that the doings of the dissembling and heathenish-minded Jews made Jehovah loathe his dwelling-place; but all this is far enough from vindicating such an appellation of the temple itself in Daniel, as (shiqqutzim). Daniel calls it (qodesh), 8:13,14 ; (mepon miqedasho) 8:11. In 9:26, also, he names it (haqqodesh), and in 9:16 we have 'thy city, thy sanctuary' and 'thy people'. In most of these cases, also, he is speaking of the temple in the same circumstances as in our text. Comp. also Dan. 12:7. Such an exegesis, then, makes against all usage elsewhere, and against the whole current of Hebrew feeling. 'Thy holy city, the sanctuary', is the indelible and eternal name stamped upon these objects. Down to the present hour, even the very Moslems call the city 'El Qods', i.e. (haqqodesh). (shiqqutzim) then is a noun which qualifies or limits MS. It means always 'idolatrous rites' or 'abominations', or else 'idol-images' or 'statues'. 'Abominations', in the general sense of 'wicked deeds', it never designates. Another word (to`ebah) is employed in such a sense. To suppose M» to mean summit, pinnacle, and then translate over the pinnacle of idols or of idolatrous abominations is the destroyer, and finally to apply this so as to designate the treading down and crushing the sacred edifice and its appurtenances, is even more strange than to use (shiqqutzim) as a designation of the temple. Where in all the Bible is such an image employed as being 'over the pinnacle' of a thing, in order to designate the violence done to it by a conqueror, or to mark his sovereign control? 'To tread down', 'to trample upon', is indeed imagery everywhere employed; but 'to be over a pinnacle', or 'a summit', is an expression revolting both to good taste and to Heb. usage. To me, at least, it seems passing strange, to apply such expressions to the domineering sway of Antiochus in Jerusalem, or (with Hengst. and Häv.) to Titus and his final destruction of the temple.

But if the meaning 'summit' and 'roof' be denied to (kanaph), only three other meanings remain, viz., that of 'wing', of 'bird' or 'winged-fowl', and of 'border' or 'extreme limit'. To give to (kanaph) the meaning of 'army-wings', cannot well be conceded. Rosenmüller, indeed, gives the clause this turn: "Exercitui detestando vastator dux praeerit. [See Gesen. Heb.-Chald. (Latin edit.) Thesaurus, 1835; under (kanaph) 2.d. last sentence. It describes military forms & positions.]" He supposes that (kanaph), like the Latin 'ala', may mean 'the wing of an army'. But if an army is to be spoken of collectively, in this way, we should expect 'wings' (kenaphaim), not 'wing' (sing.) to designate it. Isa. 8:8 and 18:1, to which Rosenm. appeals, will hardly bear him out; for in both cases a different meaning of the word is more probable. In fact, the word (kanaph) does not seem to be employed in such a sense. Ezekiel employs ('anappim) (plur. only) in the tropical sense of 'army-wings'; see Lex. sub v. Besides, how flat it would be, after saying that the people, i.e. the army, of a prince who will invade Judea, have marred city and sanctuary, and after describing all the devastations which they had committed under his guidance and direction, to add that he had supremacy over them, or (in other words) was their leader. Not so Daniel. The discourse advances. First, the invader mars city and temple. Next, he prohibits sacrifices and oblations to Jehovah, on the part of the Jews. Then he sets up the statue and other insignia of his own chosen 'god', Jupiter Olympius, in the temple, where sacrifices abominable to the Jews were offered in conformity with the usages of the heathen. Lastly, comes the fearful end of him who has desolated the city and temple; for in his turn he becomes a (shomem), i.e. 'something to be desolated' or 'destroyed'. Here all is climactic, and the tenor of the discourse, viewed in this light, becomes comparatively easy and probable.

If now we assume the second meaning, 'winged-fowl', how shall such a meaning be rendered probable? The fact is well known that Antiochus devoted the temple at Jerusalem to the worship of Jupiter Olympius, and there offered the appropriate sacrifices. It is said of him, in 1st Macc. 1:45 seq., that "he forbade burnt offerings and sacrifices and libations in the sanctuary, and [commanded] to profane the sabbaths and the feasts, to defile holy places and persons, to build altars and sacred enclosures (temenē) and idol-apparatus, and to sacrifice swinish and unclean beasts . . . And whosoever would not obey the king's command, must be put to death." The word (eidōleia) (v. 47) I have translated 'idol-apparatus', because it plainly does not mean 'idol-temple' here, for such Antiochus had no need to build, when he had converted the temple of Jehovah into a place of worship to his 'god'. The Syriac version reads (eidōla) here, which makes the sense required. But (eidōleia) may be regarded as a mere neut. pl. adjective, and be rendered as above. Altars and sacred enclosures and sacrifices necessarily demanded idol representations of the 'god', to whom the offerings were made. So was it in all the Greek and Roman world. I do not see any reason to doubt, that Antiochus set up the statue of his 'god'. "'They built or set up (bdeugma ermōseōs) by the altar,'" says 1st Macc. 1:54, i.e. (hashiqutz shomem). I understand this of a statue of Jupiter Olympius erected in the temple; and this statue, as is well known, usually stood over 'an eagle at its feet with wide-spread wings'. Hence ('al kenaph shiqqutzim), 'over a wing of abominations', or rather 'over an abominable winged-fowl, is a desolator'. That (kanaph) may mean 'the possessor of a wing', i.e. a winged fowl, as well as 'wing', is only in conformity with abundant analogies in Hebrew. Such a meaning it has in Gen. 7:14 (shiqqutzim) qualifies (kenaph), § 104. 1, and shows that the 'winged bird' was a part of the heathen symbols. The plural seems here to be chosen in order that a connection with (meshomem) may be avoided by the reader. The horror and disgust which such a spectacle would occasion to a pious Jew, can more easily be conceived of than expressed. But the wide-spread eagle-wings is not all. This is at the foot of an image that stands 'over' it ('al kenaph), which image is here characterized by the appellation (meshomem). Most critics have referred (meshomem) to the (meshomem) of the desolator, the "prince who will come," i.e. most of those who refer vs. 26,27, to Antiochus. But in such a case, how could the 'article' be dispensed with? It would not only be 'renewed mention' of the person, but a case which would require special pains not to be misunderstood, and so demand specification. But as no article is prefixed to (meshomem), we may in this connection refer this word to the 'statue' of the heathen god, which is very significantly named 'a desolator', from the effect which its erection in the temple produced upon the Jewish religious rites and those who performed them. In 11:31, the (shiqqutz) (idol) has the same participle applied to it, and for the same reason. The temple was utterly forsaken by all but apostates to heathenism. Everything that pertained to the true God was trodden down and destroyed. In this case (meshomem) should not have (as it has not) the article; for it is neither renewed mention of a thing, nor is it something of which the reader could be supposed to have formed an antecedent idea in his own mind. The single 'statue' of Jupiter is spoken of in the sing. number; and thus the whole form of expression falls within the regular laws of grammar. The erection of such an image with its 'winged symbolical bird', is a consummation of impiety, which goes quite beyond the inhibition of the Jewish sacrifices and oblations. Iniquity is now 'come to the full', and therefore must be punished.

Hoffman (Die 70 Jahre) has proposed such an interpretation as that now suggested. In his Weissag. und Erfüll. (s. 308), he seems to give the preference to another and different explanation, which Steudel (ut sup. s. 47) has suggested. The verb (kanaph) means 'to cover'. Of course (kanaph) may, as he thinks, retain this idea. He then refers it to a 'covering' built on the Jewish altar by Antiochus, after the manner of the heathen, which was profane and abominable in the eyes of a Hebrew, who was commanded to construct his altar only with earth, Ex. 20:24. On the profanely covered altar of Antiochus, heathen abominations were offered. Hence a 'covering of abominations'. But how he disposes of (meshomem), in this case, he does not expressly tell us. He must refer it to (kanaph). But this is hard. 'Over the covering of abominations' is —what? (meshomem) can hardly designate the sacrifices offered there. Is Antiochus, then, designated by it, as presiding 'over' the heathen altar? If so, the 'article' must be prefixed. An 'altar-covering', moreover, could hardly be regarded here, as answering to the 'climactic' nature of the discourse. I deem his former opinion, therefore, to be much better grounded.

One other view of the case I will venture to suggest —a possible one if not probable —that I have nowhere met with. This would assume, in the present case, the frequent meaning of (kenaph), viz. 'border, extremity', and then translate thus: 'On the border of idols' or 'idol-places, will be the destroyer'. The ground of this exegesis may be found in the history of Antiochus. After the ravages committed by him in Jerusalem, he went into the East (see Dan. 11:44) to avenge himself there for offences; and in Persia he entered forcibly the great temple at Elymais, and robbed it of its treasures. The people of that region, exasperated by his sacrilege, rose 'en masse' and forced him to retreat. On that retreat he was overtaken with the news of the destruction of his army in Palestine, and the victorious entrance of Judas into Jerusalem. Through fatigue, or exasperation and disappointment, or a combination of both, he fell into a raging fever, and died after a very short space in that condition. If now we may suppose our text to look to this, there is a regular progress in the narration: after all his outrages in Palestine, he goes to the border or extremity of the idol countries, robs an idol-temple there, and then the destruction, predicted in the next clause, hastens on. It is an augmentation of his woes, that he perishes in a distant land. 'The destroyer' (meshomem), to use the language applied to this very expedition in Dan. 11:44, "went forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away with many," and, in so doing, he himself becomes a (shomem), i.e. is utterly destroyed. —If it be objected to this view of the subject, that it is too specific, let anyone read Dan. 11, and he will no more insist on such an objection. It cannot be denied, moreover, that the prediction is thus regularly climactic, and that it is full of meaning. The only serious doubts would arise from another quarter. Would his eastern journey or expedition be described in language so obscure, and so alien from the usual methods of describing, such events? And then, in case Antiochus is designated by (meshomem), how could the 'article' be dispensed with in such a renewed mention of him? These two considerations occasion doubt and hesitation. There is somewhat less of difficulty in the solution given above; at least there is less of grammatical difficulty. But the general sense of the passage is plainly more striking, on the ground last assumed.

(we`ad kalah), 'but unto destruction'. Wieseler (Die 70 Wochen, s. 42 seq.) strenuously defends the position, that (kalah) is a 'verb' here, employed in its usual sense. He translates thus: 'And until it [the half-week] is completed', etc. His arguments are unsatisfactory, (`ad) must mean either 'while' or 'during', or else 'unto, even to'. Thus understood, it would make the death of the tyrant, which the next clause predicts, to happen during the half week, or to be taking place until that was completed; so that Antiochus must, at all events, on such a ground, have died either before the end of the three and a half years, or just at that point. But neither of these positions is true. There can be no question as to the right to take (kalah) as a 'noun', for such a usage is frequent. As little question can there be, as to its energetic meaning. The verb means 'to consummate, to finish, to complete', etc.; and of course the noun designates 'consummation, a full end of, a finishing off with'; —a mode of expression stronger than that of mere 'excision', etc. Such was to be the end of the tyrant. The (we) in (we`ad) is best rendered by 'but'. The sentiment of the verse stands arranged thus: 'He will make a firm league with many apostate Jews ; for three and a half years will he remove the sacrifices and oblations of the temple; he will even erect a statue of Jupiter there, accompanied by its usual eagle with expanded wings at its feet —but a dreadful reverse will overtake him; the overwhelming indignation of Heaven, that which is irreversibly decreed, will make an utter and final end of him.' Thus all is smooth and easy.

(wenecheratzah tittak), 'even that which is decreed, it shall be poured out', or 'even decreed [destruction] shall be poured out'. The accents follow the sense of the first rendering, and divide accordingly, putting a 'Zakeph Qaton' on (necheratzah). Of course, if we follow them, the verb is 'impersonal', or at least a kind of 'constructio praegnans' which implies (kalah) for its Nom., or else 'wrath, indignation', or 'curse', is implied. The verb (nathak) is not used in the literal sense, but only in the tropical one; and it is always joined with some subject like those just named, which makes the verb easy to be understood if it be employed in an elliptical way. It is a kind of 'terminus technicus' for the expression of such ideas; and being 'intransitive', it readily goes over into a 'passive' sense. If we follow the accents, then, there is no serious difficulty in the construction. But if we depart from them, and take (necheratzah) as a participial noun, and as the Nom. to (tittak), then all is easy and obvious. This member of the clause is an advance upon (`ad kalah) is. It designates a total end which is 'definitely decreed' by Heaven, and this decree is beyond control and irreversible. The very same sentiment is developed in (kalah wenecheratzah) in Isa. 10:23; 28:22. The accession of energy and definiteness to the threat, from the addition of (wenecheratzah), must be obvious to everyone familiar with the Hebrew. The imagery of 'pouring out' originates here in (weqitzo bashshetef) of v. 26, and is therefore both natural and forcible.

(`al shomem), 'upon him who is to be made desolate'. Quite different from (meshomem) (the destroyer, waster) is the participial intrans. form, (shomem). It has always a 'passive' sense, and therefore means 'delendus, vastandus, one who is' or 'ought to be destroyed'. The first is the (`ho anthrōpos tēs `hamartias), and the second is the (`ho `huios tēs apōleias), of Paul in 2nd Thess. 2:3, who seems to have had his mind on the passage before us. In the expression is substantially couched the favorite (paranomasia) of the Hebrews; the 'desolator, waster' shall be (shomem) (wasted).

Thus ends the second great national trial of the Jews. The tyrant who brought it upon them, falls in the midst of his contests and of his vengeance, and with his fall, the august drama closes, as in ch. 7; 8; 11.

It would be little to my present purpose, to give a minute history of all the interpretations that have been put upon the passage respecting the 'seventy week's', and of the efforts made to sustain them. Most of them depend on some 'a priori' conception of what Daniel ought to say, rather than on a philologico-historical deduction from what he has said. For my present purpose, I need to notice only two classes of interpretation: (1) The exclusively Messianic. (2) The exclusively Anti-Messianic. Of these, in their order, I shall speak very briefly.

(1) The Exclusively Messianic. 'An anointed one, a prince' (v. 25), is converted into 'the Messiah, the Prince', i.e. Christ the King of kings. The cutting off of 'an Anointed One' (in v. 26) is the violent death of Jesus, 'the Messiah'; (we'en lo) designates his vicarious suffering for sinners. The time when he entered on his public ministry, is the 'terminus ad quem' of the sixty-two weeks and the seven weeks; and these two distinct periods are combined into one, which is made to commence, not with Cyrus' proclamation, nor yet with that of Darius, but with that of Artaxerxes in the twentieth year of his reign. Nor is this all that is assumed. Not only is the period of the 'birth' of Christ arbitrarily set aside from the calculation, but in order to adjust the sixty-nine weeks to the period of his entrance on his public ministry, the reign of Artaxerxes is made ten years longer than the most authentic histories make it, i.e.

fifty-one years instead of forty-one, and so much is then taken from the reign of his father Xerxes. With all these assumptions, the sixty-nine weeks (62 + 7) or 483 years are at last adjusted to the period, when Jesus was baptized and entered on his official work. In this way two portions of the seventy weeks are summarily disposed of.

I need not here repeat the objections to most of these positions, which have already been made in the preceding pages. Most of these objections, to say the least, are founded in philology and in history, as well as in the analogy of the book in general. Enough of them, at all events, will abide the test, and are entirely unanswerable. But if not, what follows in respect to the 'one' remaining 'week', is decisive of the whole matter.

According to v. 26, 'an anointed one' is to be cut off at the 'close' of the 'sixty-two' weeks, and of course at the beginning of the 'one week', i.e. seven years. The interpreters in question, however, make his excision three and a half years later. But it is quite plain, that it is during the remainder of the week, i.e. during the next and latter three and a half years, that our text makes the principal desolations of the city and sanctuary to take place, and the invader perishes at the close of this period. The exclusively Messianic interpreters, however, make 'Titus' the desolator, and the 'Roman army' the people whom he leads on to waste the city and the sanctuary. But if Christ was crucified in A.D. 34, and Titus invested Jerusalem in A.D. 70, we have thirty-six intervening years instead of three and a half before his work of ruin; —a matter which, in such a book of accurate dates as the one before us, is inadmissible beyond all question. Besides, 'how, where', did 'Titus' die? Under any special tokens of divine vengeance, such as 9:27 predicts and threatens to the waster? We know not where to find these tokens. But further, 'when' did he die? In A.D. 81. Instead of perishing then at the close of the noted 'last week', his death took place some forty-seven years afterwards.

In a word, history is at utter and irreconcilable variance with the scheme of interpretation in question. It is indeed wonderful that it ever could have been advocated by sensible men. According to this scheme, Jesus Christ and the 'Roman' power are almost the only agents developed in the prophecy; whereas it lies upon the very face of v. 24, that 'the seventy weeks precede the coming of the true Messiah'. The blessings there promised, are not bestowed until after those weeks are completed.

(2) The Exclusively Anti-Messianic Interpretation. Wieseler (in his 'Die siebenzig Wochen') has concentrated all that has been said, and I may add, all that can well be said, in favor of this. He possesses distinguished critical skill, and withal a discriminating knowledge of the Hebrew. All turns, however, on v. 24. Vs. 25-27 must undoubtedly be conceded to him, for reasons like to those already assigned above, in defense of the interpretation which I have given. I cannot doubt, for a moment, that these verses refer to Antiochus. But for the reasons stated (in Comm. on v. 24), I can by no means concede to him the position, that the good there designated has respect only to the return from the Babylonish exile. Comparison of actual history with the splendid prospects and promises held out in v. 24, will show beyond all reasonable doubt, that the fulfilment of those predictions must be sought elsewhere than in the return from exile.

My leading reasons for choosing the 'medium iter', in this case, arise from no design to "split the difference" between the two conflicting views just stated. Long before I could obtain a sight of Wieseler and Hoffman on 'the seventy weeks and years', I had come, from the simple study of the text, substantially to the same conclusion that I have now developed. But some particulars of the prophecy continued still to be dark. On these, the two writers just named have cast some new light. All seems capable of reasonable illustration, and even of a good degree of certainty, with the exception of the beginning and end of the 'seven weeks', and the particular period which they designate, and perhaps the clause respecting (kenaf shiqqutzim). The last seems, however, in some good measure, to be illustrated by historical facts respecting the worship of Jupiter Olympius at Jerusalem, and the statue with the usual symbol of the "winged-fowl." The seven weeks, I regret to say, remain for future efforts, which however need not be despaired of. In the meantime, I must try to console myself for my own ignorance, with a 'Non omnia possumus omnes ['we cannot all do all things' (Virgil)]'.

All the close of this protracted examination of 9: 24-27, it may be useful to recapitulate summarily, and to compare the whole with the other predictions of Daniel.

The Babylonish exile was to continue seventy years; Jer. 25:11; 29:10, Dan. 9:2. Near the close of these, Daniel betook himself to earnest prayer, that the fulfilment of the prediction that the Jews should return from their exile, might speedily be developed, Dan. 9:2,3. Gabriel is commissioned to make a new announcement to him, of what would take place after the exile and before the coming of the great deliverer. This he does, by still preserving the number seventy, but converting this into so many 'weeks of years', (lit. 'seventy besevened'), instead of simple years which belonged to the prophecy of Jeremiah. The great question here is, or rather should be, (for in time past little or no attention has been paid to it): Does the period of 'seventy weeks' cover the 'whole' ground, from the time of Daniel's vision to the coming of Christ? The greatest possible effort has been often made, to bring about a union of the end of the seventy weeks with the period of Christ's birth, or of his public ministry. Of course the 'terminus a quo' has been the principal point of controversy; in as much as there has generally been at least a tacit concession, that the 'terminus ad quem' must be one of the points just mentioned. But history baffles all attempts to accomplish the object in question. From Daniel's vision down to the birth of Christ, is some 538 years; and seventy weeks make but 490, i.e. forty-eight years less. Attempts to find the proclamation 'to rebuild' in Jer. 29; in Cyrus' edict, in that of Darius, or that of Artaxerxes; are all frustrated by history again; and this matter must be, after all, given up as impracticable by these means. But then, (if we may be permitted to ask the question), what need of all this trouble? 'Is it any part of the angel's design to place the seventy weeks in such an attitude'? To me it seems plain, that it is not. In all the prophetic pages of the O. Test., or of the New, where does any prophecy assume the attitude of a book of 'Annals'? The nearest approach is in Dan. 11; but even here, there are merely touches on the fourth dynasty, until we come to the (nibezeh), the (meshomem), Antiochus. We have then only one prophetic history of one king, in all the Scriptures which is 'annalistic'; and the Syrian tyrant is that king. For the rest, great events, and those only are described. When these cease, prophecy lays aside her pen, and keeps silence. The reason is obvious, viz. that only such events are adapted to instruct by making deep impressions. The ordinary course of events does not attract the prophetic eye; and so no sketch of them is drawn.

This consideration liberates us at once from all necessity of forcing the 'terminus ad quem' of the seventy weeks into a union with the year of Christ's birth, or of his public ministry. All that the angel designs to communicate is, that as there had been seventy years of exile in regard to the Jews, seven times that number must pass away, before they would cease to be troubled in like manner, and before the Messiah would come. Sixty-two of these are "troublous times," but the following one week (= seven years) is to renew all the horrors of the Babylonish invasion, and even more, on the score of impiety and persecution. With these last seven years, times so hazardous to the nation and to religion are to cease, until the coming of Christ. So much, but no more, seems to be plainly within the design and scope of the angel's communication. And of course, we have, on this ground, no special interest to seek for a union of the 'terminus ad quem of the seventy weeks' with the year of Christ's birth or of his entering on public office. We can leave it wherever it falls or terminates, as comprising all that was especially interesting for prophecy to disclose.

'Inasmuch now as the period of sixty-two weeks has no terminus a quo expressly assigned to it, it would seem to be not inapposite, that it should be regarded as already virtually designated by the beginning of the seventy years in Jeremiah. So sonic have understood the matter. Then all that follows they consider as supported and illustrated by historical facts. Antiochus began to vex the Jews, in B.C. 171, (i.e. sixty-two weeks = 434 years after B.C. 606 when Jeremiah's seventy years begin); and in that year an 'anointed one', a lawful high-priest, Onias III, was cut off, and the people had no other legitimate officer of this rank until after the death of the tyrant. During the 'week' (seven years) that followed, Antiochus laid waste the city and sanctuary; for three and a half years he took away sacrifice and oblation; he erected his altar and his idol-statue in the temple of God; and at the close of this period, and of course at the close of the seven years, he perished by a miserable death in a foreign land, whither he had gone to commit sacrilege again. How is it possible, they ask, (and with no small appearance of right), that all these periods should so exactly meet the 'facts of history', and at so many points, unless the exegesis that we have given is well grounded? To say the least, they add, 'facts' make our exegesis altogether probable.

No one can refuse to acknowledge that the accordance of 'dates' and events, in this case, is striking, and seemingly decisive at first view. But it must be remembered that the sixty-two weeks are not the only period to be provided for. What is to be done with the seven weeks = forty-nine years, which constitute the first division of the seventy weeks? —No room is here left for them; or if any, they must be put 'after' the sixty-two weeks, which seems to be at least an unnatural mode of exegesis. Then again as to the sixty-two weeks, the statement in Daniel (v. 25) is, that the city is to be in a course of rebuilding, during that period, and of rebuilding in a stinted and imperfect manner, by reason of troublous times. Yet, according to the scheme of interpretation which we are now examining, the first seventy years of the sixty-two weeks are those of the exile, when Jerusalem lay all the time in ruins. These two circumstances seem then, after all, to decide against the scheme in question. Could it be shown, or even made probable, that the seven weeks either follow the sixty-two weeks, or are coordinate and contemporaneous with a part of the latter, then all would be easy of explanation, and the whole paragraph might be enucleated, and placed in a clear and satisfactory light.

Desirable as it seems to be to bring this about, I cannot on the whole persuade my hermeneutical conscience to be reconciled to the plan. I see no satisfactory way of removing the impression which the text makes, of three 'distinct' and 'successive' periods, viz. of seven, sixty-two, and one weeks. The writer seems plainly to mean, not only that these are to be reckoned so as to make up the sum of seventy, but that each of the two latter periods begin, when the preceding one ends. How else can seventy weeks be made out?

That there were events and persons corresponding to what the angel declares, I cannot well doubt. So many things strikingly correspond with facts known, that they seem to be a pledge for the certainty of the rest. At all events, my ignorance of facts, or inability to see how our text accords with those that we do know, cannot with propriety be regarded as decisive evidence against the correctness and truthfulness of the predictions. As history now lies before us, I am unable to find the 'indicia' of the first period of seven weeks. Where I can easily make out a 'terminus a quo', I fail in my endeavors to find the 'terminus ad quem' and so 'vice versa'. And this is equally true, if I amalgamate, as many do, the periods of seven and sixty-two weeks. The beginning and end of the sixty-nine weeks thus made, i.e. 483 years, is no more discoverable in our histories, than the beginning and end of the seven years. At least the face of history is to be changed and remodeled, in respect to 'time', in order to make out any agreement between it and the sixty-nine weeks. Moreover the very amalgamation in question is, as has already been shown, against the tenor of the text, and against actual facts.

I have exposed myself, perhaps, to an accusation not very unfrequent, viz., that of pulling down without building up. But if I have endeavored to pull down, only where the foundations were tottering, and the building ready to fall by a slight touch, this is nothing that deserves reprobation. It is a first step toward a new and more stable edifice. If I am unable to erect it, others may succeed. May all prosperity (so do I devoutly wish) attend their efforts! But I will not pretend to know, what I feel conscious of not knowing to my satisfaction. I much prefer the confession of ignorance to a pretension of knowledge, specially when the means of acquiring that knowledge are not within our power.

A few words more, on the subject of applying vs. 25-27 to 'Antiochus Epiphanes', instead of the 'Romans', either heathen or Christian, and I have done.

Does the tenor of the book of Daniel, as to its prophecies, tend to support and confirm the exegesis which I have given? The answer to this question must be in the affirmative. Antiochus does not indeed appear in a special manner, in chap. 2. But he is virtually there, in the crushing power of the fourth dynasty. His fall is involved in that of the dynasty, 2:44. In 7:7-11, 19-26, Antiochus specifically appears, in all his cruelty and blasphemy. In 8: 9-12, 23-25, he is still more graphically described, and as possessing the same characteristics. Chap. 11:21-45 is even a kind of historical narration of him, which is particular beyond any example in all the Scriptures. His doings and his end are of the same character here as before. If language has any definite meaning, the identification of the same tyrant in all these prophecies and visions, is altogether certain. How comes it now, that all these prophecies should be uniform as to this trait, and the present one (in chap. 9) be discrepant from all the rest? If the exclusively Messianic interpreters are in the right, then Antiochus is not at all the subject of the prediction in 9: 25-27. But if 'analogy' has any force, it is quite plain that we might expect to find him there. That he is to be found there, we have seen, if any credit is to be given in this matter to historical facts and dates. It is utterly improbable that such a concurrence could exist between prediction and events and persons, unless there had been some actually designed and foreseen coincidence, i.e. unless the one were prediction and the other fulfilment, or unless, indeed, the book were written, as some have uncritically maintained, 'post eventum'.

If one now will patiently go through with a comparison of the expressions and events in the prophecy before us, he will be forced to feel that there is a similarity very striking, which scarcely leaves any room for doubt. Compare the cutting off of the high priest in 9:26 and 11:22; the marring of the city and sanctuary in 9:26, and in 11:31, also in 8:24; the final end of Antiochus in 9:26 and 8:25; the covenanting with many in 9:27, and 11:23, 30; and the removing of sacrifice and oblation in 9:27, and in 8:12; 11:31; 12:11. Even the ('ad-kalah wenecharatzah') of 9:27, has its parallel in 11:35, 45. The 2300 days of 8:13 should also be compared with the 'one week' of 9:27, with due allowance for the differences in the things presented; the 1290 and 1335 days of 12:11,12, in respect to the abolishing of sacrifice and oblation, are to be compared (with the like allowance) with the 'half-week' (= three and a half years) of 9:27, with which must also be joined 12:7.

When all this is done, compare the development of the 'Messianic kingdom' in chap. 2; 7; 12, with 9:24. In this last case, the Messianic kingdom is indeed mentioned first; but still, it is arranged and spoken of as the last in order. It comes not until 'after' the end of the seventy weeks; the other events in vs. 25-27 occur 'during' that period, i.e. before it ends. Everywhere the monarchies predicted or brought to view fall, 'before' the new and perpetual kingdom arises. How then can any of them be the dynasty of the 'Romans'? Is there not throughout the whole book, a harmony so complete, that it amounts to nearly all but the repetition of the same things in the same words? In any case, where investigation should be made without any favorite theory to support, and without the aid of any 'a priori' assumptions, would there or could there be any doubt, as to what conclusions we should adopt?

For the gratification of the reader's curiosity, and also for the sake of supplying him with the means of comparing different attempts to translate vs. 24-27, I shall here subjoin these verses in various translations, so that they may be compared with the original text and with each other. Perhaps moreover, he who examines them will learn to estimate, in some good measure, the difficulty that attends the passage in question, and cease to wonder at the diversity of translation and explanation that exists.

(Texts of 9:24-27 in I. Hebrew Massoretic, II. English AKJV 1611, III. Greek LXX Septuagint, IV. LXX Theodotion, V. Latin Vulgate, VI. Syriac (Aramaic) English translation, VII. Rosenmüller's Latin Version, VIII. De Wette's German Version.)

For convenience' sake No. I, II. are here inserted. No. III, IV, speak for themselves. As to No. III, the author of this version plainly was perplexed about the meaning of the Hebrew, and has given some strange turns to the sentiment, even in vs. 24-26. But in v. 27 we are entirely lost. We can scarcely trace any certain resemblances. The clause in v. 26, "After seven and seventy years," is a guess that the time, here aimed at in the Heb. text, is the era of the Selucidae. This began 312 B. C, and the sum of the numbers named in the version is 139, which tallies with the time when Antiochus Epiphanes began his reign. What follows doubtless relates to him, but it is such a confused medley, that nothing can be made out of it. No wonder the ancient churches were discontented with such a version. I say 'such a version', because there are, in many parts of it elsewhere, characteristics of a similar nature. No. IV is certainly a great improvement upon the Septuagint; but even this shows that the author of the version was at times quite uncertain in his own mind, about the meaning of the Hebrew. I need not point out particulars, as the reader can easily find them, and judge for himself. The part included in brackets is as it stands in the Romish edition of Theodotion, but it is omitted in Bos' edition of the Septuagint. It is palpably another version of v. 27, which was copied on the margin, and through carelessness was foisted into the text, by the copyist who wrote the Ms. used in the Romish edition. Both versions show in what perplexity the authors of them were. No. V shows the deep acquaintance of Jerome with the Hebrew, and has come nearer to accuracy than any of ancient versions. Of the Targums of Daniel, we know nothing; not even whether any ever existed.

No. VI deserves some special notice. The author of this plainly had a better knowledge of the Hebrew than any of his predecessors in translating, (fl. prob. Cent. II); and in some points he has hit nearer the mark than even Jerome. The Latin translation of this Syriac Version is a miserable affair, and no dependence can be placed upon it. I have made a new and literal version, because it would be useless, or nearly so, to print it in Syriac. But this version deserves much more attention than it has yet received. Many a good hint may be got from it, to cast light on the difficult words or phrases in the Hebrew. The author was well grounded in the knowledge of that language.

As to No. VII, VIII, the object in presenting them lies upon the face of the thing. Two such scholars as Rosenmüller and De Wette may well excite the curiosity of the interpreter, to know how they understood the Hebrew text, in the passage before us. Most readers, I trust, will be glad of such a 'conspectus' as that which is here submitted to their examination.

[It has already been said that a great variety of interpretations have been proposed, of Dan. 9:24-27. The reader who is curious to know how much and what has been said, and what endless perplexity has attended all attempts to explain without the aid of a distinctive philology, is remitted for information to the following works, as exhibiting the ablest efforts of this nature. Some few of them, however, have been distinguished by philological effort.

Among the older writers, 'Vitringa' stands preeminent, as usual, in his very learned discussion of the subject in Observatt. Sac. VI. 1-5. He is 'exclusively Messianic', and is the store-house from which Hengstenberg and Hävernicks have drawn, in their discussions of the matter in question. Among the more respectable attempts to explain this matter may be reckoned 'J. D. Michaelis' Versuch über die 70 Wochen Daniels, 1771. 8. 'Eichhorn', Bibliothek, B. III. s. 761 seq, has suggested many good hints, while he adopts a tortuous method of reckoning the respective classes of weeks. 'Bleek', Theol. Zeitschrift von Schleiermacher, De Wette, etc., 1819, Heft. 3, s. 171 seq. 'Berthholdt', Comm. sum Buche Daniel. II. Theil. 'Hengstenberg', Die 70 Wochen Daniels, in his Christol. Theil. II. s. 401 seq. 1831. Hävernicks, Comm. Oher Daniel, in loc. 1832. 'Scholl', Comm. exeget. de 70 hebdom. Danielis, 1829. 'Hitzig', Recension in Thcol. Stud, et Krit. 1832. s. 143 seq. 'Rösch', Die 70 Wochen des Daniel, jb. Jahr 1835. 'Lengerke', Comm. Dber Dan. in loc. As distinguished greatly from all the preceding efforts, remain to be noted, 'J. C. K. Hoffman', Die 70 Jahre des Jeremias, 1836; and his later and highly important work, Weissagung und Erfüllung, 1841, Th. I. s. 296 seq., which is filled indeed with mere hints, but they are exceedingly significant, and are the result of much thought and profound study. The recent exclusively 'Anti-messianic' interpreter is 'Wieseler', Die 70 Wochen und die 63 Jahrwochen, 1839, a book pregnant with thought and interesting matter, and giving evidence of great acuteness in philology: but exhibiting some inconclusive reasoning, and a strong leaning to preconceived theory. Substantial progress in philology has been made by these two last named writers. It would be easy to subjoin scores of other writers; but they would add little or nothing to the apparatus of the reader who has access to those named above.]

(10:1:) [The preceding vision was seen in the 'first' year of Darius the Medc, 9: 1. The one now before us is dated in the 'third' year of the reign of Cyrus, which would make it some seventy-two years from the time that Daniel was carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, 1:1-3, and about four years later than the preceding vision. The vision is prefaced by a narration of Daniel's special fasting and prayer, for the space of three weeks, vs. 1-3. The 'occasion' of this is not directly and explicitly stated. But we may gather hints from the book of Ezra, which will give some probable illustration. Soon after the building of the temple was commenced, "the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin" began their opposition to it by active measures. During all the remainder of Cyrus' reign, and even down to that of Darius, i.e. from B.C. 536 down to 519, (Ezra 4:4,5; 6:1-15), opposition was continued. If Daniel was uncertain in his mind, whether the (shabuim shibeim) of 9:24 meant seventy weeks of 'days' or seventy weeks of 'years', (and considering the ellipsis in this case of (shanim), we may easily suppose him to have been in doubt for a time), then must he have felt greatly perplexed with such a state of things as existed in the third year of Cyrus' reign. Nothing of consequence had yet taken place, excepting the bare return of a company of exiles to Palestine. The temple-building was at a stand. The city building must have been in a very embarrassed and perplexing state. If Daniel had hitherto indulged the hope that only seventy 'weeks of days' were appointed for the restoration of the city and sanctuary, he must now be greatly in doubt what to think. The time of seventy 'weeks of days' had more than passed, yea double that time, and yet there were no indications of successful progress at Jerusalem. The close of v. 1 indicates the deliverance which the mind of the prophet experienced, by the new revelation which he was about to record. It also contains an indication, tacit but yet intelligible, that he had not before satisfactorily understood the communication made to him in 9:24-27. In 10:12 is an intimation, moreover, of the fear which had oppressed Daniel, when he considered the then-present state of the holy city and temple. The events which are disclosed in the prophecy that follows, show that one could not reasonably suppose them all to happen in the course of seventy weeks of 'days'; the time therefore of 9:24, must be weeks of 'years'.

Daniel had fasted and prayed, from the first day of the first [Heb.] month until the close of the twenty-first, 10:3. Three days after this, viz. on the twenty-fourth, he was on the banks of the Tigris, and there saw his last and very instructive vision, 10:4. An angel appears in splendid costume, and addresses him in a voice like that of a great multitude, vs. 5,6. To Daniel alone was this heavenly messenger visible; but his attendants were stricken with great fear and fled, probably because of some audible and preternatural sound, v. 7. Daniel remained alone, and he grew pale with terror, and sunk down in great weakness, v. 8. In a kind of trance, while on the ground, he heard the angel speaking to him, who came near and partially lifted him up, vs. 9,10. The angel then addressed to him words of great kindness, and bade him attend carefully to what he was about to communicate, by which he was somewhat revived, even so as to stand erect, although with trembling, v. 11. He assures Daniel, that his prayers had been heard, and his solicitude to understand more fully what had been addressed to him on a former occasion, was favorably regarded, v. 12. The angel discloses a reason why there had been some delay, in bringing his message. The angel of the Persian kingdom had withstood him for twenty-one days, until Michael came to his aid, when he was left alone to exercise his good influence over the Persian dynasty. [His object seems to have been, to give a turn to the Persian affairs which would be favorable to the Hebrews], 5:13. The next verse (14) discloses the special object of the angel's mission, which was, to instruct Daniel what would befall his people at a future period, for the vision had respect to a prolonged period. When this was mentioned, Daniel cast down his eyes to the earth, and remained silent, v. 15. In this plight, an angel under the appearance of a man touched his lips, and enabled him to speak, which he did by stating, that the terror caused by the vision had deprived him of the use of his bodily powers, vs. 16,17. An angel in human form then touched him again, and his strength was somewhat restored, v. 18. He bade Daniel not to fear, for he was greatly beloved, and peace would be given him; after which Daniel requested him to proceed, inasmuch as he was fully revived, v. 19. The angel begins his communication by asking the seer, whether he knew for what purpose he had come? Taking his answer for granted, (as indeed he might, if we compare v.14), the angel goes on to say, that he shall return [to Persia] in order to contend with the prince of Persia; that when he departs, the prince of Grecia will come, [when he abandons the Persian court, the king or Greece, Alexander, will come against the country], v. 20. What is written in the book of truth respecting the future, will now be disclosed. Only the angel Michael assists him against his antagonists; —but this same Michael is the special guardian of the Hebrews.)

(10:21:) [It is common for interpreters to assume here, that the angel 'Gabriel' was the one who appeared to Daniel, and made communications on the occasion before us. Analogy from a comparison of Dan. 8:16; 9:21, where he is named, might naturally lead to such an opinion; which might also be strengthened by Luke 1:19, The apocryphal books, both of the O. Test. and of the New, frequently name this angel, and also many others; specially does the book of Enoch abound in the names of angels. But still, the opinion about Gabriel in the present case must be conjectural; for there is no name assigned to the angel-communicator, in chap. 10, 11.

The question: How much of the representation of chap. 10 is 'costume', and what is 'historical reality'? is more difficult than one might at first suppose. If the princes of Persia and Grecia be 'good' angels, how, it is asked, 'can contention arise between them and the guardians of the Jews? Each would bow in submission to the divine will, and so, when that was known, there could be no differences of opinion.' But angels are not 'omniscient'; and a good being, with limited faculties, who is set to watch over a particular king or country, may very naturally contract some partiality for the object of his attention, and may not always see clearly what his duty is. In a case of this kind, it is easy to see, that something like an opposition to another good being may arise, who is commissioned to interfere with the object of guardianship. Somewhat in this light, I think, we must regard the narration in the present chapter, provided we consider it as based on ample historical facts.

'But may not the whole be in the way of allegorical representation, i.e. so as to represent the activity of the enemies of the Jews, and the stumbling-blocks which they threw in the way of those who had returned, from exile, and also the opposition of the Grecian kings of Syria and Egypt, after the death of Alexander? In such a case, guardian-angels of the holy land would represent the kind care which heaven bestowed upon the Hebrews; and the opposing 'princes' of Persia and Grecia would indicate the counsel unfriendly to the Jews, which those dynasties were inclined to follow.'

That it is possible to regard the whole representation in this light, 'salva fide et salva ecclesia', I would not deny; but the angelology of the Scriptures prevents me from admitting this. I feel the difficulty presented by an account of 'contest' between good angels; and specially the difficulty of supposing that these good beings would excite the Persian and Grecian chiefs against the Hebrew nation. But is it the design of the writer to communicate anything more, than the general idea of the angel-guardianship of nations, and of that zeal for their respective interests, which springs from a feeling that is natural to such a relation? If he designs more than this, we are at least left in the dark, as to the manner in which his views can be reconciled with the character of angels, as beings perfectly holy and obedient to the will of God, and also beings of superior, although not of perfect, knowledge. The Apocalypse is through and through of the same tenor, in regard to angel, and their offices, as the present book.]

(Chapter 11:) [This chapter should not have been separated from the preceding one; for it is a mere continuance of the address to Daniel, which was begun in the close of that chapter. 5:1 informs him, that the angel-narrator, now engaged on behalf of the Hebrews, had for some time before, at the Medo-Persian court, been engaged in like manner with Darius the Mede. He then goes on to sketch some of the events of the Persian dynasty, the invasion of Greece by Xerxes; the spirit of hostility which will be roused up by this; the rise and fall of Alexander the Great; and the subsequent division of his broken empire into four dynasties, vs. 2-4. After this, the dynasties of Egypt and Syria are selected, doubtless because they are the only ones with which the Jews were to be concerned. The mutual alliances, attacks, and defenses, of the kings of these countries, are next detailed with almost historical minuteness, vs. 5-20. We come next upon Antiochus Epiphanes, whose history (as we may almost name it) occupies the rest of the chapter. It is a prophetic representation so ample and particular, as to be without a parallel in all the Scriptures. Something in the aspect of the times, or in the feelings and views of the Jewish people, was probably the immediate occasion of this. The expectation of no more trial and suffering may have been too confident among the Hebrews, and have needed a check. Or we may suppose another ground: 'Forewarned, forearmed'. But whatever was the cause of the peculiar 'form' of the prediction before us, there can be but one view as to its actual character. As has already been said, Porphyry in ancient times, and not a few critics in recent times, have strenuously asserted that it was written 'post eventum', and is therefore nothing more than real history. The assertion is grounded mainly on its historical minuteness; but partly (by the new school of criticism) on the alleged impossibility of a miracle. A real 'a priori', so minute and circumstantial, must of course be the result or a miraculous interposition; and the 'a priori' assumption is, that a miracle is impossible. Therefore the author of the book of Daniel must have written 'post eventum'.

But the assumption in this case is too great, reasonably to claim assent on the part of the sober-minded; and the critical history of the book of Daniel, as also the internal evidence of the book itself, throw obstacles in the way or supposing a very late composition that seem to be insuperable. But this is not the place to pursue the illustrations and confirmation of these suggestions. The matter, however, must necessarily be investigated, in a critical introduction to the book.]

(Chapter 12:) [Nothing can be plainer, than that the beginning of this chapter belongs to the prophecy which precedes. It is not only a continuation of the address of the same speaker, but evidently a sequel of the same subject. The division, if made at all, should have been made at the end of 12:3.]

§ 2. Nature and Design of the Book.

It is difficult to make a greater mistake in regard to these, than to suppose that he designed to write a continuous and regular history, either of himself, of the Jews, or of the kings of Babylon. So much of his early history is developed, as serves to cast light on the manner in which he became qualified to act the important part which fell to his lot. When this is accomplished, he is brought to view only on some great occasions, where his interposition seems to make a signal display of divine power and goodness. E.g. he interprets Nebuchadnezzar's first and second mysterious dreams. He explains to the impious Belshazzar the ominous hand-writing on the wall. He is elevated to the post of viceroy under Darius the Mede, and had a marvellous escape from the den of lions, into which he had been cast by the malignant artifices of envious courtiers. It appears probable from 6:28 and 10:1, that he retained a high post of honor, at least for some three years of the reign of Cyrus. These are all the incidents recorded of a life of some seventy years, in connection with the Babylonish court. To speak of a regular 'biography', then, as undertaken by Daniel, would indicate a very singular notion of what belongs to his book.

As to the Jews, not one word is said concerning them, either as to the good or evil that befell them, during their state of exile. What was their condition, and what their demeanor, the writer of the book of Daniel has not undertaken at all to inform us.

In regard to the native kings of Babylon, the names of only two of them occur, viz. of Nebuchadnezzar and of Belshazzar. Nebuchadnezzar reigned more than forty years, and made many conquests. But it is only on the occasion of his two dreams, and the consecration of his colossal idol, that he is brought to view, after Daniel becomes a member of his court. Belshazzar appears only on the last day of his life; and his Medo-Persian successors are brought to view in such a way, that we have only a single glance at them. Darius' sad mistake in yielding to the artifices of his courtiers to destroy Daniel, is graphically placed before us; but nothing further is disclosed respecting him. That Cyrus succeeded him in the throne of Babylon, is all that is said concerning him, excepting that he was the friend of Daniel.

The rest of the book is made up of four prophetic visions, seen between B.C. 555 and 584, i.e. in the later part of Daniel's life. These are 'sui generis' both in respect to form and matter, to a certain extent; although in several respects they strongly resemble other visions of other prophets during the exile, e.g. those of Ezekiel and Zachariah. The main object of them is, to show the future condition and destiny of the Jewish people, after the exile and before the period when their great Deliverer should come.

Some critics have assumed, that Daniel undertook to write his own history and that of Babylon; or at least, that he ought to have done so; and then they take him to task for having performed his work so imperfectly and unskillfully. Others, perceiving how slender is the foundation on which all this is built, proclaim (adunco naso) that the whole book has a mere parenetic or hortatory object in view; and that this design is reached just as well by romance or allegory as by facts. They compare the narratives in Daniel with the parables in the Evangelists, and aver, that in both cases the end is reached equally as well by romance as by facts. In this way, all investigation as to actual events or occurrences is suspended, or rendered a matter of indifference, and comes out that we have before us, in the book of Daniel, a mere fiction or allegory, a part of which has pretended facts for its basis, and the other part is underlaid by supposed prophetic revelations and visions.

When the question is asked: What book in the Old Test. or the New stands on such a basis? it becomes difficult to give a satisfactory answer. Strauss, indeed, and those who sympathize with him, have no difficulty in answering the question; for they take the same position as the objectors before us, with regard to the Gospels themselves, viz. that they are but a tissue of allegories and romance. But men of more sober minds can find but little satisfaction, in the assumption of positions such as these.

When it is said (as it sometimes has been), that the design of the author of the book of Daniel is wholly 'paraenetic', the assertion plainly goes too far. The 'prophetic' parts of this book have surely but a slight tinge of this cast. But still, if I might be permitted to define the word 'paraenetic', I should not wish to deny that the book at large has this characteristic, even in a high degree. I understand this word to designate something that is 'edifying', and this in the way of 'warning' and 'exhortation' or excitement. Most surely the occurrences related by Daniel are deeply interesting in their nature, and highly adapted to make a deep impression on all minds, of the power and goodness and holiness of the Supreme Being. Could Daniel, or any other prophet, preach more impressive sermons to Nebuchadnezzar and his court, than the explanation of the monarch's dreams, and the defeat of his murderous purposes on the plains of Dura? Was there ever a more impressive scene, than that in Belshazzar's palace, on the night of his death? Could a thousand books or addresses have made an impression so deep and awful, on the riotous and idolatrous courtiers of the king, as the mysterious handwriting on the wall, and the interpretation of the same? Or was there any means of securing to Daniel his place in the court of Darius, and afterwards in that of Cyrus, so stringent and effectual, as the deliverance of the Heb. prophet from the den of lions? All this undoubtedly is 'paraenetic', and is so in a high degree. Indeed the mind cannot well conceive of occasions that would command a more thrilling interest, than those related by Daniel. Nothing trifling, nothing indifferent, nothing 'mediocre', is connected with them. They far exceed, in point of real interest, the renowned tales of oriental fiction so long current and popular in the West as well as the East. The reason is, that the events with which they are concerned are of the highest magnitude and importance; and while there is enough in them of the marvellous to gratify this craving of the human mind, there is still nothing of the monstrous, the absurd, the puerile, and the impossible. I speak of course as a believer in the possibility of miracles; but even those who deny this, cannot deny the thrilling interest of the narrations, nor their adaptedness to excite a deep religious feeling. What could be devised better to show the heathenish court and city, that their "idol 'gods' were a lie, and that those who make them are like unto them?"

The prophetic parts of the book are designed more for believing Jews, than for the heathen. Yet even here there is matter which might well instruct the heathen, and especially those of that period. The succession of the four dynasties was a thing that could be nothing more than guessed at, without the aid of inspiration. The character and demeanor of the Syrian dynasty were, matters in the dark, and also, as yet, in the distant future. Supposing Daniel to have written all the predictions in his book respecting this dynasty, how; is it possible to deny that he had a foresight altogether supernatural? Josephus (Antiqq. x. ad. fin.) argues, from this book of Daniel, the certainty of an omniscient and omnipotent overruling Providence. The argument is sound and conclusive; unless indeed we assume, with many recent critics, that a miracle is an utter impossibility.

But let us view the book before us in another light. The Jews were in exile, in different parts of Babylonia; many of them near the metropolis. All captives in war were universally considered, at that time, as the 'slaves' of the conquerors. In this state, they must naturally have been exposed to many injuries, insults, and severities. Slavery is but a bitter draught, even when the potion is sweetened. But a slavish subjection of the people of God to a highly superstitious and idolatrous nation, must, in the usual course of things, have exposed them to many indignities and cruelties. Was it nothing, then, to this degraded and suffering people, that one of their own nation was the highest officer at court, the king excepted? Was it nothing, that Daniel and his three friends managed all the concerns of Babylonia? Could they not, in many ways, and without exciting the suspicion or displeasure of the king, modify and allay the severities to which the exiles were exposed, and lighten the yoke that was on their neck? And if the God of heaven meant to preserve his people, in the midst of their chastisement and humiliation, and finally to restore them to their country, was it not worthy of him to interpose as he did, and order matters in such a way that the Jews would be kept quiet until the appointed time, and would be protected from special insult and injury? One can scarcely believe that the miracles wrought under Moses in the wilderness, were more important to the existence and welfare of the Jews, than those which were wrought in Babylon.

Nor is this all. Babylon was to change masters. What then would the new sovereigns do, in regard to the Jews? Would they oppress them, as other slaves were usually oppressed? Or would they treat them kindly, and give them their liberty? When Darius came to the throne of Babylon, this was a deeply interesting question. The time of deliverance, as predicted by Jeremiah, was near at hand. Much was to be done. Darius, therefore, and after him Cyrus, were to be won over to the cause of the exiles. Daniel's standing and relation to these kings doubtless accomplished this important work. No sooner had Cyrus become seated on his new throne, than he set the whole Jewish nation free. All the sacred vessels of the temple were given up to the returning exiles, and all persons were called upon to encourage them, and contribute to their holy and patriotic undertaking.

If now the events related in the book of Daniel have evidently such important ends in view, and are well adapted to accomplish them, who will deny the importance of recording them for the instruction of all future ages? Facts like these, which exhibit the power and glory of God, and show his tender care for his people even when erring from his ways, are, I readily concede, 'paraenetic' even in the highest degree. But they are far indeed from detracting from the value of the book, or from being unworthy of the sacred records.

It has been made an objection against the book before us, that it is a mixture of history and prediction, and thus exhibits itself as alien from the Hebrew prophetic writing in general. But this objection has little ground to support it. Is it not Isaiah in part historical? See chap. 36-39. Is not almost one half of Jeremiah historical? Are not parts of Haggai and Zechariah historical? How is it any objection to Daniel, then, that it contains historical narrations, when all that is related has a most evident and intimate connection with the welfare of the people, and is adapted to impress deeply on their minds, what God had done in their behalf?

In respect to the 'prophetic' parts of the book, there is no portion of them which does not point the Jews to the great Deliverer, who was yet to appear among them. In regard to 'Messianic' views, no prophet introduces them so often and danger that were yet to come, we may apply the common apothegm: 'Forewarned, forearmed.' Daniel and others might, of themselves, have hoped that liberation from the Babylonish exile would secure the lasting and uniform prosperity of the Jews. But his visions warn him and them not to rely on false hopes. Still further chastisement would be needed, and still more would be inflicted. Rejoice indeed they might; but they were warned to rejoice with trembling.

One other characteristic of the book deserves special notice. A portion —a large one— of its prophetic parts relates to a period between the return from exile and the coming of the Messiah. No other prophecy has occupied this ground. With the exception of the Messianic period itself; all other prophetic books close, as to any future, either with the exile itself, or with return from it? Has Isaiah, Jeremiah, or Ezekiel gone beyond this, excepting in what is Messianic, much as they have said about the exile and the return from it? And is there no special propriety in Daniel's occupying the highly important ground in question? Ezra and Nehemiah and the book of Esther have indeed related some important occurrences, within the first century after the return from Babylon. But even the latest of the Hebrew prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, leave more than four centuries unoccupied by prediction, and equally so by history. The great misfortunes and sufferings of the Jews, even such as in some respects surpassed those of the Babylonish captivity, were yet to come, and the Jews, as a nation, had as yet no warning of them. Is no important object accomplished, then, when Daniel fills up this gap? At least it will be acknowledged, that the Jews had, and must have, a deep interest in such predictions as disclosed to them other times of trial and of danger. It cannot be charged upon the prophecies of Daniel, therefore, that they are insignificant or unimportant.

But why (the Messianic period excepted) do his predictions stop short with the death of Antiochus Epiphanes? The Jews had many troubles 'after' his time; why not predict and specify them in like manner?

To these questions one might reply, by asking why all the other prophets have, with the exception of the Messianic prophecies, a 'terminus ad quem' about of Daniel's? Why did they not go beyond the exile, and the return from it? But, passing this, I would remark, that, as has already been stated, neither Daniel, nor any other prophet, undertakes to write 'annals' of the Jewish nation. Ordinary events and occurrences are omitted in prophecy. Daniel stops with those occurrences which were not inferior, in point of interest, to the Babylonish captivity itself. There was even more danger to the religion of the Jews under Antiochus' reign than under Nebuchadnezzar's. Let us see moreover, for a moment, whether there is not a natural turn (so to speak) given to the mind of the prophet. When the seventy years were near to a close, Daniel prays most earnestly for the promised deliverance. Gabriel then appears to tell him, that although one period of seventy had now come near its close, yet another period of seven times seventy awaited his people, one of deep and thrilling interest. The city and temple would indeed be rebuilt; but this would be accomplished in troublous times; and at last another crisis in their affairs would come, not unlike that through which they had just passed. Jeremiah had occupied his book with the crisis which had just passed; Daniel might very naturally occupy his with the one that was yet to come.

'But why not go beyond this?' I answer again by asking: Why did not Jeremiah go beyond the end of the exile? There must be some stopping place, unless prophecy necessarily becomes a book of continuous annals. Enough for Daniel, that he looked forward to the second exile as it were, and predicted it. The Jews had indeed many troubles after that period; but they bore no comparison with those of the reign of Antiochus. They were temporary. They always had their own kings and priests. Even the conquest of Pompey (B.C. 63) did not seriously interrupt the independence and prosperity of the Jews. He left the temple untouched, with all its sacred utensils. It is no objection then to the book before us, that its predictions close with a second horrible catastrophe. And surely it is no unimportant object to be accomplished by it, to disclose a sad catastrophe which no other prophet had foretold.

Even those interpreters (who are quite numerous), that look upon the book of Daniel as having named a specific period of seventy weeks of years which reaches down to the Messiah, are obliged to confess its silence respecting 'events' after the reign of Antiochus, and even until the Messianic period. But for the 490 years which these weeks contain, there has been found by those interpreters no apposite 'terminus a quo'; as we have already seen in the Comm. on 9:24-27. That they 'end' with the reign and death of Antiochus, I cannot doubt; although I am unable to make the commencement of them clear. But as I shall not here renew the discussion of this topic, I merely remark, that any 'a priori' prescription of the metes and bounds of prophecy must be inapposite and irrelevant. 'Everything' is not predicted, nor designed to be predicted. We must leave the matter of judging where to stop, and what to include, to the prophet himself. Enough in the present case, that analogy drawn from other prophets justifies Daniel in stopping with a signal catastrophe.

A class of objectors to the contents of the book of Daniel, different from those whom I have noticed, make the allegation, that 'the book has no important 'moral' object in view. It never preaches, never denounces, never threatens, and never promises. It is therefore unlike any other of the prophecies.'

But if we should suppose the alleged histories in the book to be romance, or allegory, even then there would be little force in this objection. Does not our Saviour teach, yea preach, and threaten, and promise, and exhort, in his parables? Daniel was not by regular office a prophet, i.e. he was not sent to the Jewish people in the capacity of a public teacher. He does not address them at all, in a direct manner, like Isaiah, Jeremiah, and others. But are not his narrations full of most important instruction? Are they not comminatory to idolaters, and encouraging and soul-stirring to the pious? Are any more lofty ideas of God, and his superintending and remunerating providence, anywhere disclosed? Are not the events then future, which are disclosed in the predictions of Daniel, of thrilling interest and importance? And with all this before us, are we entitled to make such an objection as that in question?

On another extreme are those who assert that 'the object of the book is that of a narrow-minded and superstitious Hebrew. According to him, there is no God but Jehovah, and no people but the Jews. Everything is purely national and selfish; or else it savors of superstition and closely adheres to the Jewish ritual.'

To the accusation, that Daniel makes Jehovah supreme and all in all, and the Jewish people his then only chosen people, I plead 'guilty' in his behalf. But if there be culpable guilt or superstition in this, then all the Heb. prophets lie under the same condemnation yea, all the O. Testament. But on 'such' points, accusation is eulogy. God be thanked, that there are many millions who have thought with Daniel, and who still think and believe with him, as to Jehovah and his chosen people! In regard to 'superstition' and 'selfishness', I am unable to find either of them in the pages of Daniel. A more pious, devoted, noble minded man never lived. How could he have been so long in the Babylonish court, without a liberality and courteousness of mind and manners of which there are but few examples?

Lengerke and others, who assign the book to the period of Antiochus' persecutions, represent 'the main object of it to be, to encourage the Jewish people who were suffering under them, and to hold up to them, in the example of Nebuchadnezzar, the probable fate of their tyrannical oppressor. Everything throughout the book, it is alleged, is written with such a purpose in mind, and to this both the historical part and the predictions have a constant reference. It was, moreover, this 'a propos' character and quality of the book which procured for it, at so late a period, a place in the Jewish canon.'

I do not feel disposed in any measure to call in question the fact, that the book of Daniel was highly adapted to admonish, to comfort, and to quicken the righteous sufferers, under the cruel persecutions of Epiphanes; nor that it is a book adapted peculiarly to seasons of distress and trouble, at all times and in all countries. But that the book was written for the purpose of making Nebuchadnezzar an allegorical personage, whose real antitype was Antiochus, I must be permitted to call in question. Some features of mutual resemblance indeed there are, as there always must be between men who are tyrants and oppressors and plunderers. But beyond the facts, that both of these kings overran and subdued Palestine, and took possession of its capital city; that both of them rifled the temple of many of its treasures, and destroyed many of the Jews in war —beyond these facts, there is little in common between Nebuchadnezzar and Antiochus. Nebuchadnezzar was no persecutor for the sake of religion. With the exception of the three Jewish worthies who were cast into the furnace of fire, (and this because they publicly refused to obey the king's orders to prostrate themselves before his idol, and that, as he viewed the matter, showed him disrespect), we read of no persecution for the sake of religion in Nebuchadnezzar's time. We are told indeed by Jeremiah (29:22), that the king of Babylon roasted Zedekiah and Ahab in the fire. But it appears from the context, that these were false prophets and preachers of sedition among the Hebrew captives. In all probability it was for reasons of State, that they were sentenced to death. But in all the accounts we have of Nebuchadnezzar's demeanor in respect to the Jews in exile, we have nothing to excite suspicion that he was a bigoted persecutor, or even a persecutor at all. In accordance with the war-usages of the times, Nebuchadnezzar, when provoked by the frequent rebellion of the Jews, made havoc among their leaders, after they had been conquered in battle. But none of the prophets, during the exile, have told us of anything which he did to the Jews, which resembled the furious and bloody and long-continued persecutions of Antiochus. Nebuchadnezzar destroyed the temple, because he knew it would be a rallying point for the Jewish nation. But Antiochus, the (meshomem), made it desolate and polluted it by his abominations, his statue of Jupiter with his eagle, and his offerings of swine's flesh on the altar. He also sought to destroy every copy of the Jewish sacred books, and punished with death those who concealed them from him. He bribed apostate Jews to practise the heathen rites, and deluged with blood the holy city for several years. We have no account that Nebuchadnezzar did anything like to this. We do not read of his prohibiting the Jews to retain their Scriptures, or of his obliging them to desist from their worship and rites. It is impossible to suppose, with any probability, that Nebuchadnezzar had any bitter and bigoted resentment against the Jews as such. If so, how could he have constituted a 'Jew' his prime minister, and his three intimate friends satraps in Babylonia? It lies on the face of the whole narration, that the state of the Jews at that period must have been rendered quite tolerable, in a civil and social respect, under such a viceroy and such governors. The advice which Jeremiah gives them (ch. 29), shows that the exiles were far from being in a very degraded state, or destitute of many important privileges.

Compare now with all this, the doings of Antiochus as related in 1st Macc. i. seq. In common, both the king of Babylon and the king of Syria were conquerors, and masters of Judea for a time. But the demeanor of Nebuchadnezzar toward the vanquished, and that of Antiochus, was as discrepant as we can well imagine.

Why then should a writer, in the time of Antiochus in go about inventing a fictitious exemplar of that tyrant, and yet make it so widely diverse, that one can scarcely find any analogy between the two cases, excepting that of original conquest and pillage? A very unskillful writer of fiction he must have been, not to make the prototype more like the antitype. Even as to temper and character, the two kings were very unlike. Nebuchadnezzar was indeed haughty, and passionate, and during his passion he was cruel. But he had his seasons of deep relenting, and could be made to feel the force of an appeal to that God who alone is supreme. It seems even probable from Dan. 4, that he died at last a penitent and a believer. But Antiochus had all his bad qualities, without any of his good ones. He was relentless, bigoted to the last degree, cruel beyond any precedent where his anger had been excited, and irascible to an extreme. Well was he nicknamed (epimanēs). Besides all this, he was avaricious, debauched beyond all measure, mean, contemptible, (nibezeh) as Daniel very appropriately calls him), and withal very arrogant and ambitious. It would be difficult to find his parallel, even in a Tiberius, a Caligula, or a Nero.

To me it would appear a matter of wonder, that a writer having such an object in view as that of making out a prototype for Antiochus, should have succeeded so ill, since he has manifested, in many parts of his book, ideas and emotions that are truly sublime and striking. That a man of even 'mediocre' talent, should not better succeed, must be a matter of surprise to all, in case we make the main object of the book to be what Lengerke asserts it to be.

But this is not all. Lengerke and his 'liberal' friends declare unhesitatingly their disbelief of all miracles. Of course, they deny that 'prediction', in a truly prophetic sense, is anywhere to be found in the Bible. Of course Daniel could really predict nothing. But as his book contains many things, which if written during the exile, must be considered as real predictions, it follows of course, as they conclude, that the book could have been written only after the events described had taken place.

But here is some substantial disagreement with the positions that we have just been examining. Daniel, they say, was written in the time of the Maccabees, to encourage and comfort the Jews under persecution. Of course, if this were the object, it must have been written when the persecution was going on, i.e. during the life of Antiochus. But how then did the writer come to know much about the 'death' of Antiochus? How did he know that this would happen at the end of the last week of the 70 weeks? To fill this gap, Bleek alleges, that chaps. 10-12. were written 'after' his death, so that it is 'prophecy post eventum.' But unluckily for this subterfuge, Dan. 7:24-26 predicts his death after a 'definite' period, viz. after the last half of the final week of years. It is also again predicted in Dan. 8:23-26, where it is explicitly stated, that Antiochus shall be crushed, not in war, nor by human power, but by the mighty hand of the Prince of princes, without human aid. Dan. 9:26,27, repeats the same declarations. Here then the time and manner of Antiochus' death are both explicitly declared. How now could a writer under his reign, foresee all this, without the spirit of prophecy? And of what use is it to tell us, that chap. 10-12 at least were written 'post eventum'? If we concede it, does not in the least remove our difficulty with the theory in question.

At all events, then, those who reject 'prophecy' as an impossibility, must maintain that the whole book of Daniel (comp. 2:40-4.8) was written 'after' the death of Antiochus. But here again we have ('husteron proteron'). If such were the case, then what need of the 'paraenetics' addressed to the persecuted? Antiochus was dead; Judas was triumphant; Judea was free; her temple was cleansed and deconsecrated, and all its holy rites and privileges renewed. Did the Jews need the exhortation and consolation addressed to the persecuted, when it was with them a time of feasting, and of keeping their national thanksgiving? Rather, we should suppose, did the times call for something like Ex. 15, or Ps. 68, or Is. 14.

And then, (I cannot help asking the question): How were the Jews of that period, led on by such men as Mattathias, and Judas, and Simon, to be convinced that a book just written, and never before heard of, was the work of a man who lived more than four centuries before, and deserved a place in their sacred canon, now rendered doubly dear by persecution, and by the efforts to destroy it? Believe all this who may, I must regard it as a stretch of credulity far beyond that belief which others cherish, who are accused of an 'a priori' faith, and are treated with so much scorn on account of it.

That the book of Daniel may profit the people of God at all times and in all places, I have fully conceded. But that it was written in 'Antiochian' times, and for such a specific purpose as is alleged, and was foisted at that time into the Jewish canon, are assertions which require evidence to establish them than has yet been adduced.

Enough has been said, to show the moral, religious, and, I may add, political or civil designs and objects of the book before us. It does not, like most of the prophets, contain 'preaching' or 'hortatory'. But both its narrative and its predictions are full of interesting and important instruction. In one particular it differs from most of the other prophetic books. It contains predictions that relate to a series of successive empires, in middle and hither Asia. The like is not elsewhere to be met with. But it is not of these empires because they are such, or rather, it is not of them 'historically' regarded as empires, that it treats. It is of them only as standing in relation to or in connection with the Jews, that it speaks. When it was written, the first of the four great empires had attained its height of power. The prophet follows on to sketch very briefly the fall of all the four great dynasties, until he comes to the last, on which he dwells more than on all the others, merely because the Jews were more affected by it than by all the rest. It lies upon the very face of his predictions, that such is the nature of his design. Having brought his people to what we may call their second exile, (for multitudes did in reality become exiles and fled to the caves and deserts), he breaks off here, with the exception of disclosing a future great Deliverer and Saviour, whose kingdom is to be universal. It was not to his purpose, to pursue the detail of historic facts any further.

That he has left behind him a book of the deepest interest, to all who admit the miracles of the Bible, none I think will question. We should lose an important link in the golden chain of revelation, if this were struck out. My belief is, that all the efforts of unbelieving and sneering criticism will not be able to remove it from its place. }}

6. Barnes.

Notes, Critical, Explanatory, and Practical, on the Book of Daniel, with an Introductory Dissertation. By the Rev. Albert Barnes. Edited by Rev. Ebenezer Henderson, D.D. In 2 Vols. London. 1851. 1853.

{{ Editor's Preface:The subject-matter of that now laid before the public is one of no slight interest, as it is one of no common difficulty. The 'Book of Daniel' stands out as the Apocalypse of the Old Testament. Written by "a man greatly beloved"—written by him in the land of his exile—written in prophetic language, which veiled the future under symbolic images and shadowy forms, it has a considerable affinity, both in its circumstances and in its character, to the Book of Revelation. But on this predictive record Mr. Barnes has brought to bear the same critical acumen, and the same spirit of piety, that are evinced in his exposition of the closing portion of the inspired volume..... E.Henderson.1853.}}

{{ Advertisement to the London Edition:(Notes on the Book of Daniel written in 1850, but published after the Notes on the Book of Revelation.) This explanation seems to be necessary, as there are many references in the "Notes on the Book of Revelation" to the "Notes on the Book of Daniel." The two books, according to the views taken in the exposition, refer, to a considerable extent, to the same events; and as the "Notes on the Book of Daniel" were first written, those points were of necessity illustrated in that work, and this fact made anything more than a mere reference to it needless in commenting on the Book of Revelation. The two may therefore, without impropriety, be regarded as parts of one work; and they are now committed, with many thanks for the favourable reception of my former publications, and, I may add, with special gratitude to British Christians, to the candid judgment of those who love the Bible, and to the blessing of God.....Albert Barnes, 1853. }}

{{ Preface: A very remarkable resemblance has always been observed between the Book of Daniel and the Book of Revelation. Whatever view may be taken of the proper interpretation of these books, it is difficult to write a Commentary on one of them without carefully studying the other, and without practically furnishing to a considerable extent an exposition of the other. There is no evidence, indeed, that John, in the Book of Revelation, intended to imitate Daniel, and yet there is so strong a resemblance in the manner in which the Divine disclosures respecting the future were made to the two writers; there is so clear a reference to the same great events in the history of the world; there is so much similarity in the symbols employed, that no commentator can well write on the one without discussing many points, and making use of many illustrations, which would be equally appropriate in an exposition of the other.....A.B., 1851. }}

{{ Chapter I. Section I. Authenticity of the Chapter: [B.C. 607.]

For the general argument in favour of the genuineness and authenticity of the book of Daniel, see Intro. § II, III. To the genuineness and authenticity of each particular chapter in detail, however, objections, derived from something peculiar in each chapter, have been urged, which it is proper to meet, and which I propose to consider in a particular introduction to the respective chapters. These objections it is proper to consider, not so much because they have been urged by distinguished German critics —De Wette, Bertholdt, Bleek, Eichhorn, and others, for their writings will probably fall into the hands of few persons who will read these Notes, but (a) because it may be that men of so much learning, industry, acuteness, and ingenuity, have urged all the objections which can, with any appearance of plausibility, be alleged against the book; and (b) because the objections which they have urged may be presumed to be felt, to a greater or less degree, by those who read the book, though they might not be able to express them with so much clearness and force. There are numerous objections to various portions of the Scriptures floating in the minds of the readers of the Bible, and many difficulties which occur to such readers, which are not expressed, and which it would be desirable to remove, and which it is the duty of an expositor of the Bible, if he can, to remove. Skeptical critics, in general, but collect and embody in a plausible form difficulties which are felt by most readers of the Scriptures. It is for this reason, and with a view to remove what 'seems' to furnish plausible arguments against the different portions of this book, that the objections which have been urged, principally by the authors above referred to, will be noticed in special sections preceding the exposition of each chapter.

The only objection to the genuineness and authenticity of the first chapter which it seems necessary to notice is, that the account of Daniel in the chapter is inconsistent with the mention of Daniel by Ezekiel. The objection substantially is, that it is improbable that the Daniel who is mentioned by Ezekiel should be one who was a contemporary with himself, and who at that time lived in Babylon. Daniel is three times mentioned in Ezekiel, and in each case as a man of eminent piety and integrity as one so distinguished by his virtues as to deserve to be classed with the most eminent of the patriarchs. Thus in Ezek. 14:14, "Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness, saith the Lord God." So again, ver. 20, "Though Noah, Daniel, and Job were in it, as I live, saith the Lord God, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter, they shall deliver but their own souls by their righteousness." And again, ch. 28:3, speaking of the prince of Tyre, "Behold thou art wiser than Daniel." The objection urged in respect to the mention of Daniel in these passages is substantially this —that if the account in the book of Daniel is true, he must have been a contemporary with Ezekiel, and must have been, when Ezekiel prophesied, a young man; that it is incredible that he should have gained a degree of reputation which would entitle him to be ranked with Noah and Job; that he could not have been so well known as to make it natural or proper to refer to him in the same connexion with those eminent men; and 'especially' that he could not have been thus known to the prince of Tyre, as is supposed of those mentioned by Ezekiel in the passages referred to, for it cannot be presumed that a man so young had acquired such a fame abroad as to make it proper to refer to him in this manner in an address to a heathen prince. This objection was urged by Bernstein (über das Buch Hiob, in den Analekten von Keil und Tzschirner, i. 3, p. 10), and it is found also in Bleek, p. 284, and De Wette, Einl. p. 380. #. ette says that it is probable that the author of the book of Daniel used the name of "an ancient mythic or poetic person falsely," in order to illustrate his work.

Now, in regard to this objection, it may be remarked (a) that, according to all the accounts which we have in the Bible, Ezekiel and Daniel 'were' cotemporary, and were in Babylon at the same time. As Daniel, however, lived a long time in Babylon after this, it is to be admitted, also, that at the period referred to by Ezekiel, he must have been comparatively a young man. But it does not follow that he might not then have had a well-known character for piety and integrity, which would make it proper to mention his name in connexion with the most eminent saints of ancient times. If the account in the book of Daniel 'itself' is a correct account of him, this will not be doubted, for he soon attracted attention in Babylon; he soon evinced that extraordinary piety which made him so eminent as a man of God, and that extraordinary wisdom which raised him to the highest rank as an officer of state in Babylon. It was very soon after he was taken to Babylon that the purpose was formed to train him, and the three other selected youths, in the learning of the Chaldeans (ch. 1:1-4), and that Daniel showed that he was qualified to pass the examination, preparatory to his occupying an honourable place in the court (ch. 1:18-21); and it was only in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar that the remarkable dream occurred, the interpretation of which gave to Daniel so much celebrity, ch. ii. According to a computation of Hengstenberg ('Authentic des Daniel', p. 71), Daniel was taken to Babylon full ten years before, the prophecy of Ezekiel, in which the first mention of him was made; and if so, there can be no real ground for the objection referred to. In that time, if the account of his extraordinary wisdom is true; if he evinced the character which it is said that he did evince —and against this there is no intrinsic improbability; and if he was exalted to office and rank, as it is stated that he was, there can be no improbability in what Ezekiel says of him, that he had a character which made it proper that he should be classed with the most eminent men of the Jewish nation. (b) As to the objection that the name of Daniel could not have been known to the king of Tyre, as would seem to be implied in Ezek. 28:3, it may be remarked, that it is not necessary to suppose that these prophecies were ever known to the king of Tyre, or that i. were ever designed to influence him. The prophecies which were directed against the ancient heathen kings were uttered and published among the Hebrew people, primarily for 'their' guidance, and were designed to furnish to them, and to others in future times, arguments for the truth of religion, though they assumed the form of direct addresses to the kings themselves. Such an imaginary appeal may have been made in this by Ezekiel to the king of Tyre; and, in speaking of him, and of his boasted wisdom, Ezekiel may have made the comparison which would then naturally occur to him, by mentioning him in connexion with the most eminent man for wisdom of that age. But it should be said, also, that there can be no certain evidence that the name of Daniel was 'not' known to the king of Tyre, and no intrinsic improbability in the supposition that it was. If Daniel had at that time the remarkable wisdom at the court of Babylon which it is said in this book that he had; if he had been raised to that high rank which it is affirmed he had reached, there is no improbability in supposing that so remarkable a circumstance should have been made known to the king of Tyre. Tyre was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 572, after a siege of thirteen years, and it is in no way improbable that the king of Tyre would be made acquainted with what occurred at the court of the Chaldeans. The prophecy in Ezekiel, where Daniel is mentioned (ch. 28:3), could not have been uttered long before Tyre was taken, and, in referring to what was to occur, it was not unnatural to mention the man most distinguished for wisdom at the court of Babylon, and in the councils of Nebuchadnezzar, with the presumption that his name and celebrity would not be unknown to the king of Tyre. (c) As to the objection of Bernstein, that it would be improbable, if Daniel lived there, and if he was comparatively a young man, that his name would be placed 'between' that of Noah and Job (Ezek. 14:14), as if he had lived 'before' Job, it may be remarked, that there might be a greater similarity between the circumstances of Noah and Daniel than between Noah and Job, and that it was proper to refer to them in this order. But the mere circumstance of the order in which the names are mentioned cannot be adduced as a proof that one of the persons named did not exist at that time. They may have occurred in this order to Ezekiel, because in his apprehension, that was the order in which the degree of their piety was to be estimated.

To this objection thus considered, that the mention of Daniel in connexion with Noah and Job proves that Ezekiel referred to some one of ancient times, it may be further replied, that, if this were so, it is impossible to account for the fact that no such person is mentioned by any of the earlier prophets and writers. How came his name known to Ezekiel? And if there had been a patriarch so eminent as to be ranked with Noah and Job, how is it to be accounted for that all the sacred writers, up to the time of Ezekiel, are wholly silent in regard to him? And why is it that, when he mentions him, he does it as of one who was well known? The mere mention of his name in this manner by Ezekiel proves that his character was well known to those for whom he wrote. Noah and Job were thus known by the ancient records; but how was Daniel thus known? He is nowhere mentioned in the ancient writings of the Hebrews; and if he was so well known that he could be referred to in the same way as Noah, and Job, it must be either because there was some tradition in regard to him, or because he was then living, and his character was well understood by those for whom Ezekiel wrote. ... But there is no evidence that there was any such tradition, and no probability that there was, and the conclusion, then, is inevitable, that he was then so well known to the Hebrews in exile, that it was proper for Ezekiel to mention him just as he did Noah and Job. If so, this furnishes the highest evidence that he actually lived in the time of Ezekiel; that is, in the time when this book purports to have been written. }}

{{ Section II. Analysis of Chapter 1:

This chapter is entirely historical, the prophetic portions of the book commencing with the second chapter. The 'object' of this chapter seems to be to state the way in which Daniel, who subsequently acted so important a part in Babylon, was raised to so distinguished favour with the king and court. It was remarkable that a Jewish captive, and a young man, should be so honoured; that he should be admitted as one of the principal counsellors of the king, and that he should ultimately become the prime-minister of the realm; and there was a propriety that there should be a preliminary statement of the steps of this extraordinary promotion. This chapter contains a record of the way in which the future premier and prophet was introduced to the notice of the reigning monarch, and by which his wonderful genius and sagacity were discovered. It is a chapter, therefore, that may be full of interest and instruction to all, and especially to young men. The chapter contains the record of the following points, or steps, which led to the promotion of Daniel:—

I. The history of the Jewish captivity, as explanatory of the reason why those who are subsequently referred to were in Babylon. They were exiles, having been conveyed as captives to a foreign land, vers. 1,2.

II. The purpose of the king, Nebuchadnezzar, to bring forward the principal talent to be found among the Jewish captives, and to put it under a process of training, that it might be employed at the court, vers. 3,4. In carrying out this purpose, a confidential officer of the court, Ashpenaz, was directed to search out among the captives the most promising youths, whether by birth or talent, and to put them under a process of training, that they might become fully instructed in the science of the Chaldeans. What were the reasons which led to this cannot be known with certainty. They may have been such as these: (1.) The Chaldeans had devoted themselves to science, especially to those sciences which promised any information respecting future events, the secrets of the unseen world, etc. Hence they either originated or adopted the science of astrology; they practised the arts of magic; they studied to interpret dreams; and, in general, they made use of all the means which it was then supposed could be employed to unlock the secrets of the invisible world, and to disclose the future. (2) They could not have been ignorant of the fact, that the Hebrews claimed to have communications with God. They had doubtless heard of their prophets, and of their being able to foretell what was to occur. This kind of knowledge would fall in with the objects at which the Chaldeans aimed, and if they could avail themselves of it, it would enable them to secure what they so ardently sought. It is probable that they considered this as a sort of 'permanent' power which the Hebrew prophets had, and supposed that at all times, and on all subjects, they could interpret dreams, and solve the various questions about which their own magicians were so much engaged. It is not to be presumed that they had any very accurate knowledge of the exact character of the Hebrew prophecies, or the nature of the communication which the prophets had with God; but it was not unnatural for them to suppose that this spirit of prophecy or divination would be possessed by the most noble and the most talented of the land. Hence Ashpenaz was instructed to select those of the royal family, and those in whom there was no blemish, and who were handsome, and who were distinguished for knowledge, and to prepare them, by a suitable course, for being presented to the king. (3.) It may have been the purpose of the Chaldean monarch to bring forward all the talent of the realm, whether native or foreign, to be employed in the service of the government. There is no reason to suppose that there was any jealousy of foreign talent, or any reluctance to employ it in any proper way, in promoting the interests of the kingdom. As the Chaldean monarch had now in his possession the Hebrew royal family, and all the principal men that had been distinguished in Judea, it was not unnatural to suppose that there might be valuable talent among them of which he might avail himself, and which would add to the splendour of his own court and cabinet. It might have been naturally supposed, also, that it would tend much to conciliate the captives themselves, and repress any existing impatience, or insubordination, to select the most noble and the most gifted of them, and to employ them in the service of the government; and in any questions that might arise between the government and the captive nation, it would be an advantage for the government to be able to employ native-born Hebrews in making known the wishes and purposes of the government. It was, moreover, in accordance with the proud spirit of Nebuchadnezzar (see ch. 4) to surround himself with all that would impart splendour to his own reign.

III. The method by which this talent was to be brought forward, vers. 5-7. This was by a course of living in the manner of the royal household, with the presumption that at the end of three years, in personal appearance, and in the knowledge of the language of the Chaldeans (ver. 4), they would be prepared to appear at court, and to be employed in the service to which they might be appointed.

IV. The resolution of Daniel not to corrupt himself with the viands which had been appointed for him and his brethren, ver. 8. He had heretofore been strictly temperate; he had avoided all luxurious living; he had abstained from wine; and, though now having all the means of luxurious indulgence at command, and being unexpectedly thrown into the temptations of a splendid Oriental court, he resolved to adhere steadfastly to his principles.

V. The apprehension of the prince of the eunuchs that this would be a ground of offence with his master, the king, and that he would himself be held responsible, vers. 9,10. This was a very natural apprehension, as the command seems to have been positive, and as an Oriental monarch was entirely despotic. It was not unreasonable for him to whom this office was entrusted to suppose that a failure on his part to accomplish what he had been directed to do would be followed by a loss of place or life.

VI. The experiment, and the result, vers. 11-17. Daniel asked that a trial might be made of the effects of temperance in preparing him and his companions for presentation at court. He requested that they might be permitted, even for a brief time, yet long enough to make a fair experiment, to abstain from wine, and the other luxuries of the royal table, and that then it might be determined whether they should be allowed to continue the experiment. The result was as he had anticipated. At the end of ten days, on a fair comparison with those who had indulged in luxurious living, the benefit of their course was apparent, and they were permitted to continue this strict abstinence during the remainder of the time which was deemed necessary for their preparation to appear at court.

VII. The presentation at court, vers, 18-21. At the end of the time appointed for preparation, Daniel and his selected companions were brought into the royal presence, and met with the most favourable reception which could have been hoped for. They were distinguished, it would seem, for beauty and manly vigour, and as much distinguished for wisdom as they were for the beauty and healthfulness of their bodily appearance. They at once took an honourable station, greatly surpassing in true wisdom and knowledge those at the court who were regarded as skilled in the arts of divination and astrology. These years of preparation we are not to suppose were spent in merely cultivating the beauty of their personal appearance, but they were doubtless employed, under all the advantages of instruction which could be afforded them, in the careful cultivation of their mental powers, and in the acquisition of all the knowledge which could be obtained under the best masters at the court of the Chaldeans. Comp. ver. 4. }}

{{ Chapter II. Section I. Authenticity of Chapter 2: [B.C. 603.]

The objections to the authenticity and credibility of this chapter are not numerous or important.

I. The first that is alleged, by Bertholdt (Com. pp. 192, 193), is substantially this: "that if the account here is true, the records of ancient times could not exhibit a more finished tyrant than Nebuchadnezzar was, if he doomed so many persons to death on so slight and foolish an occasion, ver, 5. This cruelty, it is said, is wholly contrary to the general character of Nebuchadnezzar as it is reported to us, and wholly incredible. It is further said, that, though it was common in the East to trust in dreams, and though the office of interpreting them was an honourable office, yet no one was so unreasonable, or could be, as to require the interpreter to reveal the dream itself when it was forgotten. The proper office of the interpreter, it is said, was to interpret the dream, not to tell what the dream was."

To this objection, which seems to have considerable plausibility, it may be replied:—

(1.) Much reliance was placed on 'dreams' in ancient times, alike among the Hebrews and in the heathen world. The case of Pharaoh will at once occur to the mind; and it need not be said that men everywhere relied on dreams, and inquired earnestly respecting them, whether they 'might' not be the appointed means of communication with the spiritual world, and of disclosing what was to occur in the future. There can be no objection, therefore, to the supposition that this heathen monarch, Nebuchadnezzar, felt all the solicitude which he is reported to have done respecting the dream which he had. It may be further added, that in the dream itself there is nothing improbable as a dream, for it has all the characteristics of those mysterious operations of the mind; and, if God ever communicated his will by a dream, or made known future events in this way, there is no absurdity in supposing that he would thus communicate what was to come, to him who was at that time at the head of the empires of the earth, and who was the king over the first of those kingdoms which were to embrace the world's history for so many ages.

(2.) There is no improbability in supposing that a dream would vanish from the distinct recollection, or that if it had vanished, the mind would be troubled by some vague recollection or impression in regard to it. This often occurs in our dreams now, as in the indistinct recollection that we have had a pleasant or a frightful dream, when we are wholly unable to recall the dream itself. This often occurs, too, when we would be 'glad' to recover the dream if we could, but when no effort that we can make will recall its distinct features to our minds.

(3) There was, really, nothing that was unreasonable, absurd, or tyrannical in the demand which Nebuchadnezzar made on the astrologers, that they should recall the dream itself, and then interpret it. Doubtless, he could recollect it if they would suggest it, or at least he could so far recollect it as to prevent their imposing on him; for something like this constantly occurs in the operation of our own minds. When we have forgotten a story, or a piece of history, though we could not ourselves recall it, yet when it is repeated to us, we can then distinctly recollect it, and can perceive that that is the same narrative, for it agrees with all our impressions in regard to it. Furthermore, though it was not understood to be a part of the office of an interpreter of dreams to 'recall' the dream if it had vanished from the mind, yet Nebuchadnezzar reasoned correctly, that if they could 'interpret' the dream they ought to be presumed to be able to tell what it was. The one required no more sagacity, than the other; and if they were, as they pretended to be, under the inspiration of the 'gods' in interpreting a dream, it was fair to presume that, under the same inspiration, they could tell what it was. Comp. notes on ver. 5. No objection, then, can lie against the authenticity of this chapter from any supposed absurdity in the demand of Nebuchadnezzar. It was not only strictly in accordance with all the just principles of reasoning in the case, but was in accordance with what might be expected from an arbitrary monarch who was accustomed to exact obedience in all things.

(4.) What is here said of the threatening of Nebuchadnezzar (ver. 5) accords with the general traits of his character as history has preserved them. He had in him the elements of cruelty and severity of the highest order, especially when his will was not immediately complied with. In proof of this we need only refer to his cruel treatment of the king Zedekiah, when Jerusalem was taken: "So they took the king, and brought him to the king of Babylon to Riblah; and they gave judgment upon him. And they slew the sons of Zedekiah, before his eyes, and put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him with fetters of brass, and brought him to Babylon," 2nd Kings 25:6,7: compare also, in vers. 18-21 of the same chapter, the account of his slaying the large number of persons that were taken by Nebuzar-adan, captain of the guard, and brought by him to the king in Babylon. These were slain in cold blood by order of Nebuchadnezzar himself. These facts make it every way probable that, in a fit of passion, he would not hesitate to threaten the astrologers with death if they did not comply at once with his will. Comp. Jer. 39:5, seq.; 52:9-11. The truth was, that though Nebuchadnezzar had some good qualities, and was religious 'in his way', yet he had all the usual characteristics of an Oriental despot. He was a man of strong passions, and was a man who would never hesitate in carrying out the purposes of an arbitrary, a determined, and a stubborn will.

II. A second objection made by Bertholdt, which may demand a moment's notice, is, substantially, that the account bears the mark of a later hand, for the purpose of conferring a higher honour on Daniel, and making what he did appear the more wonderful: pp. 62, 63, 193-196. The supposition of Bertholdt is, that the original account was merely that Nebuchadnezzar of the interpreter to explain the sense of the dream, but that, in order to show the greatness of Daniel, the author of this book, long after the affair occurred, added the circumstance that Nebuchadnezzar required of them to make the 'dream' known 'as' well as the 'interpretation', and that the great superiority of Daniel was shown by his being able at once to do this. As this objection, however, is not based on any historical grounds, and as it is throughout mere conjecture, it is not necessary to notice it further. Nothing is gained by the conjecture; no difficulty is relieved by it; nor is there any real difficulty 'to be' relieved by any such supposition. The narrative, as we have it, has, as we have seen, no intrinsic improbability, nor is there anything in it which is contrary to the well-known character of Nebuchadnezzar.

III. A third objection to the authenticity of the chapter, which deserves to be noticed, is urged by Lüderwald, p. 40, seq., and Bleek, p. 280, that this whole narrative has a strong resemblance to the account of the dreams of Pharaoh, and the promotion of Joseph at the court of Egypt, and was apparently made up from that, or copied from it. But to this we may reply, (a) that, if either happened, there is no more improbability in supposing that it should happen to Daniel in Babylon than to Joseph in Egypt; and, taken as separate and independent histories, neither of them is improbable. (b) There is so much diversity in the two cases as to show that the one is 'not' copied from the other. They agree, indeed, in several circumstances: —in the fact that the king of Egypt and the king of Babylon had each a dream; in the fact that Joseph and Daniel were enabled to interpret the dream; in the fact that they both ascribed the ability to do this, not to themselves, but to God; and in the fact that they were both raised to honour as a consequence of their being able to interpret the dream. But in nothing else do they agree. The dreams themselves; the occasion; the explanation; the result; the bearing on future events—in these, and in numerous other things, they differ entirely. It may be added, also, that 'if' the one had been copied from the other, it is probable that there would have been some undesigned allusion by which it could be known that the writer of the one had the other before him, and that he was framing his own narrative from that. But, as a matter of fact, there are no two records in history that have more the marks of being independent and original narratives of real transactions than the account of Joseph in Egypt, and of Daniel in Babylon.

IV. A fourth objection to the account in this chapter arises from an alleged error in 'chronology'. For a consideration of this, see notes on ver. 1. }}

{{ Section II. Analysis of Chapter 2:

The subjects of this chapter are the following:—

I. The dream of Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 1. In accordance with the common belief among the ancients, he regarded this as a Divine message. The dream, too, was of such a character as to make a deep impression on his mind, though its distinct features and details had gone from him.

II. The demand of Nebuchadnezzar that the Chaldeans should recall the dream to his recollection, and expound its meaning, vers. 2-9. He ordered those whose business it was professedly to give such interpretations to come into his presence, and to make known the dream and its meaning. But it would seem that their pretensions went no further than to explain a dream when it was known, and hence they asked respectfully that the king would state the dream in order that they might explain it. The king, in anger, threatened death if they did not first recall the dream, and then make known the interpretation, promising at the same time ample rewards if they were able to do this. As all this, under Divine direction, was designed to communicate important information of future events, it was so ordered that the dream should be forgotten, thus entirely confounding the art of the Chaldeans, and giving an opportunity to Daniel to make the dream and its interpretation known, thus exalting a man from the land of the prophets, and showing that it was not by the skill of the pretended interpreters of dreams that future events could be made known, but that it was only by those who were inspired for that purpose by the true God.

III. The acknowledged failure of the power of the astrologers and Chaldeans, vers. 10, 11. They admitted that they could not do what was demanded of them. Whatever might be the consequence, they could not even 'attempt' to recall a forgotten dream. And as, though we may be unable to recall such a dream distinctly ourselves, we could easily 'recognise' it if it were stated to us, and as we could not be imposed on by something else that any one should undertake to make us believe was the real dream, the magicians saw that it was hopeless to attempt to palm a story of their own invention on him, as if that were the real dream, and they therefore acknowledged their inability to comply with the demand of the king.

IV. The decree that they should die, vers. 12,13. In this decree, Daniel and his three friends who had been trained with him at court (ch. 1) were involved, not because they had failed to comply with the demand of the king, for there is the fullest evidence that the subject had not been laid before them, but because they came under the general class of wise men, or counsellors, to whom the monarch looked to explain the prognostics of coming events.

V. Daniel, when apprised of the decree, and the cause of it, went to the king and requested a respite in the execution of the sentence, vers. 14-16. It would seem that he had the privilege of access to the king at pleasure. We may presume that he stated that the thing had not in fact been laid before him, though he had become involved in the general sentence, and it is no unreasonable supposition that the king was so much troubled with the dream, that he was so anxious to know its signification, and that he saw so clearly that if the decree was executed, involving Daniel and his friends, 'all' hope of recalling and understanding it would be lost, that he was ready to grasp at 'any' hope, however slender, of being made acquainted with the meaning of the vision. He was willing, therefore, that Daniel should be spared, and that the execution of the decree should be suspended.

VI. In these interesting and solemn circumstances, Daniel and his friends gave themselves to prayer, vers. 17,18. Their lives were in danger, and the case was such that they could not be rescued, but by a direct Divine interposition. There was no power which they had of ascertaining by any human means what was the dream of the monarch, and yet it was indispensable, in order to save their lives, that the dream should be made known. God only, they knew, could communicate it to them, and he only, therefore, could save them from death; and in these circumstances of perplexity they availed themselves of the privilege which all the friends of God have —of carrying their cause at once before his throne.

VII. The secret was revealed to Daniel in a night vision, and he gave utterance to an appropriate song of praise, vers. 19-23. The occasion was one which demanded such an expression of thanksgiving, and that which Daniel addressed to God was every way worthy of the occasion.

VIII. The way was now prepared for Daniel to make known to the king the dream and the interpretation. Accordingly he was brought before the king, and he distinctly disclaimed any power of himself to recall the dream, or to make known its signification, vers. 24-30.

IX. The statement of the dream and the interpretation, vers. 31-45.

X. The effect on Nebuchadnezzar, vers. 46-49. He recognised the dream; acknowledged that it was only the true God who could have made it known; and promoted Daniel to distinguished honour. In his own honours, Daniel did not forget the virtuous companions of his youth (ch. 1), and sought for them, now that he was elevated, posts of honourable employment also, ver. 49. }}

{{ Chapter III. Section I. Authenticity of Chapter 3: [B.C. 580.]

The objections which have been urged against the authenticity of this chapter are much more numerous than those which have been alleged against the two previous chapters.

I. The first which deserves to be noticed is stated by De Wette (p. 383, under the general head of 'improbabilities' in the chapter), and Bleek, p. 268, as quoted by Hengstenberg, die Authentie des Daniel, p. 83. The objection is, substantially, that if the account in this chapter is true, it would prove that the Chaldeans were inclined to persecution on account of religious opinions, which, it is said, is contrary to their whole character as elsewhere shown. So far as we have any information in regard to them, it is alleged, they were far from having this character, and it is not probable, therefore, that Nebuchadnezzar would make a law which would compel the worship of an idol under severe pains and penalties.

To this objection the following reply may be made:—

1.) Little is known, on any supposition, of the Chaldeans in general, and little of the character of Nebuchadnezzar in particular, beyond what we find in the book of Daniel. So far, however, as we have any knowledge of either from any source, there is no inconsistency between that and what is said in this chapter to have occurred. It is probable that no one ever perceived any incongruity of this kind in the book itself, nor, if this were all, should we suppose that there was any improbability in the account in this chapter.

(2.) There is properly no account of 'persecution' in this narrative, nor an reason to suppose that Nebuchadnezzar designed any such thing. This is admitted by Bertholdt himself (p. 261), and is manifest on the face of the whole narrative. It is indeed stated that Nebuchadnezzar demanded, on severe penalties, a recognition of the 'god' that he worshipped, and required that the reverence should be shown to that god which he thought to be his due. It is true, also, that the monarch intended to be obeyed in what seems to us to be a very arbitrary and unreasonable command, that they should assemble and fall down and worship the image which he had set up, But this does not imply any disposition to persecute on account of religion, or to prevent in others the free exercise of their own religious opinions, or the worship of their own 'gods'. It is well known that it was a doctrine of all ancient idolaters, that respect might be shown to foreign 'gods' —to the 'gods' of other people— without in the least degree implying a want of respect for their own 'gods', or violating any of their obligations to them. The universal maxim was, that the 'gods' of all nations were to be respected, and hence foreign 'gods' might be introduced for worship, and respect paid to them without in any degree detracting from the honour which was due to their own. Nebuchadnezzar, therefore, simply demanded that homage should be shown to the idol that he had erected; that the 'god' whom he worshipped should be acknowledged as a 'god'; and that respect should thus be shown to himself, and to the laws of his empire, by acknowledging his god, and rendering to that 'god' the degree of homage which was his due. But it is nowhere intimated that he regarded his idol as the only true god, or that he demanded that he should be recognised as such, or that he was not willing that all other 'gods', in their place, should be honoured. There is no intimation, therefore, that he meant to persecute any other men for worshipping their own 'gods', nor is there any reason to suppose that he apprehended that there would be any scruples on religious grounds about acknowledging the image that he set up to be worthy of adoration and praise.

(3.) There is no reason to think that he was so well acquainted with the peculiar character of the Hebrew religion as to suppose that its votaries would have any difficulty on this subject, or would hesitate to unite with others in adoring his image. He knew, indeed, that they were worshippers of Jehovah; that they had reared a magnificent temple to his honour in Jerusalem, and that they professed to keep his laws. But there is no reason to believe that he was very intimately acquainted with the laws and institutions of the Hebrews, or that he supposed that they would have any difficulty in doing what was universally understood to be proper —to show due respect to the 'gods' of other nations. Certainly, if he had intimately known the history of a considerable portion of the Hebrew people, and been acquainted with their proneness to fall into idolatry, he would have seen little to make him doubt that they would readily comply with a command to show respect to the 'gods' worshipped in other lands. There is no reason; therefore, to suppose that he anticipated that the Hebrew exiles, any more than any other people, would hesitate to show to his image the homage which he required.

(4.) The whole account agrees well with the character of Nebuchadnezzar. He was an arbitrary monarch. He was accustomed to implicit obedience. He was determined in his character, and resolute in his purposes. Having once formed the resolution to erect such a magnificent image of his god —one that would correspond with the greatness of his capital, and, at the same time, show his respect for the god that he worshipped,— nothing was more natural than that he should issue such a proclamation that homage should be shown to it by all his subjects, and that, in order to secure this, he should issue this decree, that whoever did not do it should be punished in the severest manner. There is no reason to suppose that he had any particular class of persons in his eye, or, indeed, that he anticipated that the order would be disobeyed by any class of persons. In fact, we see in this whole transaction just one illustration of what usually occurred under the arbitrary despotisms of the East, where, whatever is the order that is issued from the throne, universal and absolute submission is demanded, under the threatening of a speedy and fearful punishment. The order of Nebuchadnezzar was not more arbitrary and unreasonable than those which have been frequently issued by the Turkish sultan.

II. A second objection to the chapter is the account of the musical instruments in ver. 5. The objection is, that to some of these instruments 'Grecian' names are given, and that this proves that the transaction must have a later date than is attributed to it, or that the account must have been written by one of later times. The objection is, that the whole statement seems to have been derived from the account of some Greek procession in honour of the 'gods' of Greece. See Bleek, p.259.

To this objection, it may be replied, (a) that such processions in honour of the 'gods', or such assemblages, accompanied with musical instruments, were, and are, common among all people. They occur constantly in the East, and it cannot, with any propriety, be said that one is borrowed from another. (b) A large part of these instruments have undoubtedly Chaldee names given to them, and the names are such as we may suppose that one living in the times of Nebuchadnezzar would give them. See notes on ver. 5. (c) As to those which are alleged to indicate a Greek origin, it may be observed, that it is quite uncertain whether the origin of the name was Greek or Chaldee. That such names 'are' found given to instruments of music by the Greeks is certain; but it is not certain whence they obtained the name. For anything that can be proved to the contrary, the name may have had an Eastern origin. It is altogether probable that many of the names of things among the Greeks had such an origin; and if the instrument of music itself—as no one can prove it did not—came in from the East, the 'name' came also from the East. (d) It may be further stated, that, even on the supposition that the name had its origin in Greece, there is no absolute certainty that the name and the instrument were unknown to the Chaldeans. Who can prove that some Chaldean may not have been in Greece, and may not have borne back to his own country some instrument of music that he found there different from those which he had been accustomed to at home, or that he may not have constructed an instrument resembling one which he had seen there, and given it the same name Or who can prove that some strolling Greek musician may not have travelled as far as Babylon—for the Greeks travelled everywhere—and carried with him some instrument of music before unknown to the Chaldeans, and imparted to them at the same time the knowledge of the instrument and the name? But until this is shown the objection has no force.

III. A third objection is, that the statement in ver. 22, that the persons appointed to execute the orders of the king died from the heat of the furnace, or that the king issued an order, to execute which periled the lives of the innocent who were entrusted with its execution, is improbable. To this it may be said, (a) that there is no evidence or affirmation that the king contemplated 'their' danger, or designed to peril their lives; but it is undoubtedly a fact that he was intent on the execution of his own order, and that he little regarded the peril of those who executed it. And nothing is more probable than this; and, indeed, nothing more common. A general who orders a company of men to silence or take a battery has no malice against them, and no design on their lives; but he is intent on the accomplishment of the object, whatever may be the peril of the men, or however large a portion of them may fall. In fact, the objection which is here made to the credibility of this narrative is an objection which would lie with equal force against most of the orders issued in battle, and not a few of the commands issued by arbitrary monarchs in time of peace. The fact in this case was, the king was intent on the execution of his purpose—the punishment of the refractory and stubborn men who had resisted his commands, and there is no probability that, in the excitements of wrath, he would pause to inquire whether the execution of his purpose would endanger the lives of those who were entrusted with the execution of the order or not. (b) There is every probability that the heat 'would' be so great as to peril the lives of those who should approach it. It is said to have been made seven times hotter than usual (ver. 19); that is, as hot as it could be made, and, if this were so, it is by no means an unreasonable supposition that those who were compelled to approach it so near as to cast others in should be in danger.

IV. A fourth objection, urged by Griesinger, p. 41, as quoted by Hengstenberg, Authentie des Daniel, p. 92, is, that "as Nebuchadnezzar had the furnace already prepared ready to throw these men in, he must have known beforehand that they would not comply with his demand, and so must have designed to punish them; or that this representation is a mere fiction of the writer, to make the delivery of these men appear more marvellous."

To this it may be replied, (a) that there is not the slightest evidence, from the account in Daniel, that Nebuchadnezzar had the furnace prepared beforehand, as if it were expected that some would disobey, and as if he meant to show his wrath. He indeed (ver. 6) threatens this punishment, but it is clear, from ver. 19, that the furnace was not yet heated up, and that the occasion of its being heated in such a manner was the unexpected refusal of these three men to obey him. (b) But if it should be admitted that there was a furnace thus glowing —heated with a view to punish offenders— it would not be contrary to what sometimes occurs in the East under a despotism. Sir John Chardin (Voy. en Perse, iv. p. 276) mentions in his time (in the seventeenth century), a case similar to this. He says that during a whole month, in a time of great scarcity, an oven was kept heated to throw in all persons who had failed to comply with the laws in regard to taxation, and had thus defrauded the government. This was, in fact, strictly in accordance with the character of Oriental despotism. We know, moreover, from Jer. 29:22, that this mode of punishment was not unknown in Babylon, and it would seem probable that it was not uncommon in the time of Nebuchadnezzar. Thus Jeremiah says, “And of them shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire.”

V. A fifth objection is stated thus by Bertholdt: “Why did the wonders recorded in this chapter take place? It was only for this purpose that Nebuchadnezzar might be made to appear to give praise to God, that he is represented as giving commandment that no one should reproach him. But this object is too small to justify such an array of means.” To this it may be replied, (a) that it does not appear from the chapter that this was the 'object' aimed at. (b) There were other designs in the narrative beside this. They were to show the firmness of the men who refused to worship an idol 'god'; to illustrate their conscientious adherence to their religion; to show their confidence in the Divine protection; to prove that God will defend those who put their trust in him, and that he can deliver them even in the midst of the flames. These things were worthy of record.

VI. It has been objected that “the expression in which Nebuchadnezzar (ver. 28) is represented as breaking out, after the rescue of the three men, is altogether contrary to his dignity, and to the respect for the religion of his fathers and of his country, which he was bound to defend.” —'Bertholdt' 253. But to this it may be replied, (a) that if this scene actually occurred before the eyes of the king —if God had thus miraculously interposed in delivering his servants in this wonderful manner from the heated furnace, nothing would be more natural than this. It was a manifest miracle, a direct interposition of God, a deliverance of the professed friends of Jehovah by a power that was above all that was human, and an expression of surprise and admiration was in every way proper on such an occasion. (b). It accorded with all the prevailing notions of religion, and of the respect due to the 'gods', to say this. As above remarked, it was a principle recognised among the heathen to honour the 'gods' of other nations, and if they had interposed to defend their own votaries, it was no more than was admitted in all the nations of idolatry. If, therefore, Jehovah had interposed to save his own friends and worshippers, every principle which Nebuchadnezzar held on the subject would make it proper for him to acknowledge the fact, and to say that honour was due to him for his interposition. In this, moreover, Nebuchadnezzar would be understood as saying nothing derogatory to the 'gods' that he himself worshipped, or to those adored in his own land, All that is 'necessary' to be supposed in what he said is, that he now felt that Jehovah, the God whom the Hebrews adored, had shown that he was worthy to be ranked among the 'gods', and that in common with others, he had power to protect his own friends. To this it may be added (c) that, in his way, Nebuchadnezzar everywhere showed that he was a religious man: that is, that he recognised the 'gods', and was ever ready to acknowledge their interference in human affairs, and to render them the honour which was their due. Indeed, this whole affair grew out of his respect for religion, and what here occurred was only in accordance with his general principle, that when any 'god' had shown that he had power to deliver his people, he should be acknowledged, and that no words of reproach should be uttered against him, ver. 29.

VII. A more plausible objection than those which have just been noticed is urged by Lüderwald, Jahn, Dereser, in regard to the account, which is given of the image which, Nebuchadnezzar is said to have erected. This objection has reference to the 'size' of the image, to its proportions, and to the material of which it is said to have been composed. This objection, as stated by Bertholdt (p. 256), is substantially the following: "that the image had probably a human form, and yet that the proportions of the human figure are by no means observed —the height being represented to have been sixty cubits (90' feet), and its breadth six cubits (9' feet) —or its height being to its breadth as ten to one, whereas the proportion of a man is only six to one; that the amount of gold in such an image is incredible, being beyond any means which the king of Babylon could have possessed; and that probably the image here referred to was one that Herodotus says he saw in the temple of Belus at Babylon (I. 183), and which Diodorus Siculus describes (II. 9), and which was only forty feet in height." See notes on ver. 1. In regard to this objection, we may observe, then—

(a) That there is no certainty that this was the same image which is referred to by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus. That image was in the temple; this was erected on the "plain of Dura." See notes on ver. 1. But, so far as appears, this may have been erected for a temporary purpose, and the materials may then have been employed for other purposes; that in the temple was permanent.

(b) As to the amount of gold in the image —it is not said or implied that it was of 'solid' gold. It is well known that the images of the 'gods' were made of wood or clay, and overlaid with gold or silver, and this is all that is necessarily implied here. See notes on ver. 1.

(c) The 'height' of the alleged image can be no real objection to the statement. It is not necessary to assume that it had the human form —though that is probable —but if that be admitted, there can be no objection to the supposition that, either standing by itself, or raised on a pedestal, it may have been as lofty as the statement here implies. The colossal figure at Rhodes was a hundred and five Grecian feet in height, and, being made to stride the mouth of the harbor, was a work of much more difficult construction than this figure would have been.

(d) As to the alleged 'disproportion' in the figure of the image, see notes on ver. 1. To what is there said may be added: (1.) It is not 'necessary' to suppose that it had the human form. Nothing of this kind is affirmed, though it may be regarded as probable. But if it had not, of course the objection would have no force, (2.) If it had the human form, it is by no means clear whether it had a sitting or a standing posture. Nothing is said on this point in regard to the image or statue, and until 'this' is determined nothing can be said properly respecting the proportions. (3.) It is not said whether it stood by itself, or whether it rested on a basis or pediment —and until 'this' is determined, no objections can be valid as to the proportion of the statue. It is every way probable that the image was reared on a low pedestal, and for anything that appears, the proportions of the 'image itself', whether sitting or standing, may have been well preserved. (4.) But in addition to this it should be said, that if the account here is to be taken literally as stating that the image was ten times as high as it was broad —thus failing to observe the proper human proportions —the account would not be incredible. It is admitted by Gesenius (Ency. von Ersch und Gruber, art. Babylon, Th. vii. p. 24), that the Babylonians had no correct taste in these matters. "The ruins," says he, "are imposing by their colossal greatness, not by their beauty; all the ornaments are rough and barbarian." The Babylonians, indeed, possessed a taste for the colossal, the grand, the imposing, but they also had a taste for the monstrous and the prodigious, and a mere want of 'proportion' is not a sufficient argument to prove that what is stated here did not occur.

VIII. But one other objection remains to be noticed. It is one which is noticed by Bertholdt (pp. 251, 252), that, if this is a true account, it is strange that 'Daniel' himself is not referred to; that if he was, according to the representation in the last chapter, a high officer at court, it is unaccountable that he is not mentioned as concerned in these affairs, and especially that he did not interpose in behalf of his three friends to save them. #. this objection it is sufficient to reply (a) that, as Bertholdt himself (p. 287) suggests, Daniel may have been absent from the capital at this time on some business of state, and consequently the question whether he would worship the image may not have been tested. It is probable, from the nature of the case, that 'he' would be employed on such embassies, or be sent to some other part of the empire from time to time, to arrange the affairs of the provinces, and no one can demonstrate that he was not absent on this occasion. Indeed, the fact that he is not mentioned at all in the transaction would serve to imply this; since, if he were at court, it is to be presumed that he himself would have been implicated as well as his three friends. Comp. ch. vi. He was not a man to shrink from duty, or to decline any proper method of showing his attachment to the religion of his fathers, or any proper interest in the welfare of his friends. But (b) it is possible that even if Daniel were at court at that time, and did not unite in the worship of the image, he might have escaped the danger. There were undoubtedly many more Jews in the province of Babylon who did not worship this image, but no formal accusation was brought against them, and their case did not come before the king. For some reason, the accusation was made specific against these three men—'for they were rulers in the province' (ch. 2:49), and being foreigners, the people under them may have gladly seized the occasion to complain of them to the king. But so little is known of the circumstances, that it is not possible to determine the matter with certainty. All that needs to be said is, that the fact that Daniel was 'not' implicated in the affair is no proof that the three persons referred to were not; that it is no evidence that what is said of them is not true because nothing is said of 'Daniel'. }}

{{ Section II. Analysis of Chapter 3:

This chapter, which is complete in itself, or which embraces the entire narrative relating to an important transaction, contains the account of a magnificent brazen image, erected by Nebuchadnezzar, and the result of attempting to constrain the conscientious Hebrews to worship it. The narrative comprises the following points:—

- I. The erection of the great image in the plain of Dura, ver. 1.
- II. The dedication of the image in the presence of the great princes and governors of the provinces, the high officers of state, and an immense multitude of the people, accompanied with solemn music, vers. 2-7.
- III. The complaint of certain Chaldeans respecting the Jews, that they refused to render homage to the image, reminding the king that he had solemnly enjoined this on all persons, on penalty of being cast into a burning furnace in case of disobedience, vers. 8–12. This charge was brought particularly against Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. Daniel escaped the accusation, for reasons which will be stated in the notes on ver. 12. The common ⁹of the Jews also escaped, as the command extended particularly to the rulers.
- IV. The manner in which Nebuchadnezzar received this accusation, vers. 13-15. He was filled with rage; he summoned the accused into his presence; he commanded them to prostrate themselves before the image on penalty of being cast at once into the fiery furnace.
- V. The noble answer of the accused, vers. 16-18. They stated to the king that his threat did not alarm them, and that they felt no solicitude to answer him in regard to the matter (ver. 16); that they were assured that the God whom they served was able to deliver them from the furnace, and from the wrath of the king (ver. 17); but that even if he did not, whatever might be the issue, they could not serve the 'gods' of the Chaldeans, nor worship the image which the king had set up.
- VI. The infliction of the threatened punishment, vers. 19-23. The furnace was commanded to be heated seven times hotter than usual; they were bound and thrown in with their usual ^{on}; and the hot blast of the furnace destroyed the men who were employed to perform this service.
- VII. Their protection and preservation, vers. 24–27. The astonished monarch who had commanded 'three' men to be cast in 'bound', saw 'four' men walking in the midst of the flames 'loose'; and satisfied now they had a Divine Protector, awed by the miracle, and doubtless dreading the wrath of the Divine Being that had become their protector, he commanded them suddenly to come out. The princes, and governors, and captains were gathered together, and these men, thus remarkably preserved, appeared before them uninjured.

VIII. The effect on the king, vers. 28-30. As in the case when Daniel had interpreted his dream (ch. 2), he acknowledged that this was the act of the true God, ver. 28. He issued a solemn command that the God who had done this should be honoured, for that no other God could deliver in this manner, ver. 29. He again restored them to their honourable command over the provinces, ver. 30. }}

{{ Chapter IV. Section I. Authenticity of Chapter 4: [B.C. 570.]

To the authenticity of this chapter, as to the preceding, objections and difficulties have been urged, sufficient in the view of the objectors to destroy its credibility as an historical narrative. Those objections, which may be seen at length in Bertholdt (pp. 70-72, 285-309),. (Theol. Zeitschrift, Drittes Heft, 268, seq.), and Eichhorn (Einlei. iv. 471, seq.), relate mainly to two points —those derived from the want of historical proofs to the narrative, and those derived from its alleged intrinsic improbability.

I. The former of these, derived from the want of historic confirmation of the truth, of the narrative, are summarily the following: (1.) That the historical books of the Old Testament give no intimation that these remarkable things happened to Nebuchadnezzar, that he was deranged and driven from his throne, and made to dwell under the open heaven with the beasts of the field —an omission which, it is said, we cannot suppose would have occurred if these things had happened, since the Hebrew writers, on account of the wrongs which Nebuchadnezzar had done to their nation, would have certainly seized on such facts as a demonstration of the Divine displeasure against him. (2.) There is no record of these events among the heathen writers of antiquity; no writer among the Greeks, or other nations, ever having mentioned them. (3.) It is equally remarkable that Josephus, in his narrative of the sickness of Nebuchadnezzar, makes no allusion to any knowledge of this among other nations, and shows that he derived his information only from the sacred books of his own people. (4.) It is acknowledged by Origen and Jerome that they could find no historical grounds for the truth of this account. (5.) If these things had occurred, as here related, they would not have been thus concealed, for the king himself took all possible measures by the edict referred to in this chapter to make them known, and to make a permanent record of them. How could it have happened that all knowledge would have been lost if they had thus occurred? (6.) If the edict was lost, how was it ever recovered again? When, and where, and by whom, was it found? If actually issued, it was designed to make the case known throughout the empire. Why did it fail of producing that effect so as not to have been forgotten? If it was lost, how was the event known? And if it was lost, how could it have been recovered and recorded by the author of this book? Comp. Bertholdt, p. 298.

To these objections, it may be replied, (1.) that the silence of the historical looks of the Old Testament furnishes no well-founded objection to what is said in this chapter, for none of them pretend to bring down the history of Nebuchadnezzar to the close of his life, or to this period of his life. The books of Kings and of Chronicles mention his invasion of the land of Palestine and of Egypt; they record the fact of his carrying away the children of Israel to Babylon, but they do not profess to make any record of what occurred to him after that, nor of the close of his life. The second book of Chronicles closes with an account of the removal of the Jews to Babylon, and the carrying away of the sacred vessels of the temple, and the burning of the temple, and the destruction of the city, but does not relate the history of Nebuchadnezzar any farther, 2nd Chron. 36. The silence of the book cannot, therefore, be alleged as an argument against anything that may be said to have occurred after that. As the history closes there; as the design was to give a record of Jewish affairs to the carrying away to Babylon, and not a history of Nebuchadnezzar as such, there is no ground of objection furnished by this silence in regard to anything that might be said to have occurred to Nebuchadnezzar subsequently this in his own kingdom.

In regard to profane writers, also, nothing can be argued as to the improbability of the account mentioned here from their silence on the subject. It is not remarkable that in the few fragments which are found in their writings respecting the kings and empires of the East, an occurrence of this kind should have been omitted. The general worthlessness or want of value of the historical writings of the Greeks in respect to foreign nations, from which we derive most of our knowledge of those nations, is now generally admitted, and is expressly maintained by Niebuhr, and by Schlosser (see Hengstenberg, Die Authentie des Daniel, p. 101), and most of these writers make no allusion at all to Nebuchadnezzar. Even Herodotus, who travelled into the East, and who collected all he could of the history of the world, makes no mention whatever of a conqueror so illustrious as Nebuchadnezzar. How could it be expected that when they have omitted all notice of his conquests, of the great events under him, which exerted so important an effect on the world, there should have been a record of an occurrence like that referred to in this chapter—an occurrence that seems to have exerted no influence whatever on the foreign relations of the empire. It is remarkable that Josephus, who searched for all that he could find to illustrate the literature and history of the Chaldees, says (Ant. b. x, ch. xi. § 1) that he could find only the following “histories as all that he had met with concerning this king: Berosus, in the third book of his Chaldaic history; Philostratus, in the history of Judea and of the Phoenicians, who only mentions him in respect to his siege of Tyre; the Indian history of Megasthenes —(Indika)— in which the only fact which is mentioned of him is that he plundered Libya and Iberia; and the Persian history of Diocles, in which there occurs but one solitary reference to Nebuchadnezzar.” To these he adds, in his work against Apion (b. i. 20), a reference to the “Archives of the Phoenicians,” in which it is said that “he conquered Syria and Phoenicia.” Berosus is the only one who pretends to give any extended account of him. See Ant. b. x. ch. xi. § 1. All those authorities mentioned by Josephus, therefore, except Berosus, may be set aside, since they have made no allusion to many undeniable facts in the life of Nebuchadnezzar, and, therefore, the events referred to in this chapter may have occurred, though they have not related them. There remain two authors who have noticed Nebuchadnezzar at greater length, Abydenus and Berosus. Abydenus was a Greek who lived 268 B.C. He wrote, in Greek, an historical account of the Chaldeans, Babylonians, and Assyrians, only a few fragments of which have been preserved. Eusebius, Cyrill, and Syncellus. Berosus was a Chaldean, and was a priest in the temple of Belus, in the time of Alexander, and having learned of the Macedonians the Greek language, he went to Greece, and opened a school of astronomy and astrology in the Island of Cos, where his productions acquired for him great fame with the Athenians. Abydenus was his pupil. Berosus wrote three books relative to the history of the Chaldeans, of which only some fragments are preserved in Josephus and Eusebius. As a priest of Belus he possessed every advantage which could be desired for obtaining a knowledge of the Chaldeans, and if his work had been preserved it would doubtless be of great value. Both these writers professedly derived their knowledge from the traditions of the Chaldeans, and both should be regarded as good authority.

Berosus is adduced by Josephus to confirm the truth of the historical records in the Old Testament. He mentions, according to Josephus, the deluge in the time of Noah, and the account of the resting of the ark on one of the mountains of Armenia. He gives a catalogue of the descendants of Noah, and “at length comes down to Nabolassar, who was king of Babylon and of the Chaldeans.” He then mentions the expedition of his son, Nabuchodonosor (Nebuchadnezzar), against the Egyptians; the capture of Jerusalem; the burning of the temple; and the removal of the Jews to Babylon. He then mentions the manner in which Nebuchadnezzar succeeded to the throne; the way in which he distributed his captives in various parts of Babylonia; his adorning of the temple of Belus; his rebuilding the old city of Babylon, and the building of another city on the other side of the river; his adding a new palace to that which his father had built; and the fact that this palace was finished in fifteen days. After these statements respecting his conquests and the magnificence of his capital, Berosus gives the following narrative: "Nabuchodonosor, after he had begun to build the forementioned wall, fell sick —(empesön eis ar`hröstian)— and departed this life —(metëllaxato ton bion)"— [a phrase meaning to die, see Passow on the word (metallassö)] "when he had reigned forty-three years, whereupon his son, Evil-Merodach, obtained the kingdom." Josephus against Apion, b. i. § 20. Now this narrative is remarkable, and goes in fact to confirm the statement in Daniel in two respects: (a) It is manifest that Berosus here refers to some sickness in the case of Nebuchadnezzar that was unusual, and that probably preceded, for a considerable time, his death. This appears from the fact, that in the case of the other monarchs whom he mentions in immediate connexion with this narrative, no sickness is alluded to as preceding their death. This is the case with respect to Neriglissar and Nabonnedus — successors of Nebuchadnezzar. See Jos. against Ap. i. 20. There is no improbability in supposing that what Berosus here calls 'sickness' is the same which is referred to in the chapter before us. Berosus, himself a Chaldean, might not be desirous of stating all the facts about a monarch of his own country so distinguished, and might not be willing to state all that he knew about his being deprived of reason, and about the manner in which he was treated, and yet what occurred to him was so remarkable, and was so well known, that there seemed to be a necessity of alluding to it in some way; and this he did in the most general manner possible. If this were his object, also, he would not be likely to mention the fact that he was restored again to the throne. He would endeavour to make it appear as an ordinary event —a sickness which preceded death— as it 'may' have been the fact that he never was wholly restored so far as to be in perfect health. (b) This statement of Berosus accords, in respect to 'time', remarkably with that in Daniel. Both accounts agree that the sickness occurred after he had built Babylon, and towards the close of his reign.

The other author which is referred to is Abydenus. The record which he makes is preserved by Eusebius, praep. Evang. ix. 41, and 'Chronicon Armeno-latinum', l. p. 59, and is in the following words: (meta tauta de, legetai pros Chaldaïon, `hös anabas epi ta basilëia, kataschetheïë theö `hoteö dö, phthengxamenos de eipen. outos egö Naboukodrosoros, ö Babulönioi, tën mellousan `humin proanggellö sumphorën, tën `hote Bëlos emos progonos, `hë te basileia Bëltis apotrepsai Moiras peisai asthenousin. `hëxei Persës `hëmionos, toisin `humeteroisi daimosi chreömenos summachoisin. epaxei de doulousunën. `hou dö sunaitios estai Mëdës, to Assurion auchëma. `hös eithe min prosthen ë dounai tous poliëtas, Charubdin tin tina, ë thalassan eisdexamenën, aistösai pror`ridzon. ë min allas `hodous straphenta pheresthai dia tës erë mou, `hina oute en te petrësi kai charadrësi mounon `halömenon. eme te, prin, eis noun balesthai tauta, teleos ameiononos kurëσαι. `Ho men thespisas parachrëma ëphanisto). This passage is so remarkable, that I annex a translation of it, as I find it in Prof. Stuart's work on Daniel, p. 122: "After these things," [his conquests which the writer had before referred to,] "as it is said by the Chaldeans, having ascended his palace, he was seized by some 'god', and speaking aloud, he said: 'I, Nebuchadnezzar, O Babylonians, foretell your future calamity, which neither Belus, my ancestor, nor queen Beltis, can persuade the destinies to avert. A 'Persian mule' will come, employing your own divinities as his auxiliaries; and he will impose servitude [upon you]. His coadjutor will be the 'Mede', who is the boast of the Assyrians. Would that, before he places my citizens in such a condition, some Charybdis or gulf might swallow him up with utter destruction! Or that, turned in a different direction, he might roam in the desert (where are neither cities, nor footsteps of man, but wild beasts find pasturage, and the birds wander), being there hemmed in by rocks and ravines!, May it be my lot to attain to a better end, before such things come into his mind!' Having uttered this prediction, he forthwith disappeared." This passage so strongly resembles the account in Daniel 4, that even Bertholdt (p. 296) admits that it is identical (identisch) with it, though he still maintains, that although it refers to mental derangement, it does nothing to confirm the account of his being made to live with wild beasts, eating grass, and being restored again, to his throne. The points of 'agreement' in the account of Abydenus and that of Daniel are the following: (1.) The account of Abydenus, as Bertholdt admits, refers to mental derangement. Such a mental derangement, and the power of prophecy, were in the view of the ancients closely connected, or were identical, and were believed to be produced by the overpowering influence of the 'gods' on the soul. The rational powers of the soul were supposed to be suspended, and the 'god' took entire possession of the body, and through that communicated the knowledge of future events. Comp. Dale, de Oraculis Ethnicorum, p. 172. Eusebius, Chron. Arm. lat. p. 61. In itself considered, moreover, nothing would be more natural than that Nebuchadnezzar, in the malady that came upon him, or when it was coming upon him, would express himself in the manner affirmed by Abydenus respecting the coming of the Persian, and the change that would occur to his own kingdom. If the account in Daniel is true respecting the predictions which he is said to have uttered concerning coming events (ch. 2), nothing would be more natural than that the mind of the monarch would be filled with the anticipation of these events, and that he would give utterance to his anticipations in a time of mental excitement. (2.) There is a remarkable agreement between Abydenus and Daniel in regard to the 'time' and the 'place' in which what is said of the king occurred. According to Abydenus, the prophetic ecstasy into which he fell was at the close of all his military expeditions, and occurred in the same place, and in the same circumstances, which are mentioned in the book of Daniel —upon his palace—apparently as he walked upon the roof, or upon some place where he had a clear view of the surrounding city which he had built —(anabas epi ta basilēia). (3) The accounts in Abydenus and in Daniel harmonize so far as they relate to the 'God' by whom what occurred was produced. In Daniel it is attributed to the true God, and not to any of the objects of Chaldean worship. It is remarkable that in Abydenus it is not ascribed to an idol, or to any 'god' worshipped by the Chaldees, but to 'God' simply, as to a God that was not known —(kataschetheiē theō `hoteō dē). It would seem from this that even the Chaldee tradition did not attribute what was said by Nebuchadnezzar, or what occurred to him, to any of the 'gods' worshipped in Babylon, but to a foreign 'god', or to one whom they were not accustomed to worship. (4.) In the language which Nebuchadnezzar is reported by Abydenus to have used respecting the return of the Persian king after his conquest, there is a remarkable resemblance to what is said in Daniel, showing that, though the language is applied to different things in Daniel and in Abydenus, it had a common origin. Thus, in the prophecy of Nebuchadnezzar, as reported by Abydenus, it is said, "may he, returning through other ways, be borne through the desert where there are no cities, where there is no path for men, where wild beasts graze, and the fowls live, wandering about in the midst of rocks and caves." These considerations show that the Chaldean traditions strongly corroborate the account here; or, that there are things in these traditions which cannot be accounted for except on the supposition of the truth of some such occurrence as that which is here stated in Daniel. The sum of the evidence from history is, (a) that very few things are known of this monarch from profane history; (b) that there is nothing in what is known of him which makes what is here stated improbable; (c) that there 'are' things related of him which harmonize with what is here affirmed; and (d) that there are traditions which can be best explained by some such supposition as that the record in this chapter is true.

As to the objection that if the edict was promulgated it would not be likely to be lost, or the memory of it fade away, it is sufficient to observe that almost 'all' of the edicts, the laws, and the statutes of the Assyrian and Chaldean princes have perished with all the other records of their history, and almost all the facts pertaining to the personal or the public history of these monarchs are now unknown. It cannot be believed that the few fragments which we now have of their writings are all that were ever composed, and in the thing itself there is no more improbability that 'this' edict should be lost than any other, or that though it may have been kept by a Hebrew residing among them, it should not have been retained by the Chaldeans themselves. As to the question which has been asked, if this were lost how it could have been recovered again, it is sufficient to remark that, for anything that appears, it never 'was' lost in the sense that no one had it in his possession. It would undoubtedly come into the hands of Daniel if he were, according to the account in his book, then in Babylon; and it is not probable that so remarkable a document would be suffered by 'him' to be lost. The fact that it was preserved by him is all that is needful to answer the questions on that point. It 'may' have been swept away with other matters in the ruin that came upon the Chaldean records in their own country; it has been preserved where it was most important that it should be preserved—in a book where it would be to all ages, and in all lands, a signal proof that God reigns over kings, and that he has power to humble and abase the proud.

II. There is a second class of objections to the credibility of the account in this chapter quite distinct from that just noticed. They are based on what is alleged to be the intrinsic 'improbability' that the things which are said to have occurred to Nebuchadnezzar should have happened. It cannot be alleged, indeed, that it is incredible that a monarch should become a maniac—for the kings of the earth are no more exempt from this terrible malady than their subjects; but the objections here referred to relate to the statements respecting the manner in which it is said that this monarch was treated, and that he lived during this long period. These objections may be briefly noticed.

(1.) It has been objected, that it is wholly improbable that a monarch at the head of such an empire would, if he became incapable of administering the affairs of government, be so utterly neglected as the representation here would imply:—that he would be suffered to wander from his palace to live with beasts; to fare as they fared, and to become in his whole appearance so 'like' a beast. It is indeed admitted by those who make this objection, that there is no improbability that the calamity would befall a king as well as other men; and Michaelis has remarked that it is even more probable that a monarch would be thus afflicted than others (Anm. Z. Dan. p. 41; comp. Bertholdt, p. 304), but it is alleged that it is wholly improbable that one so high in office and in power would be treated with the utter neglect which is stated here. "Is it credible," says Bertholdt (p. 300–303), "that the royal family, and the royal counsellors, should have shown so little care or concern for a monarch who had come into a state so perfectly helpless? Would no one have sought him out, and brought him back, if he had wandered so far away? Could he anywhere in the open plains, and the regions about Babylon, destitute of forests, have concealed himself so that no one could have found him? It could only have been by a miracle, that one could have wandered about for so long a time, amidst the dangers which must have befallen him, without having been destroyed by wild beasts, or falling into some form of irrecoverable ruin. What an unwise policy in a government to exhibit to a newly-conquered people so dishonorable a spectacle! "To this objection it may be replied, (a) that its force, as it was formerly urged, may be somewhat removed by a correct interpretation of the chapter, and a more accurate knowledge of the disease which came upon the king, and of the manner in which he was actually treated. According to some views formerly entertained respecting the nature of the malady, it would have been impossible, I admit, to have defended the narrative. In respect to these views, see notes on ver. 25. It 'may' appear, from the fair interpretation of the whole narrative, that nothing more occurred than was natural in the circumstances. (b) The supposition that he was left to wander without any kind of oversight or guardianship is entirely gratuitous, and is unauthorized by the account which Nebuchadnezzar gives of what occurred. This opinion has been partly formed from a false interpretation of the phrase in ver. 36—"and my counsellors and my lords 'sought unto me'"—as if they had sought him when he was wandering with a view to find out where he was; whereas the true meaning of that passage is, that 'after' his restoration they sought unto him, or applied to him as the head of the empire, as they had formerly done. (c) There is some probability from the passage in ver. 15—"leave the stump of his roots in the earth, 'even with a band of iron and brass'"—that Nebuchadnezzar was secured in the manner in which maniacs often have been, and that in his rage he was carefully guarded from all danger of injuring himself. See notes on ver. 15. (d) On the supposition that he was not, still there might have been all proper 'care' taken to guard him. All that may be implied when it is said that he "was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen," etc., may have been that this was his 'propensity' in that state; that he had this roving disposition, and was disposed rather to wander in fields and groves than to dwell in the abodes of men; and that he was driven 'by this propensity', not 'by men', to leave his palace, and to take up his residence in parks or groves —anywhere rather than in human habitations. This has been not an uncommon propensity with maniacs, and there is no improbability in supposing that this was permitted by those who had the care of him, as far as was consistent with his safety, and with what was due to him as a monarch, though his reason was driven from its throne. In the parks attached to the palace; in the large pleasure grounds, that were not improbably stocked with various kinds of animals, as a sort of royal menagerie, there is no improbability in supposing that he may have been allowed at proper times, and with suitable guards, to roam, nor that the fallen and humbled monarch may have found, in comparatively lucid intervals, a degree of pleasant amusement in such grounds, nor even that it might be supposed that this would contribute to his restoration to health. Nor, on 'any' supposition in regard to these statements, even admitting that there was a great degree of criminal inattention on the part of his friends, would his treatment have been worse than what has usually occurred in respect to the insane. Up to quite a recent period, and even now in many civilized lands, the insane have been treated with the most gross neglect, and with the severest cruelty, even by their friends. Left to wander where they chose without a protector; unshaven and unwashed; the sport of the idle and the vicious; thrown into common jails among felons; bound with heavy chains to the cold walls of dungeons; confined in cellars or garrets with no fire in the coldest weather; with insufficient clothing, perhaps entirely naked, and in the midst of the most disgusting filth —such treatment, even in Christian lands, and by Christian people, may show that in a heathen land, five hundred years before the light of Christianity dawned upon the world, it is not wholly incredible that an insane monarch might have been treated in the manner described in this chapter. If the best friends now may so neglect, or treat with such severity, an insane son or daughter, there is no improbability in supposing that in an age of comparative barbarism there may have been as 'little' humanity as is implied in this chapter. The following extracts from the Second Annual Report of the Prison Discipline Society (Boston) will show what has occurred in the nineteenth century, in this Christian land, and in the old commonwealth of Massachusetts —a commonwealth distinguished for morals, and for humane feeling —and will demonstrate at the same time that what is here stated about the monarch of heathen Babylon is not unworthy of belief. They refer to the treatment of lunatics in that commonwealth before the establishment of the hospital for the insane at Worcester. "In Massachusetts, by an examination made with care, about thirty lunatics have been found in prison. In one prison were found three; in another five; in another six; and in another ten. It is a source of great complaint with the sheriffs and jailers that they must receive such persons because they have no suitable accommodations for them. Of those last mentioned, one was found in an apartment in which he had been nine years. He had a wreath of rags around his body, and another around his neck. This was all his clothing. He had no bed, chair, or bench. Two or three rough planks were strewed around the room; a heap of filthy straw, like the nest of swine, was in the corner. He had built a bird's nest of mud in the iron grate of his den. Connected with his wretched apartment was a dark dungeon, having no orifice for the admission of light, heat, or air, except the iron door, about two and a half feet square, opening into it from the prison. The other lunatics in the same prison were scattered about in different apartments, with thieves and murderers, and persons under arrest, but not yet convicted of guilt. In the prison of five lunatics, they were confined in separate cells, which were almost dark dungeons. It was difficult after the door was open to see them distinctly. The ventilation was so incomplete that more than one person on entering them has found the air so fetid as to produce nausea, and almost vomiting. The old straw on which they were laid, and their filthy garments, were such as to make their insanity more hopeless; and at one time it was not considered within the province of the physician to examine particularly the condition of the lunatics. In these circumstances any improvement of their minds could hardly be expected. Instead of having three out of four restored to reason as is the fact in some of the favoured lunatic asylums, it is to be feared that in these circumstances some who might otherwise be restored would become incurable, and that others might lose their lives, to say nothing of present suffering. In the prison in which were six lunatics their condition was less wretched. But they were sometimes an annoyance, and sometimes a sport to the convicts; and even the apartment in which the females were confined opened into the yard of the men; there was an injurious interchange of obscenity and profanity between them, which was not restrained by the presence of the keeper. In the prison, or house of correction, so called, in which were ten lunatics, two were found about seventy years of age, a male and female, in the same apartment of an upper ⁹ The female was lying upon a heap of straw under a broken window. The snow in a severe storm was beating through the window, and lay upon the straw around her withered body, which was partially covered with a few filthy and tattered garments. The man was lying in the corner of the room in a similar situation, except that he was less exposed to the storm. The former had been in this apartment six, and the latter twenty-one years. Another lunatic in the same prison was found in a plank apartment of the first story, where he had been eight years. During this time he had never left the room but twice. The door of this apartment had not been opened in eighteen months. The food was i. through a small orifice in the door. The room was warmed by no fire; and still the woman of the house said, 'he had never froze.' As he was seen through the orifice of the door, the first question was, 'Is that a human being. The hair was gone from one side of his head, and his eyes were like balls of fire. In the cellar of the same prison were five lunatics. The windows of this cellar were no defense against the storm, and, as might be supposed, the woman of the house, said, "We have a sight to do to keep them from freezing." There was no fire in this cellar which could be felt by four of these lunatics. One of the five had a little fire of turf in an apartment of the cellar by herself. She was, however, infuriate, if anyone came near her. The woman was committed to this cellar seventeen years ago. The apartments are about six feet by eight. They are made of coarse plank, and have an orifice in the door for the admission of light and air, about six inches by four. The darkness was such in two of these apartments that nothing could be seen by looking through the orifice in the door. At the same time there was a poor lunatic in each. A man who has grown old was committed to one of them in 1810, and had lived in it seventeen years. An emaciated female was found in a similar apartment, in the dark, without fire, almost without covering, where she had been nearly two years. A coloured woman in another, in which she had been six years; and a miserable man in another, in which he had been four years."

(2.) It is asked by Bertholdt as an objection (p. 301), whether "it is credible that one who had been for so long a time a maniac would be restored again to the throne; and whether the government would be again placed in his hands, without any apprehension that, he would relapse into the same state? Or whether it can be believed that the lives and fortunes of so many millions would be again entrusted to his will and power?" To these questions it may be replied: (a) That if he was restored to his reason he had a 'right' to the throne, and it might not have been a doubtful point whether he should be restored to it or not. (b) It is probable that during that time a 'regency' was appointed, and that there would be a hope entertained that he would be restored. Undoubtedly during the continuation of this malady, the government would be, as was the case during the somewhat similar malady of George III of Great Britain, placed in the hands of others, and unless there was a revolution, or a usurpation, he would be of course restored to his throne on the recovery of his reason. (c) To this it may be added, that he was a monarch who had been eminently successful in his conquests; who had done much to enlarge the limits of the empire, and to adorn the capital; and that much was to be apprehended from the character of his legal successor, Evil-Merodach (Hengstenberg, p. 113); and that if he were displaced, they who were then the chief officers of the nation had reason to suppose that, in accordance with Oriental usage on the accession of a new sovereign, they would lose their places.

(3.) It has been asked also, as an objection, whether “it is not to be presumed that Nebuchadnezzar, on the supposition that he was restored from so fearful a malady, would have employed all the means in his power to suppress the knowledge of it; or whether, if any communication was made in regard to it, pains would not have been taken to give a coloring to the account by suppressing the real truth, and by attributing the affliction to some other cause?”—Bertholdt, p. 301. To this it may be replied: (a) that if the representation here made of the cause of his malady is correct, that it was a Divine judgment on him for his pride, and that God's design in bringing it on him was that he himself might be made known, it is reasonable to presume that, on his restoration, there would be such a Divine influence on the mind of the monarch, as to lead him to make this proclamation, or this public recognition of the Most High; (b) that the edict seems to have been made, not as a matter of policy, but under the fresh recollection of a restoration from so terrible a calamity; (c) that Nebuchadnezzar seems to have been a man who had 'a conscience' that prompted him to a decided acknowledgment of Divine interposition; (d) that he had a strong religious propensity (comp. ch. iii.), and was ready to make any public acknowledgment of that which he regarded as Divine; and (e) that perhaps he supposed that, by stating the truth as it actually occurred, a better impression might be made than already existed in re to the nature of the malady. It 'may' have been an object also with him to convince his subjects that, although he had been deprived of his reason, he was now in fact restored to a sound a sound mind.

(4.) Another ground of objection has been urged by Eichhorn, Bertholdt, and others, derived from the character of the edict. It is said that “the narrative represents Nebuchadnezzar at one time as an orthodox Jew, setting forth his views almost in the very words used in the writings of the Jews, and which only a Jew would employ (see vers. 2, 3, 34–37), and then again as a mere idolater, using the language which an idolater would employ, and still acknowledging the reality of idol 'gods', vers. 8, 9, 18.” To this it may be replied that this very circumstance is rather a confirmation of the truth of the account than otherwise. It is just such an account as we should suppose that a monarch, trained up in idolatry, and practicing it all his life, and yet suddenly, and in this impressive manner, made acquainted with the true God, would be likely to give. In an edict published by such a monarch under such circumstances, it would be strange if there should be no betrayal of the fact that he had been a worshipper of heathen gods, nor would it be strange that when he disclosed his dream to Daniel, asking him to interpret it, and professing to believe that he was under the influence of inspiration from above, he should trace it to the gods in general, vers. 8, 9, 18. And, in like manner, if the thing actually occurred, as is related, it would be certain that he 'would' use such language in describing it as an “orthodox Jew.” might use. It is to be remembered that he is represented as obtaining his view of what was meant by the vision from Daniel, and nothing is more probable than that he would use such language as Daniel would have suggested. It could not be supposed that one who had been an idolater all his life would soon efface from his mind all the impressions made by the habit of idolatry, so that no traces of it would appear in a proclamation on an occasion like this; nor could it be supposed that there would be no recognition of God as the true God. Nothing would be more natural than such an intermingling of false notions with the true. Indeed, there is in fact scarcely any circumstance in regard to this chapter that has more the air of authenticity, nor could there be anything more probable in itself, than what is here stated. It is just such an intermingling of truth with falsehood as we should expect in a mind trained in heathenism; and yet this is a circumstance which would not be 'very' likely to occur to one who attempted a forgery, or who endeavoured to draw the character of a heathen monarch in such circumstances without authentic materials. If the edict was the work of a Jew, he would have been likely to represent its author without any remains of heathenism in his mind; if it were the work of a heathen, there would have been no such recognition of the true God. If it is a mere fiction, the artifice is too refined to have been likely to occur, to attempt to draw him in this state of mind, where there was an intermingling of falsehood with truth; of the remains of all his old habits of thinking, with new and momentous truths that had just begun to dawn on his mind. The supposition that will best suit all the circumstances of the case, and be liable to the fewest objections, is, that the account is an unvarnished statement of what actually occurred. On the whole subject of the objections to this chapter, the reader may consult Hengstenberg, Die Authentie des Daniel, pp. 100-119. For many of the remarks here made, I am indebted to that work. Comp. further the notes on ver. 25, seq. of the chapter. }}

{{ Section II. Analysis of Chapter 4:

The chapter professes to be an edict published by Nebuchadnezzar after his recovery from a long period of insanity which was brought upon him for his pride. The edict was promulgated with a view to lead men to acknowledge the true God. It states, in general, that the approach of his calamity was made known to him in a dream, which was interpreted by Daniel; that his own heart had been lifted up with pride in view of the splendid city which he had built; that the predicted malady came suddenly upon him, even while he was indulging in these proud reflections; that he was driven away from the abodes of men, a poor neglected maniac; that he again recovered his reason, and then his throne; and that the God who had thus humbled him, and again restored him, was the true God, and was worthy of universal adoration and praise. The edict, therefore, embraces the following parts:—

I. The reason why it was promulgated —to show to all people dwelling in all parts of the earth, the great things which the high God had done towards him, vers. 1-3.

II. The statement of the fact that he had had a dream which greatly alarmed him, and which none of the Chaldean soothsayers had been able to interpret, vers. 4-7.

III. The statement of the dream in full to Daniel, vers. 8-18.

IV. The interpretation of the dream by Daniel —predicting the fact that he would become a maniac, and would be driven from his throne and kingdom, and compelled to take up his abode with the beasts of the field —a poor neglected outcast, vers. 19-26.

V. The solemn and faithful counsel of Daniel to him to break off his sins, and to become a righteous man, if possibly the terrible calamity might be averted, ver. 27.

VI. The fulfilment of the prediction of Daniel. Nebuchadnezzar was walking on his palace, and in the pride of his heart, surveying the great city which he had built, and suddenly a voice from heaven addressed him announcing that his kingdom had departed, and his reason left him, vers. 28-33.

VII. At the end of the appointed time, his reason was restored, and he gratefully acknowledged the Divine sovereignty, and was again reinstated on his throne, vers. 34-36.

VIII. For all this he says that he praised the God of heaven, for he had learned that all his works are truth, and his ways judgment, and that those who walk in pride he is able to abase, ver. 37.

{{ Chapter V. Section I. Authenticity of Chapter 5: [B.C. 538.]

Much fewer objections have been made to the authenticity of this chapter, and much fewer difficulties started, than in regard to chapter 4. Those which have been urged may be classed under the following heads:—

I. The first is substantially stated in this manner by Bertholdt, that “Daniel is represented as speaking to the king in such a tone, that if it had actually occurred he would have been cut to pieces by an arbitrary Babylonian despot; but instead of that, he is not only unpunished, but is suffered to announce to the king the certain destruction of his kingdom by the Medes and Persians; and not only this, but he is immediately promoted to be a minister or officer of a state of exalted rank,” p. 345.

To this it may be replied, (1.) That the way in which Daniel addressed him was entirely in accordance with the manner in which he addressed Nebuchadnezzar, in which Nathan addressed David, in which Isaiah addressed Ahaz, and Jeremiah the kings in his time. (2.) Belshazzar was overpowered with the remarkable vision of the handwriting on the wall; his conscience smote him, and he was in deep alarm. He sought the meaning of this extraordinary revelation, and could not but regard it as a communication from heaven. In this state of mind, painful as was the announcement, he would naturally receive it as a Divine communication, and he might fear to treat with indignity one who showed that he had the power of disclosing the meaning of words so mysterious. (3.) It was in accordance with the custom of those times to honour those who showed that they had the power of penetrating the Divine mysteries, and of disclosing the meaning of dreams, prodigies, and omens. (4.) It is not impossible, as Hengstenberg (Authentic des Dan. 120) suggests, that, smitten with the consciousness of guilt, and knowing that he deserved punishment, he may have hoped to turn away the wrath of God by some act of piety; and that he resolved, therefore, to honour Daniel, who showed that he was a favourite of heaven. The main security of Daniel, however, in these bold and fearful announcements, was undoubtedly to be found in the 'smitten conscience' of the trembling-monarch, and in the belief that he was a favourite of heaven.

II. The improbability that all this should occur in one night —that so many scenes should have been crowded into so short a time —embracing the feast, the writing, the calling in of the magicians, the investing of Daniel with his new office, the taking of the city, etc. "Why," says Bertholdt, "was not the proclamation in regard to the new minister deferred to the following day? Why did all this occur in the midst of the scenes of revelry which were then taking place?" pp. 345, 346.

To this it may be replied, (1.) That there is, indeed, every appearance of haste and confusion in the transactions. This was natural. But there was assuredly no want of 'time' to accomplish all that it is said was accomplished. If it was true that Cyrus broke into the city in the latter part of the night, or if, as historians say was the fact, he had entered the city, and made considerable progress in it before the tidings were communicated to Belshazzar there is no improbability in supposing that all that is said of the feast, and of the handwriting, and of the calling in of the magicians, and of their failure to decipher the meaning of the writing, and of the summoning of Daniel, and of the interpretation which he gave, actually occurred, for there was time enough to accomplish all this. (2.) As to the other part of the objection, that it is improbable that Daniel would be so soon invested with office, and that a proclamation would be made in the night to this effect, it may be replied, that all that is fairly meant in the chapter (ver. 29) may be that 'an order' was made to that effect, with a purpose to carry it into execution on the following day. Bertholdt himself translates the passage (ver. 29), "Then Belshazzar gave command that they should clothe Daniel with scarlet, and put a chain of gold around his neck," etc. Hierauf 'gab Belschazar den Befehl' dem Daniel den purpurmantel und den goldenen Halsschmuck umzuhängen, etc. On the one hand, nothing forbids the supposition that the execution of this order might have been deferred; or, on the other, that the order was executed at once. But little time would have been necessary to do it. See, however, notes on ver, 29.

III. A third objection or difficulty arises from the writing itself. It is, that it is wholly improbable that Daniel could have had sufficient knowledge to enable him to interpret these words when no one of the Chaldean sages could do it. Where, it is asked, could he have obtained this knowledge? His instruction in reading languages he must have received in Babylon itself, and it is wholly improbable that among so many sages and wise men who were accustomed to the languages spoken in Babylon and in other countries, no one should have been found who was as able to interpret the words as he.— 'Bertholdt', p. 346.

To this it is obvious to reply, that the whole narrative supposes that Daniel owed his ability to interpret these words, not to any natural skill, or to any superior advantages of genius or education, but to the fact that he was directly endowed from on high. In other cases, in the times of Nebuchadnezzar, he always disclaimed any power of his own of revealing the meaning of dreams and visions (ch. ii. 27–30), nor did he set up any claim to an ability to do it of himself on this occasion. If he received his knowledge directly from God, all the difficulty in this objection vanishes at once; but the whole book turns on the supposition that he 'was' under Divine teaching.

IV. It has been objected that there was no object to be accomplished worthy of such a miracle as that of writing in this mysterious manner on the wall. It is asked by Bertholdt (p. 347), "Is the miracle credible? What purpose was it designed to serve? What end would it accomplish? Was the design to show to Belshazzar that the city was soon to be destroyed? But of what use could this be but a couple of hours before it should occur? Or was it the design to make Belshazzar acquainted with the power of Jehovah, and to punish him for desecrating the vessels of the temple service? But who could attribute to the all-perfect Being such a weakness that he could be angry, and take this method to express his anger, for an act that could not be regarded as so heinous as to be worthy of such an interposition?"

To this it may be replied, (1.) That the objection here made would lie in some degree against almost any single miracle that is recorded in the Scriptures. (2.) That it may have been the intention to warn the king of the impending danger, not so much with a view that the danger should be averted, as to show that it came from God. (3.) Or it may have been the intention to show him the enormity of his sins, and even then to bring him to repentance. (4.) Or it may have been the intention to connect quite distinctly, in the apprehension of all present, and in the view of all future ages, the destruction of Babylon with the crimes of the monarchs, and especially their crimes in connexion with the destruction of the city of Jerusalem, the burning of the temple, and the carrying away of the people into a long captivity. There can be no doubt, from many parts of the prophetic writings, that the overthrow of Babylon, and the subversion of the Chaldean power, was in consequence of their treatment of the Hebrew people; and nothing was better fitted to show this than to make the destruction of the city coincident, with the desecration of the sacred vessels of the temple. (5.) Or it may have been the intention to recall Daniel into notice, and to give him authority and influence again preparatory to the restoration of his countrymen to their own land. It would seem from the whole narrative that, in accordance with a custom which still prevails in Persia (Chardin, as referred to by Hengstenberg, Authentic des Daniel, p. 123), all the magicians and astrologers had been dismissed from court on the death of Nebuchadnezzar, and that Daniel with the others had retired from his place. Yet it may have been important, in order to the restoration of the Hebrew people to their land at the appointed time, that there should be one of their own nation occupying an influential station at court, and Daniel was thus, in consequence of his ability to interpret this mysterious language, restored to his place, and was permitted to keep it until the time of the return of the Hebrews to their country arrived. See ch. vi. 2, 3, 28. (6.) And it may have been the intention to furnish an impressive demonstration that Jehovah is the true God. Other objections it will be more convenient to notice in the course of the exposition of the chapter. }}

{{ Chapter V. Section II. Belshazzar:

Of Belshazzar, the closing scene of whose reign is described in this chapter, little more is known than is recorded here. He is mentioned by Daniel as the last king of the Chaldees, under whom Babylon was taken by the Medes and Persians. Herodotus (i. 188) calls this king, and also his father, 'Labynetus', which is undoubtedly a corruption of Nabonnedus, the name by which he was known to Berosus. — 'Josephus against Apion', i. 20. Josephus himself (Ant. x. ch. xi. § 2) says that the name of this king, whom he calls Daltasar, among the Babylonians, was Nabonadellus. , Nabonadius in the canon of Ptolemy, Nabonnedus in Eusebius (Chron. Armen. i. p. 60), and Nabonnidochus in Eusebius (Prep. Evang. ix. 41), are remarked by Winer as only varieties of his name. Winer conjectures that in the name Belshazzar, the element 'shazzar' means "the principle of fire." See Kitto's Cyclopaedia.

The accounts which we have of this king are very meagre, and yet, meagre as they are, they are by no means uniform, and it is difficult to reconcile them. That which is given by Josephus as his own account of the successors of Nebuchadnezzar is in the following language: "After the death of Nebuchadnezzar Evil-Merodach, his son, succeeded in the kingdom, who immediately set Jeconiah at liberty, and esteemed him among his most intimate. When Evil-Merodach was dead, after a reign of eighteen years, Neglissar, his son, took the government, and retained it forty years, and then ended his life; and after him the succession came to his son, Labosordacus, who continued it in all but nine months; and when he was dead, it came to Baltasar, who by the Babylonians was called Naboandelus; against him did Cyrus the king of Persia, and Darius the king of Media, make war; and when he was besieged in Babylon there happened a wonderful and prodigious vision. He was sat down at supper in a large room, and there were a great many vessels of silver, such as were made for royal entertainments, and he had with him his concubines and his friends; whereupon he came to a resolution, and commanded that those vessels of God which Nebuchadnezzar had plundered out of Jerusalem, and had not made use of, but had put them into his own temple, should be brought out of that temple."—Ant. b. x. ch. xi. 2. Josephus then proceeds to give an account of the appearance of the hand, and of the writing, and of the result in the taking of Babylon, substantially the same as that which is found in this chapter of Daniel.

The account which Berosus gives as preserved by Josephus (against Apion, b. i. § 20) varies from this in some important particulars. For an account of Berosus, see the Introduction to ch. iv. § I. I. He says, "Nabuchodonosar (Nebuchadnezzar), after he had begun to build the fore mentioned wall, fell sick, and departed this life, when he had reigned forty-three years; where in his son, Evil-Merodach, obtained the kingdom. He governed public affairs after an illegal and impure manner, and had a plot laid against him by Neriglissar, his sister's husband, and was slain by him when he had reigned but two years. After he was slain, Neriglissar, the person who plotted against him, succeeded him in the kingdom, and reigned four years; but his son Laborosoarchad obtained the kingdom, though he was but a child, and kept it nine months; but by reason of the very ill-temper, and the ill-practices he exhibited to the world, a plot was laid against him also by his friends, and he was tormented to death. After his death, the conspirators got together, and by common consent put the crown upon the head of Nabonnedus, a man of Babylon, and one who belonged to that insurrection. In his reign it was that the walls of the city of Babylon were curiously built with burnt brick and bitumen; but when he was come to the seventeenth year of his reign, Cyrus came out of Persia with a great army, and having already conquered the rest of Asia, he came hastily to Babylonia. When Nabonnedus perceived he was coming to attack him, he met him with his forces, and joining battle with him, was beaten, and fled away with a few of his troops with him, and was shut up in the city of Borsippus. Hereupon Cyrus took Babylon, and gave orders that the outer walls of the city should be demolished, because the city had proved very troublesome to him, and cost him a great deal of pains to take it. He then marched away to Borsippus to besiege Nabonnedus; but as Nabonnedus did not sustain the siege, but delivered himself into his hands, he was at first kindly used by Cyrus, who gave him Carmania as a place for him to inhabit in, but sent him out of Babylonia. Accordingly, he spent the rest of his time in that country, and there died."

Roos (Exposition of Daniel, p. 65) supposes that Evil-Merodach, who succeeded Nebuchadnezzar, did not reign more than one year, and that this accounts for the reason why he was not mentioned by Daniel; and that Belshazzar was a grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, though, according to the idiom of Scripture, he is called his son, and Nebuchadnezzar his father, Dan. v. 11, 22. Belshazzar, he supposes, must have reigned more than twenty years.

The succession in the Babylonian Chaldean kingdom, according to Dr. Hales, was as follows: "Nabonassar reigned 14 years, from 747, B.C. Nadius; 2, 733; Chinzirus, 5, 731; Jugaus, 5, 726; Mardok Empad, or Merodach Baladan, 12, 721; Arcianus, 5, 709; first interregnum, 2, 704; Belibus, 3, 702; Aphromadius, 6, 699; Regibelus, 1,693; Mesessemordach, 4, 692; second interregnum, 8, 688; Asaradin, or Esar-haddon, 13, 680; Saosduchin, 20, 667; Chyncladon, 22, 647; Nabopolassar, or Labynetus I., 21, 625; Nineveh taken by the Babylonians and Medes, 604, B.C. Then follows the Babylonian dynasty, to wit, Nabopolassar, Labynetus I., Bektanser, or Nebuchadnezzar, who reigned 43 years from 604, B.C.; Ilverodam, or Evil-Merodach, 3, 561, B.C.; Nerichassolassar, Neriglissar, or Belshazzar, 5, 558, B.C.; Nabonadius, or Labynetus II., appointed by Darius the Mede, 17, 553, B.C.; Babylon taken by Cyrus, 536, B.C."

Dr. Hales remarks in connexion with this, "Nothing can exceed the various and perplexed accounts of the names and reigns of the princes of this dynasty (the Babylonian) in sacred and profane history."

Jahn, following, Ptolemy chiefly, thus enumerates the kings of Babylon from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar: "Nabocholassar, or Nebuchadnezzar, 43,605, B.C.; Iluarodamus, or Evil-Merodach, 2, 562, B.C.; Nerichassolassar, or Neriglissar, 4, 560, B.C.; Laborasoarchad, 9 months, 556, B.C.; Nabounned, 17 years, 556, B.C.; Babylon taken by the Medes and Persians, 540, B.C."

In this confusion and discord respecting the chronology of these princes, the following remarks may be made in regard to the credibility of the statements in the book of Daniel: (1.) It is clear that it was not uncommon for the same prince to have more names than one. This has not been unusual, especially among Oriental princes, who seem to have often prided themselves on the number of epithets which they could use as designating their royal state. Since this was the case, it would not be strange if the names of the same kings should be so used by writers, or in tradition, as to leave the impression that there were several; or if one writer should designate a king by one name, and another by another. (2.) It would seem probable, from all the accounts, that Belshazzar was the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, but little is known of the king or kings whose reign intervened between that of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar. (3.) The testimony of Daniel in the book before us should not be set aside by the statement of Berosus, or by the other confused accounts which have come down to us. For anything that appears to the contrary, the authority of Daniel is as good as that of Berosus, and he is as worthy of belief. Living in Babylon, and through a great part of the reigns of this dynasty; present at the taking of Babylon, and intimate at court; honoured by some of these princes more than any other man in the realm, there is no reason why he should not have had access to the means of information on the subject, and no reason why it should not be supposed that he has given a fair record of what actually occurred. Though the account in regard to the last days of Belshazzar, as given by Berosus, does not agree with that of Daniel, it should not be 'assumed' that that of Berosus is correct, and that of Daniel false. The account in Daniel is, to say the least, as probable as that of Berosus, and there are no means of proving that it is false except by the testimony of Berosus. (4.) The statement in Daniel of the manner in which Babylon was taken, and of the death of Belshazzar, is confirmed by Xenophon (Cyrop. vii.) —an authority quite equal, at least, to that of Berosus. See notes on ver. 30 of the chapter. In the record in Daniel of the close of the life of Belshazzar, there is nothing that might not have been supposed to occur, for nothing is more probable than that a king might have been celebrating a feast in the manner described, or that the city 'might' be surprised in such a night of revelry, or that, being surprised, the monarch might be slain.

5:1: 'Belshazzar the king'. See Intro. to the chapter, § II. In the Introduction to the chapter here referred to, I have stated what seemed to be necessary in order to illustrate the history of Belshazzar, so far as that can be now known. The statements in regard to this monarch, it is well understood, are exceedingly confused, and the task of reconciling them is now hopeless. Little depends, however, in the interpretation of this book, on the attempt to reconcile them, for the narrative here given is equally credible, whichever of the accounts is taken, unless that of Berosus is followed. But it may not be improper to exhibit here the two principal accounts of the successors of Nebuchadnezzar, that the discrepancy may be distinctly seen. I copy from the Pictorial Bible. "The common account we shall collect from "L'Art de Verifier les Dates," and the other from Hales's 'Analysis,' disposing them in opposite columns for the sake of comparison:—

From "L'Art de Verifier."

B.C.

605: Nebuchadnezzar, who was succeeded by his son.

562: Evil-Merodach, who, having provoked general indignation by his tyranny and atrocities, was, after a short reign of about two years, assassinated by his brother-in law.

560: Neriglissar, or Nericassolassar, who was regarded as a deliverer, and succeeded by the choice of the nation. He perished in a battle by Cyrus, and was succeeded by his son.

555: Laborosoarchod, notorious for his cruelty and oppression, and who was assassinated by two nobles, Gobryas and Gadatas, whose sons he had slain. The vacant throne was then ascended by 554: Nabonadius, the Labynetus of Herodotus, the Nabonidel of Josephus, and the Belshazzar of Daniel, who was the son of Evil Merodach, and who now succeeded to the throne of his father.

538: Belshazzar, after a voluptuous reign, his city was taken by the Persians under Cyrus, on which occasion he lost his life.

From Hales's "Analysis."

B. C.

604: Nebuchadnezzar was succeeded by his son.

561: Evil-Merodach, or Ilverodam, who was slain in a battle against the Medes and Persians, and was succeeded by his son.

558: Neriglissar, Nericassolassar, or Belshazzar, the common accounts of whom seem to combine what is said both of Neriglissar, and his son, opposite. He was killed by conspirators on the night of the "impious feast," leaving a son (a boy), Laborosoarchod.

553: Laborosoarchod, on whose death, nine months after, the dynasty became extinct, and the kingdom came peaceably to 'Darius the Mede,' or Cyaxares who, on the well-known policy of the Medes and Persians, appointed a Babylonian nobleman, named Nabonadius, or Labynetus, to be king, or viceroy. This person revolted against Cyrus, who had succeeded to the united empire of the Medes and Persians. Cyrus could not immediately attend to him, but at last marched to Babylon, took the city, B.C. 536, as foretold by the prophets.

It will be observed that the principal point of difference in these accounts is, that Hales contends that the succession of Darius the Mede to the Babylonian throne was not attended with war; that Belshazzar was not the king in whose time the city was taken by Cyrus; and, consequently, that the events which took place this night were quite distinct from and anterior to that siege and capture of the city by the Persian king which Isaiah and Jeremiah so remarkably foretold. }}

{{ Section II. Analysis of Chapter 5:

The chapter comprises a record of the series of events that occurred in Babylon on the night in which it was taken by the Medes and Persians. The scene may be supposed to open in the early evening, at a time when a festival would probably be celebrated, and to continue through a considerable part of the night. It is not known precisely at what time the city was taken, yet it may be supposed that Cyrus was making his approaches while the revel was going on in the palace, and that even while Daniel was interpreting the handwriting on the wall, he was conducting his armies along the channel of the river, and through the open gate on the banks of the river, toward the palace. The order of the events referred to is as follows: (1.) The feast given by Belshazzar in his palace, vers. 1-4; (2.) the mysterious appearance of the part of the hand on the wall, ver. 5; (3) the summoning of the soothsayers to interpret the handwriting, and their inability to do it, vers. 6-9; (4) the entrance of the queen into the banqueting hall on account of the trouble of the king, and her reference to Daniel as one qualified to interpret, the vision, vers. 10-12; (5) the summoning of Daniel by the king, and his address to him, vers. 13-16; (6) the answer of Daniel, declining any rewards for his service, and his solemn address to the king, reminding him of what had occurred to Nebuchadnezzar, and of the fact that he had forgotten the lessons which the Divine dealings with Nebuchadnezzar were adapted to teach, and that his own heart had been lifted up with pride, and that his conduct had been eminently wicked, vers. 17-23; (7) the interpretation of the words by Daniel, vers. 24-28; (8) the order to clothe Daniel in a manner appropriate to one of high rank, and the to the third office in the kingdom, ver. 29; and (9) the taking of the city, and the death of Belshazzar, vers. 30, 31. }}

{{ Chapter VI: Section I. Authenticity of Chapter 6: [B.C. 538.]

This chapter, like the previous ones, has not escaped serious objections as to its authenticity and credibility. The objections which have been made to it have been derived from what is regarded as incredible in its statements. It is important, as in the previous chapters, to inquire whether the objections are insuperable or whether this is so free from reasonable objection as to be worthy to be received as a portion of Divine truth. The objections, as urged by Bertholdt (Daniel aus dem Hebräisch-Aramäischen neu übersetzt, etc., pp. 72-75, and, pp. 357-364) and by Bleek, are capable of being reduced to the four following:—

I. That it is wholly improbable that a monarch, in the circumstances of Darius, would give an order so unreasonable and foolish as that no one of his subjects should present any petition for a month to any one, God or man, but to himself. It is alleged that no good end could have been proposed by it; that it would have perilled the peace of the empire; that among a people who worshipped many 'gods'—who had 'gods' in all their dwellings—it would have been vain to hope that the command could have been carried peaceably into execution; and that, whoever proposed this, it could not have been executed without shaking the stability of the throne. Bertholdt asks (p. 357, seq.), “Can one believe that, among a people so devoted to religion as the Babylonians were, it should have been forbidden them to address their 'gods' for one single day? Is it credible that the counsellors of the king were so irreligious that without fear of the avenging deities they would endeavour to enforce such an order as that here referred to—that no petition should be addressed to God or man for a month, except to the king. And was Cyaxares so destitute of religion as not to refuse to sanction such a mandate? And does this agree with the fact that in the issue itself he showed so much respect to a foreign God—the God of the Jews? Under what pretence could the ministers of the king give him this counsel? Could it be under any purpose of deifying his own person? But it remains to be proved that either then, or soon after that time, it was customary in Asia to attribute Divine honours to a monarch, whether deceased or living.”

To this objection, Hengstenberg (Die Authentie des Daniel, p. 125, seq.) replies, by an endeavour to show that it was a common opinion in Persia that the king was regarded “as a representative, and an incarnation of Ormuzd;” and that nothing is more probable than that such a monarch coming to the throne of Babylon would be willing to appear in that character, claiming Divine honours, and early testing the inclination of his new subjects to receive him in that character in which he was recognised in his own land. In confirmation of this, he quotes two passages from Heeren (Ideen Ste Auag. I. i. p. 446, 51) in proof that these ideas thus prevailed. “The person of the king," Heeren says, "is in Asiatic kingdoms the middle point around which all revolves. He is regarded, according to the Oriental notions, not so much the ruler as the actual owner of the people and land. All their arrangements are formed on this fundamental idea, and they are carried to an extent which to Europeans appears incredible and ridiculous." [Compare the Egyptian Pharaoh: Lord of All, or the Chinese Emperor: the divine Son of Heaven.] "The idea of citizenship, according to the European nations, is altogether a strange idea to them; without exception, from the highest to the lowest, are the servants of the king, and the right to rule over them, and to deal with them as he pleases, is a right which is never called in question." Hengstenberg then remarks, that it is capable of the clearest proof that 'the kings of the Medes and Persians were regarded and honoured as the representatives and incarnations of Ormuzd'. In proof of this, he quotes the following passage from Heeren (p. 474), showing that this idea early prevailed among the followers of Zoroaster. "Zoroaster," says he, "saw the kingdom of light and of darkness both developed upon the earth; Iran, the Medo-Bactrian kingdom, under the sceptre of Gustasp, is to him the image of the kingdom of Ormuzd; 'the king himself is an image of him'; Turan, the Northern Nomadland, when Afrasiab, reigned, is the image of the kingdom of darkness, under the dominion of Ahriman." This idea, says Hengstenberg, the magi made use of when they wished to bring the king to their own interests, or to promote any favourite object of their own. The king was regarded as the representative, the visible manifestation of Ormuzd, ruling with power as uncircumscribed as his; the seven princes standing near him were representatives of the seven Amshaspands, who stood before the throne of Ormuzd. The evidence that the Persian kings were regarded as an embodiment of the deity, or that they represented him on earth, Hengstenberg remarks (p. 126), is clear in the classic writings, in the Scriptures, and in the Persian monuments. In proof of this, he appeals to the following authorities among the classic writers: Plutarch (Themistocl. cap. 27); Xenophon (Agesil.); Isocrates (Panegyri de Pers. princ. p. 17); Arrian (6.29); Curtius (8.5). Curtius says, 'Persas reges suos inter deos colere' ['The Persians worshipping (venerating) their kings among the 'gods']. For the same purpose, Hengstenberg (pp. 128, 129) appeals to the following passage of Scripture, Esth. 3:4, and the conduct of Mordecai in general, who refused, as he supposes, the respect which Haman demanded as the first minister of the king, on religious grounds, and because more was required and expected of him than mere civil respect—or that a degree of homage was required entirely inconsistent with that due to the true God. In proof of the same thing, Hengstenberg appeals to Persian monuments, pp. 129–132. The proof is too long to be inserted here. These monuments show that the Persian kings were regarded and adored as impersonations of Ormuzd. To this may be added many of their inscriptions. In the work by De Sacy, Memoires s. divers. Antiq. de la Perse, Pl. i. p. 27, 31, the Persian kings are mentioned as (ekgonai theön, ek genous theön), and (theoi)—both as offsprings of the 'gods', as of the race of the 'gods', and as 'gods'.

If this is correct, and the Persian kings were regarded as divine—as an impersonation or incarnation of the 'god' that was worshipped—then there is no improbability in the supposition that it might be proposed to the king that for a given space of time he should allow no petition to be presented to anyone else, 'god' or man. It would be easy to persuade a monarch having such pretensions to issue such a decree, and especially when he had subjected a foreign people like the Babylonians to be willing thus to assert his authority over them, and show them what respect and homage he demanded. In judging also of the probability of what is here said, we are to remember the arbitrary character of Oriental monarchs, and of the Persian kings no less than others. Assuredly there were as strange things in the character and conduct of Xerxes, one of the successors of this same Darius, as any that are recorded in this chapter of the book of Daniel; and if the acts of folly, which he perpetrated, had been written in a book claiming to be Divinely inspired, they would have been liable to much greater objection than anything which is stated here. The mere fact that a thing is in itself foolish and unreasonable, and apparently absurd, is no conclusive evidence that a man clothed with absolute authority would not be guilty of it.

To all that has been said on this point, there should be added a remark made by Bertholdt himself (p. 357) respecting Darius, which will show that what is here said of him is really not at all inconsistent with his character, and not improbable. He says, speaking of Darius or Cyaxares, that "from his character, as given by Xenophon, a man of weak mind (Cyrop. i. 4, 22; 4:1, 13); a man passionate and peevish (3:3, 29; 4:5, 8; 5:5; 1:8); a man given to wine and women (4:5, 52; v. 5; 1:8), we are not to expect much wisdom." There is nothing stated here by Daniel which is inconsistent with the character of such a man.

II. A second objection made to the probability of this statement is drawn from the character of the edict which Darius is said to have proclaimed, commanding that honour should be rendered to Jehovah, vers. 25-27. It is alleged that if such an edict had been published, it is incredible that no mention is made of it in history; that the thing was so remarkable that it must have been noticed by the writers who have referred to Darius or Cyaxares.

To this it may be replied, (1) that, for anything that appears to the contrary, Daniel may be as credible an historian as Xenophon or Herodotus. No one can demonstrate that the account here is not as worthy of belief as if it had appeared in a Greek or Latin classic author. When will the world get over the folly of supposing that what is found in a book claiming to be inspired should be regarded as suspicious until it is confirmed by the authority of some heathen writer; that what is found in any other book should be regarded as necessarily true, however much it may conflict with the testimony of the sacred writers? Viewed in any light, Daniel is as worthy of confidence as any Greek or Latin historian; what he says is as credible as if it had been found in the works of Sanchoniathon or Berosus. (2.) There are, in fact, few things preserved in any history in regard to Darius the Mede. Comp. § II. The information given of him by Xenophon consists merely of a few detached and fragmentary notices, and it is not at all remarkable that the facts here mentioned, and the proclamation which he made, should be unnoticed by him. A proclamation respecting a foreign 'god', when it was customary to recognise so many 'gods', and indeed to regard all such 'gods' as entitled to respect and honour, would not be likely to arrest the attention of a Greek historian even if he knew of it, and, for the same reason, it would be scarcely probable that he would know of it at all. Nothing would be more likely to pass away from the recollection of a people than such an edict, or less likely to be known to a foreigner. So far as the evidence goes, it would seem that the proclamation made no disturbance in the realm; the injunction appeared to be generally acquiesced in by all except Daniel; and it was soon forgotten. If it was understood, as it was not improbable, that this was designed as a sort of 'test' to see whether the people would receive the commands of Darius as binding on them; that they would honour him, as the Persian monarch was honoured in his own proper kingdom, it would seem to have been entirely successful, and there was no occasion to refer to it again.

III. A third objection urged by Bertholdt (p. 361), is derived from the account respecting the lions in this chapter. It is alleged by him that the account is so full of improbabilities that it cannot be received as true; that though the fact that they did not fall on Daniel can be explained from the circumstance that they were not hungry, etc., yet that it is incredible that they should have fallen on the 'enemies' of Daniel as soon as they were thrown into the den; that the king should expect to find Daniel alive after being thrown among them; that he should have called in this manner to Daniel, etc.

To all this it is sufficient to reply, that no one can suppose that the facts stated here can be explained by any natural causes. The whole representation is evidently designed to leave the impression that there was a special Divine interposition—a miracle—in the case, and the only explanation which is admissible here is that which would be proper in the case of any other miracle. The only questions which could be asked, or which would be proper, are these two: whether a miracle is possible; and whether this was a suitable occasion for the miraculous exertion of Divine power. As to the first of these questions, it is not necessary to argue that here—for the objection might lie with equal force against any other miracle referred to in the Bible. As to the second, it may be observed, that it is not easy to conceive of a case when a miracle would be 'more' proper. If a miracle was ever proper to protect the innocent; or to vindicate the claims of the true God against all false 'gods'; or to make a deep and lasting impression on the minds of men that Jehovah is the true God, it is not to conceive of a more appropriate occasion than this. No situation could be conceived to be more appropriate than when an impression was designed to be made on the mind of the sovereign of the most mighty empire on the earth; or than when, through a proclamation issued from the throne, the nations subject to his sceptre should be summoned to acknowledge him as the true God.

IV. A fourth objection, urged by Bleek (Theologische Zeitschrift, pp.262-264) is, substantially, the following: that it is remarkable that there is in this account no allusion to the three companions of Daniel; to those who had been trained with him at the Chaldean court, and had been admitted also to honour, and who had so abundantly shown that they were worshippers of the true God. The whole story, says Bleek, appears to have been designed to produce a moral effect on the mind of the Jews, by the unknown author, to persuade them in some period of persecution to adhere to the God of their fathers in the midst of all persecution and opposition.

To this objection it may be replied, (1.) 'That it is wholly probable that there were many other pious Jews in Babylon at this time beside Daniel —Jews who would, like him, adhere to the worship of the true God, regardless of the command of the king. We are not to suppose, by any means, that Daniel was the 'only' conscientious Jew in Babylon. The narrative evidently does not require that we should come to such a conclusion, but that there was something 'peculiar' in regard to Daniel. (2.) As to the three companions and friends of Daniel, it is possible, as Hengstenberg remarks (Authentie etc. p. 135), that they may either have been dead, or may have been removed from office, and were leading private lives. (3.) This edict was evidently aimed at Daniel. The whole narrative supposes this, For some cause, according to the narrative —and there is no improbability that such an opposition 'might' exist against a foreigner advanced to honour at court —ere was some ground of jealousy against him, and a purpose formed to remove or disgrace him. There does not appear to have been any jealousy of others, or any purpose to disturb others in the free enjoyment of their religion. The aim was to humble Daniel; to secure his removal from office, and to degrade him; and for this purpose a plan was laid with consummate skill. He was known to be upright; and they who laid the plot felt assured that no charge of guilt, no accusation of crime, or unfaithfulness in his office, could be alleged against him. He was known to be a man who would not shrink from the avowal of his opinions, or from the performance of those duties which he owed to his God. He was known to be a man so much devoted to the worship of 'Jehovah' the God of his people, that no law whatever would prevent him from rendering to him the homage which was his due, and it was believed, therefore, that if a law were made, on any pretence, that no one in the realm should ask anything of either God or man, except the king, for a definite space of time, there would be a moral certainty that Daniel would be found to be a violator of that law, and his degradation and death would be certain. What was here proposed was a scheme worthy of crafty and jealous and wicked men; and the only difficulty, evidently, which would occur to their mind would be to persuade the king to enter into the measure so far as to promulgate such a law. As already observed, plausible pretenses might be found for that; and when that was done, they would naturally conclude that their whole scheme was successful. (4.) There is no improbability, therefore, in supposing that, as the whole thing was aimed at Daniel, there might have been many pious Jews who still worshipped God in secret in Babylon, and that no one would give information against them. As the edict was not aimed at them, it is not surprising that we hear of no prosecution against them, and no complaint made of them for disregarding the law. If Daniel was found to violate the statute; if he was ensnared and entrapped by the cunning device; if he was humbled and punished, all the purposes contemplated by its authors would be accomplished, and we need not suppose that they would give themselves any trouble about others. }}

{{ Section II. The Question: Who Was Darius the Mede? Chapter 6:

Considerable importance is to be attached to the question who was "Darius the Mede," as it has been made a ground of objection to the Scripture narrative, that no person by that name is mentioned in the Greek writers.

There are three Medo-Persian kings of the name of Darius mentioned in the Old Testament. One occurs in the book of Ezra (4:5; 6:1, 12, 15), in Haggai (1:1; 2:10), and in Zechariah (1:7), as the king who, in the second year of his reign, effected the execution of those decrees of Cyrus which granted the Jews the liberty of rebuilding the temple, the fulfilment of which had been obstructed by the malicious representations which their enemies had made to his immediate successors. It is commonly agreed that this king was Darius Hystaspis, who succeeded the usurper Smerdis, B.C. 521, and reigned thirty-six years.

A second is mentioned as "Darius the Persian," in Neh. 12:22. All that is said of him is, that the succession of priests was registered up to his reign. This was either Darius Nothus, B.C. 423, or Darius Codomanus, B.C. 336, See Kitto's Cyclop., art. Darius.

The remaining one is that mentioned in Daniel only as Darius the Median. In ch. 9:1, he is mentioned as Darius the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes. Much difference of opinion has prevailed as to the person here intended; but a strict attention to what is actually expressed in, or fairly deduced from, the terms used in Daniel, tends to narrow the field of conjecture very considerably, if it does not decide the question. It appears from the passage in ch. 5:30,31, and 6:28, that Darius the Mede obtained the dominion over Babylon on the death of Belshazzar, who was the last Chaldean king, and that he was the immediate predecessor of Koresh (Cyrus) in the sovereignty. The historical juncture here defined belongs, therefore, to the period when the Medo-Persian army led by Cyrus took Babylon (B.C. 538), and Darius the Mede must denote the first king of a foreign dynasty who assumed the dominion over the Babylonian empire before Cyrus. These indications all concur in the person of Cyaxares the Second, the son and successor of Astyages [Ahasuerus], and the immediate predecessor of Cyrus. — Kitto's Cyclop., art. Darius.

In reference to the question, who was Darius the Mede, Bertholdt has examined the different opinions which have been entertained in a manner that is satisfactory, and I cannot do better than to present his views on the subject. They are found in his 'Vierter Excurs, über den Darius Medus', in his Commentary on Daniel, pp. 843–858. I will give the substance of the Excursus, in a free translation:—

"Who was Darius the Mede, the son of Ahasuerus, of whom mention is made in the sixth chapter of the book of Daniel, and again in ch. 9:1 and 11:1 It is agreed on all hands that he was the immediate successor of Belshazzar, the king of the Chaldeans (ch. 5:30). Comp, ch. 6:1. But, notwithstanding this, there is uncertainty as to his person, since history makes no mention of a 'Median' Darius. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that various opinions have been entertained by commentators on the Scriptures, and by historical inquirers. Conring (Advers. Chronol. c. 13), whom many have followed, particularly Harenberg (Aufklärung des Buchs Daniels, s. 454, seq.), has endeavoured to show that Darius the Mede was the fourth Chaldean monarch, Neriglissar, and that Belshazzar, his predecessor, was Evil-Merodach. J. Scaliger (De Emendat. Temporum, p. 579, seq.) recognised in Darius the Mede the last Chaldean king in Babylon, Nabonned, and in Belshazzar, the one before the last, Laborosoarchod, which hypothesis also Calvisius, Petavius, and Buddeus adopted. On the other hand, Syncellus (Chronogr., p. 232), Cedrenus (Chron. p. 142), the Alexandrine Chronicle, Marsham (Can. Chron. p. 604, seq.), the two most recent editors of Æschylus, Schütz (in zweiten, Excurs. zu Æschylus's (persai)), and Bothe (Æsch. dramata, p. 671), held that Darius the Mede was the Median king Astyages, the maternal grandfather of Cyrus. Des Wignolles (Chronologie, t. 2, p. 495), and Schröer (Regnum Babyl. Sect. 6, § 12, seq.), held him to be a prince of Media younger brother of Astyages, whom Cyrus made king over Babylon. Another opinion, however, deserves more respect than this, which was advanced by Marianus Scotus, a Benedictine monk of the eleventh century, though this hypothesis is not tenable, which opinion has found, in modern times, a warm advocate in Beer (Kings of Israel and Judah, p. 22, seq.) According to this opinion, it was held that Darius the Mede is the same person as the third Persian king after Cyrus, Darius Hystaspis, and that Belshazzar was indeed the last Chaldean king, Nabonned, but that in the first capture of Babylon under Cyrus, according to the account of Berosus (in Jos. c. Ap. i. 20) and Megasthenes (in Euseb. Praep. Evang. ix. 44), he was not put to death, but was appointed by Cyrus as a vassal-king; and then in the second taking of Babylon under Darius Hystaspis (Herod. iii. 150, seq.), from whom he had sought to make himself independent, he was slain. This opinion has this advantage, that it has in its favour the fact that it has the undoubted name of 'Darius', but it is not conformable to history to suppose that Darius Hystaspis was a son of Ahasuerus the Mede; for his father, Hystaspis, was a native-born prince of Persia (Xenop. Cyrop. iv. 2, 46), of the family of the Achaemenides (Herod. i. 209, 210). Darius Hystaspis was indeed remotely related by means of the mother of Cyrus, Mandane, with the royal family; but this relation could not entitle him to be called a Mede, for, since she was the mother of Cyrus, it is altogether inexplicable that since both were thus connected with each other that Cyrus should be called 'the Persian' (Parsaiya'), and Darius 'the Mede' (Madaia'), Dan. 6:28 (29). The supposition, moreover, that Nabonned, after the taking of Babylon, was appointed as a tributary king by Cyrus, is wholly gratuitous; since Nabonned, according to the express testimony of Xenophon (Cyrop. vii. 5, 26, seq.), was slain at the taking of Babylon.

"There is yet one other opinion respecting Darius the Mede, to which I will first prefix the following remarks: (1.) Darius the Mede is mentioned in ch. vi. 28 (29) as the immediate predecessor of Cyrus in Babylon. (2.) Belshazzar was the last Babylonish Chaldee king. (3.) The account of the violent death of Belshazzar, with which the fifth chapter closes, stands in direct historical connexion with the statement in the beginning of the sixth chapter that Darius the Mede had the kingdom. (4.) Darius the Mede must, therefore, be the first foreign prince after the downfall of the Chaldean dynasty, which directly reigned over Babylon. (5.) The chronological point, therefore, where the history of Belshazzar and of Darius the Mede coincide, develops itself: the account falls in the time of the downfall of Babylon through the Medo-Persian army, and this must be the occasion as the connecting fact between the fifth and sixth chapters. According to this, Darius the Mede can be no other person than the Medish king Cyaxares II., the son and successor of Astyages, and the predecessor of Cyrus in the rule over Babylon; and Belshazzar is the last Chaldee monarch, Nabonned, or Labynet. With this agrees the account of Josephus (Ant. x. 11, 4); and later, this opinion found an advocate in Jerome.

"The existence of such a person as Cyaxares II, has been indeed denied because, according to Herodotus (i. 109), and Justin (i. 4, 7), Astyages had no son. But it should be remarked that the latter of these writers only copies from the former, and what Herodotus states respecting Astyages has so much the appearance of fable that no reliance is to be placed on it. It has been objected also that Dionysius of Halicarnassus (b. i. § 1), says that the Medish kingdom continued only through four reigns, so that if we reckon the names of the reigning kings, Dejoces, Phraortes, Cyaxares (the contemporary of Nebuchadnezzar), and Astyages, there will be no place for a second Cyaxares... But is it not probable that Dionysius meant, by these words, only that the Median kingdom came to an end under the fourth dynasty? Finally, it has been objected that, according to Herodotus (i. 128, seq.), and Ctesias ((Persik). 2 and 5), no Median prince sat upon the throne in Ecbatana after Astyages, but that with Astyages the kingdom of the Medes came to an end, and with Cyrus, his immediate successor, the Persian kingdom took its beginning. Therewith agree, nearly all the historians of the following times, Diodorus (ii. 34), Justin (i. 6, 16, 17, vii. 1), Strabo (ix. p. 735, xv. p. 1662), Polyān (vii. 7), and many others. But these writers only copy from Herodotus and Ctesias, and the whole rests only on their authority. But their credibility in this point must be regarded as doubtful, for it is not difficult to understand the reasons why they have omitted to make mention of Cyaxares II. They commenced the history of the reign of Cyrus with the beginning of his world-renowned celebrity, and hence it was natural to connect the beginning of his reign, and the beginning of the Persian reign, with the reign of his grandfather Astyages; for, so long as his uncle Cyaxares II. reigned, Cyrus alone acted, and he in fact was the regent. But if the silence of Herodotus and Ctesias is not to be regarded as proof that no such person as Cyaxares II, lived and reigned, there are in favour of that the following positive arguments:—

“(1.) The authority of Xenophon, who not only says that a Cyaxares ascended the throne after Astyages, but that he was a son, of Astyages (Cyr. i. 5, 2), and besides relates so much of this Cyaxares (i. 4, 7, iii. 3, 20, viii. 5, 19) that his Cyropaedia may be regarded as in a measure a history of him. Yea, Xenophon goes so far (8:7, 1) that he reckons the years of the reign of Cyrus from the death of Cyaxares II. Can anyone conceive a reason why Xenophon had a motive to weave together such a tissue of falsehood as this, unless Cyaxares II actually lived? If one should object, indeed, that he is so far to be reckoned among fictitious writers that he gives a moral character to the subjects on which he writes, and that he has passed over the difference between Cyrus and his grandfather Astyages, yet there is no reason why he should have brought upon the stage so important a person, wholly from fiction, as Cyaxares. What a degree of boldness it must have required, if he, who lived not much more than a century after the events recorded, had mentioned to his contemporaries, so much respecting a prince of whom no one whatever had even heard. But the existence of Cyaxares II. may be proved, “(2)
From a passage in Aeschylus (Pers, ver, 762, seq.)—

*(Mēdos gar ēv `ho prōtos `ēgemōn stratou:
`Hallosos d' exeinou pais ré to d' ergon enuse:
Tritos d' ap' autou Kuros, eudaimōn anēr, k.t.l.)*

The first who is here mentioned as the Mede (Mēdos) manifestly no other than Astyages, whom, 'before' Cyrus, his son succeeded in the government, and who is the same whom we, after Xenophon, call Cyaxares. This testimony is the more important as Aeschylus lived before Xenophon, in the time of Darius Hystaspis, and is free from all suspicions from this circumstance, that, according to the public relations which Aeschylus sustained, no accounts of the former Persian history could be expected from any doubtful authorities to have been adduced by him. But the existence of Cyaxares II does not depend solely on the authority of Xenophon, in his Cyropædia. For,

“(3.) Josephus (Ant. x. 11, 4), who speaks of this person under the name of Darius, adds, (Ēn Astuagous `Huios, eteron de para tois `Hellēsin ekaleito ovoma) —“he was the son of Astyages, but had another name among the Greeks.” This name, which he had among the Greeks, can be found only in their own Xenophon.

“(4.) To all this should be added, that many other data of history, especially those taken from the Hebrew writings, so set out the continuance of the reign of the Medes over Upper Asia that it is necessary to suppose the existence of such a person as the Medish king, Cyaxares, after the reign of Astyages. Had Cyrus, after the death of Astyages, immediately assumed the government over Upper Asia, how happened it that until the downfall of the Babylonian-Chaldee kingdom mention is made almost always of the Medes, or at least of the Persians, of whom there is special mention? Whence is it that the passage of Abydenus, quoted from Megasthenes, p. 295, speaks of 'a Mede', who, in connexion with a Persian, overthrew the Babylonish kingdom Is not the Mede so represented as to show that he was a prominent and leading person? Is it not necessary to attribute to this fragment a higher authority, and to suppose that a Medish monarch, in connexion with a Persian, brought the kingdom of Babylon to an end? Whence did Jeremiah, ch. 1 and 2 expressly threaten that the Jews would be punished by a Median king? Whence does the author of Isa. 13, and 14 mention that the destruction of the Chaldean monarchy would be effected by the Medes? The accession of Cyrus to the throne was no mere change of person in the authority, but it was a change of the reigning nation. So long as a Mede sat on the throne, the Persians, though they acted an important part in the affairs of the nation, yet occupied only the second place. The court was Medish, and the Medes were prominent in all the affairs of the government, as every page of the Cyropaedia furnishes evidence.

Upon the accession of Cyrus, the whole thing was changed. The Persians were now the predominant nation, and from that time onward, as has been remarked, the Persians are always mentioned as having the priority, though before they had but a secondary place. As the reign of Astyages, though he reigned thirty-five years (Herod. i. 130), could not have embraced the whole period mentioned to the accession of Cyrus, so the royal race of the Medes, and the kingdom of the Medes, could not have been extinguished with him, and it is necessary to suppose the existence of Cyaxares II as his successor, and the predecessor of Cyrus."

These considerations, suggested by Bertholdt, are sufficient to demonstrate that such a person as Cyaxares II. lived between the reign of Astyages and Cyrus, and that, after the destruction of Babylon, he was the immediate successor of Belshazzar, or Nabonned, and was the predecessor of Cyrus. He was the first of the foreign princes who reigned over Babylon. It has been made a question why, in the book of Daniel, he is mentioned under the name of 'Darius', and not by his other name Cyaxares. It may be difficult to answer this question, but it will be sufficient to remark (a) that it was common for Oriental kings to have many names, and, as we have seen, in regard to the kings of Babylon, one writer might designate them by one name, and another by another. This is indeed the occasion of much confusion in ancient history, but it is inevitable. (b) As we have seen, Josephus (Ant. x. 11, 4) expressly says that this Darius had another name among the Greeks, and, as Bertholdt remarks, it is natural to seek that name in the writings of their own Xenophon. (c) Darius was a common name in Persia, and it may have been one of the names by which the princes of Persia and Media were commonly known. Three of that name are mentioned in the Scriptures, and three who were distinguished are mentioned in profane history—Darius Hystaspis, Darius Ochus, or Darius Nothus, as he was known among the Greeks, and Darius Codomanus, who was overthrown by Alexander the Great.

An important statement is made by Xenophon respecting Cyaxares II, the son of Astyages, which may account for the fact that his name was omitted by Herodotus and Ctesias. He describes him as a prince given up to sensuality, and this fact explains the reason why he came to surrender all authority so entirely into the hands of his enterprising son-in-law and nephew Cyrus, and why his reign was naturally sunk in that of his distinguished successor.—Cyrop. i. 5, viii. 7. }}

{{ Section III. Analysis of Chapter 6:

This chapter contains the history of Daniel under the government, or during the reign of Darius the Mede, or Cyaxares II, from a period, it would seem, soon after the accession of Darius to the throne in Babylon, or the conquest of Babylon, till his death. It is not indeed said how soon after that event Daniel was exalted to the premiership in Babylon, but the narrative would lead us to suppose that it was soon after the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus, acting under the authority of Cyaxares. As Daniel, on account of the disclosure made to Belshazzar of the meaning of the handwriting on the wall, had been exalted to high honour at the close of the life of that monarch (ch. 5), it is probable that he would be called to a similar station under the reign of Darius, as it cannot be supposed that Darius would appoint Medes and Persians entirely to fill the high offices of the realm. The chapter contains a record of the following events: (1.) The arrangement of the government after the conquest of Babylon, consisting of one hundred and twenty officers over the kingdom, so divided as to be placed under the care of three superior officers, or "presidents," of whom Daniel held the first place, vers. 1-3. (2.) The dissatisfaction or envy of the officers so appointed against Daniel, for causes now unknown, and their conspiracy to remove him from office, or to bring him into disgrace with the king, ver. 4. (3.) The plan which they formed to secure this, derived from the known piety and integrity of Daniel, and their conviction that, at any hazard, he would remain firm to his religious principles, and would conscientiously maintain the worship of God. Convinced that they could find no fault in his administration; that he could not be convicted of malversation or infidelity in office; that there was nothing in his private or public character that was contrary to justice and integrity, they resolved to take advantage of his well-known piety, and to make that the occasion of his downfall and ruin, ver. 5. (4.) The plan that was artfully proposed was, to induce the king to sign a decree that if any one for thirty days should ask any petition for anything of God or man, he should be thrown into a den of lions —that is, should be, as they supposed, certainly put to death. This proposed decree they apprehended they could induce the king to sign, perhaps because it was flattering to the monarch, or perhaps because it would test the disposition of his new subjects to obey him, or perhaps because they knew he was a weak and effeminate prince, and that he was accustomed to sign papers presented to him by his counsellors without much reflection or hesitation, vers. 6-9. (5.) Daniel, when he was apprised of the contents of the decree, though he saw its bearing, and perhaps its design, yet continued his devotions as usual —praying, as he was known to do, three times a day, with his face toward Jerusalem, with his windows open. The case was one where he felt, undoubtedly, that it was a matter of principle that he should worship God in his usual manner, and not allow himself to be driven from the acknowledgment of his God by the fear of death, ver. 10. (6.) They who had laid the plan made report of this to the king, and demanded the execution of the decree. The case was a plain one, for though it had not been intended or expected by the king that Daniel would have been found a violator of the law, yet as the decree was positive, and there had been no concealment on the part of Daniel, the counsellors urged that it was necessary that the decree should be executed, vers. 11-13. (7.) The king, displeased with himself, and evidently enraged against these crafty counsellors, desirous of sparing Daniel, and yet feeling the necessity of maintaining a law positively enacted, sought some way by which Daniel might be saved, and the honour and majesty of the law preserved. No method, however, occurring to him of securing both objects, he was constrained to submit to the execution of the decree, and ordered Daniel to be cast into the den of lions, vers. 14-17. (8.) The king returned to his palace, and passed the night fasting, and overwhelmed with sadness, ver. 18. (9.) In the morning he came with deep anxiety to the place where Daniel had been thrown, and called to see if he were alive, vers. 19, 20. (10.) The reply of Daniel, that he had been preserved by the intervention of an angel, who had closed the mouths of the lions, and had kept him alive, vers. 21,22. (11.) The release of Daniel from the den, and the command to cast those in who had thus accused Daniel, and who had sought his ruin, vers. 23,24. (12.) An appropriate proclamation from the king to all men to honour that God who had thus preserved his servant, vers. 25-27. (13.) A statement of the prosperity of Daniel, extending to the reign of Cyrus, ver. 28. }}

{{ Chapter VII. Section I. Analysis of Chapter 7: [B.C. 555]

This chapter contains an account of a remarkable prophetic dream which Daniel had in the first year of the reign of Belshazzar, and of the interpretation of the dream. After a brief statement of the contents of the chapter, it will be proper, in order to its more clear exposition, to state the different methods which have been proposed for interpreting it, or the different views of its application which have been adopted. The chapter comprises the following main points: the vision, vers. 1-14; and the explanation, vers. 15-28.

I. The vision, vers. 1-14. The dream occurred in the first year of the reign of Belshazzar, and was immediately written out. Daniel is represented as standing near the sea, and a violent wind rages upon the sea, tossing the waves in wild commotion. Suddenly he sees four monsters emerge from the agitated waves, each one apparently remaining for a little time, and then disappearing. The first, in its general form, resembled a lion, but had wings like an eagle. On this he attentively gazed, until the wings were plucked away, and the beast was made to stand upright as a man, and the heart of a man was given to it. Nothing is said as to what became of the beast after this. Then there appeared a second beast, resembling a bear, raising itself up on one side, having three ribs in its mouth, and a command was given to it to arise and devour much flesh. Nothing is said further of what became of this beast. Then there arose another beast like a leopard, with four wings, and four heads, and to this beast was given wide dominion. Nothing is said as to what became of this animal. Then there arose a fourth beast more remarkable still. Its form is not mentioned, but it was fierce and strong. It had great iron teeth. It trampled down everything before it, and devoured and brake in pieces. This beast had at first ten horns, but soon there sprang up in the midst of them another —a smaller horn at first, but as this increased three of the ten horns were plucked up by the roots —apparently either by this, or in order to give place to it. What was more remarkable still, in this smaller horn there appeared the eyes of a man — emblematic of intelligence and vigilance; and a mouth speaking great things —indicative of pride and arrogance. Daniel looked on this singular vision till a throne was set up or established, and then the Ancient of days did sit —till the old forms of dominations ceased, and the reign of God was introduced and established. He contemplated it till, on account of the great words which the “horn spake,” the beast was slain, and his body was destroyed, and given to the burning flame. In the meantime the dominion was taken away from the other beasts, though their existence was prolonged for a little time. Then appeared in vision one in the form of man, who came to the Ancient of days, and there was given to him universal dominion over all people —a kingdom that should never be destroyed.

II. The interpretation of the vision, vers. 15–28. Daniel was greatly troubled at the vision which he had seen, and he approached one who stood near, and asked him the meaning of it, vers. 15, 16. The explanation with which he was favoured was, in general, the following: That those four beasts which he had seen represented four kings or kingdoms which would exist on the earth, and that the great design of the vision was to state the fact that the saints of the Most High would ultimately possess the kingdom, and would reign forever, vers. 17, 18. The grand purpose of the vision was to represent the succession of dynasties, and the particular character of each one, until the government over the world should pass into the hands of the people of God, or until the actual rule on the earth should be in the hands of the righteous. The ultimate object, the thing to which all revolutions tended, and which was designed to be indicated in the vision, was the final reign of the saints on the earth. There was to be a time when the kingdom under the whole heaven was to be given to the people of the saints of the Most High; or, in other words, there would be a state of things on the earth, when “all dominions,” or all “rulers” (margin, ver. 27), would obey him. This general announcement in reference to the ultimate thing contemplated, and to the three first kingdoms, represented by the three first beasts, was satisfactory to Daniel, but he was still perplexed in regard to the particular thing designed to be represented by the⁹ beast, so remarkable in its structure, so unlike all the others, and undergoing so surprising a transformation, vers. 19–22. The sum of what was stated to him, in regard to the events represented by the fourth beast, is as follows: (1.) That this was designed to represent a fourth kingdom or dynasty which would arise upon the earth, in many respects different from the three which would precede it. It was to be a kingdom which would be distinguished for oppressive conquests. It would subdue the whole earth, and it would crush, and prostrate, and trample down those whom it invaded. . The description would characterize a dominion that would be stern, and mighty, and cruel, and successful; that would keep the nations which it subdued under its control by the terror of arms rather than by the administration of just laws, ver, 23. (2.) The ten horns that Daniel saw spring out of its head denoted ten kings that would arise, or a succession of rulers that would sway the authority of the kingdom, ver. 24. (3.) The other horn that sprang up among the ten, and after them, denoted another dynasty that would arise, and this would have peculiar characteristics. It would so far have connexion with the former that it would spring out of them, but in most important respects it would differ from them. Its characteristics may be summed up as follows: (a) It would spring from their midst, or be somehow attached, or connected with them —as the horn sprang from the head of the beast—and this would properly denote that the new power somehow sprang from the dynasty denoted by the fourth beast —as the horn sprang from the head of that beast; (b) though springing from that, it would be “diverse” from it, having a character to be determined, not from the mere fact of its origin, but from something else. (c) It would “subdue three of these kings;” that is, it would overcome and rostrate a certain portion of the power and authority denoted by the ten horns, meaning that it would .. something like one-third of the power of the kingdom denoted by the fourth beast., (d) It would be characterized by arrogance and haughtiness—so much so that the fair construction of its claims would be that of “speaking against the Most High.” (e) It would “wear out the saints of the Most High”—evidently referring to persecution. (f) It would claim legislative authority so as to “change times and laws” —clearly referring to some claim set up over established laws, or to unusual authority, vers. 24, 25. (4.) Into the hand of this new power, all these things would be given for “a time, and times, and half a time:” implying that it would not be permanent, but would come to an end, ver. 25. (5.) After that there would be a judgment—a judicial determination in regard to this new power, and the dominion would be taken away, to be utterly destroyed, ver. 26. (6.) There would come a period when the whole dominion of earth would pass into the hands of the saints; or, in other words, there would be a universal reign of the principles of truth and righteousness, ver. 27. In the conclusion of the chapter (ver. 28), Daniel says that these communications deeply affected his heart. He had been permitted to look far into futurity, and to contemplate vast changes in the progress of human affairs, and even to look forward to a period when all the nations would be brought under the dominion of the law of God, and the friends of the Most High would be put in possession of all power. Such events were fitted to fill the mind * solemn thought, and it is not wonderful that he contemplated them with deep emotion. }}

{{ Chapter VII. Section II. Various Methods of Chapter 7: [B.C. 538]

It is hardly necessary to say that there have been very different methods of interpreting this chapter, and that the views of its proper interpretation are by no means agreed on by expositors. It may be useful to refer to some of those methods before we advance to its exposition, that they may be before the mind in its consideration. We shall be the better able to ascertain what is the true interpretation by inquiring which of them, if any, accords with the 'fair' exposition of the language employed by the sacred writer. The opinions entertained may be reduced to the following classes:—

I. Hardt supposes that the four beasts here denote four particular kings— Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-Merodach, Belshazzar, and Cyrus.

II. Ephraem, who is followed by Eichhorn, supposes that the first beast referred to the Babylonish-Chaldean kingdom; the second, the Medish empire under Cyaxares II., the three “ribs” of which denote the Medish, Persian, and Chaldean portions of that empire; the third, the Persian empire, the four heads and wings of which denote the spread of the Persian empire towards the four regions under heaven, or to all parts of the world; the fourth, to the Grecian empire under Alexander and his successors, the ten horns of which denote ten eminent kings among the successors of Alexander, and the “little horn,” that sprang up among them, Antiochus Epiphanes. The succeeding state of things, according to Ephraem and Eichhorn, refers to the kingdom of the Messiah.

III Grotius, representing another class of interpreters, whom Hetzel follows, supposes that the succession of the kingdoms here referred to is the Babylonish-Chaldean; the Persian; the kingdom of Alexander, and his successors. The fifth is the Roman empire.

IV. The most common interpretation which has prevailed in the church is that which supposes that the first beast denotes the Chaldean kingdom; the second, the Medo-Persian; the third, the Greek empire under Alexander and his successors; the fourth, the Roman empire. The dominion of the saints is the reign of the Messiah and his laws. But this opinion, particularly as far as pertains to the fourth and fifth of these kingdoms, has had a great variety of modifications, especially in reference to the signification of the ten horns, and the little horn that sprang up among them. Some who, under the fifth kingdom, suppose that the reign of Christ is referred to, regard the fourth kingdom as relating to Rome under the Caesars, and that the ten horns refer to a succession of ten regents, and the little horn to Julius Caesar. Others, who refer the last empire to the personal reign of Christ on the earth, and the kingdom which he would set up, suppose that the ten horns refer to ten kings or dynasties that sprang out of the Roman power —either a succession of the emperors, or those who came in after the invasion of the northern hordes, or certain kingdoms of Europe which succeeded the Roman power after it fell; and by the little horn, they suppose that either the Turkish power with its various branches is designated, or Mohammed, or the Papacy, or Antichrist.

V. The Jews, in general, suppose that the fifth kingdom refers to the reign of the Messiah; but still there has been great diversity of views among them in regard to the application of particular parts of the prophecy. Many of the older interpreters among them supposed that the ten horns denoted ten Roman Caesars, and that the last horn referred to Titus Vespasian. Most of the later Jewish interpreters refer this to their fabulous Gog and Magog.

VI. Another interpretation which has had its advocates is that which supposes that the first kingdom was the Chaldean; the second, the Persian; the third, that of Alexander; the fourth, that of his successors; and the fifth, that of the Asmonean princes who rose up to deliver the Jewish nation from the despotism of the Syrian kings.

VII. As a specimen of one mode of interpretation which has prevailed to some extent in the church, the opinion of Cocceius may be referred to. He supposes that the first beast, with the eagle's wings, denoted the reign of the Christian emperors in Rome, and the spread of Christianity under them into remote regions of the East and West; the second, with the three ribs in his mouth, the Arian Goths, Vandals, and Lombards; the third, with the four heads and four wings, the Mohammedan kingdom with the four Caliphates; the fourth, the kingdom of Charlemagne, and the ten horns in this kingdom, the Carolingians, Saxons, Salic, Swedish, Hollandish, English, etc., princes and dynasties or people; and the little horn, the Papacy as the actual Antichrist.

The statement of these various opinions, and methods of interpretation, I have translated from Bertholdt, Daniel, pp. 419–426. To these should be added the opinion which Bertholdt himself maintains, and which has been held by many others, and which Bertholdt has explained and defended at length, pp. 426–446. That opinion is, substantially, that the first kingdom is the Babylonish kingdom under Nebuchadnezzar, and that the wings of the first beast denote the extended spread of that empire. The second beast, with the three “ribs,” or ‘fangs’, denotes the Median, Lydian, and Babylonish kingdoms, which were erected under one sceptre, the Persian. The third beast, with the four wings and four heads, denotes the Grecian dynasty under Alexander, and the spread of that kingdom throughout the four parts of the world. The fourth beast denotes the kingdom of the Lagidae and Seleucidae, under which the Hebrews suffered so much. The statement respecting this kingdom (ver. 7), that “it was diverse from all that went before it,” refers to the “plurality of the fourth kingdom,” or the fact that it was an ‘aggregate’ made up of many others—a kingdom in a ‘collective’ sense [i.e. kingdoms, ‘empire’]. The “ten horns” denote ten successive princes or kings in that kingdom, and Bertholdt enumerates them in the following order: 1, Seleucus Nicator; 2, Antiochus Soter; 3, Antiochus Theos; 4, Seleucus Kallinicus; 5, Seleucus Rerunus; 6, Antiochus the Great; 7, Seleucus Philopater; 8, Heliodorus; 9, Ptolemy Philometer; 10, Demetrius. The eleventh—denoted by the little horn—was Antiochus Epiphanes, who brought so many calamities upon the Hebrew people. His reign lasted, according to Bertholdt, “a time, and times, and half a time”—or three years and a half; and then the kingdom was restored to the people of God to be a permanent reign, and, ultimately, under the Messiah, to fill the world and endure to the end of time.

The interpretation thus stated, supposing that the “little horn” refers to Antiochus Epiphanes, is also maintained by Prof. Stuart. —Hints on Prophecy, 2nd ed. P; 85–98. Compare also Commentary on Daniel, pp. 173-194, and 205–211.

Amidst such a variety of views, the only hope of arriving at any satisfactory conclusion respecting the meaning of this chapter is by a careful examination of the text, and the fair meaning of the symbols employed by Daniel.

Chapter 7:We are prepared now, having gone through with an exposition of this chapter, as to the meaning of the symbols, the words, and the phrases, to endeavour to ascertain what events are referred to in this remarkable prophecy, and to ask what events it was designed should be portrayed. And in reference to this there are but two opinions, or two classes of interpretations, that require notice: that which refers it primarily and exclusively to Antiochus Epiphanes, and that which refers it to the rise and character of the Papal power; that which regards the fourth beast as referring to the empire of Alexander, and the little horn to Antiochus, and that which regards the fourth beast as referring to the Roman empire, and the little horn to the Papal dominion. In inquiring which of these is the true interpretation, it will be proper, first, to consider whether it is applicable to Antiochus Epiphanes; secondly, whether it in fact finds a fulfilment in the Roman empire and the Papacy; and, thirdly, if such is the proper application, what are we to look for in the future in what remains unfulfilled in regard to the prophecy.

I. The question whether it is applicable to the case of Antiochus Epiphanes. A large class of interpreters, of the most respectable character, among whom are Lengerke, Maurer, Prof. Stuart (Hints on the Interpretation of Prophecy, p. 86, seq.; also Com. on Daniel, pp. 205-211), Eichhorn, Bertholdt, Bleek, and many others, suppose that the allusion to Antiochus is clear, and that the primary, if not the exclusive, reference to the prophecy is to him. Prof. Stuart (Hints, p. 86) says, "The passage in Dan. 7:25 is so clear as to leave no reasonable room for doubt." "In vers. 8, 20, 24, the rise of Antiochus Epiphanes is described; for the fourth beast is beyond all reasonable doubt the divided Grecian dominion which succeeded the reign of Alexander the Great. From this dynasty springs Antiochus, vers. 8, 20, who is most graphically described in ver. 25 "as one who shall speak great words against the Most High," etc."

The 'facts' in regard to Antiochus, so far as they are necessary to be known in the inquiry, are briefly these: —Antiochus Epiphanes ('the Illustrious', a name taken on himself, Prideaux, iii. 213), was the son of Antiochus the Great, but succeeded his brother, Seleucus Philopater, who died B.C. 176. Antiochus reigned over Syria, the capital of which was Antioch, on the Orontes, from B.C. 176 to B.C. 164. His character, as that of a cruel tyrant, and a most bloodthirsty and bitter enemy of the Jews, is fully detailed in the first and second book of Maccabees. Comp. also Prideaux, Con. vol. iii. 213–234. The facts in the case of Antiochus, so far as they are supposed to bear on the application of the prophecy before us, are thus stated by Prof. Stuart (Hints on the Interpretation of Prophecy, pp. 89,90): "In the year 168 before Christ, in the month of May, Antiochus Epiphanes was on his way to attack Egypt, and he detached Apollonius, one of his military confidants, with 22,000 soldiers, in order to subdue and plunder Jerusalem. The mission was executed with entire success. A horrible slaughter was made of the men at Jerusalem, and a large portion of the women and children, being made captives, were sold, and treated as slaves. The services of the temple were interrupted, and its joyful feasts were turned into mourning, 1st Mac. 1:37-39. Soon after this the Jews in general were compelled to eat swine's flesh, and to sacrifice to idols. In December of that same year, the temple was profaned by introducing the statue of Jupiter Olympius; and on the 25th of that month sacrifices were offered to that idol on the altar of Jehovah. Just three years after this last event, viz., December 25, 165 B.C., the temple was expurgated by Judas Maccabaeus, and the worship of Jehovah restored. Thus, 'three years and a half', or almost exactly this period, passed away, while Antiochus had complete possession and control of everything in and around Jerusalem and the temple. It may be noted, also, that just three years passed, from the time when the profanation of the temple was carried to its greatest height —viz., by sacrificing to the statue of Jupiter Olympius on the altar of Jehovah, down to the time when Judas renewed the regular worship.

I mention this last circumstance in order to account for the 'three years' of Antiochus' profanations, which are named as the period of them in Josephus, Ant. xii. 7, § 6. This period tallies exactly with the time during which the profanation as consummated was carried on if we reckon down to the period when the temple worship was restored by Judas Maccabaeus. But in Prooem. ad Bell. Jud. § 7, and Bell. Jud. I. 1, § 1, Josephus reckons three years and a half as the period during which Antiochus ravaged Jerusalem and Judea."

In regard to this statement, while the general facts are correct, there are some additional statements which should be made, to determine as to its real bearing on the case. The act of detaching Apollonius to attack Jerusalem was not, as is stated in this extract, when Antiochus was on his way to Egypt, but was on his return from Egypt, and was just two years after Jerusalem had been taken by Antiochus. —Prideaux, iii. 239. The 'occasion' of his detaching Apollonius, was that Antiochus was enraged because he had been defeated in Egypt by the Romans, and resolved to vent all his wrath upon the Jews, who, at that time, had given him no particular offence. When, two years before, Antiochus had himself taken Jerusalem, he slew forty thousand persons; he took as many captives, and sold them for slaves; he forced himself into the temple, and entered the most holy place; he caused a great sow to be offered on the altar of burnt offering, to show his contempt for the temple and the Jewish religion; he sprinkled the broth over every part of the temple for the purpose of polluting it; he plundered the temple of the altar of incense, the shew-bread table, and the golden candlestick, and then returned to Antioch, having appointed Philip, a Phrygian, a man of a cruel and barbarous temper, to be governor of the Jews.—Prideaux, iii. 231. When Apollonius again attacked the city, two years afterwards, he waited quietly until the Sabbath, and then made his assault. He filled the city with blood, set it on fire, demolished the houses, pulled down the walls, built a strong fortress over against the temple, from which the garrison could fall on all who should attempt to go to worship. From this time "the temple became deserted, and the daily sacrifices were omitted," until the service was restored by Judas Maccabeus, three years and a half after. The 'time' during which this continued was, in fact, just three years and a half, until Judas Maccabeus succeeded in expelling the heathen from the temple and from Jerusalem, when the temple was purified, and was solemnly reconsecrated to the worship of God. See Prideaux, Con. iii. 240, 241, and the authorities there cited.

Now, in reference to this interpretation, supposing that the prophecy relates to Antiochus, it must be admitted that there are coincidences which are remarkable, and it is on the ground of these coincidences that the prophecy has been applied to him. These circumstances are such as the following: (a) The general character of the authority that would exist as denoted by the "little horn," as that of severity and cruelty. None could be better fitted to represent that than the character of Antiochus Epiphanes. Comp. Prideaux, Con. iii., 213, 214. (b) His arrogance and blasphemy—"speaking great words against the Most High." Nothing is easier than to find what would be a fulfilment of this in the character of Antiochus—in his sacrilegious entrance into the most holy places; in his setting up the statue of Jupiter; in his offering a sow as a sacrifice on the great altar; in his sprinkling the broth of swine on the temple in contempt of the Hebrews and their worship, and in his causing the daily sacrifice at the temple to cease. (c) His making war with the "saints," and "wearing out the saints of the Most High"—all this could be found accomplished in the wars which Antiochus waged against the Jews in the slaughter of so many thousands, and in sending so many into hopeless slavery. (d) His attempt to "change times and laws"—this could be found to have been fulfilled in the case of Antiochus—in his arbitrary character, and in his interference with the laws of the Hebrews. (e) The 'time', as above stated, is the most remarkable coincidence. If this is 'not' to be regarded as referring exclusively to Antiochus, it must be explained on one of two suppositions—either that it is one of those coincidences which 'will' be found to happen in history, as coincidences happen in dreams; or as having a double reference, intended to refer primarily to Antiochus, but in a secondary and more important sense referring also to other events having a strong resemblance to this; or, in other words, that the language was designedly so couched as to relate to two similar classes of events. It is not to be regarded as very remarkable, however, that it is possible to find a fulfilment of these predictions in Antiochus, though it be supposed that the design was to describe the Papacy, for some of the expressions are of so general a character that they could be applied to many events which have occurred, and, from the nature of the case, there were strong points of resemblance between Antiochus and the Papal power. It is not absolutely necessary, therefore, to suppose that this had reference to Antiochus Epiphanes; and there are so many 'objections' to this view as to make it, it seems to me, morally impossible that it should have had such a reference. Among these objections are the following:—

(1.) This interpretation makes it necessary to divide the kingdom of the Medes and Persians, and to consider them two kingdoms, as Bichhorn, Jahn, Dereser, De Wette, and Bleek do. In order to this interpretation, the following are the kingdoms denoted by the fourbeasts—by the first, the Chaldee ; by the second, the Medish; by the third, the Persian; and by the fourth, the Macedonian, or the Macedonian-Asiatic kingdom under Alexander the Great. But to say nothing now of any other difficulties, it is an insuperable objection to this, that so far as the kingdoms of the Medes and Persians are mentioned in Scripture, and so far as they play any part in the fulfilment of prophecy, they are always mentioned as one. They appear as one; they act as one; they are regarded as 'one'. The kingdom of the Medes does not appear until it is united with that of the Persians, and this remark is of special importance when they are spoken of as 'succeeding' the kingdom of Babylon. The kingdom of the Medes was contemporaneous with that of Babylon; it was the Medo-Persian kingdom that was in any proper sense the successor of that of Babylon, as described in these symbols. The kingdom of the Medes, as Hengstenberg well remarks, could in no sense be said to have succeeded that of Babylon any longer than during the reign of Cyaxares II, after the taking of Babylon; and even during that short period of two years, the government was in fact in the hands of Cyrus. —Die Authentie des Daniel, p. 200. Schlosser (p. 243) says, "the kingdom of the Medes and Persians is to be regarded as in fact one and the same kingdom, only that in the change of the dynasty another branch obtained the authority." See particularly Rosenmüller, Alterthumskunde, i. 290, 291. These two kingdoms are in fact always blended—their laws, their customs, their religion, and they are mentioned as one. Comp. Esth. 1:3, 18, 19; 10:2; Dan. 5:28; 6:8, 12, 15.

(2.) In order to this interpretation, it is necessary to divide the empire founded by Alexander, and instead of regarding it as one, to consider that which existed when he reigned as one, and that of Antiochus, one of the successors of Alexander, as another. This opinion is maintained by Bertholdt, who supposes that the first beast represented the Babylonian kingdom; the second, the kingdom of the Medes and Persians; the third, that of Alexander; and the fourth, the kingdoms that sprang out of that. In order to this, it is necessary to suppose that the four heads and wings, and the ten horns, equally represent that kingdom, or sprang from it—the four heads, the kingdom when divided at the death of Alexander, and the ten horns, powers that ultimately sprang up from the same dominion. But this is contrary to the whole representation in regard to the Asiatic-Macedonian empire. In ch. 8:8,9, where there is an undoubted reference to that empire, it is said "the he-goat waxed very great: and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven. And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south," etc. Here is an undoubted allusion to Alexander, and to his followers, and particularly to Antiochus, but no mention of any such division as is necessary to be supposed if the fourth beast represents the power that succeeded Alexander in the East. In no place is the kingdom of the successors of Alexander divided from his in the same sense in which the kingdom of the Medes and Persians is from that of Babylon, or the kingdom of Alexander from that of the Persians. Comp. Hengstenberg, as above, pp. 203-205.

(3.) The supposition that the fourth beast represents either the kingdom of Alexander, or, according to Bertholdt and others, the successors of Alexander, by no means agrees with the character of that beast as compared with the others. That beast was far more formidable, and more to be dreaded, than either of the others. It had iron teeth and brazen claws; it stamped down all before it, and broke all to pieces, and manifestly represented a far more fearful dominion than either of the others. The same is true in regard to the parallel representation in ch. 2:33, 40, of the fourth kingdom represented by the legs and feet of iron, as more terrific than either of those denoted by the gold, the silver, or the brass. But this representation by no means agrees with the character of the kingdom of either Alexander or his successors, and in fact would not be true of them. It would agree well, as we shall see, with the Roman power, even as contrasted with that of Babylon, Persia, or Macedon; but it is not the representation which would, with propriety, be given of the empire of Alexander, or his successors, as contrasted with those which preceded them. Comp. Hengstenberg, as above, pp. 205-207. Moreover, this does not agree with what is expressly said of this power that should succeed that of Alexander, in a passage undoubtedly referring to it, in ch. viii. 22, where it is said, “Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power.”

(4.) On this supposition it is impossible to determine who are meant by the “ten horns” of the fourth beast (ver. 7), and the “ten kings” (ver. 24) that are represented by these. All the statements in Laniel that refer to the Macedonian kingdom (ch. vii. 6; viii. 8, 22) imply that the Macedonian empire in the East, when the founder died, would be divided into four great powers or monarchies—in accordance with what is well known to have been the fact. But who are the ten kings or sovereignties that were to exist under this general Macedonian power, on the supposition that the fourth beast represents this Bertholdt supposes that the ten horns are “ten Syrian kings,” and that the eleventh little horn is Antiochus Epiphanes. The names of these kings, according to Bertholdt (pp. 432, 433), are Seleucus Nicator, Antiochus Soter, Antiochus Theos, Seleucus Callinicus, Seleucus Ceraunus, Antiochus the Great, Seleucus Philopator, Heliodorus, Ptolemy Philometor, and Demetrius. So also Prof. Stuart, Com. on Dan. p. 208. But it is impossible to make out this exact number of Syrian kings from history, to say nothing now of the improbability of supposing that their power was represented by the fourth beast. These kings were not of the same dynasty, of Syria, of Macedonia, or of Egypt, but the list is made up of different kingdoms. Grotius (in loc.) forms the catalogue of ten kings out of the lists of the kings of Syria and Egypt—five out of one, and five out of the other; but this is manifestly contrary to the intention of the prophecy, which is to represent them as springing out of one and the same power. It is a further objection to this view, that these are lists of ‘successive’ kings—rising up one after the other; whereas the representation of the ten horns would lead us to suppose that they existed ‘simultaneously’; or that somehow there were ten powers that sprang out of the one great power represented by the fourth beast.

(5.) Equally difficult is it, on this supposition, to know who are intended by the “three horns” that were plucked up by the little horn that sprang up among the ten, ver. 8. Grotius, who regards the “little horn” as representing Antiochus Epiphanes, supposes that the three horns were his elder brothers, Seleucus, Demetrius the son of Seleucus, and Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt. But it is an insuperable objection to this that the three kings mentioned by Grotius are not all in his list of ten kings, neither Ptolemy Philometor (if Philometor be meant), nor Demetrius being of the number.—Newton on the Proph., p. 211. , Neither were they plucked up by the roots by Antiochus, or by his order. Seleucus was poisoned by his treasurer, Heliodorus, whose aim it was to usurp the crown for himself, before Antiochus came from Rome, where he had been detained as a hostage for several years. Demetrius lived to dethrone and murder the son of Antiochus, and succeeded him in the kingdom of Syria. Ptolemy Philopator died king of Egypt almost thirty years before Antiochus came to the throne of Syria; or if Ptolemy as is most probable, was meant by Grotius, though he suffered much in the wars with Antiochus, yet he survived him about eighteen years, and died in possession of the crown of Egypt.—Newton, ‘ut supra’. Bertholdt supposes that the three kings were Heliodorus, who poisoned Seleucus

Philopator, and sought, by the help of a party, to obtain the throne; Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt, who, as sister's son to the king, laid claim to the throne; and Demetrius, who, as son of the former king, was legitimate heir to the throne. But there are two objections to this view: (a) that the representation by the prophet is of 'actual' kings—which these were not; and (b) that Antiochus ascended the throne 'peaceably'; Demetrius, who would have been regarded as the king of Syria, not being able to make his title good, was detained as a hostage at Rome. —Hengstenberg, pp. 207,208. Prof. Stuart, Com. on Dan., pp. 208, 209, supposes that the three kings referred to were Heliodorus, Ptolemy Philometor, and Demetrius I; but in regard to these it should be observed, that they were mere 'pretenders' to the throne, whereas the text in Daniel supposes that they would be 'actual' kings. Comp. Hengstenberg, p. 208.

(6.) The 'time' here mentioned, on the supposition that literally three years and a half (ver. 25) are intended, does not agree with the actual dominion of Antiochus. In an undoubted reference to him in ch. 8:13,14, it is said that "the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation," would be "unto two thousand and three hundred days (2300); then shall the sanctuary be cleansed;" that is, one thousand and forty days (1040), or some two years and ten months more than the time mentioned here. I am aware of the difficulty of explaining this (see Prof. Stuart, Hints on the Interpretation of Prophecy, p. 98, seq.), and the exact meaning of the passage in ch. 8:13,14, will come up for consideration hereafter; but it is an objection of some force to the application of the "time, and times, and dividing of a time" (ver. 25) to Antiochus, that it is not the 'same' time which is applied to him elsewhere.

(7.) And one more objection to this application is, that, in the prophecy, it is said that he who was represented by the "little horn," would continue till "the Ancient of days should sit," and evidently till the kingdom should be taken by the one in the likeness of the Son of man, vers. 9,10, 13,14, 21,22, 26. But if this refers to Antiochus, then these events must refer to the coming of the Messiah, and to the setting up of his kingdom in the world. Yet, as a matter of fact, Antiochus died about 164 years before the Saviour came, and there is no way of showing that he 'continued' until the Messiah came in the flesh.

These objections to the opinion that this refers to Antiochus Epiphanes seem to me to be insuperable.

II. The question whether it refers to the Roman empire and the Papal power. The fair inquiry is, whether the things referred to in the vision actually find such a correspondence in the Roman empire and the Papacy, that they would fairly represent them if the symbols had been made use of 'after' the events occurred. Are they such as we might properly use now as describing the portions of those events that are 'passed', on the supposition that the reference was to those events? To determine this, it will be proper to refer to the things in the symbol, and to inquire whether events corresponding to them have actually occurred in the Roman empire and the Papacy. Recalling the exposition which has been above given of the explanation furnished by the angel to Daniel, the things there referred to will find an ample and a striking fulfilment in the Roman empire and the Papal power.

(1.) The fourth kingdom, symbolized by the fourth beast, is accurately represented by the Roman power. This is true in regard to the 'place' which that power ... occupy in the history of the world, on the supposition that the first three referred to the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, and the Macedonian. On this supposition there is no need of regarding the Medo-Persian empire as divided into two, represented by two symbols; or the kingdom founded by Alexander —the Asiatic-Macedonian— as distinct from that of his successors. As the Medo-Persian was in fact one dominion, so was the Macedonian under Alexander, and in the form of the four dynasties into which it was divided on his death, and down to the time when the whole was subverted by the Roman conquests. On this supposition, also, everything in the symbol is fulfilled. The fourth beast, so mighty, so terrific, so powerful, so unlike all the others —armed with iron teeth, and with claws of brass— trampling down and stamping on all the earth —well represents the Roman dominion. The symbol is such a one as we should now use appropriately to represent that power, and in every respect that empire was well represented by the symbol. It may be added, also, that this supposition corresponds with the obvious interpretation of the parallel place in chapter 2:33, 40, where the same empire is referred to in the image by the legs and feet of iron. See notes on that passage. It should be added, that this fourth kingdom is to be considered as prolonged through the entire continuance of the 'Roman' power, in the various forms in which that power has been kept up on the earth —alike under the empire, and when broken up into separate sovereignties, and when again concentrated and embodied under the Papacy. That 'fourth' power or dominion was to be continued, according to the prediction here, until the establishment of the kingdom of the saints. Either, then, that kingdom of the saints has come, or has been set up, or the fourth kingdom, in some form, still remains. The truth is, that in prophecy the entire Roman dominion seems to be contemplated as 'one' —one mighty and formidable power trampling down the liberties of the world; oppressing and persecuting the people of God —the true church; and maintaining an absolute and arbitrary dominion over the souls of men —as a mighty domination standing in the way of the progress of truth, and keeping back the reign of the saints on the earth. In these respects the Papal dominion is, and has been, but a prolongation, in another form, of the influence of heathen Rome, and the entire domination may be represented as one, and might be symbolized by the fourth beast in the vision of Daniel. When that power shall cease, we may, according to the prophecy, look for the time when the "kingdom shall be given to the saints," or when the true kingdom of God shall be set up all over the world.

(2.) Out of this one sovereignty, represented by the fourth beast, ten powers or sovereignties, represented by the ten horns, were to arise. It was shown in the exposition, that these would all spring out of that one dominion, and would wield the power that was wielded by that; that is, that the one great power would be broken up and distributed into the number represented by ten. As the horns all appeared at the same time on the beast, and did not spring up after one another, so these powers would be simultaneous, and would not be a mere succession; and as the horns all sprang from the beast, so these powers would all have the same origin, and be a portion of the same one power now divided into many. The question then is whether the Roman power was in fact distributed into so many sovereignties at any period such as would be represented by the springing up of the little horn —if that refers to the Papacy. Now, one has only to look into any historical work, to see how in fact the Roman power became distributed and broken up in this way into a large number of kingdoms, or comparatively petty sovereignties, occupying the portions of the world once governed by Rome. In the decline of the empire, and as the new power represented by the "little horn" arose, there was a complete breaking up of the one power that was formerly wielded, and a large number of states and kingdoms sprang out of it. To see that there is no difficulty in making out the number 'ten', or that some such distribution and breaking up of the one power is naturally suggested, I cast my eye on the historical chart of Lyman, and found the following kingdoms or sovereignties specified as occupying the same territory which was possessed by the Roman empire, and springing from that —viz., the Vandals, Alans, Suevi, Heruli, Franks, Visigoths, Ostrogoths, Burgundians, Lombards, Britons. The Roman empire as such had ceased, and the power was distributed into a large number of comparatively petty sovereignties —well represented at this period by the ten horns on the head of the beast. Even the Romanists themselves admit that the Roman empire was, by means of the incursions of the northern nations, dismembered into ten kingdoms (Calmet on Rev. 13:1; and he refers likewise to Berengaud, Bossuet, and Dupin. See Newton, p. 209); and Machiaveli (Hist. of Flor. l. i.), with no design of furnishing an illustration of this prophecy, and probably with no recollection of it, has mentioned these names: —1, the Ostrogoths in Moesia; 2, the Visigoths in Pannonia; 3, the Sueves and Alans in Gascoign and Spain; 4, the Vandals in Africa; 5, the Franks in France; 6, the Burgundians in Burgundy; 7, the Heruli and Turingi, in Italy; 8, the Saxons and Angles in Britain; 9, the Huns in Hungary; 10, the Lombards at first upon the Danube, afterwards in Italy. The arrangement proposed by Sir Isaac Newton is the following: —1, the kingdom of the Vandals and Alans in Spain and Africa; 2, the kingdoms of the Suevians in Spain; 3, the kingdom of the Visigoths; 4, the kingdom of the Alans in Gallia; 5, the kingdom of the Burgundians; 6, the kingdom of the Franks; 7, the kingdom of the Britons; 8, the kingdom of the Huns; 9, the kingdom of the Lombards; 10, the kingdom of Ravenna. Comp. also Duffield on the Prophecies, pp. 279, 280. For other arrangements constituting the number 'ten', as embracing the ancient power of the Roman empire, see Newton on the Prophecies, pp. 209, 210. There is some slight variation in the arrangements proposed by Mr. Mede, Bishop Lloyd, and Sir Isaac Newton; but still it is remarkable that it is easy to make out that number with so good a degree of certainty, and particularly so that it should have been suggested by a Romanist himself. Even if it is not practicable to make out the number with strict exactness, or if all writers do not agree in regard to the dynasties constituting the number 'ten', we should bear in remembrance the fact that these powers arose in the midst of great confusion; that one kingdom arose and another fell in rapid succession; and that there was not that entire certainty of location and boundary which there is in old and established states. One thing is certain, that there never has been a case in which an empire of vast power has been broken up into small sovereignties, to which this description would so well apply as to the rise of the numerous dynasties in the breaking up of the vast Roman power; and another thing is equally certain, that if we were now to seek an appropriate symbol of the mighty Roman power — of its conquests, and of the extent of its dominion, and of the condition of that empire about the time that the Papacy arose, we could not find a more striking or appropriate symbol than that of the terrible fourth beast with iron teeth and brazen claws — stamping the earth beneath his feet, and with ten horns springing out of his head.

(3.) In the midst of these there sprang up a little horn that had remarkable characteristics. The inquiry now is, if this does not represent Antiochus, whether it finds a proper fulfilment in the Papacy. Now, in regard to this inquiry, the slightest acquaintance with the history and claims of the Papal power will show that there was a striking appropriateness in the symbol — such an appropriateness, that if we desired 'now' to find a symbol that would represent this, we could find no one better adapted to it than that employed by Daniel. (a) The little horn would spring up among the others, and stand among them — as dividing the power with them, or sharing or wielding that power: That is, on the supposition that it refers to the Papacy, the Papal power would spring out of the Roman empire; would be one of the sovereignties among which that vast power would be divided, and share with the other ten in wielding authority. It would be an eleventh power added to the ten. And who can be ignorant that the Papal power at the beginning, when it first asserted civil authority, sustained just such a relation to the crumbled and divided Roman empire as this it was just one of the powers into which that vast sovereignty passed. (b) It would not spring up contemporaneously with them, but would arise in their midst, when they already existed. They are seen in vision as actually existing together, and this new power starts up among them. What could be more strikingly descriptive of the Papacy — as a power arising when the great Roman authority was broken to fragments, and distributed into a large number of sovereignties? Then this new power was seen to rise — small at first, but gradually gaining strength, until it surpassed any one of them in strength, and assumed a position in the world which no one of them had. The representation is exact. It is not a foreign power that invaded them; it starts up in the midst of them — springing out of the head of the same beast, and constituting a part of the same mighty domination that ruled the world. (c) It would be small at first, but would soon become so powerful as to pluck up and displace three of the others. And could any symbol have been better chosen to describe the Papal power than this? Could we find any 'now' that would better describe it? Anyone needs to have but the slightest acquaintance with the history of the Papal power to know that it was small at its beginnings, and that its ascendancy over the world was the consequence of slow but steady growth. Indeed, so feeble was it at its commencement, so undefined were its first appearance and form, that one of the most difficult things in history is to know exactly when it 'did' begin, or to determine the exact date of its origin as a distinct power. Different schemes in the interpretation of prophecy turn wholly on this. We see, indeed, that power subsequently strongly marked in its character, and exerting a mighty influence in the world —having subjugated nations to its control; we see causes for a long time at work tending to this, and can trace their gradual operation in producing it, but the exact period when its dominion began, what was the first characteristic act of the Papacy as such, what constituted its precise 'beginning' as a peculiar power blending and combining a peculiar civil and ecclesiastical authority, no one is able with absolute certainty to determine. Who can fix the exact date? Who can tell precisely when it was? It is true that there were several distinct acts, or the exercise of civil authority, in the early history of the Papacy, but what was the precise beginning of that power no one has been able to determine with so much certainty as to leave no room for doubt. Any one can see with what propriety the commencement of such a power would be designated by a little horn springing up among others. (d) It would grow to be mighty, for the "little horn" thus grew to be so powerful as to pluck up three of the horns of the beast. Of the growth of the power of the Papacy no one can be ignorant who has any acquaintance with history. It held nations in subjection, and claimed and exercised the right of displacing and distributing crowns as it pleased. (e) It would subdue "three kings;" that is, three of the ten represented by the ten horns. The prophet saw this at some point in its progress when three fell before it, or were overthrown by it. There might have been also other points in its history when it might have been seen as having overthrown more of them —perhaps the whole ten, but the attention was arrested by the fact that, soon after its rise, three of the ten were seen to fall before it. Now, in regard to the application of this, it may be remarked, (1.) That it does not apply, as already shown, to Antiochus Epiphanes —there being no sense in which he overthrew three of the princes that occupied the throne in the succession from Alexander, to say nothing of the fact that these were contemporaneous kings or kingdoms. (2.) There is no other period in history, and there are no other events to which it could be applied except either to Antiochus or the Papacy. (3.) In the confusion that existed on the breaking up of the Roman empire, and the imperfect accounts of the transactions which occurred in the rise of the Papal power, it would not be wonderful if it should be difficult to find events 'distinctly' recorded that would be in all respects an accurate and absolute fulfilment of the vision. (4.) Yet it is possible to make out the fulfilment of this with a good degree of certainty in the history of the Papacy. If applicable to the Papal power, what seems to be demanded is, that three of these ten kingdoms, or sovereignties, should be rooted up by that power; that they should cease to exist as separate sovereignties; that they should be added to the sovereignty that should spring up; and that, as distinct kingdoms, they should cease to play a part in the history of the world. The three sovereignties thus transplanted, or rooted up, are supposed by Mr. Mede to have been the Greeks, the Longobards, and the Franks. Sir Isaac Newton supposes they were the Exarchate of Ravenna, the Lombards, and the senate and dukedom of Rome. The 'objections' which may be made to these suppositions may be seen in Newton on the Prophecies, pp. 216, 217. The kingdoms which he supposes are to be referred to were the following: —(1st) 'First'. The Exarchate of Ravenna. This of right belonged to the Greek emperors. This was the capital of their dominions in Italy. It revolted at the instigation of the Pope, and was seized by Aistulphus, king of the Lombards, who thought to make himself master of Italy. The Pope in his exigency applied for aid to Pepin, king of France, who marched into Italy, besieged the Lombards in Pavia, and forced them to surrender the Exarchate and other territories in Italy. These were not restored to the Greek emperor, as they in justice should have been, but, at the solicitation of the Pope, were given to St. Peter and his successors for perpetual possession. "And so," says Platina, "the name of the Exarchate, which had continued from the time of Narses to the taking of Ravenna, one hundred and seventy years, was extinguished."—Lives of the Popes. This, according to Sigonius, was effected in the year 755. See Gibbon, Dec. and Fall, vol ii. 224, iii. 332, 334, 338. From this period, says Bp. Newton, the Popes, being now become temporal princes, no longer date their epistles and bulls by the years of the emperor's reign, but by the years of their own advancement to the Papal chair. (2nd) Secondly. The kingdom of the Lombards. This kingdom was troublesome to the Popes. The dominions of the Pope were invaded by Desiderius, in the time of Pope Adrian I. Application was again made to the king of France, and Charles the Great, the son and successor of Pepin, invaded the Lombards; and desirous of enlarging his own dominions, conquered the Lombards, put an end to their kingdom, and gave a great part of their territory to the Pope. This was the end of the kingdom of the Lombards, in the 206th year after their obtaining possessions in Italy, and in the year of our Lord 774. See Gibbon, Dec., and Fall. vol. iii. 335. (3rd) Thirdly. The Roman States subjected to the Pope in a civil sense. Though subjected to the Pope spiritually, yet for a long time the Roman people were governed by a senate, and retained many of their old privileges, and elected both the Western Emperors and the Popes. This power, however, as is well known, passed into the hands of the Popes, and has been retained by them to the present time, the Pope having continued to be the civil as well as the ecclesiastical head. See Bp. Newton, pp. 319, 320. All semblance of the freedom of ancient Rome passed away, and this Roman dominion, as such, ceased to be, being completely absorbed in the Papacy. The Saxons, the Franks, etc., continued their independence as civil powers; these states passed entirely into the dominion of the Pope, and as independent kingdoms or sovereignties ceased to be. This is the solution in regard to the "three horns" that were to be plucked up, as given by Bp. Newton. Absolute certainty in a case of this kind is not to be expected in the confusion and indefiniteness of that portion of history, nor can it be reasonably demanded. If there were three of these powers planted in regions that became subject to the Papal power, and that disappeared or were absorbed in that one dominion constituting the peculiarity of the Papal dominion, or which entered into the Roman Papal state, considered as a sovereignty by itself among the nations of the earth, this is all that is required. Mr. Faber supposes the three to have been these: the Herulo-Turingic, the Ostrogothic, and the Lombardic, and says of them, that they "were necessarily eradicated in the immediate presence of the Papacy, before which they were geographically standing —and that the temporal principality which bears the name of St. Peter's patrimony was carved out of the mass of their subjugated dominions."—Sacred Calendar, vol. ii. p. 102. Prof. Gaussen (Discourse on Popery, Geneva, 1844) supposes that the three kings or kingdoms here referred to were the Heruli, the Ostrogoths, and the Lombards. According to Bower (Lives of the Popes, vol ii. 108, Dr. Cox's Edition, note), the temporal dominions granted by Pepin to the Pope, or of which the Pope became possessed in consequence of the intervention of the kings of France, were the following: (1.) The Exarchate of Ravenna, which comprised, according to Sigonius, the following cities: Ravenna, Bologna, Imola, Fienza, Forlimpoli, Forli, Cesena, Bobbio, Ferrara, Commachio, Adria, Servia, and Secchia. (2.) The Pentapolis, comprehending Rimini, Pesaro, Concha, Fano, Sinigalia, Ancono, Osimo, Umono, Jesi, Fossombrone, Monteferetro, Urbino, Cagli, Lucoli, and Eugubio. (3.) The city and dukedom of Rome, containing several cities of note, which had withdrawn themselves from all subjection to the emperor, had submitted to St. Peter ever since the time of Pope Gregory II. See also Bower, ii. 134, where he says, "The Pope had, by Charlemagne, been put in possession of the Exarchate, the Pentapolis, and the dukedom of Spoleti" [embracing the city and dukedom of Rome]; And again, on the same page (note): "The Pope possessed the Exarchate, the Pentapolis, and the dukedom of Spoleti, with the city and dukedom of Rome." It should be remembered that these statements are made by historians with no reference to any supposed fulfilment of this prophecy, and no allusion to it, but as matters of simple historical fact, occurring in the regular course of history. The 'material' fact to be made out in order to show that this description of the "little horn" is applicable to the Papacy is, that at the 'commencement' of what was properly the 'Papacy' —that is, as I suppose, the union of the spiritual and temporal power, or the 'assumption' of temporal authority by him who was Bishop of Rome, and who had been before regarded as a mere spiritual or ecclesiastical ruler, there was a 'triple' jurisdiction assumed or conceded; a threefold domination; or a union under himself of what had been three sovereignties, that now disappeared as independent administrations, and whose distinct governments were now merged in the

'one' single sovereignty of the Pope. Now, that there was, just at this time, or at the 'beginning' of the Papacy, or when it had so increased that it could be recognised as having a place among the temporal sovereignties of the earth, such a united domination, or such a union of three separate powers under one, will be apparent from an extract from Mr. Gibbon. He is speaking of the rewards conferred on the Pope by the Carolingian race of kings, on account of the favour shown to them in his conferring the crown of France on Pepin, the mayor of the palace —directing in his favour over Childeric, the descendant of Clovis. Of this transaction, Mr. Gibbon observes, in general (iii. 336), that "the mutual obligations of the Popes and the Carolingian family form the important link of ancient and modern, of civil and ecclesiastical history." He then proceeds (1) to specify the gifts or favours which the Popes conferred on the Carolingian race; and (2) those which, in return, Pepin and Charlemagne bestowed on the Popes. In reference to the latter, he makes the following statement (iii. 338): "The gratitude of the Carolingians was adequate to these obligations, and their names are consecrated as the saviours and bene factors of the Roman church. Her ancient patrimony of farms and houses was transformed by their bounty 'into the temporal dominion of cities and provinces, and the donation of the Exarchate was the first-fruits of the conquests of Pepin'. Astolphus [king of the Lombards] with a sigh relinquished his prey; the keys and the hostages of the principal cities were delivered to the French ambassador; and in his master's name 'he presented them before the tomb of St. Peter'. The ample measure of the Exarchate might comprise all the provinces of Italy which had obeyed the emperor or his vicegerent; but its strict and proper limits were included in the territories of Ravenna, Bologna, and Ferrara; its inseparable dependency was the Pentapolis, which stretched along the Adriatic from Rimini to Ancona, and advanced into the midland country as far as the ridge of the Appennines. In this transaction, the ambition and avarice of the Popes have been severely condemned. Perhaps the humility of a Christian priest should have rejected an earthly kingdom, which it was not easy for him to govern without renouncing the virtues of his profession. Perhaps a faithful subject, or even a generous enemy, would have been less impatient to divide the spoils of the barbarian; and if the emperor had entrusted Stephen to solicit in his name the restitution of the Exarchate, I will not absolve the Pope from the reproach of treachery and falsehood. But, in the rigid interpretation of the laws, everyone may accept, without inquiry, whatever his benefactor may bestow without injustice. The Greek emperor had abdicated or forfeited his right to the Exarchate; and the sword of Astolphus was broken by the stronger sword of the Carolingian. It was not in the cause of the Iconoclast that Pepin had exposed his person and army in a double expedition beyond the Alps; he possessed and he might lawfully alienate his conquests; and to the importunities of the Greeks he piously replied that no human consideration should tempt him to resume the gift which he had conferred on the Roman pontiff for the remission of his sins and the salvation of his soul. The splendid donation was granted in supreme and absolute dominion, 'and the world beheld for the first time a Christian bishop invested with the prerogatives of a temporal prince', the choice of magistrates, the exercise of justice, the imposition of taxes, and the wealth of the palace of Ravenna. In the dissolution of the Lombard kingdom, the inhabitants of the duchy of Spoleti sought a refuge from the storm, shaved their heads after the Ravenna fashion, declared themselves the servants and subjects of St. Peter, 'and completed, by this voluntary surrender, the present circle of the Ecclesiastical State'." The following things are apparent from this extract: —(a) That here, according to Mr. Gibbon, was the beginning of the temporal power of the Pope. (b) That this was properly, in the view above taken, the commencement of the Papacy as a distinct and peculiar dominion. (c) That in this there was a threefold government, or three 'temporal' sovereignties united under him, and constituting at that time, in the language of Mr. Gibbon, "the present circle of the ecclesiastical state." There was, 'first', the Exarchate of Ravenna; 'secondly', the Pentapolis, "which," he says, was its "inseparable dependency;" and, 'thirdly', the "duchy of Spoleti," which, he says, "completed the present circle of the ecclesiastical state." This was afterwards, Mr. Gibbon goes on to say, greatly "enlarged;" but this was the form in which the Papal power first made its appearance among the temporal sovereignties of Europe. I do not find, indeed, that the kingdom of the 'Lombards' was, as is commonly stated, among the number of the temporal sovereignties that became subject to the authority of the Popes, but I 'do' find that there 'were' three distinct temporal sovereignties that lost their independent existence, and that were united under that one temporal authority —constituting by the union of the spiritual and temporal power that one peculiar kingdom. In Lombardy, the power remained in the possession of the kings of the Lombards themselves, until that kingdom was subdued by the arms of Pepin and Charlemagne, and then it became subject to the crown of France, though for a time under the nominal reign of its own kings. See Gibbon, iii. 334, 335, 338. If it should be said, that in the interpretation of this passage respecting the "three horns" that were plucked up, or the three kingdoms that were thus destroyed, it would be proper to look for them among the 'ten' into which the one great kingdom was divided, and that the three above referred to —the Exarchate of Ravenna, the Pentapolis, and the dukedom of Spoleti and Rome —were not properly of that number, according to the list above given, it is necessary in reply to this, to advert only to the two main facts in the case: (1) that the great Roman power was actually divided into a large number of sovereignties that sprang up on its ruins —usually, but not in fact exactly, represented by 'ten'; and (2) that the Papacy began its career with a conceded dominion over the three territories above referred to —a part, in fact, of the one great dominion constituting the Roman power, and in the same territory. It is a remarkable fact that the Popes to this day wear a triple crown —a fact that exists in regard to no other monarchs —'as if' they had absorbed under themselves three separate and distinct sovereignties; or 'as if' they represented three separate forms of dominion. The sum of what is said in the exposition of these verses may be thus expressed : — (1.) That there was originally 'one' great sovereignty represented here by the "fourth beast" —the Roman empire. (2.) That, in fact, as is abundantly confirmed by history, this one great and united power was broken up into a large number of separate and independent sovereignties —most naturally and obviously described by 'ten', or such as would appear in a prophetic vision to be 'ten', and such as is actually so represented by historians having no interest in the fulfilment of the prophecy, and no designed reference to what may be symbolized by the "ten horns." (3.) That there was another peculiar and distinct power that sprang out of them, and that grew to be mighty —a power unlike the others, and unlike anything that had before appeared in the world —combining qualities to be found in no other sovereignty —having a peculiar relation at the same time to the 'one' original sovereignty, and to the 'ten' into which that was divided —the prolongation, in an important sense, of the power of the one, and springing up in a peculiar manner among the others —that peculiar ecclesiastical and civil power —the Papacy— well represented by the "little horn." (4.) That, in fact, this one power absorbed into itself 'three' of these sovereignties —annihilating them as independent powers, and combining them into one most peculiar dominion —properly represented by "plucking them up." (5.) That as a proper symbol, or emblem of some such domination, a crown or diadem is still worn, most naturally and obviously 'suggesting' such a threefold absorption of dominion. (6.) That all this is actually prefigured by the symbols employed by the prophet, or that the symbols are such as would be naturally employed on the supposition that these events were designed to be referred to. (7.) And that there have been 'no other' historical events to which these remarkable symbols could be naturally and obviously applied. And if these things are so, how are they to be explained except on the supposition that Daniel was inspired? Has man any natural sagacity by which such symbols representing the future could be suggested? (f) It would be arrogant and proud, "speaking great words against the Most High." No 'Protestant' will doubt that this is true of the Papacy; no one acquainted with history will presume to call it in question. The arrogant pretensions of the Papacy have been manifested in all the history of that power, and no one can doubt that its assumptions have been, in fact, by fair construction, "a speaking of great words against God." The Pope has claimed, or allowed to be conferred on him, names and prerogatives which can belong only to God. See this fully shown in the notes on 2nd Thess. 2:4. The facts there referred to are all that is necessary to illustrate this passage, on the supposition that it refers to the Papacy. Comp.

also the "Literalist," vol. i. pp. 24–27. (g) This would be a persecuting power — "making war with the saints," and "wearing out the saints of the Most High." Can anyone doubt that this is true of the Papacy? The Inquisition; the "persecutions of the Waldenses;" the ravages of the Duke of Alva; the fires of Smithfield; the tortures at Goa —indeed, the whole history of the Papacy may be appealed to in proof that this is applicable to that power. If anything 'could' have "worn out the saints of the Most High" — could have cut them off from the earth so that evangelical religion would have become extinct, it would have been the persecutions of the Papal power. In the year 1208, a crusade was proclaimed by Pope Innocent III. against the Waldenses and Albigenses, in which a million of men perished. From the beginning of the order of the Jesuits, in the year 1540 to 1580, nine hundred thousand were destroyed. One hundred and fifty thousand perished by the Inquisition in thirty years. In the Low Countries fifty thousand persons were hanged, beheaded, burned, or buried alive, for the crime of heresy, within the space of thirty-eight years from the edict of Charles W., against the Protestants, to the peace of Chateau Cambresis in 1559. Eighteen thousand suffered by the hands of the executioner, in the space of five years and a half, during the administration of the Duke of Alva. Indeed, the slightest acquaintance with the history of the Papacy will convince anyone that what is here said of "making war with the saints" (ver. 21), and "wearing out the saints of the Most High" (ver. 25), is strictly applicable to that power, and will accurately describe its history. There have been, indeed, other persecuting powers, but none to which this language would be so applicable, and none which it would so naturally suggest. In proof of this, it is only necessary to refer to the history of the Papacy, and to what it has done to extirpate those who have professed a different faith. Let anyone recall (1) the persecution of the Waldenses; (2) the acts of the Duke of Alva in the Low Countries; (3) the persecution in England under Mary; (4) the Inquisition; (5) the attempts, too successful, to extinguish all the efforts at Reformation in Italy and Spain in the time of Luther and Calvin (see McCrie), and (6) the attempts to put down the Reformation in Germany and Switzerland —all which were either directly originated or sanctioned by the Papacy, and all for the same end, and he will see no reason to doubt that the language here is 'strictly' applicable to that power, and that there has been no government on earth which would be so naturally suggested by it. — Cunninghame, in the Literalist, i. 27, 28. Indeed, who can number up all that have perished in the Inquisition alone? (h) It would claim legislative power —"thinking to change times and laws." The original Chaldee here may be rendered, as is done by Gesenius and De Wette, 'set times, stated times', or 'festival seasons'. The word here, says Gesenius (Lex), is "spoken of sacred seasons, festivals," and there can be no doubt that in this place it refers to religious institutions. The meaning is, that he would claim control over such institutions or festivals, and that he would appoint or change them at his pleasure. He would abolish or modify existing institutions of that kind, or he would institute new ones, as should seem good to him. This would be applicable, then, to some power that should claim authority to prescribe religious institutions, and to change the laws of God. No one, also, can fail to see a fulfilment of this in the claims of the Papacy, in setting up a jurisdiction over seasons of festival and fast; and in demanding that the laws of kingdoms should be so modelled as to sustain its claims, and modifying the laws of God as revealed in the Bible. The right of deposing and setting up kings; of fixing the boundaries of nations; of giving away crowns and sceptres; and of exercising dominion over the sacred seasons, the customs, the amusements of nations —all these, as illustrated under the Papacy, will leave no doubt that all this would find an ample fulfilment in the history of that power. The Pope has claimed to be the head of the church, and has asserted and exercised the right of appointing sacred seasons; of abolishing ancient institutions; of introducing numberless new festival occasions, practically abrogating the laws of God on a great variety of subjects...We need only refer, in illustration of this, (a) to the claim of infallibility, by which an absolute jurisdiction is asserted that covers the whole round; (b) to all the laws pertaining to image-worship, so directly in the face of the laws of God; (c) to the celibacy of the clergy, rendering void one of the laws of heaven in relation to marriage; (d) to the whole doctrine respecting purgatory; (e) to the doctrine of transubstantiation; (f) to the practical abolition of the Christian Sabbath by appointing numerous saints' days to be observed as equally sacred; (g) to the law withholding the cup from the laity—contrary to the commandment of the Saviour; and (h) in general to the absolute control claimed by the Papacy over the whole subject of religion. Indeed, nothing would better characterize this power than to say that it asserted the right to “change times and laws.” And to all this should be added another characteristic (ver. 8), that “it would have the eyes of a man;” that is, would be distinguished for a far-seeing sagacity. Could this be so appropriately applied to anything else as to the deep, the artful, and the far-reaching diplomacy of the court of Rome; to the sagacity of the Jesuit; to the skilful policy which subdued the world to itself?

These illustrations will leave no doubt, it seems to me, that all that is here said will find an ample fulfilment in the Papacy, and that it is to be regarded as having a reference to that power. If so, it only remains,:

III. To inquire what, according to this interpretation, we are to expect will yet occur, or what light this passage throws on events that are yet future. The origin, the growth, the general character and influence of this power up to a distant period are illustrated by this interpretation. What remains is the inquiry, from the passage before us, how long this is to continue, and what we are to anticipate in regard to its fall. The following points, then, would seem to be clear, on the supposition that this refers to the Papal power.

It is to continue a definite period from its establishment, ver. 25. This duration is mentioned as “a time, and times, and the dividing of a time” —three years and a half— twelve hundred and sixty (1260) days —twelve hundred and sixty(1260) years . See the notes on that verse. The only 'difficulty' in regard to this, if that interpretation is correct, is to determine the time when the Papacy actually 'began' —the 'terminus a quo'— and this has given rise to all the diversity of explanation among Protestants. Assuming any one time as the period when the Papal power 'arose', as a date from which to calculate, it is easy to compute 'from' that date, and to fix some period —'terminus ad quem'— to which this refers, and which may be looked to as the time of the overthrow of that power. But there is nothing more difficult in history than the determination of the exact time when the 'Papacy' properly began: —that is, when the peculiar domination which is fairly understood by that system commenced in the world; or what were its first distinguishing acts. History has not so marked that period that there is no room for doubt. It has not affixed definite dates to it; and to this day it is not easy to make out the 'time' when that power commenced, or to designate any one event at a certain period that will surely mark it. It 'seems' to have been a gradual growth, and its commencement has not been so definitely characterized as to enable us to demonstrate with absolute certainty the time to which the twelve hundred and sixty (1260) years will extend.

Different writers have assigned different periods for the rise of the Papacy, and different acts as the first act of that power; and all the prophecies as to its termination depend on the period which is fixed on as the time of its rise. It is this which has led to so much that is conjectural, and which has been the occasion of so much disappointment, and which throws so much obscurity now over all calculations as to the termination of that power. In nothing is the Scripture more clear than that that power shall be destroyed; and if we could ascertain with exactness the date of its origin, there would be little danger of erring in regard to its close. The different 'periods' which have been fixed on as the date of its rise have been principally the following: (1.) An edict published by Justinian (A.D. 533), and a letter addressed by him at the same time to the Pope, in which he acknowledged him to be the head of the churches, thus conferring on him a title belonging only to the Saviour, and putting himself and empire under the dominion of the bishop of Rome. —Duffield on the Prophecies, p. 281. (2.) The decree of the emperor Phocas (A.D. 606), confirming what had been done by Justinian, and giving his sanction to the code of laws promulgated by him: a code of laws based on the acknowledged supremacy of the Pope, and which became the basis of European legislation for centuries; and conferring on him the title of “Universal Bishop.” (3.) The act of Pope Stephen, by which, when appealed to by the claimant to the crown of France, he confirmed Pepin in the kingdom, and set aside Childeric III, and, in return, received from Pepin the Exarchate of Ravenna and the Pentapolis. See Ranke's Hist, of the Papacy, vol. i. 23. This occurred about A. D. 752. (4.) The opinion of Mr. Gibbon (iv. 363), that Gregory the Seventh was the true founder of the Papal power. “Gregory the Seventh,” says he, “who may be adored or detested 'as the founder of the Papal monarchy', was driven from Rome, and died in exile at Salerno.” Gregory became Pope A. D. 1073. These different dates, if assumed as the foundation of the Papal power, would, by the addition to each of the period of 1260 years, lead respectively to the years 1793, 1866, 2012, and 2333, as the period of the termination of the Papal dominion. As this is a point of great importance in the explanation of the prophecies, it may be proper to examine these opinions a little more in detail. But in order to this, it is necessary to have a clear conception of what the 'Papacy' as a distinct domination is, or what constitutes its peculiarity, as seen by the sacred writers, and as it has in fact existed, and does exist in the world; and in regard to this there can be little difference of opinion. It is not a mere ecclesiastical power—not a mere spiritual domination—not the control of a bishop as such over a church or a diocese—nor is it a mere temporal dominion, but it is manifestly the 'union of the two': that peculiar domination which the bishop of Rome has claimed, as growing out of his primacy as the head of the church, and of a temporal power also, asserted at first over a limited jurisdiction, but ultimately, and as a natural consequence, over all other sovereignties, and claiming universal dominion. We shall not find the Papacy, or the Papal dominion as such, clearly, in the mere spiritual rule of the first bishop of Rome, nor in that mere spiritual dominion, however enlarged, but in that junction of the two, when, in virtue of a pretended Divine right, a temporal dominion grew up that ultimately extended itself over Europe, claiming the authority to dispose of crowns; to lay kingdoms under interdict, and to absolve subjects from their allegiance. If we can find the beginning of this claim—the germ of this peculiar kind of domination—we shall doubtless have found the commencement of the Papacy—the terminus a quo—as it was seen by the prophets—the point from which we are to reckon in determining the question of its duration.

With this view, then, of the nature of the Papacy, it is proper to inquire 'when' it commenced, or which of the periods referred to, if either, can be properly regarded as the commencement.

(I.) The edict of Justinian, and the letter to the bishop of Rome, in which he acknowledged him to be the head of the church, A. D. 533. This occurred under John II, reckoned as the fifty-fifth (55th) bishop of Rome. The nature of this application of Justinian to the Pope, and the honour conferred on him, was this: On an occasion of a controversy in the church, on the question whether “one person of the Trinity suffered in the flesh,” the monks of Constantinople, fearful of being condemned under an edict of Justinian for heresy in denying this, applied to the Pope to decide the point. Justinian, who took great delight in inquiries of that nature, and who maintained the opposite opinion on that subject, also made his appeal to the Pope.' Having, therefore, drawn up a long creed, containing the disputed article among the rest, he dispatched two bishops with it to Rome, and laid the whole matter before the Pope. At the same time he wrote a letter to the Pope, congratulating him on his election, assuring him that the faith contained in the confession which he sent him was the faith of the whole Eastern church, and entreating him to declare in his answer that he received to his communion all who professed that faith, and none who did not. To add weight to the letter, he accompanied it with a present to St. Peter, consisting of several chalices, and other vessels of gold, enriched with precious stones. From this deference to the Pope, on the part of the emperor, and this submitting to him, as the head of the whole church, of an important question to be determined, it has been argued that this was properly the beginning of the Papacy, and that the twelve hundred and sixty (1260) years are to be reckoned from that. But against this opinion the objections are insuperable: for (a) there was here nothing of that which 'properly' constitutes the Papacy—the peculiar union of the temporal and spiritual power; or the peculiar domination which that power has exerted over the world. All that occurred was the mere reference which an emperor showed to one who claimed to be the 'spiritual' head of the church, and who had long before claimed that. There was no 'change' —no 'beginning', properly so called— no commencement of a new form of domination over mankind, such as the Papacy has been. (b) But, as a matter of fact, there was, after all, little real deference to the Pope in this case. "Little or no account," says Bower, "ought to be made of that extraordinary deference [the deference shown by carrying this question before the Pope]... Justinian paid great deference to the Pope, as well as to all other bishops, when they agreed with him; but none at all when they did not —thinking himself, at least, as well qualified as the best of them, and so he certainly was, to decide controversies concerning the faith; and we shall soon see him entering the lists with his holiness himself." —Lives of the Popes, i. 336.

(II.) The second date which has been assigned to the origin of the Papacy is the decree made by the emperor Phocas (A.D. 606), by which, it is said, he confirmed the grant made by Justinian. This act was the following: Boniface III, when he had been made bishop of Rome, relying on the favour and partiality which Phocas had shown him, prevailed on him to revoke the decree settling the title of "Universal Bishop" on the bishop of Constantinople, and obtained another settling that title on himself and his successors. The decree of Phocas, conferring this title, has not indeed come down to us; but it has been the common testimony of historians that such title was conferred. See Mosheim, i. 513; Bower, i. 426. The fact asserted here has been doubted, and Mosheim supposes that it rests on the authority of Baronius. "Still," says he, "it is certain that something of this kind occurred." But there are serious objections to our regarding this as properly the commencement of the Papacy as such. For (a) this was not the beginning of that peculiar domination, or form of power, which the Pope has asserted and maintained. If this title were conferred, it imparted no new power; it did not change the nature of this domination; it did not, in fact, make the Roman bishop different from what he was before. He was still, in all respects, subject to the civil power of the emperors, and had no control beyond that which he exercised in the church. (b) And even 'this' little was withdrawn by the same authority which granted it —the authority of the emperor of Constantinople— though it has always since been claimed and asserted by the Pope himself. See Bower, i. 427. It is true that, as a consequence of the fact that this title was conferred on the Popes, they began 'to grasp' at power, and aspire to temporal dominion; but still there was no formal grasp of such power growing out of the assumption of this title, nor was any such temporal dominion set up as the immediate result of such a title. The act, therefore, was not sufficiently marked, distinct, and decisive, to constitute an epoch, or the beginning of an era, in the history of the world, and the rise of the Papacy cannot with any propriety be dated from that. This was undoubtedly one of the 'steps' by which that peculiar power rose to its greatness, or which contributed to lay the foundation of its subsequent claims, its arrogance, and its pride; but it is doubtful whether it was so important an event characterizing the Papacy as to be regarded as the origin, or the 'terminus a quo' in ascertaining the time of its continuance. (*Mr. Hallam (Middle Ages, i. 420, note) urges the following arguments substantially against the supposition that the Papal supremacy had its rise from this epoch, and is to be dated from the concession of the title of Universal Bishop made by Phocas to Boniface III, viz.: (1) Its truth, as commonly stated, appears more than questionable. (2) "But if the strongest proof could be advanced for the authenticity of this circumstance, we may well deny its importance. The concession of Phocas could have been of no validity in Lombardy, France, and other western countries, where, nevertheless, the Papal supremacy was incomparably more established than in the east." (3) "Even within the empire it could have had no efficacy after the violent death of that usurper, which occurred soon afterwards." (4) "The title of Universal Bishop is not very intelligible, but whatever it means the patriarchs of Constantinople had borne it before, and continued to bear it afterwards." (5) "The preceding Popes, Pelagius II and Gregory I, had constantly disclaimed the ". nor does it appear to have been claimed by the successors of Boniface, at least for some centuries." (6) "The Popes had undoubtedly exercised a species of supremacy for more than two centuries before this time, which had lately reached a high point of authority under Gregory I." (7) "There are no sensible marks of this supremacy making a more rapid progress for a century and a half after the pretended grant of this emperor.” It this, and with this considered as properly the origin of the Papacy, that the Rev. Robert Fleming, in his work on the “Rise and Fall of the Papacy,” first published in 1701, uttered the following remarkable language, as based on his calculations respecting the continuance of that power: “If we may suppose that Antichrist began his reign in the year 606, the additional one thousand two hundred and sixty (1260) years of his duration, were they 'Julian' or ordinary years, would lead down to the year 1866, as the last period of the seven-headed monster. But seeing they are prophetic years only [of 360 days], we must cast away eighteen years in order to bring them to the exact measure of time that the Spirit of God designs in this book. 'And thus the final period of the Papal usurpations (supposing that he did indeed rise in the year 606) must conclude with the year 1848.”—[‘Cobbin's Edition’, p. 32.] Whether this be considered as merely a 'happy conjecture'—the one successful one among thousands that have failed, or as the result of a proper calculation respecting the future, no one in comparing it with the events of the year 1848, when the Pope was driven from Rome, and when a popular government was established in the very seat of the Papal power, can fail to see that it is remarkable considered as having been uttered a century and a half ago. Whether it is the correct calculation, and that temporary downfall of the Papal Government is to be regarded as the first in a series of events that will ultimately end in its destruction, time must determine. The reasons mentioned above, however, and those which will be suggested in favour of a different beginning of that power, make it, at present, more probable that a different period is to be assigned as its close.

(III.) The third date which has been assigned as the beginning of the Papacy is the grant of Pepin above referred to, A. D. 752. This grant conferred by Pepin was confirmed also by Charlemagne and his successors, and it was undoubtedly at this period that the Papacy began to assume its place among the sovereignties of Europe. In favour of this opinion—that this was properly the rise of the Papacy—the 'terminus a quo' of prophecy, the following considerations may be urged: (a) We have here a definite act—an act which is palpable and apparent, as characterizing the progress of this domination over men. (b) We have here properly the 'beginning' of the temporal dominion, or the first acknowledged exercise of that power in acts of temporal sovereignty—in giving laws, asserting dominion, swaying a temporal sceptre, and wearing a temporal crown. All the facts before had been of a spiritual character, and all the deference to the Bishop of Rome had been of a spiritual nature. Henceforward, however, he was acknowledged as a temporal prince, and took his place as such among was, however, in view of the crowned heads of Europe. (c) This is properly the beginning of that mighty domination which the Pope wielded over Europe—a beginning, which, however small at first, ultimately became so powerful and so arrogant as to claim jurisdiction over all the kingdoms of the earth, and the right to absolve subjects from their allegiance, to lay kingdoms under interdict, to dispose of crowns, to order the succession of princes, to tax all people, and to dispose of all newly-discovered countries. (d) This accords better with the prophecies than any other one event which has occurred in the world—especially with the prophecy of Daniel, of the springing up of the little horn, and the fact that that little horn plucked up three others of the ten into which the fourth kingdom was divided. (e) And it should be added that this agrees with the idea all along held up in the prophecies, that this would be properly 'the fourth empire prolonged'. The fifth empire or kingdom is to be the reign of the saints, or the reign of righteousness on the earth; the fourth extends down in its influences and power to that. As a matter of fact, this 'Roman' power was thus concentrated in the Papacy. The form was changed, but it was the 'Roman' power that was in the eye of the prophets, and this was contemplated under its various phases, as heathen and nominally Christian, until the reign of the saints should commence, or the kingdom of God should be set up. But it was only in the time of Stephen, and by the act of Pepin and Charlemagne, that this change occurred, or that this dominion of a temporal character was settled in the Papacy—and that the Pope was acknowledged as having this temporal power. This was 'consummated' indeed in Hildebrand, or Gregory II (Gibbon, iii. 353, iv. 363), but 'this' mighty power properly had its 'origin' in the time of Pepin.

(IV.) The fourth date assigned for the origin of the Papacy is the time of Hildebrand, or Gregory VII. This is the period assigned by Mr. Gibbon. Respecting this, he remarks (vol. iv. p. 363), "Gregory the Seventh, who may be adored or detested 'as the founder of the Papal monarchy', was driven from Rome, and died in exile at Salerno." And again (vol. iii. p. 353) he says of Gregory, "After a long series of scandal, the apostolic see was reformed and exalted, by the austerity and zeal of Gregory VII. That ambitious monk devoted his life to the execution of two projects: I. To fix in the college of Cardinals the freedom and independence of election, and for ever to abolish the right or usurpation of the emperors and the Roman people. II. To bestow and resume the Western Empire as a fief or benefice of the church, and to extend his temporal dominion over the kings and kingdoms of the earth. After a contest of fifty years, the first of these designs was accomplished by the firm support of the ecclesiastical order, whose liberty was connected with that of the chief. But the second attempt, though it was crowned with some apparent and partial success, has been vigorously resisted by the secular power, and finally extinguished by the improvement of human reason."

(A.) If the views above suggested, however, are correct; or if we look at the Papacy as it was in the time of Hildebrand, it must be apparent that this was not the 'rise' or 'origin' of that peculiar domination, but was only the carrying out and completing of the plan laid long before to set up a temporal dominion over mankind.

It should be added, that whichever of the three first periods referred to be regarded as the time of the rise of the Papacy, if we add to them the prophetic period of 1260 years, we are 'now' in the midst of scenes on which the prophetic eye rested, and we cannot, as fair interpreters of prophecy, but regard this mighty domination as hastening to its fall. It would seem probable, then, that according to the most obvious explanation of the subject, we are at present not far from the termination and fall of that great power, and that events may be expected to occur at about this period of the world which will be connected with its fall.

(B.) Its power is to be taken away as by a solemn judgment —'as if' the throne was set, and God was to come forth to pronounce judgment on this power to overthrow it, vers. 10, 11, 26. This destruction of the power referred to is to be absolute and entire —'as if' the "beast were slain, and the body given to the burning flame" —"and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and destroy it unto the end." This would denote the absolute destruction of this peculiar power —its entire cessation in the world; that is, the absolute destruction of that which had constituted its 'peculiarity' —the prolonged power of the beast of the fourth kingdom —concentrated and embodied in that represented by the little horn. If applied to the Roman power, or the fourth kingdom, it means that 'that' power, which would have been prolonged under the dominion of that represented by the little horn, would wholly cease — as if the body of the beast had been burned. If applied to the power represented by the "little horn" — the Papacy— it means that 'that' power which sprang up amidst the others, and which became so mighty —embodying so much of the power of the beast, would wholly pass away 'as' an ecclesiastico-civil power. It would cease its dominion, and as one of the ruling powers of the earth 'would disappear. This would be accomplished by some remarkable Divine manifestation —'as if' God should come in majesty and power to judgment, and should pronounce a sentence; that is, the overthrow would be decisive, and as manifestly the result of the Divine interposition 'as if' God should do it by a formal act of judgment. In the overthrow of that power, whenever it occurs, it would be natural, from this prophecy, to anticipate that there would be some scenes of commotion and revolution bearing directly on it, 'as if' God were pronouncing sentence on it; some important changes in the nations that had acknowledged its authority, 'as if' the great Judge of nations were coming forth to assert his own power and his own right to rule, and to dispose of the kingdoms of the earth as he pleased.

(C.) It is to be anticipated that the power referred to will be destroyed on account of its pride and arrogance. See notes on ver. 11. That is, whatever power there is upon the earth at the time referred to that shall be properly that of the fourth beast or kingdom, will be taken away on account of the claims set up and maintained by the "little horn:" "I beheld 'because' of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld till the beast was slain," etc., ver. 11. On the supposition that this refers to the Papacy, what is to be expected would be, that the pride and arrogance of that power as such—that is, as an ecclesiastical power claiming dominion over civil things, and wielding civil authority, would be such that the Roman power—the lingering power of the fourth kingdom—would be taken away, and its dominion over the world would cease. That vast Roman domination that once trod down the earth, and that crushed and oppressed the nations, would still linger, like the prolonged life of the beast, until, on account of the arrogance and pride of the Papacy, it would be wholly taken away. If one were to judge of the meaning of this prophecy without attempting to apply it to particular passing events, he would say that it would be fulfilled by some such events as these:—if the people over whom the prolonged Roman civil power would be extended, and over whom the ecclesiastical or papal sceptre would be swayed, should, on account of the pride and arrogance of the Papacy, rise in their might, and demand liberty—'that' would be in fact an end of the prolonged power of the fourth beast; and it would be on account of the "great words which the horn spake," and would be in all respects a fulfilment of the language of this prophecy. Whether such an end of this power is to occur, time is to determine.

(D.) Simultaneously with this event, as the result of this, we are to anticipate such a spread of truth and righteousness, and such a reign of the saints on the earth, as would be properly symbolized by the coming of the Son of man to the Ancient of days to receive the kingdom, vers. 13,14. As shown in the interpretation of those verses, this does not necessarily imply that there would be any visible appearing of the Son of man, or any personal reign (see the notes on these verses), but there would be such a making over of the kingdom to the Son of man and to the saints as would be properly symbolized by such a representation. That is, there would be great changes; there would be a rapid progress of the truth; there would be a spread of the gospel; there would be a change in the governments of the world, so that the power would pass into the hands of the righteous, and they would in fact rule. From that time the "saints" would receive the kingdom, and the affairs of the world would be put on a new footing. From that period it might be said that the reign of the saints would 'commence'; that is, there would be such changes in this respect that 'that' would constitute an epoch in the history of the world—the proper beginning of the reign of the saints on the earth—the setting up of the new and final dominion in the world. If there should be such changes—such marked progress—such facilities for the spread of truth—such new methods of propagating it—and such certain success attending it, all opposition giving way, and persecution ceasing, as would properly constitute an 'epoch' or 'era' in the world's history which would be connected with the conversion of the world to God, this would fairly meet the interpretation of this prophecy; this occurring, all would have taken place which could be fairly shown to be implied in the vision.

(E.) We are to expect a reign of righteousness on the earth. On the character of what we are fairly to expect from the words of the prophecy, see notes on ver. 14. The prophecy authorizes us to anticipate a time when there shall be a general prevalence of true religion; when the power in the world shall be in the hands of good men—of men fearing God; when the Divine laws shall be obeyed—being acknowledged as the laws that are to control men; when the civil institutions of the world shall be pervaded by religion, and moulded by it; when there shall be no hindrance to the free exercise of religion, and when in fact the reigning power on the earth shall be the kingdom which the Messiah shall set up. There is nothing more certain in the future than such a period, and to that all things are tending. 'Such' a period would fulfil all that is fairly implied in this wonderful prophecy, and 'to' that faith and hope should calmly and confidently look forward. For that they who love their God and their race should labour and pray; and by the certain assurance that such a period will come, we should be cheered amidst all the moral darkness that exists in the world, and in all that now discourages us in our endeavours to do good. }}

{{ Chapter VIII. Analysis of Chapter 8: [B.C. 553]

This chapter contains an account of a vision seen by the prophet in the third year of the reign of Belshazzar. The prophet either was, or appeared to be, in the city of Shushan —afterwards, the capital of the Persian empire, in the province of Elam. To that place —then an important town —there is no improbability in supposing that he had gone, as he was then unconnected with the government, or not employed by the government (ch. 5), and as it is not unreasonable to suppose that he would be at liberty to visit other parts of the empire than Babylon. Possibly there may have been Jews at that place, and he may have gone on a visit to them. Or perhaps the scene of the vision may have been laid in Shushan, by the river Ulai, and that the prophet means to represent himself 'as if' he had been there, and the vision had seemed to pass there before his mind. But there is no valid objection to the supposition that he was actually there; and this seems to be affirmed in ver. 2. While there, he saw a ram with two horns, one higher than the other, pushing westward, and northward, and southward, so powerful that nothing could oppose him. As he was looking on this, he saw a he-goat come from the West, bounding along, and scarcely touching the ground, with a single remarkable horn between his eyes. This he-goat attacked the ram, broke his two horns, and overcame him entirely. The he-goat became very strong, but at length the horn was broken, and there came up four in its place. From one of these there sprang up a little horn that became exceeding great and mighty, extending itself toward the South, and the East, and the pleasant land —the land of Palestine. This horn became so mighty that it seemed to attack “the host of heaven”—the stars; it cast some of them down to the ground; it magnified itself against the Prince of the host; it caused the daily sacrifice in the temple to cease, and the sanctuary of the Prince of the host was cast down. An earnest inquiry was made by one saint to another how long this was to continue, and the answer was, unto two thousand and three hundred (2300) days, and that then the sanctuary would be cleansed. Gabriel is then sent to explain the vision to the prophet, and he announces that the ram with the two horns represented the kings of Media and Persia; the goat, the king of Greece; the great horn between his eyes, the first king; the four horns that sprang up after that was broken, the four dynasties into which the kingdom would be divided; and the little horn, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, and that would stand up against the Prince of princes, and that would ultimately be destroyed. The effect of this was, that Daniel was overcome by the vision for a certain time; afterward, he revived, and attended to the business of the king, but none understood the vision.

This is one of the few prophecies in the Scriptures that are explained to the prophets themselves, and therefore, important as a key to explain other prophecies of a similar character. Of the reference to the kingdom of Media and Persia, and to the kingdom of Greece, there is an express statement. The application of a portion of the prophecy to Alexander the Great, and to the four monarchies into which his kingdom was divided at his death, is equally certain. And there can be as little doubt of the application of the remainder to Antiochus Epiphanes, and in this nearly all expositors are agreed. Indeed, so striking and clear is the application to this series of historical events, that Porphyry maintained that this, as well as other portions of Daniel, were written 'after' the events occurred. One of two things, indeed, is certain —either that this 'was' written after the events here referred to occurred, or that Daniel was inspired. No man by any natural sagacity could have predicted these events with so much accuracy and particularity. The portion of Daniel which follows is in pure Hebrew.

The portion of the book from the fourth verse of the second chapter to the end of the seventh chapter was written in Chaldee. On this point, see Intro, § IV, III. (1).)

{{ Chapter IX. Analysis of Chapter 9: [B.C. 538]

This chapter is properly divided into three parts, or comprises three things: —

I. The inquiry of Daniel into the time that the desolations of Jerusalem were to continue, and his determination to seek the Lord, to pray that his purpose in regard to the restoration of the city and temple might be speedily accomplished, vers. 1-3. Daniel says (ver. 1), that this occurred in the first year of Darius of the seed of the Medes. He was engaged in the study of the books of Jeremiah. He learned from these books that seventy years were to elapse during which the temple, the city, and the land were to be desolate. By a calculation as to the time when this commenced, he was enabled to ascertain the period when it would close, and he found that that period was near, and that, according to the prediction, it might be expected that the time of the restoration was at hand. His mind was, of course, filled with the deepest solicitude. It would seem not improbable that he did not receive any preparation for this, or any tendency to it, and it could not but be that he would be filled with anxiety in regard to it. He does not appear to have entertained any doubt that the predictions would be fulfilled, and, the fact that they were so clear and so positive was a strong reason why he should pray, and was 'the' reason why he prayed so earnestly at this time. The prayer which he offered is an illustration of the truth that men will pray more earnestly when they have reason to suppose that God intends to impart a blessing, and that an assurance that an event is to occur is one of the strongest encouragements and incitements to prayer. So men will pray with more faith when they see that God is blessing the means of restoration to health, or when they see indications of an abundant harvest; so they will pray with the more fervour for God to bless his word when they see evidences of a revival of religion, or that the time has come when God is about to display his power in the conversion of sinners; and so undoubtedly they will pray with the more earnestness as the proofs shall be multiplied that God is about to fulfil all his ancient predictions in the conversion of the whole world to himself. A belief that God intends to do a thing is never any hindrance to real prayer; a belief that he is in fact about to do it does more than anything else can do to arouse the soul to call with earnestness on his name.

II. The prayer of Daniel, vers. 4-19. This prayer is remarkable for its simplicity, its fervour, its appropriateness, its earnestness. It is a frank confession that the Hebrew people, in whose name it was offered, had deserved all the calamities which had come upon them, accompanied with earnest intercession that God would now hear this prayer, and remove the judgments from the people, and accomplish his purpose of mercy towards the city and temple. The long captivity of nearly seventy years; the utter desolation of the city and temple during that time; the numberless privations and evils to which during that period they had been exposed, had demonstrated the greatness of the sins for which these calamities had come upon the nation, and Daniel now, in the name, and uttering the sentiments, of the captive people, confessed their guilt, and the justness of the Divine dealings with them. Never has there been an instance in which punishment has had more of its designed and appropriate effect than in prompting to the sentiments which are uttered in this prayer: and the prayer, therefore, is just the expression of what we 'should' feel when the hand of the Lord has been long and severely laid upon us on account of our sins. The burden of the prayer is confession; the object which he who offers it seeks is, that God would cause the severity of his judgments to cease, and the city and temple to be restored. The particular points in the prayer will be more appropriately elucidated in the exposition of this part of the chapter.

III. The answer to the prayer, vers. 20-27. The principal difficulty in the exposition of the chapter is in this portion; and indeed there is perhaps no part of the prophecies of the Old Testament that is, on some accounts, more difficult of exposition, as there is, in some respects, none more clear, and none more important. It is remarkable, among other things, as not being a direct answer to the prayer, and as seeming to have no bearing on the subject of the petition —that the city of Jerusalem might be rebuilt, and the temple restored; but it directs the mind onward to another and more important event the coming of the Messiah, and the final closing of sacrifice and oblation, and a more entire and enduring destruction of the temple and city, after it should have been rebuilt, than had yet occurred. To give this information, an angel —the same one whom Daniel had seen before— was sent forth from heaven, and came near to him and touched him, and said that he was commissioned to impart to him skill and understanding, vers. 20-23. "The speediness of his coming indicates a joyful messenger." The substance of that message is as follows: As a compensation for the seventy (70, LXX) years in which the people, the city, and the temple had been entirely prostrate, seventy weeks of years, seven times seventy ($70 \times 7 = 490$) years of a renewed existence would be secured to them by the Lord; and the end of this period, far from bringing the mercies of God to a close, would for the first time bestow them on the Theocracy in their complete and full measure." —Hengstenberg, Christology, ii. 293. The 'points' of information which the angel gives in regard to the future condition of the city are these:—

(a) That the whole period determined in respect to the holy city, to finish transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for the people, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy, was seventy weeks —evidently seventy prophetic weeks, that is, regarding each day as a year, four hundred and ninety (490) years, ver. 24. The time when this period would 'commence' —the 'terminus a quo'— is not indeed distinctly specified, but the fair interpretation is, from that time when the vision appeared to Daniel, the first year of Darius, ver. 1. The literal meaning of the phrase "seventy weeks," according to Prof. Stuart (Hints on the Interpretation of Prophecy, p. 82), is seventy sevens (70, 7s), that is, seventy sevens of years, or four hundred and ninety (490) years. "Daniel," says he, "had been meditating on the accomplishment of the seventy years of exile for the Jews, which Jeremiah had predicted. At the close of the fervent supplication for the people which he makes, in connexion with his meditation, Gabriel appears, and announces to him that 'seventy sevens' are appointed for his people,' as it respects the time then future, in which very serious and very important events are to take place. Daniel had been meditating on the close of the seventy years of Hebrew exile, and the angel now discloses to him a new period of seventy times seven (70×7), in which still more important events are to take place."

(b) This period of seventy sevens, or four hundred and ninety (490) years, is divided by the angel into smaller portions, each of them determining some important event in the future. He says, therefore (ver. 25), that from the going forth of the command to rebuild the temple, until the time when the.. should appear, the whole period might be divided into two portions —one of 'seven sevens', or forty-nine (49) years, and the other of 'threescore and two sevens' —sixty-two sevens, or four hundred and thirty-four (434) years, making together four hundred and eighty-three (483) years. This statement is accompanied with the assurance that the "street would be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times." . Of these periods of seven weeks, sixty-two weeks, and one week, the close of the first is distinguished by the completion of the rebuilding of the city; that of the second by the appearing of the Anointed One, or the Messiah, the Prince; that of the third by the finished confirmation of the covenant with the many for whom the saving blessings designated in ver. 24, as belonging to the end of the whole period, are designed. The last period of one week is again divided into two halves. While the confirmation of the covenant extends through it, from beginning to end, the cessation of the sacrifice and meat-offering, and the death of the Anointed One, on which this depends, take place in the middle of it.

(c) The Messiah would appear after the seven weeks (49 yrs) —reaching to the time of completing the rebuilding of the city —and the sixty-two weeks following that (that is, sixty-nine weeks ($69 \times 7 = 483$ yrs), altogether) would have been finished. Throughout half of the other week, after his appearing, he would labour to confirm the covenant with many, and then die a violent death, by which the sacrifices would be made to cease, while the confirmation of the covenant would continue even after his death.

(d) A people of a foreign prince would come and destroy the city and the sanctuary. The end of all would be a “flood”—an overflowing calamity, till the end of the desolations should be determined, vers. 26,27. This fearful desolation is all that the prophet sees in the end, except that there is an obscure intimation that there would be a termination of that. But the design of the vision evidently did not reach thus far. It was to show the series of events after the rebuilding of the city and temple up to the time when the Messiah would come; when the great atonement would be made for sin, and when the oblations and sacrifices of the temple would finally cease: cease in fact and naturally, for the one great sacrifice, superseding them all, would have been offered, and because the people of a foreign prince would come and sweep the temple and the altar away.

The design of the whole annunciation is, evidently, to produce consolation in the mind of the prophet. He was engaged in profound meditation on the present state, and the long-continued desolations of the city and temple. He gave his mind to the study of the prophecies to learn whether these desolations were not soon to end. He ascertained beyond a doubt that the period drew near. He devoted himself to earnest prayer that the desolation might no longer continue; that God, provoked by the sins of the nation, would no longer execute his fearful judgments, but would graciously interpose, and restore the city and temple. He confessed ingenuously and humbly the sins of his people; acknowledged that the judgments of God were just, but pleaded earnestly, in view of his former mercies to the same people, that he would now have compassion, and fulfil his promises that the city and temple should be restored. An answer is not given directly, and in the exact form in which it might have been hoped for, but an answer is given in which it is implied that these blessings so earnestly sought would be bestowed, and in which it is promised that there would be far greater blessings. It is assumed in the answer (ver. 25) that the city would be rebuilt, and then the mind is directed onward to the assurance that it would stand through seven times seventy (490) years —seven times as long as it had now been desolate, and that then that which had been the object of the desire of the people of God would be accomplished; that for which the city and temple had been built would be fulfilled —the Messiah, would come, the great sacrifice for sin would be made, and all the typical arrangements of a temple would come to an end. Thus, in fact, though not in form, the communication of the angel was an answer to prayer, and that occurred to Daniel which often occurs to those who pray —that the direct prayer which is offered receives a gracious answer, and that there accompanies the answer numberless other mercies which are drawn along in the train; or, in other words, that God gives us many more blessings than we ask of him. }}

{{ Chapter X. Analysis of Chapter 10: [B.C. 534]

This chapter introduces the last revelation made to Daniel, and is merely introductory to the disclosures made in the two following chapters. The whole extends to the time of the coming of the Messiah, embracing a detail of the principal historical events that would occur, and closes with some fearful allusions to the ultimate results of human conduct in the day of judgment, and to the great principles on which God governs the world. The contents of this introductory chapter are as follows: (a) The statement of the time when the revelation occurred, ver.1. This was in the third year of Cyrus king of Persia, subsequently, therefore, to the visions in the previous chapters, and after the order had been given by Cyrus for the restoration of the Jews, Ezra 1:1. (b) The particular period when this occurred was when Daniel was observing a fast that continued through three weeks, vers. 2,3. This was at the Passover, the first month in their ecclesiastical year, and the fast was observed by Daniel, evidently, on account of the sins and the calamities of his people. (c) The place where this occurred, ver. 4. He was by the side of the river Hiddekel, or Tigris. Why he was there he does not say. But it is to be remembered that he seems to have been employed on some occasions in other parts of the empire than Babylon; and one of his former visions occurred on the banks of a river that flowed into the Tigris—the river Ulai. See notes on ch. 8:2. Indeed, it would appear that the banks of rivers were not unfrequently the places to which the prophets resorted, or where they were favoured with their visions. They were retired places, and were on many accounts favourable for devotion. Comp. Ezek. 1:1; Acts 16:13. See also Rev. 22:1,2. (d) While there, engaged in his devotions, Daniel saw a man, who suddenly appeared to him, clothed in linen, and girded with a belt of gold. Those who were with him fled astonished and left him alone to contemplate the vision, and to receive the communication which this glorious stranger had to make to him. The effect of this vision on himself, however, was wholly to overcome him, to prostrate him to the earth, and to render him insensible, until the angel touched him, and raised him up, vers. 4-10. In all this there is nothing unnatural. The effect is such as would be produced in any case in similar circumstances, and it has a striking resemblance to what occurred to Saul of Tarsus on his way to Damascus (Acts 9:3,4; 22:7-9), and to John in the visions of Patmos, Rev. 1:10-17. (e) He who had thus appeared to Daniel proceeded to state to him the design for which he had come, vers. 11-14. The prayer of Daniel, he said, had been heard the first day in which he had given himself to these solemn acts of devotion. He had himself been commissioned at that time to come to Daniel, and to disclose the events which were to occur. During a period of twenty-one days, however, in which Daniel had been engaged in this season, of devotion, he had been withstood by “the prince of the kingdom of Persia,” and had been detained until Michael, one of the chief princes, had interposed to release him, and he had now come, at last, to make known to Daniel what would occur to his people in the latter days. The nature of this detention will, of course, be considered in the notes on ver. 13, (f), Daniel then (vers. 15-17) describes the effect which this vision had on him, rendering him unable to converse with him who had thus appeared to him. (g) The heavenly messenger then touched him, and b. him be of good courage and be strong (vers. 18, 19), and then said that he would return and fight with the prince of Persia, after having stated that which was “noted in the Scripture of truth,” vers. 20, 21. }}

{{ Chapter XI. Analysis of Chapter 11: [B.C. 534]

This chapter contains a portion of those things which the angel said were written in “the scripture of truth,” and which he came to disclose to Daniel. The revelation also embraces, the twelfth chapter, and the two comprise the last recorded communication that was made to Daniel. The revelation which is made in these chapters not only embraces a large portion of history of interest to the Jewish people of ancient times, and designed to give instruction as to the important events that would pertain to their nation, but also, in its progress, alludes to important periods in the future as marking decisive eras in the world's history, and contains hints as to what would occur down to the end of all things. The chapter before us embraces the following definitely marked periods:—

I. The succession of kings in Persia to the time of a mighty king who should arouse all the strength of his kingdom to make war on Greece —referring doubtless to Xerxes, vers. 1, 2. Of those kings in Persia there would be three —three so prominent as to deserve notice in the rapid glance at future events —Cambyzes, Smerdis, and Darius Hystaspis.

II. After this succession of kings, one would stand up or, appear who would be characterized as ruling “with great dominion,” and “according to his will,” ver, 3. The dominion evidently would pass into his hand, he would be distinguished from all that went before him. There can be no doubt, from the connexion, and from what is said in ver. 4, that the reference here is to Alexander the Great.

III. The state of the empire after the death of this mighty king, ver. 4. His kingdom would be broken, and would be divided into four parts —referring doubtless to the division of the empire of Alexander after his death.

IV. The history then proceeds to notice the events that would pertain to two of these portions of the empire —the conflicts between the king of the South, and the king of the North —or between Egypt and Syria, vers. 5-19. This portion of the history embraces, in detail, an account of the policy, the negotiations, and the wars of Antiochus the Great, till the time of his death. These kingdoms are particularly referred to, probably because their conflicts would affect the .. land, and pertain ultimately to the history of religion, and its establishment and triumph in the world. In the notice of these two sovereignties, there is considerable detail —so much so that the principal events could have been anticipated by those who were in possession of the writings of Daniel. The destiny of the other two portions of the empire of Alexander did not particularly affect the history of religion, or pertain to the holy land, and, therefore, they are not introduced. In a particular manner, the history of Antiochus, the Great is traced with great minuteness in this portion of the prophecy, because his doings had a special bearing on the Jewish nation, and were connected with the progress of religion. The commentary on this portion of the chapter will show that the leading events are traced 'as' accurately as would be a summary of the history made out 'after' the transactions had occurred.

V. A brief reference to the successor of Antiochus the Great, Seleucus IV. ver. 20. As he occupied the throne, however, but for a short period, and as his doings did not particularly affect the condition of the Hebrew people, or the interests of religion, and his reign was, in every respect, unimportant, it is passed over with only a slight notice.

VI. The life and acts of Antiochus Epiphanes, vers. 21–45. There can be no doubt that this portion of the chapter refers to Antiochus, and it contains a full detail of his character and of his doings. The account here, though without naming him, is just such as would have been given by one who should have written 'after' the events had occurred, and there is no more difficulty in applying the description in this chapter to him now than there would have been in such an historical narrative. The revelation is made, evidently, to prepare the Jewish people for these fearful events, and these heavy trials, in their history; and also to assure them that more glorious results would follow, and that deliverance would succeed these calamities. In the troubles which Antiochus would bring upon the Hebrew people, it was important that they should have before them a record containing the great outlines of what would occur, and the assurance of ultimate triumph —just as it is important for us now in the trials, which we have reason to anticipate in this life, to have before us in the Bible the permanent record that we shall yet find deliverance. In the twelfth chapter, therefore, the angel directs the mind onward to brighter times, and assures Daniel that there would be a day of rejoicing. }}

{{ Chapter XII. Analysis of Chapter 12: [B.C. 534]

There are several general remarks which may be made respecting this, the closing chapter of the book of Daniel.

I. It is a part, or a continuation of the general prophecy or vision which was commenced in ch. 10, and which embraces the whole of the eleventh chapter. Except for the 'length' of the prophecy there should have been no division whatever, and it should be read as a continuous whole; or if a division were desirable, that which was made by Cardinal Hugo in the 13th century, and which occurs in our translation of the Bible, is one of the most unhappy. On every account, and for every reason, the division should have been at the close of the fourth verse of this chapter, and the first four verses should have been attached to the previous portion. That the beginning of this chapter is a continuation of the address of the angel to Daniel is plain from a mere glance. The address ends at ver. 4; and then commences a colloquy between two angels who appear in the vision, designed to cast further light on what had been said. It will contribute to a right understanding of this chapter to remember that it is a part of the one vision or prophecy which was commenced in ch. 10, and that the whole three chapters (10, 11, 12) should be read together. If ch. 11, therefore, refers to the historical events connected with the reign of Antiochus, and the troubles under him, it would seem to be plain that this does also, and that the angel meant to designate the time when these troubles would close, and the indications by which it might be known that they were about to come to an end.

II. At the same time that this is true, it must also be admitted that the language which is used is such as is applicable to other events, and that it supposed that there was a belief in the doctrines to which that language would be naturally applied. It is not such language as would have been originally employed to describe the historical transactions respecting the persecutions under Antiochus, nor unless the doctrines which are obviously conveyed by that language were understood and believed. I refer here to the statements respecting the resurrection of the dead and of the future state. This language is found particularly in vers. 2, 3: “And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever.” This language is appropriate to express such doctrines as the following: (a) that of the resurrection of the dead —or a being raised up out of the dust of the earth; (b) that of retribution 'after' the resurrection: a part being raised to everlasting life, and a part to everlasting shame; (c) that of the eternity of future retribution, or the eternity of rewards and punishments: awaking to 'everlasting' life, and to 'everlasting shame'; (d) that of the high honours and rewards of those who would be engaged in doing good, or of that portion of mankind who would be instrumental in turning the wicked from the paths of sin: “they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever.” It is impossible to conceive that this language would have been used unless these doctrines were known and believed, and unless it be supposed that they were so familiar that it would be readily understood. Whatever may have been the particular thing to which it was applied by the angel, it is such language as could have been intelligible only where there was a belief of these doctrines, and it may, therefore, be set down as an indication of a prevalent belief in the time of Daniel on these subjects. Such would be understood now if the same language were used by us, to whatever we might apply it, for it would not be employed unless there was a belief of the truth of the doctrines which it is naturally adapted to convey.

III. If the angel intended, therefore, primarily to refer to events that would occur in the time of Antiochus —to the arousing of many to defend their country, as if called from the dust of the earth, or to their being summoned by Judas Maccabeus from caves and fastnesses, and to the honour to which many of them might be raised, and the shame and contempt which would await others, it seems difficult to doubt that the mind of the speaker, at the same time, glanced onward to higher doctrines, and that it was the intention of the angel to bring into view far distant events, of which these occurrences might be regarded as an emblem, and that he meant to advert to what would literally occur in the time of the Maccabees as a beautiful and striking illustration of more momentous and glorious scenes when the earth should give up its dead, and when the final judgment should occur. On these scenes, perhaps, the mind of the angel ultimately rested, and a prominent part of the design of the entire vision may have been to bring them into view, and to direct the thoughts of the pious onward far beyond the troubles and the triumphs in the days of the Maccabees, to the time when the dead should arise, and when the retributions of eternity should occur. It was no uncommon thing among the prophets to allow the eye to glance from one object to another lying in the same range of vision, or having such points of resemblance that the one would suggest the other; and it often happened that a description which commenced with some natural event terminated in some more important spiritual truth to which that event had a resemblance, and which it was adapted to suggest. Comp. Intro. to Isaiah, § 7; 3; (3) (4) (5). Three things occur often in such a case: (1), language is employed in speaking of what is to take place, which is derived from the secondary and remote event, and which naturally suggests that; (2) ideas are intermingled in the description which are appropriate to the secondary event only, and which should be understood as applicable to that; and (3) the description, which was 'commenced' with reference to one event or class of events, often passes over entirely and 'terminates' on the secondary and ultimate events. This point will be more particularly examined in the notes on the chapter.

IV. The contents of the chapter are as follows:—

(1.) The concluding statement of what would occur at the time referred to in the previous chapter, vers. 1-3. This statement, embraces, many particulars: that Michael, the guardian angel, would stand up in behalf of the people; that there would be great trouble, such as there had not been since the time when the nation began to exist; that there would be deliverance for all whose names were recorded in the book; that there would be an awakening of those who slept in the dust —some coming to life and honour, and some to shame and dishonour; and that distinguished glory would await those who turned many to righteousness.

(2.) At this stage of the matter, all having been disclosed that the angel purposed to reveal, Daniel is commanded to shut and seal the book; yet with the encouragement held out that more would yet be known on the subject, ver. 4. The matter was evidently involved still in mystery, and there were many points on which it could not but be desired that there should be fuller information —points relating to the time when these things would happen, and a more particular account of the full meaning of what had been predicted, etc. On these points it is clear that many questions might be asked, and it is probable that the mind of Daniel would be left still in perplexity in regard to them. To meet this state of mind, the angel says to Daniel that “many would run to and fro, and that knowledge would be increased;” that is, that by intercourse with one another in future times; by spreading abroad the knowledge already obtained; by diffusing information, and by careful inquiry, those of coming ages would obtain much clearer views on these points; or, in other words, that time, and the intercourse of individuals and nations, would clear up the obscurities of prophecy.

(3.) In this state of perplexity, Daniel looked and saw two other person ages standing on the two sides of the river, and between them and the angel who had conversed with Daniel a colloquy or conversation ensues respecting the time necessary to accomplish these things, vers. 5-7. They are introduced as interested in the inquiry as to the 'time' of the continuance of these things —that is, how long it would be to the end of these wonders. These were evidently angels also, and they are represented (a) as ignorant of the future —a circumstance which we must supposed to exist among the angels; and (b) as feeling a deep interest in the transactions which were to occur, and the period when it might be expected they would have their completion. To this natural inquiry, the angel who had conversed with

Daniel gives a solemn answer (ver. 7) that the period would be “a time, and times, and a half;” and that all these things would be accomplished when he to whom reference was made had finished his purpose of scattering the holy people.

(4.) Daniel, perplexed and overwhelmed with these strange predictions, hearing what was said about the time, but not understanding it, asks with intense interest when the end of these things should be, ver. 8. He had heard the reply of the angel, but it conveyed no idea to his mind. . He was deeply solicitous to look into the future, and to ascertain 'when' these events would end, and 'what' would be their termination. The answer to his anxious, earnest inquiry is contained in vers. 9-13, and embraces several points —giving some further information, but still evidently designed to leave the matter obscure in many respects. (a) The matter was sealed up, and his question could not be definitely answered, ver. 9. When the time of the end should come, it is implied the matter would be clearer, and might be understood, but that all had been communicated substantially that could be. (b) A statement is made (ver. 10) of the general result of the trials on two classes of persons: the things that would occur would tend to make the righteous more holy, but the wicked would continue to do wickedly, notwithstanding all these heavy judgments. The latter too would, when these events took place, fail to understand their design; but the former would obtain a just view of them, and would be made wiser by them. Time, to the one class, would disclose the meaning of the Divine dealings, and they would comprehend them; to the other they would still be dark and unintelligible. (c) A statement is, however, made as to the 'time' when these things would be accomplished, but still so obscure as to induce the angel himself to say to Daniel that he must go his way till the end should be, vers. 11-13. Two periods of time are mentioned, both different from the one in ver. 10. In one of them (ver. 11) it is said that from the time when the daily sacrifice should be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate should be set up, would be a thousand two hundred and ninety days (1290). In the other (ver. 12) it is said that he would be blessed or happy who should reach a certain period mentioned—a thousand three hundred and thirty-five (1335) days. What these different periods of time refer to will of course be the subject of inquiry in the notes on the chapter. (d) The whole closes, therefore (ver. 13), with a direction to Daniel that, or the present, he should go his way. Nothing additional would be disclosed. Time would reveal more; time would explain all. Meanwhile there is an assurance given that, as for himself, he would have “rest,” and would “stand in his lot at the end of the days.” This seems to be a gracious assurance to him that he had nothing to fear from these troubles personally, and that whatever should come, he would have peace, and would occupy the position in future times which was due to him. His lot would happy and peaceful; his name would be honoured; his salvation would be secured. It seems to be implied that, with this pledge, he ought to allow his mind to be calm, and not suffer himself to be distressed, because he could not penetrate the future, and foresee all that was to occur; and the truth, therefore, with which the book closes is, that, having security about our own personal salvation—or having no ground of solicitude respecting that—or having that matter made safe—we should calmly commit all events to God, with the firm conviction that in his own time his purposes will be accomplished, and that, being then understood, he will be seen to be worthy of confidence and praise.

In reference to the application of this prophecy, the following general remarks may be made:—

I. One class of interpreters explain it literally as applicable to Antiochus Epiphanes. Of this class is Prof. Stuart, who supposes that its reference to Antiochus can be shown in the following manner: “The place which this passage occupies shows that the ‘terminus a quo’, or period from which the days designated are to be reckoned, is the same as that to which reference is made in the previous verse. This, as we have already seen, is the period when Antiochus, by his military agent Apollonius, took possession of Jerusalem, and put a stop to the temple-worship there. The author of the first book of Maccabees, who is allowed by all to deserve credit as a historian, after describing the capture of Jerusalem by the agent of Antiochus (in the year 145 of the Seleucidae—168 B. c.), and setting before the reader the wide-spread devastation which ensued, adds, respecting the invaders: “They shed innocent blood around the sanctuary, and defiled the holy place; and the inhabitants of Jerusalem fled away: the sanctuary thereof was made desolate; her feasts were turned into mourning, her sabbaths into reproach, and her honour into disgrace;” 1st Macc. 1:37-39. To the period when this state of things commenced we must look, then, in order to find the date from which the 1355 days are to be reckoned. Supposing now that Apollonius captured Jerusalem in the latter part of May, B. c. 168, the 1355 days would expire about the middle of February, in the year B. c. 164. Did any event take place at this period which would naturally call forth the congratulations of the prophet, as addressed in the text before us to the Jewish people?

“History enables us to answer this question. Late in the year 165 B. C., or at least very early in the year 164 B. c., Antiochus Epiphanes, learning that there were great insurrections and disturbances in Armenia and Persia, hastened thither with a portion of his armies, while the other portion was commissioned against Palestine. He was victorious for a time; but being led by cupidity to seek for the treasures that were laid up in the temple of the Persian Diana at Elymais, he undertook to rifle them. The inhabitants of the place, however, rose ‘en masse’ and drove him out of the city; after which he fled to Ecbatana. There he heard of the total discomfiture by Judas Maccabeus of his troops in Palestine, which were led on by Nicanor and Timotheus. In the rage occasioned by this disappointment, he uttered the most horrid blasphemies against the God of the Jews, and threatened to make Jerusalem the burying-place of the nation. Immediately he directed his course toward Judea; and designing to pass through Babylon, he made all possible haste in his journey. In the meantime he had a fall from his chariot which injured him ; and soon after, being seized with a mortal sickness in his bowels (probably the cholera), he died at Tabae, in the mountainous country, near the confines of Babylonia and Persia. Report stated, even in ancient times, that Antiochus was greatly distressed on his death-bed by the sacrilege which he had committed.

“Thus perished the most bitter and bloody enemy which ever rose up against the Jewish nation and their worship. By following the series of events, it is easy to see that his death took place sometime in February of the year 164 B.C. Assuming that the commencement or 'terminus a quo' of the 1335 days is the same as that of the 1290 days, it is plain that they terminate at the period when the death of Antiochus is said to have taken place. “It was long before the commencement of the spring,” says Froelich, “that Antiochus passed the Euphrates, and made his attack on Elymais:” so that no more probable time can be fixed upon for his death than at the expiration of the 1335 days; i.e. sometime in February of 164 B. c. No wonder that the angel pronounced those of the pious and believing Jews to be 'blessed' who lived to see such a day of deliverance.”—Hints on Prophecy, pp. 95–97.

There are, however, serious, and obvious difficulties in regard to this view, and to the supposition that this is all that is intended here —objections and difficulties of so much force that most Christian interpreters have supposed that something further was intended. Among these difficulties and objections are the following:—

(a) The air of 'mystery' which is thrown over the whole matter by the angel, as if he were reluctant to make the communication; as if something more was meant than the words expressed; as if he shrank from disclosing all that he knew, or that might be said. If it referred to Antiochus alone, it is difficult to see why so much mystery was made of it, and why he was so unwilling to allude further to the subject —as if it were something that did not pertain to the matter in hand.

(b) The 'detached' and 'fragmentary' character of what is here said. It stands aside from the main communication. It is uttered after all that the angel had intended to reveal had been said. It is brought out at the earnest request of Daniel, and then only in 'hints', and in enigmatical language, and in such a manner that it would convey no distinct conception to his mind. This would seem to imply that it referred to something else than the main point that had been under consideration.

(c) The difference of 'time' specified here by the angel. This relates to two points:—

1. To what would occur 'after' the “closing of the daily sacrifice, and the setting up of the abomination of desolation.” The angel 'now' says that what he here refers to would extend to a period of twelve hundred and 'ninety' (1290) days. But in the accounts before given, the time specified had uniformly been “a time, and times, and half a time;” that is, three years and a half, or twelve hundred and 'sixty' (1260) days —differing from this by thirty days. Why should this thirty days have been added here if it referred to the time when the sanctuary would be cleansed, and the temple worship restored? Prof. Stuart (Hints on Prophecy, pp. 93, 94) supposes that it was in order that the 'exact' period might be mentioned. But this is liable to objections. For (a) the period of three and a half years was sufficiently exact; (b) there was no danger of mistake on the subject, and no such error had been made as to require correction; (c) this was not of sufficient importance to justify the manifest anxiety of the angel in the case, or to furnish any answer to the inquiries of Daniel, since so small an item of information would not relieve the mind of Daniel. The allusion, then, would 'seem' to be something else than what had been referred to by the “three and a half years.”

2. But there is a greater difficulty in regard to the other period —the 1335 days; for (a) that stands wholly 'detached' from what had been said. (b) The 'beginning' of that period —the 'terminus a quo'— is not specified. It is true that Prof. Stuart (Hints on Prophecy, p. 95) supposes that this must be the same as that mentioned in the previous verse, but this is not apparent in the communication. It is an isolated statement, and would 'seem' to refer to some momentous and important period in the future which would be characterized as a glorious or “blessed” period in the world's history, or of such a nature that he ought to regard himself as peculiarly happy who should be permitted to live then. Now it is true that with much probability this may be shown, as Prof. Stuart has done in the passage quoted above, to accord well with the time when Antiochus died, as that was an important event, and would be so regarded by those pious Jews who would be permitted to live to that time; but it is true also that the 'main' thing for rejoicing was the conquest of Judas Maccabeus and the cleansing of the sanctuary, and that the death of Antiochus does not seem to meet the fulness of what is said here. If that were all, it is not easily conceivable why the angel should have made so much a mystery of it, or why he should have been so reluctant to impart what he knew. The whole matter, therefore, appears to have a higher importance than the mere death of Antiochus and the delivery of the Jews from his persecutions.

II. Another class, and it may be said Christian interpreters generally, have supposed that there was here a reference to some higher and more important events in the far distant future. But it is scarcely needful to say, that the opinions entertained have been almost as numerous as the writers on the prophecies, and that the judgment of the world has not settled down on any one particular method of the application. It would not be profitable to state the opinions which have been advanced; still less to attempt to refute them —most of them being fanciful conjectures. These may be seen detailed in great variety in Poole's Synopsis. It is not commonly pretended that these opinions are based on any exact interpretation of the words, or on any certain mode of determining their correctness, and those who hold them admit that it must be reserved to future years —to their fulfilment— to understand the exact meaning of the prophecy. Thus Prideaux, who supposes that this passage refers to Antiochus, frankly says: “Many things may be said for the probable solving of this difficulty [the fact that the angel here refers to an additional thirty days above the three years and a half, which he says can neither be applied to Antiochus nor to Antichrist], but I shall offer none of them. Those that shall live to see the extirpation of Antichrist, which will be at the end of those years, will best be able to unfold these matters, it being of the nature of these prophecies not thoroughly to be understood till they are thoroughly fulfilled.” —Vol. iii. 283, 284. So Bp. Newton, who supposes that the setting up of the abomination of desolation here refers to the Mohammedans invading and devastating Christendom, and that the religion of Mohammed will prevail in the East for the space of 1260 years, and then a great revolution —“perhaps the restoration of the Jews, perhaps the destruction of Antichrist” —indicated by the 1290 years, will occur; and that this will be succeeded by another still more glorious event —perhaps “the conversion of the Gentiles, and the beginning of the millennium, or reign of the saints on the earth” —indicated by the 1335 years— says, notwithstanding, “What is the precise time of their beginning, and consequently of their ending, as well as what are the great and signal events which will take place at the end of each period, we can only conjecture; time alone can with certainty discover.” —Prophecies, p. 321. These expressions indicate the 'common' feeling of those who understand these statements as referring to future events; and the reasonings of those who have attempted to make a more specific application have been such as to demonstrate the wisdom of this modesty, and to make us wish that it had been imitated by all. At all events, such speculations on this subject have been so wild and unfounded; so at variance with all just rules of interpretation; so much the fruit of mere fancy, and so incapable of solid support by reasoning, as to admonish us that no more conjectures should be added to the number.

III. The sum of all that it seems to me can be said on the matter is this:—

(1.) That it is probable, for the reasons above stated, that the angel referred to 'other' events than the persecutions and the death of Antiochus, for if that was all, the additional information which he gave by the specification of the period of 1260 days, and 1290 days, and 1335 days, was quite too meagre to be worthy of a formal and solemn revelation from God. In other words, if this was all, there was no correspondence between the importance of the events and the solemn manner in which the terms of the communication were made. There was no such 'importance' in these three periods as to make these separate disclosures necessary. If this were all, the statements were such indeed as might be made by a 'weak man' attaching importance to trifles, but not such as would be made by an 'inspired angel' professing to communicate great and momentous truths.

(2.) Either by design, or because the language which he would employ to designate higher events happened to be such as would note those periods also, the angel employed terms which, in the main, would be applicable to what would occur under the persecutions of Antiochus, while, at the same time, his eye was on more important and momentous events in the far distant future. Thus the three years and a half would apply with sufficient accuracy to the time between the taking away of the daily sacrifice, and the destruction of the temple by Judas Maccabeus, and then, also, it so happens that the 'thirteen hundred and thirty-five' (1335) days would designate with sufficient accuracy the death of Antiochus, but there is nothing in the history to which the period of 'twelve hundred and ninety' (1290) days could with particular propriety be applied, and there is no reason in the history why reference should have been made to that.

(3.) The angel had his eye on three great and important epochs lying apparently far in the future, and constituting important periods in the history of the church and the world. These were, respectively, composed of 1260, 1290, and 1335 prophetic days, that is, years. Whether they had the same beginning or point of reckoning — 'termini a quo' — and whether they would, as far as they would respectively extend, cover the same space of time, he does not intimate with any certainty, and, of course, if this is the correct view it would be impossible now to determine, and the development is to be left to the times specified. One of them, the 1260 years, or the three years and a half, we can fix, we think, by applying it to the Papacy. See notes on ch. vii. 24-28. But in determining even this, it was necessary to wait until the time and course of events should disclose its meaning; and in reference to the other two periods, doubtless still future, it may be necessary now to wait until events, still to occur, shall disclose what was intended by the angel. The first has been made clear by history: there can be no doubt that the others in the same manner will be made equally clear. . That this is the true interpretation, and that this is the view which the angel desired to convey to the mind of Daniel, seems to be clear from such expressions as these occurring in the prophecy: "Seal the book 'to the time of the end'," ver. 4; "many shall run to and fro, 'and knowledge shall be increased'," ver. 4; "the words are closed up and sealed 'till the time of the end'," ver. 9; "many shall be made 'white'," ver. 10; "the wise 'shall understand'," ver. 10; "go thou thy way 'till the end be'," ver. 13. This language seems to imply that these things could not then be understood, but that when the events to which they refer should take place they would be plain to all.

(4.) Two of those events or periods—the 1290 days, and the 1335 days —seem to lie still in the future, and the full understanding of the prediction is to be reserved for developments yet to be made in the history of the world. Whether it be by the conversion of the Jews and the Gentiles, respectively, as Bishop Newton supposes, it would be vain to conjecture, and time must determine. That such 'periods' —marked and important periods —'are' to occur in the future, or in some era now commenced but not yet completed, I am constrained to believe; and that it will be possible, in time to come, to determine what they are, seems to me to be as undoubted. But where there is nothing certain to be the basis of calculation, it is idle to add other conjectures to those already made, and it is wiser to leave the matter, as much of the predictions respecting the future must of necessity be left to time and to events to make them clear.

Let me add, in the conclusion of the exposition of this remarkable book:—

(a) That the mind of Daniel is left at the close of all the Divine communications to him looking into the far distant future, ver. 13. His attention is directed onward. Fragments of great truths had been thrown out, with little apparent connexion, by the angel; hints of momentous import had been suggested respecting great doctrines to be made clearer in future ages. A time was to occur, perhaps in the far distant future, when the dead were to be raised; when all that slept in the dust of the earth should awake; when the righteous should shine as the brightness of the firmament; and when he himself should “stand in his lot” —sharing the joys of the blessed, and occupying the position which would be appropriate to him. With this cheering prospect the communications of the angel to him are closed. Nothing could be better fitted to comfort his heart in a land of exile; nothing better fitted to elevate his thoughts.

(b) In the same manner it is proper that 'we' should look 'onward'. All the revelations of God terminate in this manner; all are designed and adapted to direct the mind to far distant and most glorious scenes in the future. We have all that Daniel had; and we have what Daniel had not —the clear revelation of the gospel. In that gospel are stated in a still more clear manner those glorious truths respecting the future which are fitted to cheer us in time of trouble, to elevate our minds amidst the low scenes of earth, and to comfort and sustain us on the bed of death. With much more distinctness than Daniel saw them, we are permitted to contemplate the truths respecting the resurrection of the dead, the scenes of the final judgment, and the future happiness of the righteous. We have now knowledge of the resurrection of the Redeemer, and, through him, the assurance that all his people will be raised up to honour and glory; and though, in reference to the resurrection of the dead, and the future glory of the righteous, there is much that is still obscure, yet there is all that is necessary to inspire us with hope, and to stimulate us to endeavour to obtain the crown of life.

(c) It is not improper, therefore, to close the exposition of this book with the expression of a wish that what was promised to Daniel may occur to us who read his words —that “we may stand in our lot at the end of days;” that when all the scenes of earth shall have passed away in regard to us, and the end of the world itself shall have come, it may be our happy portion to occupy a place among the redeemed, and to stand accepted before God. To ourselves, if we are truly righteous through our Redeemer, we may apply the promise made to Daniel; and for his readers the author can express no higher wish than that this lot may be theirs. If the exposition of this book shall be so blessed as to confirm any in the belief of the great truths of revelation, and lead their minds to a more confirmed hope in regard to these future glorious scenes; if by dwelling on the firm piety, the consummate wisdom, and the steady confidence in God evinced by this remarkable man, their souls shall be more established in the pursuit of the same piety, wisdom, and confidence in God; and if it shall lead the minds of any to contemplate with a more steady and enlightened faith the scenes which are yet to occur on our earth, when the saints shall reign, or in heaven, when all the children of God shall be gathered there from all lands, the great object of these studies will have been accomplished, and the labour which has been bestowed upon it will not have been in vain. To these high and holy purposes I now consecrate these reflections on the book of Daniel, with an earnest prayer that He from whom all blessings come may be pleased so to accept this exposition of one of the portions of his revealed truth as to make it the means of promoting the interests of truth and piety in the world; with a grateful sense of his goodness in allowing me to complete it, and with thankfulness that I have been permitted for so many hours, in the preparation of this work, to contemplate the lofty integrity, the profound wisdom, the stern and unyielding virtue, and the humble piety of this distinguished saint and eminent statesman of ancient times. He is under a good influence, and he is likely to have his own piety quickened, and his own purposes of unflinching integrity and faithfulness, and of humble devotion to God strengthened, who studies the writings and the character of the prophet Daniel. }}

The Prophecies of Daniel & the Revelation of St. John: Viewed in their Mutual Relations, with an Exposition of the Principal Passages Carl (Karl) August Auberlen (Dr. Phil., Licentiate & Prof. Extraord. of Theol. in Basil; Germ. Lutheran Theolog.); with an Appendix, by M. Fr. Roos; Translated from Germ. (1851 ed.) by Adolph Saphir. Edinburgh. T&T Clark. 1856.

{{ Preface: I Venture to put these pages before the Christian and theological public, as a contribution towards the understanding of biblical prophecy. The substance of this book was completed in the year 1852, but it has been revised and re-written since, previous to its present publication.

The Old Testament enjoys the testimony of more immediate Divine authority than the New, since our Lord Jesus and the apostles mention and quote it continually, and with reverence, as the word of the living God. But the manner in which the Old Testament is treated among us, clearly shows that, in its whole mode of conception and representation—in its whole view of God and the world—it differs as widely from views current among us, as a majestic primeval forest contrasts with the busy thoroughfares of our metropolitan cities. Rationalistic criticism directed its first attacks against the Old Testament, and seems to maintain here its ground longest, for, while we may regard it as almost entirely conquered in the field of dogmatic and New Testament exegesis, we see yet a considerable number of distinguished theologians influenced in their views of the Old Covenant, more or less, by the principles of that adverse criticism. Now, is there any book in the Old Testament, where this is so much the case, as that of Daniel, which shares, in this respect, the fate of the Revelations of St John, that book of the New Covenant, which combines, in a peculiar manner, the characteristics of the Old and New Testaments. The unguineness of Daniel has become an axiom in modern theology, so that it is thought quite superfluous to adduce any proof for that assertion; and the most recent commentator says, accordingly, in a very short and explicit manner, “no sensible man” can entertain any doubt on the subject. It is necessary, from the nature of our investigation, that we should start from the statements of Daniel, and this, moreover, with special reference to the question raised by modern criticism. And this for the twofold reason, that this question is still occupying a prominent place in our present theology, and that the importance and value which are to be attributed to the apocalyptic prophecy of the Old, and, consequently, to that of the New Testament, depend on the answer given to that question.....

In the present state of things it fills us with the greater joy to see what good beginnings are made on the other side, in the investigation of the biblical books, taking them simply as they offer themselves, and proceeding thus to the exposition of details, endeavouring thereby to seize the plan and connection of ideas in the book, and, finally, searching after the position and significance which are to be attributed to the book in relation to the whole organism of Holy Scripture. This is, moreover, the only right method of refuting false criticism.

Our thirst for knowledge will not be satisfied by a refutation of individual objections; but if we are able to gain a deeper, a more living, organic and historical insight, not merely into individual passages, but into whole books, and thus by degrees into the whole of Holy Scripture, an insight unattainable by that criticism which is incapable (pneumatikös anakrinein and pneumatikōis pneumatika sungkrinein) (1st Cor. 2:13,14), then it; will become evident to us, that the results of that criticism touch only the surface and the externals of the subject, and then light will conquer darkness. And, at the same time, the real gain which unbiblical criticism has brought, by suggesting many questions, by showing the great importance of the historical method, by many a salutary exhortation to a more thorough going investigation of the text, finally, also, by many acute observations and correct hints, will only, in this manner accrue, to the Church and theological science.

Let me here acknowledge my obligations to Bengel’s school of theology. This school, more than any other, studied to view the Bible as a whole, and naturally turned to the prophetic parts of Scripture as to the most neglected portions of the Divine Word. Though many individual parts in their apocalyptic systems have not stood the test of time, and though, in many points, we must differ from their views, yet we acknowledge freely, that it was chiefly the gift and task allotted to the Bengel school, to open again to the Church the understanding of prophecy. To speak for myself, I have not met anywhere with more profound and correct views. The reader will find, in the following pages, quotations, not indeed from 'Öetinger', but from 'Bengel' himself, 'Roos', the two 'Hahn'. Also the venerable Zurich theologian, 'J. T. Hess', though he stood more under the influence of the age he lived in than the men of God named above, wrote a history of the kingdom of God, which is perhaps a little too prosaic, but accurate and intelligent, and deserves our attention. But I was filled with astonishment at the grandeur of thoughts which I saw in 'Roos' book on Daniel, especially concerning the history of revelation. Besides the quotations introduced in this volume, 'passim', we have given a larger specimen of his work in the Appendix. These men must be regarded as true models, unequalled by modern theologians, not with regard to the external scholastic form and scientific system (and yet they have a deeper insight into the organism of divine truth, than is to be found in many of the most elaborately perfected systems), but in the simple, clear, docile position, which they occupy, to the teaching of Holy Scripture, in the delicacy and persevering diligence with which they search its mysteries; in the holy discipline of truly scientific thought, and the spiritual and devout tone of their theology. Hence the depth and fulness of their knowledge, the solidity and abundance of sound theological fundamental ideas, their clear insight into God's ways, and the plan of His kingdom. In reading the works of these men, we feel as if we had entered a temple.

Among modern theologians, I look upon Dr 'J. T. Beck', in Tübingen, as most closely allied to Bengel's school; and to him, more than to any other modern divine, I feel indebted, as regards the fundamental views of the present work. It is well known, that the Reformers had only a partial insight into the Apocalypse and prophecy in general; the task and gift allotted to them concerned another portion of Scripture truth. However, I consulted, to my edification and advantage, the commentaries of 'Luther' and 'Calvin' on Daniel. For, notwithstanding many difficult and obscure passages, the prophecies of this book are clear and distinct as to their essential meaning, so much so, that with all the defects of the older prophetic theology, there is scarcely a book of Holy Scripture, concerning the general import of which the Church of all ages has been so unanimous as this, until the last century affected also this book with its innovations.....}}

Table of Contents:

Preface & Introduction:

- I. Peculiar Character of Daniel.
- II. Testimony of Holy Scripture.
- III. Testimony of the Church.
- IV. Present Aspect of the Question.
- V. Present Task.

First Section: Characteristics of the Book of Daniel.

Chapter I.—History of Revelation, or, Starting Point.

- 1. Significance of the Babylonian Captivity.
- I. Position of Daniel:
 - 1. Position of the Prophet at the Babylonian Court.
 - 2. Position of the Book in the Hebrew Canon.

Chapter II.—Contents of the Book.

- 1. Introduction & Division of the Book.
- II. First Part: Kingdom of God & Kingdom World in General.
 - 1. Second Chapter. Four Monarchies & Messianic Kingdom.
 - 2. Seventh Chapter, continuation.

3. Remarkable Events in Daniel's Life.

III. Second Part: Kingdom of God & Kingdom of World: Their More Immediate Near Future.

1. Eighth Chapter. Antiochus Epiphanes.

2. Chapters X-XII, continuation.

3. Ninth Chapter. Immediate Future of the Messiah.

Chapter III.—Apocalyptic Form of Prophecy:

I. Object of Apocalyptic Prophecy.

1. In General.

2. Apocalypses of the Old & New Testament Contrasted.

II. Nature of Apocalyptic Prophecy.

1. Subjective Form, the Dream, the Vision.

2. Objective Form, Symbolism.

Second Section: Seventy Weeks.—Daniel IX.

Chapter I.—Messianic View Taken by the Church—

1. Prophecy in its Context & Contents.

II. Chronological Boundaries.

1. Terminus a quo of the Seventy Weeks-Ezra & Nehemiah.

2. Analysis of the Seventy Weeks.

Chapter II.—Modern Interpretations.

1. Views of Ewald, Hofmann, Wieseler, & Hitzig.

II. Criticism of These Views.

1. Chronological Calculations.

II. Exposition of the Details.

III. Character of the Whole Chapter.

a. Fundamental & Distinctive Characteristics of Prophecies Referring to Antiochus.

b. Resemblance to the Prophecies Referring to Antiochus.

Third Section: Beasts & Man.

Chapter I. Four Beasts & the Son of Man in Daniel.

a. Present State of the Question.

II. Criticism of Modern View.

1. General Comparison of the Visions of the First & Second Parts.

2. Seventh & Eighth Chapters Compared, Second & Third Monarchies.

3. Fourth Monarchy, the Ten Horns.

4. Positive. Biblical Prophetic View of History.

i. Four Kingdoms of the World.

ii. Fourth Kingdom of the World, & its Relation to the Messianic Kingdom.

[Third Section: Chapter II. Beasts & Woman in Revelation of St John.etc.]

Appendix by M. Fr. Roos.

Index of Am'nons & Subjects.

Index of Passages in Daniel Explained.

Appendix by Magnus Friedrich Roos:

Sec. 1. The times of the world may be divided according to different leading ideas, either into the times before and after the birth of Christ, or into the times before and after the flood, or into the times before the giving of the law, the times of the law and the times of the New Testament, or in other ways still; but if we view the kingdom of God in connection with domestic and political institutions, it may be regarded as a good division, and useful in many ways, to divide the 'times of the world into four periods', of which the first extends from Adam to the exodus of the children of Israel out of Egypt; the second, from the exodus to the beginning of the Babylonian captivity; the third, from the exile to the beginning of the blessed thousand (1000) years (Rev. 20); and the fourth, which embraces the thousand (1000) years, and lasts to the end of the world.

See. 2 and 3. For the first period of the world-times, God ruled at first all men, and subsequently the better portion of humanity, viz., the families of the patriarchs, and He ruled through the 'fathers of families'; for before Nimrod kingdoms were not known, and after him for a long period, world-kingdoms were rare on earth. Job, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, had no king or ruler over them, but were free people. Also in Egypt the children of Israel dwelt at first as strangers or guests (Ps. 105:23; Acts 7:29; Gen. 15:13), and not so much as subjects; and for this reason, the tyranny which the kings of Egypt exercised over them, and the force wherewith they wished to hinder them from the exodus, were most unjust. Thus, up to the exodus, the government of the fathers of families was the chief rule established among men, although, sooner or later, there were established kingdoms among the heathens, which differed in magnitude and duration, and of which the tower of Babel was the first cause.

Sec. 4. The second period of the world-times was the period of 'the free and Old Testament Theocracy', or the free royal rule of God over His people Israel, according to the law of the Old Testament. God united at that time the children of Israel, who had become very numerous, that they should form one nation, and be His people and a priestly kingdom. He no longer left every father of a family to have the highest authority and governing power, but He gave laws and statutes for all the children of Israel, which Moses, the elders, the priests, the judges, and the kings, were to enact and to administer, without adding anything unto them or taking anything from them. But He himself wished to be Israel's king. Thus, there was established a visible kingdom of God upon earth, which, with its holy laws and statutes, was to be a bright light unto the whole world, and was to allure all men to faith in Jehovah, "who is the God of the whole world."

Sec. 5. And the reason why I call this the time of the Old Testament Theocracy, is, because we hope yet for a New Testament Theocracy (see Sec. 7). Moreover, I call it free Theocracy, because the people of Israel was not to acknowledge the rule of another nation or king as legitimate. Although there were occasionally, during the period of the Judges, times of bondage, and hence times when Israel was subject to other nations, yet such times of servitude were of brief duration, compared with the times of liberty. They were an exception to the rule, which does not annul, but only limit the rule. The foreign kings who subdued Israel, were looked upon as robbers, who were allowed by Divine permission to oppress the people for a while, but they were not regarded as legitimate rulers of Israel; and, therefore, whenever Israel repented, God called up judges, who drove away or put to death these robbers. In the times of the kings of Israel, no strange nation subdued the whole Jewish people, till the time of the Babylonian monarchy, or the fourth year of Jehoiakim. From that time the Theocracy did not, it is true, cease altogether, inasmuch as the Jews, after the return from Babylon, observed the Jewish law as far as possible, under the direction of their elders and priests, yet they remained subject to the Persians, Greeks, and Romans; and no repentance, no zeal in God's service, no believing the words of the prophets, or even of Christ, brought them deliverance from this bondage, till at last the Theocracy was entirely suspended by the destruction of Jerusalem through the Romans.

Sec. 6. The free Theocracy ceased in the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, and the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah; for at that time the Jewish people came, according to God's holy will, under the supremacy of the Babylonians. In this year, which was the 3338 year of the world, commenced the seventy years of the Babylonian exile, as the blessed Doctor Bengel has demonstrated in his "Ordo Temporum." The three last kings of the Jews, Jehoiakim, Jechoniah, and Zedekiah, with the Jewish nation, were subjugated by the Babylonians; and when they made an attempt to revolt, it did not succeed, as before, in the days of King Hezekiah (2nd Kings 18:7); but because it was God's will that they should serve the Babylonians (comp. Jer. 27:9-11), their resistance brought only bitter consequences, and they did not succeed, as must happen to all who do not submit to the ways of God, and are not willing to take heed to the signs of the times. From that time the Jewish people has remained subject to the Gentiles and dispersion. After the Babylonian captivity, which the seventy years of the Babylonian servitude rendered a very hard time, a portion of the Jewish people returned again to their country; yet the whole people was not gathered together, and the efforts and undertakings of the Maccabees to deliver Israel from the Greek dominion, was only a "little help" (Dan. 11:34), and to be regarded as an exception to the rule. Thus the third period of the world-times is the period of the servitude and dispersion of the holy people.

See. 7. In the fourth period of the world-times, the people of Israel shall be again converted, gathered, freed from all foreign supremacy, be visited by God in mercy, with many spiritual and temporal gifts, and be established as a 'New Testament Theocracy', which is the greatest glory upon earth.

Sec. 8. During the rule of the fathers of families, the 'Redeemer' was promised by God, under the name of the Seed. For this was adapted to the times. Because to men, who are not living under civil institutions, nothing is more important than their seed. Father of a tribe and seed were then the two most important names upon earth. For this reason God said, to the joy of man, that Eve would have a seed who was to bruise the head of the serpent, that Abraham would have a seed in whom all families of the earth would be blessed. Yet Enoch, at a time when the wickedness of earth was exceeding great, prophesied of the coming of the Lord as a Judge (Jude 14,15); and Jacob, when prophesying about the future possession of the land of Canaan by his descendants, called in this prospect, the Redeemer a Shiloh, or Prince of Peace, unto whom shall be the gathering of the nations. But when Moses the prophet was the leader and captain of the Jews, he prophesied of the Messiah as a prophet (Deut. 18:18); and when the Davidic kingdom was flourishing, Christ was promised, in the Second Psalm, and in many other passages, as a King, although there was at that time also the prophecy of His eternal priesthood (Ps. 110:4), because the Levitical priesthood was then best regulated. The following prophets, who lived during the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel, explained these prophecies more fully, and in this manner, that they praise and magnify the future Saviour as a king, almost throughout all their writings. The last prophets, Ezekiel, Daniel, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, who had lived to see the end of the Jewish kingdom, called the Redeemer 9. Shepherd, an Anointed One, Angel, Zemach. They did not keep silence as to His kingship, but did not speak of it so frequently; moreover, they distinguished the times during which the kingdom was to come gradually, more distinctly, than the former prophets did, so that their prophecies are very necessary to teach us how to understand the older ones. At last the long expected Saviour came into the world, He who is the beginning and the end of all world-times, the salvation of the world, and the Restorer of fallen humanity, and accomplished the work of redemption. This appearing of life among the dead, of light among the blind, of the Saviour among sinners, makes the third period of the world-times, though bearing its name from the servitude and dispersion of God's people Israel, a time of merciful visitation to all who know the things which belong to their peace. But it is in the fourth period of the world-times, that the Saviour will be revealed in glory among Israel, and thereby also among all nations. The fulness, or the whole multitude of the Gentiles, will then enter into the kingdom of God, and all Israel be saved (Rom. 11:25). Then Israel will arise and shine, for His light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon him. But the Gentiles shall come to his light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising (Is. 60:1-3).

Sec. 9. Under the rule of the fathers of families, there were few institutions to check, by force, the progress of wickedness, or to inflict punishment on evil doers. For although it is clear, from Gen. 30:24, that Judah wished to punish his daughter-in-law, Tamar, with death, on account of fornication, and this in virtue of his being father of the family; yet it is not probable, that such capital punishment, or other severe measures, were employed frequently at that period, of which there is at least no mention made in Holy Scripture. In the kingdoms of the heathens, which had sprung up, there were indeed civil punishments, as appears in the course of Joseph's history ; men likewise now began to carry on wars, but of short duration; in general men lived in great liberty. Extraordinary punishments from on High were, therefore, peculiarly necessary under this constitution of things. when the sword of government and of war was either not used at all, or very sparingly. And thus the first world was punished by the deluge, Sodom and Gomorrah with fire, the house of Pharaoh and Abimelech with plagues (Gen. 12:7), Egypt and Pharaoh before and after the exodus of the children of Israel, with very great plagues, and even death; and as the Theocracy was not yet firmly established in the wilderness, and the powers appointed by God could not yet properly wield the sword, God again and again sent extraordinary punishments. But under the free Theocracy, and during the time of the servitude of the holy people, the judgments of God have mostly assumed a different shape. The sword, which government bears, and is to unsheathe and use righteously, tyrants, who plague a sinful nation, and foreign, enemies, who invade a country, are now the ways in which, beside the ordinary plagues of famine and epidemics, God manifests His punishing justice to whole nations, and by which He accomplishes, what, by His command, the miraculous fire had to accomplish in the case of Sodom, the water in the case of Pharaoh and his hosts, and the earth in the case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. During the free Theocracy of the Old Testament, the divine law, the Urim and Thummim, the word of the prophets sent by God, explained, threatened, or commanded to execute the judgments and punishments of God, but since the dispersion of the people of God, as it is now ruled by many rulers, and according to different heathen laws, or by the arbitrariness of mighty men, whom God uses as His instruments, the retributive justice of God, though it is immutable in its essence, reveals itself in a more concealed way. A cruel man falls into the hands of another, who is also cruel ; an unjust man is punished by the injustice of his fellow; pride oppresses pride, avarice impoverishes avarice, wherever it sees a possibility. The world is for the most part careless about the Word of God, and yet fulfils the same without either knowing or wishing it, as regards the threatenings it contains. But thanks to our Lord, He preserves still good laws and statutes in all countries, by which much wickedness, especially among the common people, is justly punished. We have hints concerning the judgments which are to take place during the last thousand years of the world in Isa. 60:12; 65:20; Zech. 14:17; Ezek. 38:19-23; Rev. 20:7. But of this time it is said (Isa. 60:18), "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction in thy borders: but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise." And Isa. ii. 4, " They shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war anymore." And Isa. liv. 14, " In righteousness shalt thou be established: thou shalt be far from oppression; for thou shalt not fear: and from terror; for it shall not come near thee."

Sec. 10. In the same manner, as the judgments of God, by which evil is punished and checked, are executed in different ways in the different times and periods of the world, so, likewise, are the ways different by which God leads His children. We must first consider the 'Revelations of God' in their different modes and gradations. During the government of the fathers of families, time of the Theocracy. In the whole book of Genesis we do not read anything about love to God, although the hearts of the patriarchs were not strangers to that love. But because there was, at that time, no written law of God by which men might see the zeal and hatred of God against sin, and because there was no ruler upon earth to punish and avenge sin as the representative of God, it is mentioned to the praise and honour of the patriarchs, that they feared God. Thus the angel said to Abraham, when he was about to sacrifice his son Isaac, Now, I know that thou fearest God, Gen. 31:54; comp. ver. 42, and Gen. 22:12; 42:18. But after God had revealed himself on Mount Sinai as a jealous and terrible God, and filled men with great fear and awe, the commandment to love God was added expressly, lest men should go too far in their fear, and merely have a slavish terror of God; in the same way, afterwards, in the New Testament, when faith came, as St Paul says, Gal. 3:23, when the promised and expected salvation appeared in Christ Jesus, this faith, dwelling in the heart, is more tried, exercised, and brought forward. During the period of the fathers of families, God appeared by visiting them, thus adapting Himself to the institutions of that period. He came as a guest, accompanied by two angels, to Abraham; He gave names to Abraham, to Sara, and to Isaac, just as fathers usually give names to their children. He speaks to them about their seed. He appears to Jacob at the head of a ladder, which reached from earth to heaven as a staircase, and upon which the angels of God came down and went up, as is done in a house. He appeared, finally, to this same Jacob as a man, wrestled with him, and gave him the name Israel. From all which, may be seen, the friendliness and great condescension of God at that time, and it is therefore the more beautiful that the patriarchs feared God in their heart, and did not abuse His great mercy. But when God intended to establish a new institution among men, and to prepare them more especially for the knowledge of his Son, as their Redeemer, He revealed himself upon Sinai, without image or similitude, amid thunders and lightnings, as a holy and terrible God. Then it was manifest that the sinner is not only dust and ashes, as Abraham said, but is at a great distance from God, because he is a sinner; and that it was no light and easy matter to open and grant, to such a one, access to the holy God. For this purpose, the manifold institutions of the Levitical service were given to serve as types of Christ, that the people may be taught by them the holiness of God, the sinfulness and manifoldness of sin, and the necessity and nature of an atonement, and be thus led to understand Christ, and the redemption through His blood. But because God chose the people of Israel to be likewise a kingdom, He established, also, kingly institutions, gave kingly statutes and commandments, ordered the ark of the covenant, with the mercy-seat and cherubims, to be erected as a throne, and chose the city of Jerusalem as His residence. He is called king for the first time, Exod. 15:18, and when the people of Israel had to fight often afterwards, and became a warlike nation, He is called the Lord Sabaoth, the Lord of Hosts, which name occurs for the first time 1 Sam. 17:45. The Lord spoke very frequently of His kingdom by the mouth of His servant David. In the year of the death of King Uzziah, Isaiah saw the Lord as the immortal king of his orphaned nations, sitting on a high and lofty throne above the temple in Jerusalem. And when the time had come that this temple was to be destroyed, and the Jewish people sent into captivity, Ezekiel saw the Lord sitting on a throne above the cherubim, and departing from the temple, Ezek. 1:26; 10:19; 11:22,23. All these visions, and others, were adapted to the times in which they were vouchsafed, and very different from the appearances which the patriarchs, as fathers of families, saw. The royal throne was always connected with the temple, as is the case in the Apocalypse, Rev. 7:15, because Christ is to be a king on his throne and a priest (Zech. 6:13), and because the people, whose king the Lord is, cannot approach Him except by a priestly mediation. Every new manifestation and revelation of God, as also every declaration of a new name of God, was preceded by a time of great distress, because it was given, not to satisfy curiosity, but to comfort languishing and humble souls, and to teach them faith, patience, and hope. When afterwards the free Theocracy of God among men was suspended, and the people of God were given into the power of Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans, God did not cease to bear the name of king (comp. Zech. 9:9), even as our Saviour, in His deepest humiliation, confessed a good confession of His kingdom before Pharaoh, nor did the name of Lord Sabaoth disappear, but rather occurs the more frequently in the books of the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, who, doubtless, wished to counteract thereby the terror of the Jews, who, as a poor and despised nation, feared the power of the heathens, and to show them that the God in whom they believed, had hosts enough to protect them, although they themselves possessed no earthly power wherewith to resist and repel the enemy. Moreover, soon after this, the Son of God revealed himself among men, by taking upon himself our nature; He walked before their eyes, worked, taught, and performed miracles among them, ate and drank with them, went to the temple as the Angel of the Covenant, taught in it, and purified it, and finally finished His course before the eyes of men in His suffering and death, burial, resurrection, and ascension. This condescension of the Son of God to the children of men surpassed all the manifestations which had been given to the patriarchs. They also were visited by the Son of God in human shape, but only for a short while; they received comforting promises; but the work of redemption was not then accomplished, nor was the human form then assumed by the Lord, that human nature which He united to His divinity, and in which He was exalted to heaven, but only a figure and shadow of the same. But when, in the fulness of time, the Son of God became flesh, He dwelt among us thirty-three years, united humanity to His divinity inseparably, and accomplished the greatest of all works, the redemption. And as He said many things on earth, both in parables and without parable, concerning the kingdom of God, so John saw the throne of God (Rev. 4), and the Father, and the Lamb, and the Holy Ghost, and heard, at the same time, many things about the future reign of God. Thus the third period, though more abounding in affliction than any other, contains whatever was good in the two preceding ones. The merciful condescension of God towards the patriarchs, and the priestly, royal institution given to the people of Israel; in short, everything that had been revealed before, in a fragmentary manner, was summed up in the person of Christ; but, at the same time, everything became more heavenly, invisible, spiritual, so that a greater amount of faith is now required to take hold of it. The more the love of God reveals itself, the more it conceals itself from the eyes of reason. The outward glory and splendour which the types of Christ possessed, as, for instance, Melchisedec, Aaron, David, was not to be seen by human eyes in the person of Christ himself. His incomparable excellence, beauty, and majesty were invisible, and His outward appearance such as could not please the taste of this world, Isa. 53. The cross of Jesus, the preaching of the apostles, was, in the judgment of natural reason, more foolish than the preaching of Moses and Abraham, and yet it accomplished more than Moses' and Aaron's preaching. Because it was Christ's will to appear upon earth in the humble form of a servant, He chose the third part of the world-times, which is the darkest of all as regards His people, and it is according to the spirit of this period that His apostles and disciples are held up, to this day, to be a folly and a curse, and that His kingdom exists and grows under the enmity and oppression of the world, in a hidden and wonderful manner. But, notwithstanding, the faithful people of God, also such as are descended from Gentiles have, in Christ, the fulness of mercy and truth. They are no longer strangers and aliens in the kingdom of God, but fellow-citizens of the holy Israelites, who, in times of old, during the Theocracy, had obtained grace to be citizens in the kingdom of God, and they are now of the household of God, as the patriarchs were, who walked before God in childlike humility and trust. But in the last thousand (1000) years of the world, this knowledge and enjoyment will be much greater, and more universal. Israel or Zion will then be the chief church of the earth; the glory of the Lord will be seen specially upon them; but the Gentiles, also, will walk in their light, and kings in their brightness. The priesthood of Christ will then be explained much more deeply and fully, both by the types and the writings of the New Testament, in that temple of which Ezekiel speaks. The Spirit of God will then bestow great gifts, and produce mighty effects. Then the Song of Solomon, which is now the most obscure book in Holy Scripture, will be clearly understood, and correspond more than any other with the experience of the Church, for the marriage-feast of the Lamb will be celebrated in heaven (according to Rev. 19), and on earth it will be a Solomonic period, peaceful, quiet, glorious, nuptial, not in a carnal sense, but in a spiritual, even as the Scripture of all the prophets testifies. Israel will then be again a Theocracy; it will be ruled, not according to worldly, but according to divine statutes; not by strangers, but by Israelites; however, there will be then no king, but a prince, and thus the blessed Sabbath period of the Judges will return, not in the glory of the Old, but of the New Testament (Ezek. 45, etc; Isa. 1:26). Such will be the kingdom of the Lord, Obad. 21; Rev. 11:15.

Sec. 11. God leads His people by the statutes which He gives to His believers, or by the rules according to which their conduct to others is to be ordered. The command of love is, and always must be, the holy law for all times, to which all men must conform, because it flows from the nature of God, who is love; but the outward manifestations of this love are different in different periods of the world. During the government of the fathers of families, the holy patriarchs had to suffer and overlook much evil, and could not check it, because they had not power for so doing, and the authorities, who possess such power, were not as yet instituted by God. Melchisedec was king of Salem, and at the same time a priest; but Abraham, and the patriarchs before him and after him, were not invested with such an office, and hence they could exercise the duties of love, and follow their zeal against evil, only in as far as their position of fathers permitted. If they were treated unjustly, their best course was to suffer and to yield, to escape and to flee, because there was no ruler to protect them, and they were not rulers themselves. (Gen. 26:22; 1st Cor. 6:7). Abraham's expedition against the kings of the East was something extraordinary; and Abraham did not make any conquest or take any booty for himself; but God rescued Lot, and other prisoners, and their possessions, through Abraham, from the hands of their enemies, that all heathens might see that the faith of one man is stronger than the united might of many ungodly nations. After the establishment of the Theocracy, the elders, the judges, the kings, and, in extraordinary cases, even the prophets were invested with power to inflict capital punishment according to the divine law, and this not only for crimes referring to civil life, but also for such as refer to religion. For as God had established a visible kingdom on earth, why should He not inflict visible punishment of death on all who sin against Him their King, out of malice and wickedness? for no Israelite could plead ignorance, but all apostasy from their God and King arose from willfulness. Besides, the whole people of Israel had the right to conquer the Holy Land promised to them, by the edge of the sword, to exterminate the Canaanites destined to destruction by the express command of God, to defend themselves afterwards with the sword against all heathens who wished to disturb them in their quiet possession of the land and its liberty; not to submit to any foreign king, and if it should be subjugated for a while, and be forced to serve a foreign power, to take the first opportunity to shake off such a yoke, as an illegitimate one, and as opposing their privileges, even though this should make the shedding of blood necessary. But how different was everything after the Jewish people had come into the power of the Babylonians in the fourth year of King Jehoiakim. He had to obey the king of Babylon, and when he tried to shake off his yoke he came into great distress. Jehoniah likewise had to surrender to the Babylonians ; Jeremiah gave the same advice to Zedekiah, who perished miserably because he did not follow it. After the Babylonian exile neither Zerubbabel, nor Mordecai, nor Nehemiah, made any attempt to liberate their nation; no prophet called them to do so, as Deborah called Barak, nor an angel, as in the case of Gideon. The Jewish people were to serve the Gentiles, hence Daniel, Haggai, and Zechariah, mention the year of the reign of the Persian kings as the dates of their prophecy, and this indicates that they are their subjects. God sent the Jewish people help against the tyranny of the Syrian kings in the Maccabaeen heroes, and gave them some liberty for a short time, but it was of very short duration; and then the nations came under the rule of the Romans and the Herodians, and from that period all attempts to free the Jews from the rule of the Gentile nations only aggravated their sad condition. Hence our Saviour himself exhorted the Jews to give unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and commanded His disciples to take to flight, when the Jewish war, in which Jerusalem was destroyed, would commence, and not to take any part in the insurrection of the Jews. The apostles and primitive Christians obeyed most faithfully the heathen governments, although hated and persecuted by them, and for our own time also the following words are our rule: Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers (Rom. 13:1), and. "He that (wishes to defend and spread religion by outward force, and therefore) leadeth unto captivity shall go into captivity; he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword. Here is the patience and the faith of the saints" (Rev. 13:10). Behold, thus the statutes of the saints vary with the times, but he who does not consider the character of the period in which he lives, will act foolishly, and do harm to himself. In the last thousand (1000) years of the world the people of Israel will be delivered out of the hands of its enemies by the Lord himself, without human weapons; for the Lord will utterly defeat Antichrist and his army. Then Israel will be a free nation, and no more have any occasion for war, even as all other nations will then give up warfare (Isa. 2). Hence, what is said, Isa. 11:14, about Israel ruling over Philistines, Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites, and "spoiling them of the East," does not refer to warlike violence, or unjust spoliation, but the meaning of it is, that the nations mentioned will acknowledge the pre-eminence of Israel, and freely be subject to the Jewish people in all things, and allow them to rule over them according to the royal law of love, and this is in harmony with the order which God has instituted in His Church, according to which the weak follows the strong, the disciple his teacher. Israel will spoil those of the East in the same way as you take a sharp knife from a child, exercising your parental authority for its good, or as one robs a kind friend of the gift which he gives freely, and out of his own accord. With regard to the temporal welfare of God's people, which must also be considered in treating of God's leadings, it seems that the patriarchs enjoyed it to a great extent. They lived long, they were highly honoured, they had sufficient land for themselves and their cattle. No government oppressed them; no war disturbed them. But they had also sufferings; and the word: The Lord chasteneth whom He loveth, was true at that time also. However, for a long time the dark paths of the cross, through which God leads His people, were not known upon earth, as appears from the history of Job, whose extraordinary and manifold afflictions —but not equal to those of the apostles— were a stumbling-block to himself and to his friends, who were in other respects wise men. Towards the end of the period of the fathers of families, tribulations became more frequent and heavy, and life shorter; thus we read that Jacob had to suffer more than Isaac; Isaac more than Abraham. During the Theocracy there were many plagues, which fell on the just and on the unjust; for wherever the great majority of the people fell from God, war, famine, pestilence, tyranny, etc., were not kept back on account of the few righteous, but they being members of the kingdom, had to suffer with the wicked; the sufferings were a blessing to God's people and a curse to the unbelievers. Afterwards, God showed what a people had to suffer from the great power of a godless man, who abuses it to persecute the just and to suppress the true worship of God; for example, in the case of Saul and of Ahab. From the example of David, and of all the prophets, the people were to learn the nature of salutary spiritual conflicts and troubles. During this period, it is likely that the people of God enjoyed earthly prosperity; whenever it was governed according to the laws of God, which are the most righteous and equitable of all laws, they experienced that, under the shelter of a divine form of government, they could lead a quiet and peaceable life in all soberness and honesty; moreover, the Old Covenant contained many and special promises of temporal blessings, of which God's people took hold in faith, though they were exercised, and their patience sorely tried, and though they were sometimes chastised, or even put to death as martyrs. In the third period of the world, general and individual sufferings became more frequent and more severe. The two last destructions of Jerusalem, the Babylonian captivity, the Persian, Greek, and Roman servitude of the Jews, the distress which they had to suffer during the wars of the Syrians and Egyptians, the cruel religious persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, etc., were heavier afflictions than had been experienced in the preceding ages. Finally, the Lord Jesus Christ himself opened fully the path of sufferings and the cross, by His doctrine and blessed example; and the apostles, when they wished to glory, gloried in their tribulations, and rejoiced that they were allowed to suffer with Christ; and, indeed, their sufferings were heavier, and lasted longer, than those of the patriarchs and prophets, but the spirit of glory, and the rich blessing of God, rested on them. After the coming of Christ, His Church had scarcely any outward rest for two centuries, and many thousand Christians were persecuted, maltreated, and put to death. After that arose the Arian, Mohammedan, and Papal oppressions, in short, the distress signified in the Revelations of St John by the seven trumpets, and which will only end when the wrath of God has poured out the seven vials. The whole third period of the world abounds much more in afflictions than the others, and he who wishes to live aright in our times must try to understand the cross. Since the third year of Jehoiakim there has not been a time equal in temporal prosperity to that of the patriarchs, or judges, or David, Solomon, Asa, Jehoshaphat, etc. But there will be times of greater prosperity than the earth has ever seen. Temporal blessings and spiritual prosperity will go together in the millennium. Long life (Is. 65:20, 21,22), peace (Is. 2:4), honour (Is. 60:14, 15, 16), righteous government (Is. 54:14; 60:18) —all the rivers of blessings, which flowed in the periods of the patriarchs and the Theocracy, will meet, and the brightness of the New Testament, the spirit of grace and of supplication poured out abundantly, and the transcendent knowledge of Christ and His gospel will fill all hearts with peace and joy, and sanctify the enjoyment of all earthly blessings. Oh for the blessedness of the people who lived then to see the works of the Lord upon earth. But how great is the blessedness of them who will partake at that time of the marriage supper of the Lamb in heaven.

Sec. 12. 'The transition from one period to another' was always signaled by remarkable events. Judgment always begins at the house of God, after that even severer judgment is sent on His enemies. Israel was sorely afflicted in Egypt; but the Egyptians were plagued with ten plagues; Pharaoh and his hosts were destroyed, but Israel was delivered. In the wilderness the unbelieving Jews were destroyed, but soon after the Canaanites were exterminated. At the end of the second period, great judgments were sent on the Jews, as Jeremiah describes in his Lamentations. But, soon after the wrath of God came over Babylon, and the Jews received liberty to return to their land. But as the time of servitude was to continue for a long time, there arose always new enemies and persecutors of Israel and the Church, who end, without exception, in destruction. But finally, the Church will have to suffer grievously from the enmity of Antichrist, but will obtain perfect liberty after his downfall. In like manner, the last day will make a perfect end of everything evil, and transplant the whole Church into the glorious liberty of the children of God (Rom. 8:22). These two great and principal changes of the world are fully described in the prophetic word, in order that God's people may be warned beforehand. God revealed the exodus to Abraham four hundred (400) years before it took place (Gen. 15:13, 14). Jacob prophesied concerning it and the condition of his descendants during the Theocracy (Gen. 48:21, and 49.) Joseph also spoke of the exodus (Gen. 4:25). Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other prophets, gave many prophecies concerning the Babylonian captivity and the return from this exile; and the same prophets, as well as those who lived during and after the exile, but especially the Revelations of St John, prophesy frequently the downfall of the New Testament Babylon, the destruction of the beast, and the deliverance of the Church of Christ. Holy Scripture speaks in many places of the final judgment. Thus the Holy Ghost revealed through the prophets the great changes, which are of peculiar importance to the chosen seed. If we take heed to these, we will interpret prophecy aright, whereas many mistakes are committed by attaching importance to this or that war and calamity, which, though they may be important for those immediately affected by it, do not cause a great change on earth. We remark, however, that at every one of these four great transition times, the Lord sends great men to guide and help His Church. Thus, He sent Moses at the exodus out of Egypt, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, at the commencement of the Babylonian captivity, and each one of these had a different mission; the first remained in the land of Israel, the second was in Babylon, the third at the Babylonian and Persian courts. Shortly before the destruction of Antichrist, the two witnesses, which are described, Rev. 11, will be sent of God. I do not know whether God will send such great men previous to the final judgment, but it is probable.

Sec. 13. Moses, in his first book, describes the rule of the fathers of families; hence it is not strange that he narrates such apparently insignificant things, and includes marriages, quarrels between brothers, compacts and contracts between neighbours, buying and dividing of property, money affairs, births of children, stories of bond-servants and maid-servants, etc. Such were at that time the most important instances in which God revealed His power and mercy, love, and righteousness. The first book of Moses is the best family-book, from which we may learn what is necessary for a family. After families come kingdoms, therefore the Bible gives first the history of the former. But as the institution of families continues during the kingdoms, this book of Moses is useful in all times. The book of Job belongs to the same period, for his long life proves that he lived either in the time or before the time of Moses. We read in this book that Job, a good and upright man, was sorely afflicted in body and soul, house, and goods, honour and children; that Satan and earthly enemies, and inexperienced friends, and even his own wife, were united against him. Job was no king, and had no prince or ruler over him, therefore he could not ask anyone to protect him against the Chaldeans and Arabs, who had robbed him; and for this reason he does not complain that justice was refused him. He was the free ruler of his house and numerous servants as Abraham; but he had, moreover, "his help in the gate," from which it is likely that he stood in connection with other tribes, with whom he judged people [as a Sheik] under the gate.

Sec. 14. The history of the establishment of the Theocracy or the kingly government of God over His people, is described in Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy; but its subsequent history is contained in the other books of the Old Testament, with the exceptions of the books of Daniel, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. The most flourishing part of this period was the time when there was no visible king, and everyone did as he thought right, when the people of Israel enjoyed the greatest liberty in serving God and obeying His commandments. At that time Israel enjoyed rest, a foretaste of heaven, whence the expression, "the land had rest," is of such frequent occurrence in the book of Judges, whereas it occurs only once in the times of the kings, and then only as referring to ten years (2nd Chron. 14:1). The judges, which the Lord gave to the people by His immediate call whenever necessity required it, were not such burdens on the people as the kings proved afterwards, even as Samuel foretold them (1st Sam. 8). Moreover, in the time of the judges the people were more easily turned to repentance after they had departed from the right way, by chastisements and the authority of the judges, whereas, in the latter times of the kings, neither the severest afflictions, nor the prophets so frequently sent to them, nor even the kings (for example, 2nd Chron. 15:17) were able to lead the people back to the true worship of God after their falling into idolatry and all kinds of godlessness. Therefore, when God promised to the people of Israel, by His prophet Isaiah, the future better times, He says : "Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries and avenge me of mine enemies, and I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin, and I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning; afterward thou shalt be called the city of righteousness, the faithful city." (Isaiah 1:25, 23, 26).

Sec. 15. 'The book of Daniel' comprises the whole third period, or the whole time of the servitude and dispersion of the holy people. Hence the importance of this book, and its great use for our times. And surely this book will find many readers and investigators at this time, the end of the third period, who will find in it great wisdom, for during the fourth period of the world it will not be so necessary. But this period is described not only by Daniel, but also by Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi; also, the evangelists and apostles lived during this period, and both as prophets and teachers they speak of its peculiarities. There is, moreover, no book in the Old Testament in which mention is not made of this period, for all the prophecies of Christ's incarnation, suffering, death, resurrection, and ascension, as also the prophecies relating to the dispersion of Israel, refer to this time. But Daniel has this advantage, that he lived at the beginning of this period, and that he described it to its end; some beautiful but passing glances into the last period of the world were likewise granted him.

Sec. 16. 'The Revelation of John, or rather of the Lord Jesus Christ', resembles in many ways the prophecies of Daniel, embracing as it does, a great part of the same period described by Daniel; but the two books differ in several respects. Daniel begins with an earlier period than the Revelations, for the latter does not speak of the Babylonian, Persian, and Greek kingdoms, which, at the time of John, belonged to the past (?). Whereas the Apocalypse extends into more remote times than Daniel, and also contains a description of the last thousand (1000) years of the world (the beginning and general character of which were revealed also to Daniel), as also the final judgment, the New Jerusalem, etc. The prophecies of Daniel refer, in the first place, to Christ and the Roman destruction of Jerusalem (Dan. 9). Then they describe the last Antichrist (11:36). But the great intermediate period from the destruction of Jerusalem to Antichrist, is filled up by the Revelations of St John, which extends to the times after Antichrist. Besides, a Daniel, who was a holy statesman, described the history of the people of God, viewed in relation to the four world-kingdoms. John, on the other hand, as an apostle and teacher of the Church, had to view history from the Christian or churchly aspect, though he mentions worldly kings and kingdoms occasionally. In the prophecies of Daniel, the four world kingdoms, which he saw represented by different symbols, form the thread which runs through the whole book, so that he prophesies the sufferings of the people of God under each of these kingdoms. It is quite different in the case of John. He saw and described the history of the Church during and after the fourth world-kingdom, but he did not see that kingdom itself under any symbol (?), whereas he saw the Church as a woman clothed with the sun (Rev. 12), which Daniel did not see apart from the kingdoms of the world. Thus, Daniel saw the last Antichrist as a horn growing out of the fourth beast or fourth kingdom, but John described it as a separate beast, having an individual existence. Daniel called him a king, and dwells at length on his worldly conquests and warfares; John looked more to his spiritual tyranny and seduction; for which reason he adds a second beast, the false prophet, who comes in the semblance of spirituality. Thus, Antichrist and his followers are described by the two prophets, Daniel, and Isaiah. Isaiah 29 and Joel 3, and Zechariah 12,13, and 14, describe more particularly the army of Antichrist or the heathens which came up against Jerusalem and Israel, but Antichrist himself is not mentioned in their prophecy. Thus, one prophet supplements the other, for they all prophesied only “in part.” What was obscure to the one was revealed to the other; what is only briefly described by the one is more fully prophesied by the other.

Sec. 17. With regard to the 'fourth period of the world', or the 'thousand (1000) last years of the world', there is no book of the Bible which treats of them exclusively; but the promises referring to that blessed time are scattered throughout the Scriptures, and added as a source of consolation and hope to the prophecies concerning the dangers and afflictions of the Church. And let this suffice. In this order we must speak and write about it. It is revealed, not to satisfy curiosity, but to strengthen our faith and to quicken our hope. It is easy for us to bear good and joyful events whenever they come, though they were not circumstantially foretold; but it consoles a Christian, who is often grieved and distressed in these dark times, and who has a zeal for the honour of Jesus Christ and His kingdom, to look forward to the golden times, when all 'pia desideria' will be fulfilled and realised, and to see them even now in the mirror of the divine word. }}

8. Tregelles.

Remarks on the Prophetic Visions in the Book of Daniel, by Samuel Prideaux Tregelles. London.1847.

{{ Preface:.....Nothing gives us any indication of the immediate introduction of the latter day, except this to which Christ directs us: –we might see many things to make us expect that the fig-tree would soon bud, but when we see the buds (and not till then) can we speak with certainty as to what is forthwith to come to pass. We might see attempts of the nations to set the Jews in the Holy Land; –this ought to make us look carefully to Jerusalem; –God might hinder those efforts, or He might allow the fearful closing scenes of this dispensation to issue out of them, and at length He will do.

The importance of the 'detail of prophecy' is very great to the believer; it certainly is a sad thing to see this extensive portion of God's truth overlooked and neglected. It is by the detail of prophecy that we learn how to walk in tile midst of present things according to God; it is thus we learn His judgment about them, and what their issue will be. Many Christians directed their minds much to this a few years ago; but it cannot, I believe, be denied, that this portion of revealed truth has more recently been neglected and overlooked: those who have done this have surely omitted to see bow important its present bearing is on the conscience and conduct: what other portion of revelation shews so clearly the separateness from the systems of men, to which believers are called?.....These Remarks on the Prophetic Visions In the book of Daniel, are intended especially to direct the mind towards some of the important portions of the detail of prophecy with which the Scripture furnishes us. They have been written at various times, and amid various hindrances. I trust that the Remarks may be found helpful to Christian who desire to learn from the prophetic word, and that the Lord may vouchsafe to bless them to that end. Dec. 9, 1846, S.P.T. }}

{{ Remarks on the Second Chapter of Daniel:We may divide this book into two parts; namely, that part which is written in the Chaldee language, and that which is written in Hebrew. While we see that the book has one general scope, namely Jerusalem given by God for a time into the power of the Gentiles who bear rule, –we may regard this in two ways; we may either look at Gentile power in the outline of its history, or we may look at those things relating to this power in their local connection with Jerusalem. Now the course, character, and crisis of Gentile power are taken up in this book in the Chaldee language, while those things which are limited in their application to the Jews and Jerusalem are written in Hebrew.

There are very few portions of the Scripture which are written in Chaldee, –there are some parts of Ezra so written, which bring before us the children of Israel as being under the power of the Gentiles, –there are some parts of this book, and one verse in Jeremiah (10:11) which contains a message sent to the Gentiles. This passage occurs just as the gods of the nations had been mentioned in contrast with the living God. It is important that we should so bear in mind the inspiration of Scripture as to recognize that nothing respecting it can be looked on as accidental; whatever God has written, and however it be written: there must be in every circumstance a reason; whether we possess sufficient spiritual intelligence or not to apprehend it. Now it is important in such a case as the present to see that God has not made this difference of language without a very definite scope and object: –The Chaldee portion of Daniel commences at the 4th verse of the second chapter, and continues to the end of the seventh chapter: all the rest of the book is written in Hebrew. In the Chaldee portion we see power in the hands, or the Gentile presented before us as to its character, course, and consummation; and in the latter portion of the book we see the same power localized in connection with the Jews and Jerusalem. The Gentile power is in each part that which is prominently before us, although looked at in different aspects..... }} {{ Remarks on the Eight Chapter of Daniel: The prophetic scene becomes narrowed before us in this chapter; one definite portion of future history is here anticipatively written for as by God. The same is the way which God has taken in teaching us those things which were profitable for us to know, as to the past, If we look at the history of man as given in Genesis, we have at first after the flood, the general statement in outline of all nations in their ancestry and first formation; and then afterwards a narrower scene is brought before us, –one family which becomes one nation, and with this we principally have to do in the remainder of the Old Testament. Just so in the prophetic visions of Daniel; we have Gentile power in its committal, course and crisis; also in its wideness of extent, its moral relations to God, and its actings with regard to those who belong to God; and besides, an account of who it is that succeeds to the dominion which has been forfeited by the last of the Gentile powers: and then comes the narrower scene, in which we see these things set before us in their connection with that same one nation, which had been so early taken up in history.....

(Chapter 9:27-28.Seventy Weeks when Distributed into Portions, will then stand thus:

I. From the Edict to the Building of the Wall, &c.... = 49 years.

II. From the Building to Messiah the Prince, & His Cutting Off..... = 434 years.

[Then an interval of unmarked length.[So far 2000 years.]]

III. Period of the Covenant of "the Prince that shall come," = 7 years [In 2 Halves].)

On the "Year-Day System."

Many have adopted a system of interpretation of those prophecies in which spaces of time are mentioned to which they have given the name of "the year-day system."

This system may be stated thus: –that in such prophecies as treat of space of time in future events, the principle on which they are written is, that 'a day' stands as the representative of 'a year', and other spaces of time in the same proportion.

On this principle they would interpret three years and a half as meaning 1260 years; and they after speak of this period, and also of the 2300 'years' of chap. 8.

Now it is certain that these prophecies do not state anything upon the face of them which can support such a mode of interpretation: –it is also clear, (or at least, it ought to be so) that no canon of interpretation ought to be laid down and pressed, unless it can be distinctly proved from the Scripture.

Certain passages are commonly referred to in support of this hypothesis.

Num. 14:34, "After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities even forty years." This passage speaks of a denounced fact, but there is nothing that implies a principle of interpretation. They had searched the land forty 'days'; God sentences them to wander the same number of 'years'. In the prophetic part of the sentence year, are used of literal years, and not as the symbol of anything else. If the year-day system were applied to this passage, we should have to interpret the "forty years" in that way, and thus we should have a vast period of fourteen thousand four [hundred] (14,400 = 14x360; 14,600 = 14x365) years. This passage so far from upholding the year-day system in the slightest degree, supplies pointed evidence against it.

Ezek. 4. "Lie thou also upon thy left side, and lay the iniquity of the house of Israel upon it : according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie upon it, thou shalt bear their iniquity. For I have laid upon thee the years of their iniquity, according to the number of the days, three hundred and ninety (390) days: so shalt thou bear the iniquity of the house of Israel. And when thou hast accomplished them, lie again on thy right side, and thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty (40) days: I have appointed thee each day for a year."

Now this is not a symbolic 'prophecy' at all, but simply a symbolic 'action', which was commanded by God; and unless there had been the express statement, we never could have known that what Ezekiel did, for so many days really represented the actions of the same number of years. It is true that this is an instance in which a day symbolically represents a year, but the way in which this is done is wholly different from any such ground being taken as though in prophetic language the one were used for the other.

A third passage which some have used as a basis for this system is this latter part of the ninth of Daniel; –some however of the strenuous advocates of the year day principle (such as Elliott in his Horae Apocalyptical) fairly own that it has no bearing upon the question. It's supposed connection arises from the word rendered "week" having been taken as though it must be simply in its literal meaning seven 'days'. This might be called wholly a question of lexicography: –the word itself is strictly, 'something divided into' or consisting of seven parts. It bears the same grammatical relation to the numeral seven, as one of the Hebrew words used for ten does to the other of similar meaning. Gesenius simply defines its meaning to be "a septenary number," he then speaks of its use as applied sometimes to days, sometimes to years; –the word itself however defines nothing as to the denomination to which it belongs, whether the one or the other. In Ezek. 45:21 it is used almost entirely like a numeral, standing with a feminine plural termination in connection with a masculine noun, (according to the peculiar usage of numerals in Hebrew and the cognate languages;) and this passage is important as shewing its use. It is not to be denied nor yet to be wondered at that it should be more often used of 'week' than anything else, for this obvious reason, that of all things admitting a septenary division there is nothing so often spoken of as a week. In this sense however it more commonly takes the feminine plural termination.

In the present passage it takes its denomination from 'years' which had been previously mentioned in Daniel's prayer: it has here the masculine plural termination, which 'may' arise from year being 'feminine'; but this could not be absolutely stated as the reason, for it is once used with the masculine plural joined to 'days'.

I am well aware that strong assertions have been made to this effect: –that if we follow the conventional reading (i.e. with points), it is simply "seventy weeks," (i.e. of seven 'days') but that if we reject the points, it must mean "seventy seventies;" –this statement is very incorrect. I do read with the points, but the argument does not rest upon them. I do not admit that periods of seven days are necessarily indicated by the words itself. But if we paid no attention to the points we are not left to any such meaningless rendering as "seventy seventies;" –the fact must have been overlooked, that in verse 27, where the word occurs in the singular, it is twice written full, (i.e. with the letter Vau inserted,) and this, without any points to help us, decides the matter.

In translating, I have used the word "week," not at all conceding the point of the meaning of the Hebrew word, but simply for convenience sake, and as requiring less explanation and circumlocution than any other which I could think of. I believe that I need say no more to prove that this 9th of Daniel in no way upholds the year-day scheme.

But it also supplies decisive evidence against it: –what on this scheme could be made, if the seventy 'years' foretold by Jeremiah? How could Daniel have known the time to be drawing then to a close? Seventy (70, LXX) years on this scheme would represent more than 250 'centuries'. It is certain that Daniel knew nothing of this principle of interpretation,

Let the same be applied to Nebuchadnezzar's madness, and it will be a period yet incomplete: apply it to the three days of our Lord's burial, and we see its impossibility.

I think that I need say no more to show not only that the "year-day system" is wholly unsupported by Scripture, but also that Scripture, supplies positive evidence against it.

If we were to admit a 'non scriptural' canon of interpretation, we should do much injury to truth; how much more must this be the case if we admit what is absolutely 'anti-scriptural': the one might be adding to the word of God, but the other would be even contradicting it.

On the 20th of Artaxerxes.

Some have found a difficulty in making out the chronology of the seventy (70, LXX) weeks, because they have thought that the time from the 20th of Artaxerxes to the crucifixion of our Lord would not fully accord with that marked out in the prophecy. If it had been so, it need have surprised no one; whatever be the result of chronological calculations, the word of God is the same; we know that it is certain, and everything else must bend to it,

But here I believe the difficulty to be wholly imaginary. It is true that we may find some from the date pointed in the margin of our Bibles; but the history of this date as it there stands is rather curious. Archbishop Usher drew up a scheme of Chronology which is commonly followed, rather from convenience, than from its absolute correctness being supposed. About a hundred and fifty (150) years ago Bishop Lloyd undertook affixing Archbishop Usher's dates to our English Bibles; but 'in this instance' he made a considerable alteration, and substituted another date of his own so as to adapt the reign of Artaxerxes to his own theory.

The date which stands in our Bibles for the 20th of Artaxerxes is B.C. 446; –this makes the commencement– of his reign B.C. 466: –but the authority of the best and most nearly contemporary historian will put the matter in a very different light. Thucydides mentions that the accession of Artaxerxes had taken place before the flight of Themistocles: this authorizes us to adopt Usher's date, and place the commencement of the reign 473 or 474 B.C. This would give the date of 454 or 455 B.C. If we add to this the date of the crucifixion it will just give us the exact period of the sixty nine (69) weeks. In doing this we must remember that the birth of our Lord was about 4 years before the common era, so that the thirty third (33rd) year of his life, when he suffered, would correspond with 28 or 29 of our reckoning. I believe the former to have been the true date; first because of the day of the week on which the Passover commenced in that year, and also because of the consuls of that year having been mentioned by several writers as those of the year when our Lord was put to death.

These Remarks do not affect the instruction given us by God in this chapter; they are points which I only notice for the removal of difficulties.

Note on the Rendering of Daniel XII:2.

I do not doubt that the right translation of this verse is what has been given above: "And many from among the sleepers of the dust of the earth shall awake; these shall be unto everlasting life; but those [the rest of the sleepers, those who do not awake at this time] shall be unto shame and everlasting contempt." The word which in our authorized version is twice rendered "some" is never used in any another passage in Hebrew, as taking up distributively any general class which had been previously mentioned; this is enough, I believe, to warrant our applying its first occurrence to the whole of the many who awake, and the second to the mass of the sleepers who do not awake at this time. It is clearly not a general resurrection, "many 'from among';" and it is only by taking the words in this sense that we gain any information as to what becomes of those who continue to sleep in the dust of the earth. This translation is given as undoubtedly correct in Gerard Kerkherder's "Prodromus Danielicus."

I do not regard it as needful to make any remark upon the opinion, that such statements as these only relate to temporal deliverance or something of the kind. I will only ask, if such language is not declaratory of a resurrection actual and literal, is there such a thing as a resurrection spoken of in any passage of Scripture (or at least of the Old Testament) at all? How could our Lord have reproved the Sadducees for their ignorance?

This passage has been understood by the Jewish commentators in the sense that I have stated. Of course these men with the vail on their hearts are no guides as to the use of the Old Testament; but they are helps as to the grammatical and lexicographical value of sentences and words. Two Rabbis, Saadiah Haggan (in the tenth century of our era) and Aben Ezra (in the twelfth) have commented on this prophet: the latter of these was a writer of peculiar abilities and accuracy of mind. He explains the verse in the following manner: —'those who rise are the dead of Israel who will be blessed under the reign of king Messiah'; he notices none as awaking at this time but the dead of Israel, and he regards it as a literal resurrection. This had been the view of Saadiah whom he often quotes. But Aben Ezra thought only of earthly blessing, for he speaks of their living in the land and feasting on Behemoth, Leviathan, &c. He is explicit as to there being a first and a second resurrection; though his doctrine as to this is directly contradictory to that of our Lord and His Apostles; —so much so, as to make it probable that the same notions had been current among the Pharisees even in our Lord's days. Aben Ezra says that the dead of Israel who shall rise, shall enjoy themselves in the land even to old age, that they shall die again, and rise again at the general resurrection. Our Lord says, "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more": for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection" (Luke 20:35,36). "It is raised in incorruption." "It is raised a spiritual body." "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality" (1st Cor. 15) "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection, on such the second death shall have no power" (Rev. 20). These are the truths which God has vouchsafed that we should know; but still in all their ignorance, the Jewish teachers did hold two resurrections, one of the just, and the other the only one in which the unjust should rise at all. It is marvellous with the words of Scripture before them mentioning "eternal life," they could have thought that the participants in the first resurrection could die again: had they known Christ's resurrection, they 'could' not have thus erred.

Note on the Interpretation of the Former Part of Daniel XI, by Past History.

Many have supposed that there has been so exact a fulfilment of the former part of Dan. 11 in the history of the royal houses of Seleucus and Ptolemy, that all the terms of the vision have been fully met; so that, to say the least, there is no need to look for any farther accomplishment. It has been thought that a continuous history runs on from the time of Alexander the Great, to Antiochus Epiphanes; and then, those who look for the glories of the Lord's Millennial reign, and who see that a personal Antichrist precedes, have supposed that there is a transition to the times yet future. I have already remarked on the especial importance of seeing the application of the latter part of the vision, but still, it is well to observe what Scripture makes the true application of all the parts. If the chapter be so joined together, as I have sought to shew, then no alleged past accomplishment need detain our minds from looking onwards, and no testimony of past history ought to divert our minds from so doing.

But what is this testimony drawn from past history? It is a series of events selected from the circumstances of the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, and put together in order to meet, as well as may be, the terms of the prophecy. But even this is not continuous; for there is almost at the very beginning a break, and that too at the place, where I believe the long interval to be, in between verses 4 and 5. The kings of the north and south who are here first mentioned, are not the immediate successors of Alexander (upon the historical scheme), but one of each line, a generation or two down. Other breaks also exist upon this scheme, and events are passed by at least as marked and as important, as some of those that are mentioned. But farther, there are several points in which history and this chapter are directly at variance. I freely own that 'if' I saw this portion of prophecy did really belong to this past period, then all supposed discrepancies of every sort must be charged upon history and upon that only. For instance, "he that begat her" in verse 6, is directly contrary to the supposed history, and to make it suit, the incorrect rendering "whom she brought forth" is put in the margin. The description in verse 8, is much at variance with the history, as Jerome pointed out in his answer to Porphyry long ago. I might go on pointing out these little variations; but there is one more only, which I would specify: —In verse 20 "the raiser of taxes" reigns "few days;" to force this to suit, resort has been had to the "year-day" system, and some of the explanations state this as a plain and simple fact; for instance, the authors of the "Universal History" had their minds so imbued with the idea, that they quote this verse, "within few 'years'."

The idea that the past history of Alexander's successors is the subject of this chapter first appears, I believe, in the first book of Maccabees (in itself a useful and interesting piece of history;)—the writer knew of what had just befallen his nation in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes; he knew too, what Daniel had predicted, and he thought, naturally enough, that the one was the fulfilment of the other. He applied the Psalms which speak of the Jews in their latter-day trouble, to that time, and seemed to think that after the destruction of Antiochus, the promises of blessing would be accomplished. If it were taken as a fixed point that the pollution of the temple by Antiochus, is truly the "abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet," then, of course, the former part of the chapter would belong to what immediately preceded his reign.

The first person who (as far as I know) tried to draw this out into a regular scheme was the great enemy of revelation, Porphyry. We know from Jerome a great deal of what Porphyry said, and the object of Jerome was not exactly to confute his application of the former part of the chapter, but to vindicate the latter, and to shew, whatever the former part meant, the latter spoke of the Antichrist. But still Jerome often remarks that such and such alleged events rest wholly upon Porphyry's assertion and that others do not accord with facts. Indeed it is a simple fact that many of the things which Rollin and similar writers, bring forward as minute accomplishments of prophecy are points only gathered from the prophecy itself, without being known from any independent evidence, and therefore all depends upon the accuracy with which they have understood the application and meaning of the prophecies. Porphyry's position was, that the book of Daniel was a spurious book, composed about the time of the Maccabees, and thus not a prophecy at all. But though I object to the supposition that Antiochus Epiphanes and his pollution of the temple, are here taught us, I most freely admit, that the deeds of Antiochus form a striking and solemn foreshadowing of what shall be in the days of the Antichrist. Antiochus set up, on the altar of burnt-offering an idol, and built an altar before it, upon which he sacrificed abominations. Fierce and bitter persecution was the treatment of those who abstained from participating in these pollutions.

And yet the claims and conduct of the Antichrist will go beyond this. In reading (simply as a piece of uninspired history), the first book of Maccabees, we may form some idea of the more fearful display of evil, which is yet to be.

Note on the Fourth Chapter of Daniel.

Although the object of these "Remarks" has been to speak of those portions of Daniel, which are still, in a great measure, future, this chapter should not be wholly passed by; for here we have in the past accomplishment of a vision, an earnest of the exact and precise fulfilment which all of these visions must necessarily receive.

The king Nebuchadnezzar saw the vision of the tree, (verses 10-12); it grew in the midst of the earth, it was great and fair; its fruit, much; and it afforded food for fowl and beast. But this, which was so splendid in the eyes of men, received sentence by the mouth of a watcher, and an holy one who came down from heaven; —"Hew down the tree, cut off his branches, shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit: let the beasts get away from under it, and the fowls from off his branches. Nevertheless, leave the stump of his roots in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth; let his heart be changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him, and let seven times pass over him." After the sentence, and its duration, the object is next stated; —"This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones; to the intent that the living may know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men."

This was interpreted to the king by Daniel; —Nebuchadnezzar was himself the tree, that had become great and had overshadowed the earth; the meaning of the hewing down of the tree, &c., is then explained: —"This is the interpretation, O king, and this is the decree of the Most High, which is come upon my lord the king; that they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, and they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and they shall wet thee with the dew of heaven, and seven times shall pass over thee, till thou know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will. And whereas they commanded to leave the stump of the tree roots; thy kingdom shall be sure unto thee, after that thou shalt have known that the heavens do rule." Daniel then advises the king as to the breaking off of his sins, bestowing his counsel in vain.

All that had been spoken was exactly carried out. The heart of Nebuchadnezzar was lifted up with pride, instead of owning the Most High as ruling in the kingdoms of men. The utterance of his heart was —"Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?" The sentence was then executed upon him to the very letter, and when the appointed period was accomplished, the promised restoration took place. "And at the end of the days, I, Nebuchadnezzar, lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me; and I blessed the Most High, and I praised and honoured him that liveth for ever, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and His kingdom is from generation to generation. And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing; and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" Then followed the restoration of the kingdom to him, and the record of these things, is the account, which he himself sent, in a public edict throughout his empire.

Here we have not only an instructive illustration of the exactitude with which prophecy is accomplished, –but also a lesson to Gentile power– a lesson indeed, which has not been learned, but which ought to have been learned, that the Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men. The very next chapter shews us how this was forgotten by Belshazzar, and how 'his' kingdom was utterly taken away; but still, the results in this book shew that power will never be held u from God and for God, until Christ takes it into his own hand. –God dealt with the first head of Gentile power for the instruction of those who should come after; but the result has only been the farther and farther estrangement from God, until this shall be fully exhibited in the Antichrist.

Note on the Prophetic Interpretation in Connection with Popery.

It has been alleged that it is a kind of palliation of Popish doctrine, if we do not apply the passages in Scripture, which speak of Antichrist, to the Popedom. The primary question always must be, what is it that the Spirit of God speaks of in such or such a passage. I have endeavoured to shew that the prophecies in Daniel chap. 7 & 8 are not applicable to the Pope; that they have in fact another meaning. But this does not affect the question as to what Popery and its doctrines are in the sight of God; and every one of those passages which sets forth the gospel of the grace of God, sets itself in full opposition to Romanism; –not, it is true, in opposition to Romanism merely, but also to everything else in which the doctrines of grace are not fully held and taught. There is such a thing as pride in being "Protestants," and I doubt not that many have been using Scripture prophecy (rightly as they have thought) against the Church of Rome, while, as to the vital point, "How can a sinner be justified in the sight of God?" they have been as far from the truth as the Romanists themselves.

But it is important to see that an abomination, worse than Popery, is to arise; and the adherents of it will be certainly lost: –"If any man worship the beast and his image, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God." And this shall draw into its vortex, all (except the elect of God) who are within the sphere of its influence; "All shall worship him, whose names have not been written in the Lamb's book of life." If this abomination were Popery, all would be saved who are not Roman-Catholics, –as though there were none wicked outside that pale. And all who are, or ever have been, within that pale would be lost: –and yet, the Reformers were originally Papists: –Luther himself was not only a Roman Catholic, but a priest, and also an Augustine monk. This searching for Popery in Scriptures which speak of a worse consummation, would thus lead to strange results; and the very declarations of the word of God, would have to be softened, because the mind feels that such statements cannot be fully applied to the consequences of Popery. If we admit that a person in the Church of Rome may possibly be saved, through faith in the blood of Christ (not through, but in spite of his system), and if one who renounces his errors, and leaves that system, accepting the gospel, may be saved, and used as an honoured servant of Christ, –then, in fact, the whole matter is conceded; –that a worse abomination than Popery is treated of in the word, and that it is no palliation of Popery to admit that such is the fact. But if I were to apply such Scriptures as 2nd Thess. 2 to the Popedom, I should feel that I were indeed palliating Romanism. What is meant by "the temple of God?" In Scripture this is 1st, the elect Church, or 2nd, the bodies of individual saints –the Holy Ghost dwelling in both, or 3rd, our Lord's human body, or 4th, the actual temple of God, at Jerusalem. Has the Pope sat, or could he sit, shewing himself that he is God, in any of these four? If it be said that the Pope does this, as taking such a place as he does in the Church, then Popery is indeed palliated, and the line of demarcation between truth and falsehood broken down, by applying to that system a name which belongs to God's elect people. Is the temple of God, St. Peter's? Many have seemed to affirm this, and have talked about the Pope as enthroned on the high altar in that building (which is itself quite a mistake), as the fulfilment of the prophecy. But St. Peter's is not the temple of God, but the temple of an idol, and the Pope may be there seen taking the place of an idolater as much as the meanest in the crowd. Papal claims and doctrine are alike fearful falsehoods; the word of God supplies the counteracting truths; but an indiscreet zeal may only have the effect of producing the result the very reverse of what had been intended. I utterly reject the charge of palliating the evils of Popery; and I might with truth cast it back upon those who acknowledge anything in which the Pope sits, as being "the Temple of God." }}

{ 12:2. Resurrection.

(werabbim miyesheney) –'Many of those who sleep'. 'He does not say 'all ... who sleep' ... because 'all .. '.' would include all of mankind, and He made this promise only to Israel. Therefore he says, 'many ...' 'And when He says: 'these for everlasting life and others for shame'.. . His intent is not that among those who are resurrected some will be rewarded and some punished, for those who deserve punishment will not be resurrected at the time of the redemption. Rather He means that those who will awaken will have everlasting life, and those who will not awaken will be for 'shame and for everlasting abhorrence'. For all the righteous, (including) those who repented, will live; only the unbelieving and those who died without repentance will remain. All this will happen at the time of the redemption' (R' Saadiah Gaon in Emunos V'beos ch. 7. See Ibn Ezra).

